The legend told of them is, I believe, as follows:—That an English chief, after conquering and taking possession of Lower Brittany, returned to his native land in search of wives for his army and himself. He married Ursula, an English Princess, and took eleven thousand maidens as brides for his companions in arms. Ursula whilst journeying with this bridal train to join her husband was driven by a storm into the mouth of the Rhine, and arrived, somewhat oddly, at Cologne. They were there beset by a party of Huns, who murdered them all. Their bodies were discovered at Cologne in the 16th century; and the remains of SS. Ursula, which were at first mixed with those of her companions, were pointed out by a miracle for the special veneration of the faithful. Cologne is not without a rival, however, in claiming the bones of St. Ursula, for it is said that she has a whole body also at St. Jean d'Angely, besides three separate limbs and various fragments at Mans, Tours, and Bergerat. Several of her virgins also are said to have relics in various parts of Europe, and are distinguished by their proper names, as St. Ottilla, St. Fleurina, &c.

As you seem to like short letters, perhaps you may wish to encourage them by inserting this.

Your obedient servant,

VIATOR.

We feel obliged to "Viator" for his letter, which is nothing the worse for being short. We have, ourselves, seen the glass-cases of bones in the Church of St. Ursula, at Cologne, which were disgusting and dismal enough, though we were unable to discover any one who believed in them. We suppose, however, there must be still some such persons, or probably the collection would be removed to some more decent cemetery. We confess we dislike converting a Church into a charnel-house, even were it certain that all the bones belonged to unfortunate young ladies going to be married, and butchered in barbarous times by the Huns. What must have been the darkness of the sixteenth century when such wholesale disinterments could be recognized and approved of by any Church? Cart-loads of bones, taken at random from a grave-yard, and enshrined in glass-cases for the worship of the faithful. Surely the Reformation did not begin too soon!

FLOWERS FOR SEPTEMBER.

THE flowers are gradually passing away; the sober tints of autumn succeed the gay and sprightly hues of spring and summer; brown leaves rustle where brilliant flowers lately blossomed, and though some few remain as bright as ever, yet, one by one, they are going, marking, with solemn emphasis, the sure and steady advance of winter. Such is the course of human life, passing from the joyous spring-time of youth, into the short summer season of manhood, and, then, rapidly falling into "the sear and yellow leaf" that withers, drops, and is swept away by the blast of winter. The decline of summer, and the shortening of the days—of our own few days—should be watched with a feeling of something more than melancholy, were it not that there is a germ of immortal life wrapt up in our

* See our leading article for July, 1851, vol. ii., p. 79, where our readers will find that, in his great controversy with the Donatists, St. Augustine gave up the argument from the use of the name Catholic, and decided the question, which is the Catholic Church, wholly by Scripture proofs.

frail bodies, and which, we believe, ere long, will be developed into a nobler spirit when He shall come for whom we look, even the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, "who shall change our vile bodies that they may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself."—Philippians iii., v. 20-21. The assured hope of a joyful resurrection, throws a light over the evening of life, as the prospect of another spring-time, reconciles us to the fading glories of nature. Would that we could all say with Job, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, and, though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet, in my flesh, shall I see God."—Job xix., v. 25, 26, 27. If so, we may regard the departure of summer and the approach of winter, the advance of time, and the increase of years and infirmities, and the prospect of death itself, without alarm and without regret.

But, though the garden is bereft of its chief beauties, the general landscape is, perhaps, more beautiful and enchanting than ever. The clear and cloudless sky of September, and the calm serenity that its peaceful blue betokens, are in keeping with "the universal tinge of sober gold," and combine to form a scene of rich splendour, mellowed and softened into repose. There is much, also, to compensate in the fresh foliage of the evergreens, and the after-grass of the meadows. In the corn fields, we meet a very showy flower with large, deep, yellow petals, and leaves clasping their stem—the CORN MARIGOLD, or yellow ox eye (Chrysanthemum segetum). It is larger and taller than the garden Marigold, and like a large daisy. The French call it "La Marguerite jaune," or yellow daisy. In Southern Europe, our own garden Marigolds are wild flowers, and are found growing in the corn-fields, as our Corn Marigold grows here. There is another of this family of vagrants—the many-eyed Marigold—which the farmer catches trespassing among his corn, in its gay, yellow dress. The Marigolds all belong to the chrysanthemum tribe, of which these wild ones form our only native specimens. Our garden chrysanthemums are natives of China. Their botanical name, chrysanthemum, signifies, in the Greek, gold-flower; so our native specimens were called by Chaucer, and the early English poets, gold flowers; and, in England, they are still called goules, or goulans. In Denmark, the farmers found this gay but too prolific intruder so injurious to agriculture, that a law was passed for its extirpation, and a penalty imposed upon the sluggard husbandman who endangered the safety of his neighbours' fields by harbouring the proscribed flower.

Among the flowers of the preceding month which still remain, is the brilliant SCARLET LYCHNIS (Lychnis Chalcedonica). Its name is derived from a Greek word denoting a lamp, because the bright colour of its flowers was thought to be brilliant as a flame, or because the down of the plant was used to make wicks for the lamps, of olden times. It was introduced among us from Russia, which is said to have acquired it from the East, in the time of the Crusades. Somewhat resembling the Lychnis in colour is the SCARLET LOBELIA (Lobelia syphilitica), a magnificent herbaceous plant, derived from Mexico. Among the the American Indians, it has the repute of possessing valuable medicinal qualities. Another favourite flower that still remains in blossom is the SWEET SCABIOUS (Scabiosa atropurpurea), a native of the East Indies. The name is borrowed from the roughness (scaber) of the tribe of plants to which it belongs. Its deep colour, and the sweet, musky odour of its star-studded flowers have made it a favourite.

Few, indeed, are the flowers that open to the sun of September; yet there is one of singular beauty, the GENTIANELLA, with its brilliant, bell-shaped blossoms, which open now for the second time during the year. They appeared in the spring as the harbinger of summer, and now come in the autumn to sing its requiem.

"Thou comest late and comest alone,
When woods are bare and birds are flown,
And frosts and shortening days portend
The aged year is near his end.

"Then doth thy sweet and quiet eye
Look through its fringes to the sky—
Blue, blue, as if that sky let fall
A flower from its cerulean wall.

"I would, that thus when I shall see
The hour of death draw near to me,
Hope, blossoming within my heart,
May look to heaven as I depart."

This is very prettily written by the American poet, Bryant; but it wants the assured tone of Simeon, whose earnest prayer, having found Christ, was—"Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy Word, because mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou has prepared before the face of all people—a light to lighten the Gentiles and the glory of thy people Israel."—Luke ii., v. 29, 33. St. Paul describes his feelings on the subject as "having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better."—Phil. i., v. 23. This is the hope which should blossom within the heart of the departing Christian—"to be with Christ"—wherever that may be; and if he has found Christ, and experienced him in his soul as his salvation, there need be no uncertainty about the matter, but an earnest and immediate readiness, if not a desire, to depart, and to be with him, unless, as in the case of St. Paul, he knows that God has a work for him to do upon earth, which it is his duty and privilege to perform.

The Gentianella is a mountaineer, and inhabits the loftiest heights of the Swiss Alps, and the Pyrenees, and the less elevated summits of the Welsh mountains; it, consequently, requires a very pure air in which to grow, as we have found to our sorrow and disappointment. It is too fastidious to put forth a single blossom in the confined air of a town garden; even where it does condescend to flower, the bright blue of its native mountains is never attained in less elevated aspects.

The common Gentianella (Gentiana acaulis) is called by a rather paradoxical name, the large dwarf-flowered Gentian. It is scarcely an inch in height, and consists of little else than its petals, which, in size, are out of all proportion to its diminutive leaves and branches.

There is a taller Yellow Gentian (Gentiana lutea) which bears a handsome flower and a bitter root. The Gentian root is well known in medicine, and was so from an early antiquity. The name of Gentius, a King of Illyria, is preserved to memory by this brilliant little flower, as the monarch who, according to Pliny, discovered its tonic virtues.

There is another sweet flower of September, the WHITE JESSAMINE (Jasminum officinale); its name is derived from two Greek words, signifying the odour of a violet. In the daytime it may be passed unheeded, but if we go abroad in the twilight, it is sure to attract our notice by its rich perfume; and its profusion of white flowers, peering through the green foliage, are like so many scattered stars on the firmament.

The plant that wakes while others sleep—
Timid Jasmine buds that keep
Their odours to themselves all day,
But, when the sunlight dies away,
Let their delicious secret out.

The White Jessamine is a native of the East Indies; and, though now so commonly known, when first introduced into Europe, by a certain Grand Duke of Tuscany, it was kept in a garden at Pisa, under a guard of soldiers, so that no cutting of it might be stolen. But, notwithstanding the jealous vigilance of the churlish prince, who would confine the beneficent gifts of God within the narrow enclosure of his own selfish pleasure, it has escaped, and got free, and spread its fragrance over Europe to gladden the heart of many an humble cottager. So it was recently with another Grand Duke of Tuscany, who would confine a still more precious gift of God to mankind, the Bible, within the narrow limits of his will and pleasure, and place under a guard of soldiers, and in irons, the humble family of the Madini's, for venturing to read it. We have reason to hope that in spite of his tyrannical restrictions, the Word of God will find its way into many a Tuscan cottage, spreading the odour of its sanctity around, and comforting and consoling many an humble Christian with its Divine and holy precepts.

THE SAFE WAY.

Kneel down; thou hast a lonely hour,
And thou to seek thy God art free:
The name of Jesus still has power,
Ask, and the Lord shall answer thee.—Jno. xiv. 14.

Canst thou not say, "If I am right,
Lord, keep me in Rome's strictest way;
If I am wrong, oh, give me light
To show me where I go astray."—Ps. xxv. 4, 5.

"If I am right, then bid me still
On bended knee the Host adore;
If I am wrong, incline my will
To worship creature-gods no more."—Is. xliv. 9, 10.

"If I am right, bid me entreat
Ten thousand saints my cause to aid;
If I am wrong, at Jesus' feet
Let all my prayers be only laid."—1 Tim. ii. 5.

"If I am right, then bid me win,
Through penal fires, a heavenly throne;
If I am wrong, oh, cleanse my sin
In Christ's redeeming blood alone."—1 John i. 7.

"If I am right, still bid me brave,
Safe in 'the Church,' hell's fiercest shock;
If I am wrong, look down and save,
And lead to Christ, the only rock."—1 Cor. iii. 11.

"If I am right, my will control
With faith to hear the priest forgive;
If I am wrong, absolve my soul,
And in the living bid me live."—Is. xliii. 25.

Wilt thou not pray in earnest thus,
One deep, free prayer, that light be given;
With God, and not with man, discuss
If thou art on the way to heaven.—Amos v. 4, 5,

There is one book would point the way—
Wilt thou not trust its heavenly light?
Open it now—kneel down and pray,
And God direct thee to the right.—Eph. i. 17, 18.

FARM OPERATIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

THE last fortnight has come in most opportunely, and been one continued burst of the finest harvest weather that could be desired, so that harvesting operations have gone on most briskly during the past ten days in the neighbourhood of Dublin, and men's wages have risen pretty high, both in consequence of the large breadths coming in for the sickle, and the scarcity of hands. Nevertheless, it will be to the farmers' interest to stretch his purse strings a little on the occasion, and get his harvest cut and cured in such favourable weather, and which, we trust, they will take advantage of, as the nights will henceforth be growing long, chill, and damp. Let the corn, therefore, be bound as fast as cut, and stooked before the dew falls, taking care to have them set up in the most exposed and airy situations, away from hedge rows and trees. Hooding will not be necessary, unless on the approach of rain; as by leaving them uncapped the sooner the corn will be fit to carry and stack, which should be effected as soon as the grain and straw is sufficiently dry, and, when stacked, no time should be lost in securely thatching; the stacks should be made with a long shank and short head, and well-ventilated by carrying up one or more chimneys according to size, which should discharge into horizontal flues placed to open out under the eavings.

Summer Fallows, where the system is practised, should get its final harrowing about the middle of the month, then ploughed up to receive the seed, and be sown, providing sufficient rain has fallen to give the land that proper degree of consistency necessary to the successful cultivation of wheat; but, if the land is too dry and friable, it will be necessary to wait for rain; on cold, backward soils, this is also a good season for sowing wheat.

Winter Vetches should be sown this month in considerable breadth; the land should have a liberal dressing of manure, which should be well ploughed in—the earlier the better. If the land is dry, it may be ploughed flat, get a turn of the harrows and sown at the rate of four bushels of winter vetches and one bushel of rye, per Irish acre, and well harrowed in with a light harrow; but, if the land is not likely to be perfectly dry, it will be safer to plough into eight-feet ridges, lightly harrow, sow the seed, harrow well and cover with the shovel from the furrows.

Rape sown in June last should now be transplanted; if the land is poor a liberal dressing of manure will be well repaid in the greater luxuriance of the crop. In early, warm soils, and a favourable climate, this crop may still be sown; but in cold, backward soils the better plan will be to transplant.

Italian Ray-grass and Clover should be sown early in the month, in well-prepared, rich, stubble land, or after early potatoes. It may be sown in the proportions of two bushels of the ray-grass to 12 lbs. of clover, or four bushels of ray-grass to four or five lbs. of clover, per Irish acre, just as it may be desirable to have the ray-grass or clover form the greatest bulk of soiling; rye may also be now sown alone as a soiling crop.

Clover and Grass Seeds intended for meadow or pasture may still be sown; let the land have a light ploughing or scarifying, well pulverized and cleaned before sowing.

Grass Lands may now be advantageously top-dressed with rich composts. If the land is much infested with moss, it should be well scarified with the harrows to extract the moss, which should then be raked off, and harrowed before top-dressing; it should be well bush-harrowed, to distribute the manure, and then well rolled. A good opportunity will now be afforded to introduce such of the superior grass seeds as the pasture may be deficient in.

Clover Leas intended for wheat should be ploughed up forthwith. The clover should be eaten or mown close before ploughing—the latter is the better plan. A dressing of twenty to forty barrels of lime may be given and harrowed in with the seed. After many years' experience, we would strongly recommend sowing the winter wheat in eight or ten feet ridges, and shovelling the furrows, particularly in clover lea.

Cabbages, if sown early in July, will be ready for transplanting by the middle of the month. The land for this crop should be well manured and deeply tilled.

Hemp.—When the leaves begin to decay and the seeds turn brown, the main crop of hemp will be fit for pulling; it is then tied in small bundles, and stooked till dry; the seeds then thrashed out, and the bundles steeped like flax; raised when sufficiently steeped, spread out, and dew-retted till the fibres readily separate from the woody matter.

Ewes should now be selected from the general stock for breeding, and put them on good, sound, pasture, that they may be in good condition when put with the tups next month.

Lambs should also be kept on good pastures, lest they fall off in condition, which cannot be restored during the winter. Young animals should be kept in a gradually increasing condition.

Ploughing should be energetically proceeded with after the corn is cut. When subsoiling is necessary this is the best month to do it in; where there is not a proper subsoil plough or grubber, a strong, common plough, stripped of its mould, following in the track of the other, answers the purpose admirably, and will do the work very effectively.

A WISE OLD MAN.

We have been much struck with the force of the following story, which we find in the leading article of the Tablet, of Saturday, October 7:—

"Bacon tells a story of a man who had become famous among his friends for skill in reconciling differences. His son tried his hand at the same difficult task; but having failed on several occasions, he begged his father to tell him the secret of his own great success. The father told him that his secret was a very simple one; he never interfered at the beginning of the dispute; but he waited until the dispute had lasted a long while, until both parties were weary of the controversy; and, though too proud to make advances themselves, were not the less very willing to see an impartial mediator step in and aid them to do, at last, what was the common interest, and the common wish of both disputants."

Nothing is wanting to this story but the name of "the wise old man." Would our readers like to know who he is? No doubt they would. It would make the Tablet itself doubly sensible of the old man's wisdom. Now, we happen to know who that old man was; for he is a great acquaintance of ours, and we know him well. The Pope himself is that "wise old man;" and St. Bernard, "the last of the Fathers," was the foolish son!

Now, listen to this. SEVEN HUNDRED YEARS ago a dispute arose, for the first time, whether the blessed Virgin was conceived immaculate; St. Bernard, like a goose, interfered at the beginning of the dispute; of course, he failed, and all Roman Catholics will shortly be bound to believe that he was little better than a heretic, for he denied the immaculate conception; and his foolish haste to try and preserve the peace and ancient faith of the Church, only resulted in a desperate strife, of some centuries duration, between the Franciscans and Dominicans. Not so, "the wise old man;" he "waited a long while."*

At the Council of Trent, after FOUR HUNDRED YEARS of fighting, the Franciscans worked hard to get the Pope and council to settle the question. But the old man was too wise, for the parties were fighting still! The Holy Council, under the old man's direction, expressly said they would not settle it (session v.); and the present Pope, in his letter of February 3, 1849, has said—"This honour has not yet been decreed to the most holy Virgin by the Church, and the APOSTOLIC SEE." So, for THREE HUNDRED YEARS more, the old man has waited still!

But now, when the Dominicans seem to have abandoned the former doctrines and conduct of their order—now, when no Roman Catholic is heard to raise his voice on behalf of St. Bernard—now, when the dispute seems to have worn itself out, and the battle is ended—the wise old man has been for FIVE whole years (since February, 1849) cautiously feeling his way, to step in and settle the question—which he now promises to do on the 8th of December next.

* Our readers may find the history in the 1st and 2nd numbers of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, January and February, 1852, vol. I.

Never did a wise old man wait so long, watching till a dispute should be over, that he might then step in and settle it! And that is just the way we know that this is the very old man that is pointed at in the story in the Tablet.

No wonder, then, that the Tablet, as in duty bound, should admire the wisdom of its "wise old man." But, for us, it savours a little too much of that worldly wisdom, sometimes called cunning, to be suitable to the "Vicar of CHRIST" (who taught the world in another method), or "to the judge of controversies." But "the children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light."—Luke xvi. 8. And St. Bernard, with many of the errors of his age, was a "child of light" indeed, compared to "the wise old man."

THE INVOCATION OF SAINTS.—No. III.

We undertook in our first article on this subject to give our readers some account of the manner in which the corrupt practice of saint-worship was gradually introduced into the Church, thinking that no error is fully refuted, until some explanation is given how men ever came to adopt and practice it. And here we shall not indulge in any theory or speculation of our own, but prefer what has been already written by eminent writers; and we consider ourselves fortunate in being able to refer to the writings of a very eminent Roman Catholic author of our own day, M. Beugnot, who has, singularly enough, largely developed the subject in his "Histoire de la Destruction du Paganisme en Occident"—a work which is considered one of the masterpieces of modern French literature, and was crowned as such by one of the most learned bodies of Europe, the "Academie des Inscriptions et des Belles Lettres," of Paris. We propose to avail ourselves, in our present article, of the result of his learned labours, merely premising that hero or dæmon worship was a favourite part of all Pagan systems of religion, and that the invasion of Italy by the Pagan Goths and Vandals appears to have been nearly cotemporaneous with the rise and growth of saint-worship in the Church of Rome.

"The fundamental idea of Christianity," says M. Beugnot, "was a new powerful idea, and independent of all those by which it had been preceded. However, the men by whom the Christian system was extended and developed, having been formed in the school of Paganism, could not resist the desire of connecting it with the former systems. It was, indeed, making a large concession to the spirit of ancient times; but they believed that they could correct its inconveniences by maintaining in all its purity the form of Christian worship, and rejecting with disdain the usages and ceremonies of polytheism. When Christianity became the dominant religion, its doctors perceived that they would be compelled to give way equally in respect to the external form of worship, and that they would not be sufficiently strong to constrain the multitude of pagans, who were embracing Christianity with a kind of enthusiasm as unreasoning as it was of little duration, to forget a system of acts, ceremonies, and festivals, which had such an immense power over their ideas and manners. The Church admitted, therefore, into her discipline, many usages evidently pagan. She undoubtedly has endeavoured to purify them, but she never could obliterate the impression of their original stamp.

"This new spirit of Christianity—this eclectism, which extended even to material things—has, in modern times, given rise to passionate discussions; those borrowings from the old religion were condemned, as having been suggested to the Christians of the fourth and fifth centuries by the remnants of that old love of idolatry which was lurking at the bottom of their hearts. It was easy for the modern reformers to condemn, by an unjust blame, the leaders of the Church; they should, however, have acknowledged, that the principal interest of Christianity was to wrest from error the greatest number of its partisans, and that it was impossible to attain this object without providing for the obstinate adherents of the false gods an easy passage from the temple to the Church. If we consider that, notwithstanding all these concessions, the ruin of paganism was accomplished only by degrees and imperceptibly—that, during more than two centuries, it was necessary to combat, over the whole of Europe, an error which, although continually overthrown, was incessantly rising again—we shall understand that the conciliatory spirit of the leaders of the Church was true wisdom.

"St. John Chrysostom says that the devil having perceived that he could gain nothing with the Christians by pushing them in a direct way into idolatry, adopted for the purpose an indirect one. If the devil—that is to say, the pagan spirit—was changing its plan of attack, the Church was also obliged to modify her system of defence, and not to affect an inflexibility which would have kept from her a great number of people, whose irresolute conscience was fluctuating between falsehood and truth.

"Already, at the beginning of the fifth century, some haughty spirits—Christians who were making a display of the dignity of their virtues, and who were raising an outcry against the profanation of holy things—began to preach a pretended reform; they were recalling the Christians to the apostolic doctrine; they demanded what they were calling a true Christianity. Vigilantius, a Spanish priest, sustained on this subject an animated contest with St. Jerome. He opposed the worship of the saints, and the custom of placing candles on their sepulchres; he condemned, as a source of scandal, the vigils in the basilicas of the martyrs, and many other usages, which were, it is true, derived from the ancient worship. We may judge by the warmth with which St. Jerome refuted the doctrines of this heresiarch, of the importance which he attached to those usages. He foresaw that the mission of the Christian doctrine would be to adapt itself to the manners of all times, and to oppose them only when they would tend towards depravity. Far from desiring to deprive the Romans of certain ceremonial practices which were dear to them, and whose influence had nothing dangerous to the Christian dogmas, he openly took their part, and his conduct was approved by the whole Church.

"If St. Jerome and St. Augustine had shared the opinions of Vigilantius, would they have had the necessary power successfully to oppose the introduction of pagan usages into the ceremonies of the Christian Church? I do not believe they would. After the fall of Rome, whole populations passed under the standards of Christianity, but they did it with their baggage of senseless beliefs and superstitious practices. The Church could not repulse this crowd of self-styled Christians, and still less summon them immediately to abandon all their ancient errors; she, therefore, made concessions which were not entirely voluntary. They may be considered as calculations full of wisdom on the part of the leaders of the Church, as well as the consequence of that kind of irruption which was made at the beginning of the fifth century into the Christian society by populations who, notwithstanding their abjuration, were Pagans in their manners, their tastes, their prejudices, and their ignorance.

"The Romans had derived from their religion an excessive love of public festivals. They were unable to conceive a worship without the pompous apparel of ceremonies. They considered the long processions, the harmonious chants, the splendour of dresses, the light of tapers, the perfume of frankincense, as the essential part of religion. Christianity, far from opposing a disposition which required only to be directed with more wisdom (?), adopted a part of the ceremonial system of the ancient worship. It changed the object of its ceremonies, it cleansed them from their old impurities, but it preserved the days upon which many of them were celebrated; and the multitude found thus in the new religion, as much as in the old one, the means of satisfying its dominant passion.*

"The neophytes felt for the pagan temples an involuntary respect. They could not pass at once from veneration to a contempt for the monuments of their ancestor's piety. Christianity understood the power of this feeling; it consented, therefore, to establish the solemnities of its worship in the edifices which it had long disdained. Its care not to offend pagan habits was such, that it often respected even the pagan names of these edifices. There are at Rome even now several Churches which had formerly been pagan temples, and thirty-nine of them have been built on the foundation of such temples. Four

* On comparing the Christian calendar with the Pagan, it is impossible not to be struck by the great concordance between the two. The Saturnalia and several other festivals were celebrated on the calends of January; Christmas was fixed at the same epoch the Lupercalia—a pretended feast of purification—took place on the calends of February; the Christian purification (Candlemas) was celebrated on the 2nd of February; the festival of Augustus—celebrated on the calends of August—was replaced by that of St. Peter, to whom is established on the first of that month.

Churches at Rome have pagan names—viz., S Maria Sopra Minerva, S Maria Aventina, St. Lorenzo in Matuta, and St. Stefano del Cacco.

"There is, moreover, a peculiar cause to which the rapid decline of the pagan doctrines in the west must be ascribed. On the 21st June, 431, two hundred bishops at the Council of Ephesus declared that the Virgin Mary should be honoured as the mother of God. The worship of Mary the mother of God, seems to have been the means which Providence has employed for completing Christianity. The nations were as if dazzled by the image of this Divine mother, who united in her person the two most tender feelings of nature—the pudicity of the virgin, and the love of the mother. They accepted this new worship with an enthusiasm sometimes too great, because with many Christians it became the whole Christianity. The pagans did not even try to defend their altars against the progress of the worship of the mother of God; they opened to Mary the temples which they kept closed to Jesus Christ,* and confessed their defeat. It is true that they often mixed with the worship of Mary those pagan ideas, those vain practices, those ridiculous superstitions, from which they seemed unable to detach themselves; but the Church rejoiced, nevertheless, at their entering into her pale, because she knew that it would be easy to her (?) to purge of its alloy, with the help of time, a worship whose essence was purity itself. Thus, some prudent concessions, temporarily made to the pagan manners, and the worship of Mary, were two elements of force which the Church employed in order to conquer the resistance of the last pagans—a resistance which was feeble enough in Italy, but violent beyond the Alps."

We beg our readers to recollect that the whole of the above long extract is taken from an eminent Roman Catholic writer, and did space permit there is much more of M. Beugnot's work which we might extract with benefit, as proving, in an unanswerable manner, the extent to which pagan rites and ideas were admitted into the Roman Catholic Church by way of compromise between Christianity and paganism; but we shall merely observe, that however natural it is to believe that such a line of policy may have contributed to the rapidity of the extension of the external dominion of Christianity, it as naturally accounts for the introduction into her pale of errors and superstitions, which (as we must ever think the propagation of Divine truth by the Church of Christ to be a matter of principle not policy), we cannot but think, it was her mission to eradicate and destroy, instead of delivering over mankind, as far as lay in her power, to their baneful influence.

With such admissions on the part of an able writer, not at all imbued with Protestant notions or arguments, we think it will not be very difficult to understand or imagine how the saints of the Roman Church, to whom the defence of particular countries was assigned, took the place of the Dii Tutelares of the pagan world; how those to whom the safety of certain cities were committed, took the place of their Dii Præsides; or such saints as temples and churches were built and altars erected to, of their Dii Patroni; in short, how the practice of saint and martyr worship was gradually, during the fourth and fifth centuries, substituted for the hero, or dæmon worship of pagan Rome.

We have still, however, to show the way in which sincere Christians were themselves gradually led into superstitious practices, which, in the primitive ages, they were ignorant of; and to trace some, at least, of the steps by which this kind of worship grew up to the height which it ultimately arrived at in the Church of Rome.

That during the first ages of Christianity, when persecution raged against it, and martyrdom was no infrequent testimony to the earnestness and devotedness of its professors, the primitive Christians should have held these martyrs and confessors in the greatest honour, on account of the great service they had done to the cause of Christ, was both natural and commendable. In fact, they were in the habit of frequenting their tombs, and rehearsing there the good works they had done in their lifetime, and their faith, patience, and constancy in death. There they blessed God for the grace that was given to them, and proposed their virtues for imitation, and had their own piety and zeal inflamed by the remembrance of them. This was the honour which the primitive Christians deservedly showed to their victorious martyrs—they loved their memories, commemorated their virtues, and blessed God for their example; but they did not invocate them; that, as we showed in our former paper, they reserved as the religious worship which was due to God only.

Towards the middle and latter end, however, of the fourth century, the state of the Church had greatly changed. The Emperor, Constantine the Great, had been converted to Christianity, and the Church had rest and ease, and prosperity began to dawn upon it. Riches and honour at length began to attend the profession, for which so many had suffered martyrdom; and those who were wont to frequent the tombs of the martyrs, that at the sight of the place their affections might be raised, their devotions enlivened, and their faith and charity receive warmth and heat from their burning and shining examples, now that they no longer anticipated a similar fate themselves, soon began to honour the saints more by lofty praises and high sounding commendations, than by endeavouring to become saints themselves by imitating their virtues; and, as is not unusual in religious matters, that they might make up in the one way what they wanted in the other, the language of their panegyrics, and laudatory orations, by degrees broke out into superstitious conceits, and lavish and extravagant expressions, which ended at last in actual invocation or religious worship.

Gregory of Nazianzum, who died about the close of the fourth century, A.D. 396, is referred to by Father Paul (the well-known Roman Catholic commentator on the proceedings of the Council of Trent) as one of those, who, "by addressing the saints in public harangues, laid the foundation of the modern practice of praying to them; though such addresses," he justly adds "ought to be regarded as figures of rhetoric, rather than invocations." Gregory's works, no doubt, contain many panegyrics delivered on the anniversaries, or at the tombs of celebrated Christians, in which, at the close of his collaudation of their virtues, he apostrophizes the martyr, apologizes for his own defects, begging him to accept his exertions, however unworthy of the merits he had been celebrating, and to look favourably on the company who were assembled in his honour. That such apostrophes, however, do not prove that Gregory actually believed that the dead heard or understood his addresses, is plain; for, we find him, by a similar figure of rhetoric, apostrophizing things which never had ears to hear, or a mind to understand. Such as the following*—"Such are thy narrations and wonders, O Egypt," &c.;† and the same thing will appear, perhaps, still more clearly, when we find him addressing dead men and women in the language of uncertainty and doubt (not as to the happiness of true Christians in another world, but as to their power to hear the addresses made to them by any here below). Thus, in his funeral oration upon his own sister Gorgona, he says (Paris Ed., p. 189), "Mayest thou enjoy all these, of which on earth thou receivest a few droppings, from thy genuine disposition towards them. But IF thou canst take any interest in our affairs, and this boon be granted by God to pious souls, that they have any perception of such things, receive our address, instead of many, and in preference to many, funeral obsequies, which address we presented to Cæsarius before thee, and now to thee after him.‡ Better, we know, and far more to be prized, are the things which thou hast now, than what are here seen; the choir of angels, the vision of the Trinity most high, the more pure and perfect illumination of the glory no longer withdrawing itself from a mind in bondage and dissipated by the passions, but certainly contemplated and held by the whole mind, and shining upon our souls with the whole light of the Godhead, and all these thou mayest enjoy," &c. And, again, in his First Invective against Julian (Id., p. 50), after calling upon all on earth to hear him, the same Gregory adds, "Hear, O Heaven, and give ear O earth . . . and Hear, O thou soul of the great Constantius, if thou hast any perception of these things, and all ye souls of the kings before him who loved Christ."§ Who could fairly conclude from such passages that Gregory of Nazianzum believed, or intended seriously to teach, that it was proper or justifiable to invoke the saints with religious worship, or to inculcate the belief that they were able to hear or answer our prayers? It is obvious that the language of doubt is not that which St. Gregory would have spoken, had the Church then held it as a matter of faith, that the saints can hear us, and ought to be worshipped.

We might greatly extend quotations illustrative of this subject, but our space forbids us to go further for the present. We think, however, we have already said enough to show our readers in what manner saint-worship was first introduced, and some of the steps, at least, by which, in the fourth and fifth centuries, the minds of Christians became gradually reconciled to practices at variance with the purer worship of the first three centuries.

*"Amongst a multitude of proofs," says Beugnot, "I shall choose only one, in order to show with what facility the worship of Mary swept away, in its progress, the remnants of paganism which were still covering Europe:—Notwithstanding the preaching of St. Hilarion, Sicily had remained faithful to the ancient worship.—After the Council of Ephesus, we see eight of the finest pagan temples of that island becoming, in a very short time, churches dedicated to the Virgin. These temples were—(1.) Of Minerva, at Syracuse; (2.) of Venus and Saturn, at Messina; (3.) of Venus Erigone, on the Mount Eryx—believed to have been built by Æneas; (4.) of Phalaris, at Agrigent; (5.) of Vulcan, near Mount Etna; (6.) the Pantheon, at Catania; (7.) of Ceres, in the same town; (8.) the Sepulchre of Stesichorus."—Aprile Cronologia Universale di Sicilia.

* By similar apostrophies insensate things are often addressed in the Holy Scriptures—"Hear, O ye mountains." "Praise the Lord, ye dragons and all deeps"—and numberless other passages in the poetical books of Scripture.

† Our readers will probably recollect a striking instance of this in our last number, where John Damascenus apostrophizes the tomb of the Virgin, as if it had been a living being.—p. 109.

HISTORY OF THE POPES.—No. I.

POPE STEPHEN VI., AND POPE FORMOSUS'S FINGERS.

THE office claimed by the Popes is the highest that has been imagined among men. To be the vicar of Christ, and the successor of Peter, the prince of the Apostles—to decide all questions that can arise in the Church by the authority of Peter, who speaks in the person of the Pope—these are their claims. Thus, when the Irish Roman Catholic bishops were disputing about the national schools, the Pope pronounced his decision, and the Synod of Thurles proclaimed it thus—"Peter has spoken in the person of Pius; the judge has spoken; the controversy is ended." And when Pope Pius shall have decided, for the first time, on the 8th of December next, that the Blessed Virgin Mary was conceived without sin, the Roman Catholic bishops will equally exclaim, that it is St. Peter who has spoken in the person of Pius.

It is not supposed that Popes have acquired these powers in modern times: no; it is affirmed that the Church has never been without a lawful representative of Peter, speaking by his apostolical authority.

Those who are convinced that this claim is well founded, may well believe that the history of the Popes is worthy of the most attentive study. What a pity that Roman Catholics should be so little acquainted with the lives and actions of the Popes in ages past! May they not, with great reason, expect, that in the history of this divine institution, from age to age, there will be found lessons of justice, wisdom, and truth, superior to any that can be learned in the history of any other institution that ever has existed in the world?

We shall endeavour, from time to time, to open up this mine of hidden wisdom, by giving some of the most striking facts from the lives and history of the Popes. Writing, as we do, for Roman Catholics, we shall, of course, not quote what any Protestant author has written about Popes; we shall confine ourselves entirely to the lives of the Popes, as we find them in the collection of the councils made by the learned Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart, and in the annals of Cardinal Baronius, and other authors of the very highest credit in the Church of Rome.

We take as our first instance, the life of Pope Stephen, VI.,* who succeeded Formosus about 896, as we find it in Labbe and Cossart (vol. ix., p. 474, Ed. Par. 1671), who profess to have taken it chiefly from Cardinal Baronius.

"Stephen VI. succeeded Formosus. For Boniface, who invaded the apostolical See, and held it for fifteen days, is not to be reckoned among the Popes. . . . . And although each of them obtained the See by force, fear, and tyranny (that is, both Boniface and Stephen VI.), and, therefore, one who was equally an intruder thrust out an intruder, yet Stephen is reckoned in the number and list of the Popes by common consent; because, for the sake of averting the danger of schism, the entire clergy approved of him, although he was a most infamous man, and the whole Catholic Church† acknowledged him as vicar of Christ and successor of St. Peter."

The account gives some instances as to how he was acknowledged, and then proceeds—"He commenced his pontificate with that sacrilege in which he cast into the Tiber the body of Formosus, dug up out of its grave, clothed with the sacerdotal garments, and mutilated of three of its fingers; and ordered that all who had been ordained by him should be consecrated and ordained over again."‡

The life in Labbe and Cossart goes on to express surprise that Onuphrius, in his notes on Platina, should reject this account as fabulous, since it is proved by ancient documents, and is related by Luitprand,§ in the eighth chapter of the first book of his history; which account the life proceeds to give as follows—". . . . . who being appointed, like an impious man and ignorant of the holy doctrines, he ordered that Formosus should be dragged out of his tomb, and placed on the pontifical seat, clothed in the sacerdotal vestments; to whom also he says 'when you were Bishop of Ostia, why did you usurp the universal Roman See, in the spirit of ambition?' These things being done, he ordered him to be cast into the Tiber, stript of the sacred vestments, and three of his fingers being cut off;

* Some call this Pontiff Stephen the Sixth, others call him Stephen the Seventh: attention to this is necessary, to prevent confusion. The difficulty arises in this way—Roman Catholics do not know whether the Stephen who was first appointed in the year 752 was a Pope or not. It will be seen in this paper that Roman Catholics have no certain way of knowing who were really Popes and who were not. Labbe and Cossart get over this difficulty cleverly: in the list in vol. xvi., p. 132, they count thus—Stephen II., Stephen III., then another Stephen III., and then Stephen IV. Thus they call this man Stephen VI., as the ancients did, and still they contrive to get in all the Stephens—more clever than satisfactory, certainly—in a list of the Popes.

§ This Luitprand was Bishop of Cremona, in Italy. He wrote his history about thirty years after the death of Pope Stephen. He was well acquainted with the facts of those times, and bears the character of a learned and accurate historian.

and he ordained over again, as deposed from their orders, all whom he (Formosus) had ordained."*

That all this really was done by Pope Stephen VI. to the dead body of his predecessor, Pope Formosus, is past all reasonable doubt; for it is not only related by Luitprand who wrote so soon after Stephen's time, but we have another account written by Auxilius, who was himself ordained a priest by Pope Formosus,† who relates exactly the same story, except that he says that Pope Stephen only cut off two fingers of the right hand; In all which, he says, Pope Stephen acted like a wild beast, unmindful of humanity; and he observes that the Lord did not say, whatever you shall bind under the earth or under the river, shall be bound in heaven!—Book ii. ch. 30.

The object of cutting off the dead Pope's fingers is not very clear to us. Why did not the live Pope cut off the dead Pope's head?‡ Why not the toe which all the world had been kissing? Why did he not, at least, cut off all his fingers while he was about it? Was it from moderation? or was there any special reason for it? Some say that these three fingers were used in benediction and ordination; in which case, cutting them off would, of course, disable the dead Pope from ordaining any more; but could scarcely be supposed to affect what he had done while living. But, then, it seems strange that Auxilius, who was himself ordained by Formosus, should speak of only two fingers. If but one had been cut, we might have thought it was done to get off "the fisherman's ring;" and, indeed, the Roman Council under Pope John IX., which condemned the acts of Stephen, expressly says that plunder was the object of the whole proceeding.§

We must return to the account in Labbe and Cossart, who proceed thus with Luitprand's story—"Of how great authority and how religious Pope Formosus was, we can gather from this, since, when he was afterwards found by fishermen and carried to the Church of the blessed Prince of the Apostles, certain images of the saints, with veneration, saluted him, placed in his coffin; for this I have very often heard from most religious men of the city of Rome."‖

We should have thought that this miracle would have settled the question, whether the ordinations performed by Pope Formosus were to be considered null, and to be repeated; but we shall see presently that the question continued to rage for seventeen years after, and that different Popes decided it in opposite ways. But to return again to the life of Pope Stephen VI.; it goes on to say—"Pope Stephen added crime to crime, when in a synod which he collected, he approved the nefarious, impious, and detestable act. For the stones themselves, execrating such a monstrosity, then cried out with their own voice by knocking against each other, that they would more willingly suffer spontaneous ruin, than that the Roman Church should remain depressed by so great a scandal. It happened, then, that the sacred Basilica of the Lateran, the principal seat of the Pope, fell prostrate from the altar to the door, an evil angel striking it, because the walls were by no means able to stand, when the first rock of the hinge was shaken by the earthquake of so great a crime."¶

The life in Labbe and Cossart goes on to say, that "the heretics of our time (the Protestants) on account of that impious act, wickedly rise up against the promises of Christ made to Peter and the Church, and boasting too much of victory, triumph too soon." We give now the defence of these most learned men against the triumph of the Protestants, and let us see if it be satisfactory: "For all things, which Stephen said or did against Formosus, he did as a man struck with madness, fulfilling what his raging fury suggested. But he defined nothing against faith or good morals by pontifical authority lawfully obtained. For the bishops and presbyters who were summoned to a synod about this matter, being not unlike to Stephen, persecuted Formosus with like hatred, and, therefore, pronounced for that sentence which they knew would be agreeable to a man struck with madness. From whence we acknowledge, indeed, a violent tyranny in fact in this matter; but we confidently deny that an error in faith was defined or approved by Stephen lawfully obtaining pontificial authority; although it would in no way prejudice the apostolic See, if we should grant that an usurper, not lawfully elected, but an intrusive false Pope had erred in affirming articles of faith."††

The force of the defence lies in this—first, that Stephen VI. was a madman, and not lawfully Pope; and, secondly, that he defined nothing against faith or good morals.

As to the first, it is a common and an easy device, when a Pope is convicted of infamous crimes, or sacrilege, or error in faith, to say, "Oh, that man was no lawful Pope; he got the Popedom by tyranny or bribery, or even by worse means, and, of course, the powers of a true and lawful Pope are not to be expected in him." We shall have many instances to show, in which Roman Catholics are driven to set up this defence and excuse for the doings of their Popes.

But is not this the great argument in support of the claims of the Popes—"that it is impossible to believe that God would have left his Church without a visible head, a living and speaking judge, in the place of Christ, whom all might safely follow in the confidence of faith?" And is it not still harder to believe that God should profess and undertake to give his Church such a head and judge, and yet leave the Church liable to be deceived by a false head—to be imposed on by a madman, who was no lawful Pope, and led by him into wholesale sacrilege about the so-called sacrament of orders? If the Church cannot distinguish between a true and a false head, where is her security in having a visible head?

Now, this very account of Pope Stephen in Labbe and Cossart, which sets up this defence, that Stephen was no lawful Pope, does also say (as we have shown above) that "the whole clergy approved of him, and the whole Catholic Church acknowledged him as the Vicar of Christ and the successor of Peter;" and the account concludes by saying, "after he had held the apostolic See six years, being strangled in prison, he closed his life by an infamous death, God being the avenger."† Was not this a great security to the Catholic Church, to be for six years looking up to a sacrilegious madman, who actually filled the place of the Pope, but who was no lawful Pope—mistaking him for the Vicar of Christ and true head of the Church?

This is what Roman Catholics tell us themselves. And then they ask us how we can dare to suppose that God would leave his Church without a visible head, a living and speaking judge in the place of Christ?

And to this we reply, that if God had undertaken to provide such a head, He would not have let it become a delusion and a snare, such as we have it proved by Roman Catholic authority that this Pope Stephen was.

But how do Labbe and Cossart know that this Stephen was not a lawful Pope? The whole Catholic Church thought that he was—nay, Pope John IX., who succeeded soon after, and whom all Roman Catholics acknowledge as a lawful Pope, thought so too; for he held a council at Rome in the year 904, to reverse the proceedings of Pope Stephen and his council against Formosus; and that council of Pope John commences thus—"We wholly repeal the council celebrated in the time of Pope Stephen VI., of PIOUS MEMORY—to wit, OUR PREDECESSOR—in which the venerable body of the venerable Pope Formosus was dragged through the land from its violated sepulchre, ..."‡

Clearly, then, the Church at that time, even when it had a Pope whom Roman Catholics now think was a lawful head, did not find out its mistake about Pope Stephen; for the lawful successor, even when repealing Pope Stephen's acts, acknowledged him as a lawful Pope.

To say he was not a lawful Pope is a mere afterthought to get out of a difficulty, and one which Roman Catholics of the present day are not agreed about; for Bishop Milner, in his End of Controversy (Letter xxviii., century ix.), thus gives the list of the Popes—" . . . John VIII., Marinus, Adrian III., Stephen VI., Formosus, Stephen VII.,§ Romanus, Theodore II., John IX., Benedict IV., Leo V., Christopher, and Sergius III."

The SECOND point in the defence of Labbe and Cossart against "the heretics," is that Pope Stephen VI. defined nothing contrary to faith or good morals. It is confessed by Labbe and Cossart themselves, that Pope Stephen VI. did commit sacrilege in decreeing that persons who had been lawfully ordained should be ordained over again; and, we ask, is not sacrilege, at least, contrary to good morals? But was not this sacrilege also contrary to the Roman faith as now held? This is certainly a hard thing to urge against Roman Catholics; because their religion, being formed, from time to time, by additions and inventions of men, is not the same in one age which it becomes in another; and it is hard to expect Popes of the 9th century to decide according to what their religion was to be in the 19th. But while Roman Catholics continue to assert that their religion has been the same in all ages, we must continue to show them the falsehood of this assertion.

It is confessed that Pope Stephen did decree that all who had been ordained by his predecessor, Pope Formosus, should be ordained over again. The Council of Trent declared that three of the sacraments of the Roman Church, Baptism, Confirmation, and Orders, cannot be repeated.* It has ever since been held that it is sacrilege, and contrary to the true Roman faith about the sacraments, to ordain over again those who have once been ordained. But all now acknowledge that those whom Formosus ordained were really ordained; yet Pope Stephen and his council decreed that they should be ordained over again, contrary to the Roman doctrine, as now held about the sacraments. And Auxilius, who was ordained by Formosus, tells us (Book ii. c. 9) that "a great multitude of bishops, priests, and deacons" were so ordained over again. Pope Stephen VI. did, therefore, err in the Roman faith concerning the sacrament of orders; and he led "the whole Catholic Church," who followed him "as the vicar of Christ," into wholesale sacrilege about "the sacrament of orders;" and it was, indeed, a question of faith, that the live Pope and the dead Pope were then cutting off each other's fingers about. And yet we feel that it is rather hard to urge this against Pope Stephen VI., when we consider what has been said about this very case by Father Morinus, the most learned authority of the Church of Rome in the matter of ordination—"It had not yet passed into a thing settled, and AN AXIOM OF THE CATHOLIC FAITH, that whatever ordination performed according to the rites of the Church, and by a bishop ordained according to those rites, was valid, and in no case to be repeated."† So this poor madman, Pope Stephen VI., only erred in not knowing what "the axioms of the Catholic faith" might turn out to be 600 years after! If he was a Pope, he was, at least, no prophet! It is hard to blame him; but we commend this to the consideration of those modern Roman Catholics who still think that "the axioms of the Catholic faith," have been the same in the Church of Rome in all ages. Clearly it was not so about "the sacrament of orders."

One word now about the history of this question about the ordinations of Pope Formosus.

About the year 896, Pope Stephen VI., and his council at Rome, ordered all those ordained by Formosus, to be ordained over again.

In the year 904, Pope John IX., and his council at Rome, repealed all that Pope Stephen and his council had decreed. Benedict IV., Leo V., and Christophorus kept this decree unchanged. ‡

About the year 906, Pope Sergius III. renewed the decree that the ordinations of Pope Formosus were to be repeated.—Labbe and Coss., vol. ix., p. 517.

How long this decree of Pope Sergius III. held good we cannot tell. The following Popes seem too deeply sunk in wickedness to trouble their heads about ordinations. But Morinus says, "this controversy afflicted the Church about seventeen years."—Part iii., cap. 3., p. 69. And that, although Luitprand says, that at the very beginning of the controversy the images of the saints interfered to try and settle it, by bowing down to Pope Formosus in his coffin!

We commend it to Roman Catholics to consider, "where was the head of the Church, and the living and speaking judge in place of Christ, during the pontificate of Pope Stephen VI.?" Even if this were a solitary instance, it is yet enough to disprove the notion that God must always have given such a head to the Church. But we warn them it is not a solitary instance.

We purpose proceeding with the history of the Popes in our next number, and we fear the result will still further horrify those who still try to believe that the Papacy was instituted by God, and that the Pope is the inheritor of the promises made to the Church.

THE SUCCESSION OF ST. PATRICK.

IN our number for last August, we published an article "ON THE SUCCESSION OF THE IRISH BISHOPS." At the end of that article we said, "whether Roman Catholics can show a clear succession in the Archbishopric of Armagh, the See of St. Patrick, we will put to the proof in our next number. We will give the succession of the archbishops of Armagh down from Primate Cromer, who was Archbishop of Armagh in 1550, before the Reformation. We now call on all Roman Catholic archbishops in Ireland (especially Dr. Dixon), on all Roman Catholic bishops, priests, and laymen, to send us a list of Roman Catholic archbishops in succession from Primate Cromer, with the dates of the vacancies and appointments, and the proofs of each. If any such list should be sent to us, we will publish it, side by side, with our own list; if no such list should be sent to us, Roman Catholics may well suspect that it is as great a puzzle to make out a Roman Catholic succession in Armagh, as in Dublin. We have now put this question in a position in which it may be fairly examined and discussed; and we trust our readers will look with interest for the results."

We now appeal to our Roman Catholic readers, whether that proposal was not a fair one on our part—whether it would not have been the most satisfactory way to have the two successions placed side by side, that they might be examined and compared together?

We greatly regret that it is not in our power now to place the two successions side by side; but the fact is, that no Roman Catholic has ventured to send us a list of the succession of their archbishops in the chair of St. Patrick; and that, although we have waited a second month for it.

We are not surprised—for it is our conviction that no Roman Catholic can give us such a list as would stand examination. But we think such a fact must be either humiliating or instructive to Roman Catholics, who have been so long accustomed to hear their priests and bishops boasting of their succession from St. Patrick. We wish this fact to be instructive to them, and not humiliating; for no man is really humbled by learning an important fact, but the contrary. We, therefore, call again on all candid Roman Catholics to inquire of their priests, whether a list of their archbishops of Armagh can be given, showing their succession from St. Patrick, or from Primate Cromer, who was Archbishop of Armagh before the Reformation.

In the meantime, all we can do is to give what we believe to be the true succession of Archbishops of Armagh, from Primate Cromer, which we take from Sir James Ware's learned work on the Irish bishops.* It will then be for Roman Catholics, if they can, to give us what they consider the true succession.

We shall proceed to give the succession in the See of Dublin next.

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XXV.

"PAT, I have got something new to talk about," said Jem, pulling a roll of paper out of his pocket.

"Let us see it, Jem," said Pat. So Jem unrolled the paper, and showed a beautiful picture, with fine, bright colours in it.

So said Pat, "what is it at all, Jem?"

"Don't you see for yourself Pat?" said Jem.

"Why, then, if it isn't the souls in Purgatory!" said Pat.

"'Deed and it isn't then; you're out for this time," said Jem; "so look again, Pat."

So Pat looked again; "and what else can you make of it at all?" said Pat.

"The bodies in purgatory," said Jem.

"Well, sure enough, it is," said Pat; "sure enough them's bodies; them can't be souls anyway. But isn't it mostly souls that goes to Purgatory?" said Pat, a little puzzled.

"Well, I never heard tell of any but souls going there, if so be they go there at all," said Jem; "but you see yourself it's bodies that is in it."

"Sure enough it is, Jem," said Pat; "and my! but they're the purty creatures, them women, just like real ladies! I wonder what they done at all to bring them there? Would they be bad women, now?" said Pat.

"Well, you know Pat," said Jem, "that couldn't be; for doesn't the catechism say that them that dies in mortal sin goes to hell for all eternity, and not to Purgatory?"

"Aye," said Pat; "but doesn't the catechism say, too, that them that gets their mortal sin, and the guilt of it, forgiven in this world, has still to go to Purgatory, for a time, to get the stains washed out of them before they can go to heaven, where nothing defiled can enter? and might'nt it be that way they got there?"

"Well, maybe so," said Jem, "if so be that them that's forgiven goes there at all. But when Jesus Christ said to the woman that was a sinner, thy sins are forgiven thee; and when he allowed her to wash his feet with her tears, and wipe them with the hair of her head, and, more than all, when he finished with her by saying, thy faith hath saved thee, GO IN PEACE, did he just mean to bid her go to Purgatory? or was that the meaning she took out of it?"*

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "I'm thinking if Jesus Christ had just took and shown her that picture, she would'nt have gone in peace anyway."

"I'm thinking so, too," said Jem; "and that when the Blessed Lord said them blessed words to the woman that was a sinner, he didn't mean the picture at all; and it's hard to think that them that's forgiven by him will ever come to the like of what's in that picture."

"Well, if they was ever so bad," said Pat, "sure it would be only commonly decent, with their purty, white skins, and the beautiful hair flowing down on their backs, to put a bit of a shift on them itself when their pictures was going to be took in Purgatory."

"Man alive," said Jem, "what good would that be? sure look at the long flames just curling up all round them, and would'nt the shift be burned off them afore you could look round?"

"Well, I don't know for that," said Pat; "sure there isn't so much as the sign of a scorch on their beautiful skins; and why couldn't the shift stand it as well? Don't you mind in the Book of Daniel, when the wicked king put the three men in the fire, because they would not worship the golden image, the fire couldn't hurt their clothes no more than themselves."†

"Well, sure enough," said Jem, "the picture looks a deal more like people that the fire couldn't hurt at all, than like people it could hurt; and that being the way, they might as well have their clothes on, and I'm thinking it might be better too in the picture; for you know yourself, Pat, there's many a young boy that cares little for Purgatory, that would buy that picture just for the bad thoughts that could be took out of it."

"Well, there's some in the picture dressed fine enough, anyway," said Pat; "who would they be now?"

"Sure them's the angels taking the souls out of Purgatory," said Jem; "don't you see the wings on them."

"Well, that's the elegant dress on that angel," said Pat; "that's the beautiful green bedgown, and the purtiest red petticoat ever I seen. Sure the finest lass at a fair would be proud to be an angel, to wear such a bedgown and petticoat!"

"'Deed and she might," said Jem; "but sure a girl that wore the like of that would, at least, have the shoes on her arm going to a fair or a market."

"But what's this, at all, at the top," said Pat, "with all the bright light about it? Well, it's the cross and a lamb on it. Won't that be Jesus, now?"

"That's what it's meant for," said Jem; "the lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world;‡ and don't you see the blood running from its throat, and the angels catching the blood in golden cups, and pouring it out on the people in Purgatory."

"And is it the blood of Christ and not the fire, after all, that cleanses them that's in Purgatory?" said Pat; "and is it only waiting in the fire they are till they get the blood of Christ? didn't I think that sins were forgiven in this life by the blood of Christ, and that them that was forgiven had to go to Purgatory to get their stains bleached out of their souls by the fire itself? but if it's the blood of Christ that cleanses too, what is the fire for at all?"

"Well, it's just for to punish them," said Jem.

"Don't tell me of punishment for them that's forgiven," said Pat, "that's not reason, and it's not Gospel. Either the fire is to cleanse out the stains of the soul, after the sins is forgiven, or it's for nothing at all; and which does the cleansing, is it the blood of Christ, or is it the fire?"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "the Bible tells us of forgiveness of sins, through the blood of Christ; and it tells us just the same of the cleansing too. Sure does'nt it say—'How much more shall the blood of Christ, who by the Holy Ghost offered himself unspotted unto God, CLEANSE our conscience from dead works, to serve the living God.'§ And if the blood of Christ does all, what is the fire for?"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "here is the differ of the Bible and the picture. Both allows that the blood of Christ does it; but, by the Bible, the blood of Christ does it now; and, by the picture, the blood of Christ won't cleanse us till we get to Purgatory."

"Well, I think that's it," said Jem. "Sure we have the Bible and the picture to choose between."

"Well, thank God for having the choice anyway," said Pat, "which I wonder would the priests like us to follow?"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "I got this picture in a shop that had plenty more, just nigh hand to the great Carmelite Church, in York-row, in Dublin. Sure the priests like to see it set up in the windows; if they don't like it, why don't they stop it? Sure it isn't Protestants sells that! And why don't they say a word against it? Why don't they warn the people against it, the way they do against reading the Bible? Sure the priests like the picture well, and why would'nt they give it to us for our religion. I'm thinking there is a deal of things in our religion would be better took off it, if any priest would only set about it."

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "I thought that last week, when I seen Peter M'Kenna buying a horse in Kilcommon fair; and the horse had a big bush of a tail on him, and Peter got him cheap, for he run him down for falling away entirely in the hind quarters; and when Peter got him into a yard, he just backed him up to the wrong end of a cart, and whipped the big tail off him, and then he stood a one-side, and says Peter—'Now, is'nt that a great addition to him entirely.' And thinks I to myself, would'nt it be a great addition to our religion if it was well docked too."

"Well, never mind the horse, Pat," said Jem. "But sure enough there's a deal to come off our religion, and the more the Bible gets out, the sooner it will be done."

And the more we hear of the talk of plain people, like Pat and Jem, the more hope we have that the Bible will get out indeed.

† This history is in the fourth chapter of the Book of Daniel. N.B.—Observe, from verse 23 to verse 90 of this chapter, in the Douay Bible, is not in Hebrew Bible—Daniel wrote in Hebrew: neither is it in the Protestant Bible; but the account of the men being saved in the fire is in both Biblea.

THE LIFE OF A PRIEST.

To those who are themselves seeking for truth, or desirous of studying the human mind under circumstances, and, perhaps, struggles similar to their own, a truthful narrative of the mental workings of one who has made serious sacrifices to what he is convinced is the cause of truth, may, perhaps, not be without instruction, or, at least, interest. It will be seen, at any rate, in what follows, that the writer has not been actuated by any momentary impulse, or propelled by any ecclesiastical censures, in taking the course he has finally adopted; but has been led to his present views by slow degrees, and, after long deliberation and a diligent study of that Holy Book which all Christians equally acknowledge to be the Word of the Living God.

Guided by such feelings and principles, allow me to introduce myself to your notice, and to that of the educated and thinking persons who read the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, as a priest who passed his classes, with some distinction, in the College of Maynooth, where I remained during the period of six years—the three first of which were spent in exercises on metaphysics, ethics, and mathematics, under the guidance of French refugees (Sorbonnists), whose literary merit I was then unable to appreciate, but who, now that my judgment is matured by years, I have no hesitation in saying, were men of unquestionable talent and varied information. The other three years were misspent in the quibbling casuistry of moral theology.

During all that time the students were not instructed in the Scriptures, except during one hour on Sunday, by the dean, who was an indifferent scholar, and who explained them according to the view of that Church of which he was a paid official, invariably enforcing his arguments by reference to decrees and councils, rather than to the internal evidence of undoubted inspiration.

After my course of education was completed, I was ordained in due course, and obliged, in one hour after, to take up the Breviary, a book replete with the most palpable falsehoods that were ever dictated by the pen of untruth. It will be sufficient for my justification in leaving off reading this book (although taught that I was bound to read it, under pain of mortal sin), to point out one or two of those fables. One day, during the infancy of Peter of Alcantara, and whilst a baby, under a Spanish veranda, a swarm of bees came into the cradle where the baby was placed, got into his armpit, and brought out honey therein! Another of these fables is—The Bishop of Cracow, in Poland, purchased a plot of land from one of the public functionaries, to build a church on. In some time after, the bishop was called upon for payment, to which application he replied, that the money was already paid, and required but three days to substantiate his point. The holy bishop repaired to the cemetery, where his man of business had been buried upwards of three years, took off his mantle, spread it on the tomb, and called upon his old friend to come up, and, in an instant, he came forth, walked to the magistrate's office, deposed, on oath, that the money was paid, went back, and slept in the Lord! I am induced to add another, although at the risk of trespassing on the pages of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN. A friar wanted to cross the Nile, but could not procure a boat. A crocodile, seeing the holy man's distress, backed in to the bank and carried him over in safety! Such are the fables that are to be found in that book, which is put into the hands of all young priests the moment they are ordained, and after they promise, on bended knees, that they will not preach or teach anything contrary to truth, and not contained in the volume of inspiration. How preposterous is it in the Church of Rome, after imposing such obligations, to put such incredible fables into the hands of her ministers! What morality can be expected from the members of a Church which forces such indigestible food down the throats of her priesthood, and requires them to believe, or, at least, to profess, things so self-evidently incredible and absurd?

After having finished my academical course of study, and left the college, I considered it would add not a little to the future dignity of my character to travel. Accordingly, I set off for Paris, and, as my family was much more respectable and opulent than those from whom the students were usually selected, I had ample means given me for my journey. After my arrival in that city, I had time enough to consider how weak it would be to continue to read a book which I could not disguise from myself was nothing but a mass of turgid homilies, unintelligible hymns, and incredible falsehoods. I then came to the resolution of adding one volume more to the small family library of the hotel I was staying in, in the Rue de St. Honoré—Fontaine's and Florian's fables. I placed my book of fables with them, without possessing the style or morality of either.

After having thus disposed of my Breviary, I bought a copy of the New Testament, out of which I read a chapter every day, and feared no divine displeasure in consequence of the change. In the dark ages, when those miraculous powers existed in the minds of cloistered monks, rather than in the persons to whom the suspension of the natural law was attributed, those legendary tales were fabricated, without evidence or facts, justifiable alone on the Jesuit principle, "that the end justifies the means, and that all pious frauds are allowable to promote the glory of God."

As I had learned the French language grammatically in the college, I had not much difficulty in speaking it fluently after a stay of six months in that city, where I had repeated opportunities of witnessing the gorgeous display of natural and artificial garlands of flowers, with clouds of incense that obscured the churches, notwithstanding the brilliant light of the wax candles so uselessly wasted in the sunshine of a Paris meridian. Young as I was, it struck me very forcibly that these spectacles, these theatrical performances, were calculated more to affect the senses than to inspire a spirit of piety or improve the heart, and that all true devotion was lost in the representation; it appeared also to me to be a device of the Church of Rome to engage the senses, in order to prevent the mind from investigating the subject of most cardinal importance in this pompous display. During my stay in Paris, I visited the public libraries, and the various public buildings with which that great city abounds. The Royal Institutes, the Hotel Dieu, built by Madame Neckar, the Hotel des Invalides, and the Palace of the Tuileries, commenced by that wicked woman, Catherine de Medicis, who, actuated by the same infernal principle, "the end justifies the means," caused the death of so many thousands of French Protestants in the streets of Paris, on the Feast of St. Bartholomew, in 1572.

The gallery of the Louvre, and the royal gardens, designed by Andrew Lenostre, were the next objects to captivate my attention, and I must to say, that for conception of design and grandeur of effect, nothing in England, not even the Paxton Gardens at Chatsworth, could, in my opinion, be compared to them.

During my stay of six months in Paris, I had frequent opportunities of speaking to the priests on various subjects. But, whenever I spoke on the religion of Rome, they invariably shrugged up their shoulders, and, with a forbidding grimace, said that the Church was infallible, that the Church ordered everything as it then stood, and that nothing remained for them but to obey. On one occasion, I said to one of them, named Huluttè, as you are at this side of the Alps, and have nothing to fear from the tribunal of the Inquisition, would you not test all things, according to the advice of St. Paul? I would, said he, but my bread depends upon my present belief, and I will not forfeit it for any other. However, as you are a British subject, and I have nothing to fear from you, I shall be happy to discuss the subject of infallibility with you this evening in the sacristy of the church to which I belong. I accordingly went, and began by saying, that from the days of St. Augustine, every Roman bishop had reversed, not only the decisions of his predecessors, but his own; and that these reversals had exercised a decided influence, not only on the Church itself, but on the purity of her doctrine. I showed him that Pelagius, Theodoretus, Arius, Athanasius, Origen, Paul of Samosata, and many others, had been condemned and acquitted by general councils, with the approbation of the Popes.

Is it not also a matter of history, that those very books that were once to be found in the "Index Expurgatorius," became afterwards school-books in the colleges of Rome; and as this is an age of proof, I shall point out some of them to your notice.

The history of Natalis Alexander, the writings of Galileo, the sentences of Petrus Lombardus, Archbishop of Paris, even the books of Bellarmine are among those I have mentioned. Here you see a change of purpose totally incompatible with the Pope's infallibility, even in matters of fact. Besides, this doctrine of infallibility of the Popes was not known in the early ages of the Church; as Bossuet says, that the Popes' infallibility was first propounded in the Council of Florence, in the 15th century, by Cajetan, celebrated in ecclesiastical story. To all this he fully agreed, but said, what is to become of me, if I change my creed? I should have to go to one of the poor institutions of the city!

This objection was, of course, an unanswerable one. That it was not, however, calculated to convince an inquiring mind, you will readily believe. That it shuts the door, however, against all inquiry to many, there can be no doubt, in Ireland as well as in France. Alas! when will religious liberty be more than a mere name?

Before I left the College of Maynooth, I was greatly prejudiced against the French nation, in consequence not only of the frightful massacre of the French Protestants, already alluded to, but also on account of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and the infamous conduct of the Duke of Alva, to say nothing of the more recent horrors of the French Revolution.

Tours and Cambray were, however, names of almost daily familiarity; and I was irresistibly impelled to visit both those places. A magnetic influence draws our feet to spots upon which our imagination has long fed; it is an instinct of our nature; and, perhaps, the chief charm of travel, and the simplest dictate of the heart, is to wish to visit those places that have been sanctified by miracles, or adorned by learning. I, therefore, set off for Tours, the Canterbury of France.

After spending a few days at Orleans I descended, in a passage boat, down the Loire, which serpentined around a smiling and fertile landscape, and whose banks were decorated with the yellow blossom of the broom, which formerly gave title to the House of Plantagenet, and now rendered the scenery "unprofitably gay."

During the voyage of a summer's day, my mind was occupied with thoughts of Tours, formerly the ecclesiastical capital of France, in the fourth century, and the depository of the miracle-working remains of St. Martin, during the fifth and sixth centuries. This miraculous power gave an impulse to the munificence of France, and Tours became the centre from which radiated churches, monasteries, and religious houses. I must confess I was greatly disappointed when I found that two dilapidated towers were the only remains of the Cathedral of St. Martin, of which the king of France was once the abbot; and found the Church of St. Julian profaned by the impious ribaldry of a French postilion. The healing powers of the saint have been withdrawn by God, he even permitted the shrine to be plundered, the body itself to be taken away, and dishonored. Can it be that the saints are like the heroes of antiquity, that have passed away; and that a book is a more lasting monument than a saintly life; or than a body endowed with miraculous powers? Are the plough and the mattock, the loom and the distaff, of more paramount importance to mankind than the crucifix and the missal? I felt on this occasion that disappointment which a person who expects too much always feels. Yet, I must say, with Dr. Johnson, that I do not envy the man his feelings whose piety or patriotism are not excited by visiting the ruins of Iona or the plains of Marathon; and that it would give me pain to be numbered as one of those cold calculators who visit, with indifference and without emotion, such places of intense interest, as the hallowed remains of the Cathedral of Tours, Galileo's cell, the ancient battle-field, or the ruined abbey.

On my return from Tours, nothing of any moment occurred; nor did I see anything worth mentioning, except the sullen and gloomy scowl of the frowning Blois, as we swept along its rugged base. The scenery of France is generally tame and monotonous, without any of those bold features which so particularly distinguish Northern Europe. You do not find those mountain ranges in France that reign elsewhere with such composed majesty from age to age, and arrest the traveller's attention as he journies along; but a vast ocean of tillage everywhere appears, with beautiful slopes dressed with vines, and whole districts covered with the mulberry tree, which feeds myriads of silkworms which enrich, in perspective, the populous city of Lyons.

Having taken leave of Tours, I set out for Cambray, in Picardy, a place that has been associated with everything that could adorn literature or add dignity to virtue. I may be pardoned when I avow that my feelings overcame my reason, when the tottering remains of the episcopal palace that witnessed the learned labours of the illustrious Fenelon were pointed out to my notice, as also the spot where the streets met at right angles, and where that illustrious man was compelled to burn, with his own hands, the best of his works, by order of the then Pope, the veriest of despotic tyrants. Cambray has been distinguished by two events of a very different character; the first is, that it was in this city was formed the famous league against the republic of Venice by Julius II.; the second, that it was from Cambray that the classic elegance of Fenelon's compositions was poured forth upon Europe.

The age that was signalized by the reign of Louis XIV., which in itself involved the history of Europe, was not less remarkable for having given birth to the inimitable author of Telemachus.

I was not long in Cambray when I became acquainted with a Dutch priest whose name was Rondat, who showed me the public institutions of the city; and, in return, I made myself as useful as I could, particularly on Sunday morning, when he was engaged in the confessional; I blessed the holy water for him. As I was always most anxious to come at the foundation of things, I examined very closely, not only the derivation of words, but also the practices of the early ages. I searched for the origin of holy water in the New Testament, in the works of the early Fathers, and, lastly, in the heathen authors. After having searched in vain for holy water in the Holy Scriptures, I examined the works of the Holy Fathers without finding any trace of it; but I found it in the works of the heathen writers. The lustrations of the ancient pagans was effected by sulphur, fire, or water; and as water was the most common element, it was it that was most commonly used. Ovid speaks of the Aqua Lustralis in his Metamorphoses, and so does Virgil in his Georgics. The arena where the gladiators fought was purified with water in ancient Rome. That the holy water of the Roman Church was borrowed from the lustral water of the pagans is evident, as the brush used by the priests is called asperges, the very name it bore amongst the pagans.

Frequent lustrations are also practised by the Turks in their mosques before prayers, and the Church of Rome, as well as that of Mahomet, borrowed this lustral practice from the ancient pagans. The exorcism used in making holy water is a curious pot-pourri of the practice of the middle ages, and I take leave to point out how it is effected. The priest, with lighted candles, and ritual in hand, forms the sign of the cross three several times over the salt and water, in the name of the true God, the living God, and the holy God, to banish all demons, all unclean and malignant spirits, from those elements of salt and water; he then mixes the salt and water together, and uses this mixture (out of which he supposes himself to have banished all evil and malignant spirits), in one moment after, to banish all fairies, demons, and evil spirits, that may be lurking in houses, in homesteads, in dairies, and elsewhere. What a burlesque on the common sense of mankind, to make salt and water first the medium of possessing demons and evil spirits, and then the medium of banishing them!

In the present age, when the human mind has elevated the arts and sciences to a higher standard than they were ever before known to reach, how degrading it must be to thousands of priests to be employed, simultaneously, on the Sabbath morning, banishing unclean and malignant spirits from the pure water and salt, that were produced from the barrel of a pump or the bottom of a salt-pan. And can any one doubt, that hundreds of them feel the degradation, though they are obliged to submit to it?

Besides, how profane it is to employ the name of God six times in this unholy exorcism, contrary to the third commandment—"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." Moreover, if there are unhallowed spirits in springs and salt-pans, why does not Archbishop Cullen extend the ecclesiastical privilege of exorcism to all the salt and water necessary for the domestic purposes of life?

As nothing can be more subversive of true piety than superstition, I earnestly entreat my countrymen not to depend on holy water for their future salvation, as it is not to be found in the Scripture, or in the writings of the primitive Church, but was introduced into the Church of Rome in the beginning of the ninth century, as appears from Martini's History of the Rites of the Church; but to depend on the last petition of the Lord's Prayer, to deliver us from evil. As external pomp and ritual observances are foreign to the spirit of the Christian religion, let us place no dependence upon them for our future happiness; but let us rely upon the lustral sacrifice of the cross, and upon the pure water of eternal life—the Scriptures—and let us no longer slake our thirst in the impure water that flows from the Cistern of the Hills.

LATE CONVERSION OF A PRIEST OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

During the season of 1851, the Abbé Miel, then an officiating priest of the Roman Church, published in London two small works, entitled "The Pope and the Holy Scriptures," and "The Pope and the Primitive Church." In these the writer proposed to prove, "by precise Scriptural evidence," as also "from the writings of the primitive Christians," that the supremacy of Peter, and of his so-called successors the Popes of Rome, and of the Roman Church, was universally acknowledged.

The pamphlets contain a precise digest of all the texts from Scripture, and the principal extracts from the proceedings of councils and writings attributed to the Fathers of the early Christian Church, usually quoted by Romanists on the subjects to which the titles refer. They were expressly written for circulation among Protestants.

Mr. C. H. Collette, a lay member of the Church of England, entered into a controversial correspondence with the Abbé Miel, on the subjects treated of, which has led to the conversion of the latter; and the once sincere and zealous Roman priest is now a sincere and zealous evangelical Christian.

The subjoined letter has since been received by Mr. Collette from the Abbé.

To C. H. Collette, Esq., 57, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

MONSIEUR — Comme vous avez été le premier instrument dont Dieu s'est servi pour me dessiller les yeux, je veux vous faire part, à vous le premier, de l'heureux changement que la divine grâce a opéré dans mes idées et dans mon cœur.

Et d'abord, je vous l'avouerai sans détour, Monsieur, il m'en a coûté de reconnaître, d'après vos indications si positives, non pas que je m'étais trompé, mais que nos théologiens les plus considérés nous trompent, ou plutôt se trompent eux-mêmes. Forcé pourtant de me rendre à l'évidence sur la fausseté d'un des principaux textes cités dans ma brochure, je crus pouvoir me retrancher sur les autres qui étaient nombreux et me paraissaient concluants. Hélas! vous l'avez trop bien montré, Monsieur, ils ne méritaient guère plus de confiance que le premier. Je me rejetai alors sur l'histoire. Je voulus trouver dans les documents historiques de la première période Chrétienne, des faits décisifs en faveur de la primauté de l'évêque de Rome, c'est-à-dire, de la Papauté. J'ai produit avec confiance les plus importants de ceux sur lesquels les docteurs Catholiques Romains appuyent leur système. Mais bientôt un examen plus attentif et plus impartial, provoqué par vos attaques, m'a prouvé qu'ils étaient insignifiants ou douteux; et pour quelques-uns qui semblent favorables, j'en ai découvert d'innombrables qui sont manifestement contraires à la thèse que j'avais entrepris de défendre. Et ainsi, Monsieur, si vos articles contre mes brochures pèchent dans la forme, qui pourrait être quelquefois plus digne, et souvent plus adoucie; du moins, vous avez gain de cause pour le fond, et c'est l'essentiel. La question débattue entre nous est trop sérieuse, j'ai apporté trop de bonne foi dans cette controverse, pour songer à me défendre par des arguties.

Le travail critique et historique auquel vos articles m'ont conduit, Monsieur, a été suivi d'un autre non moins important. Quand j'ai vu que la doctrine Romaine ne pouvait tenir en face de l'histoire, je me suis démandé si du moins elle n'avait pas dans l'évangile des fondements solides. Laissez-moi vous le dire, Monsieur, ce fut un grand jour dans la vie de mon âme que celui, où après de longues luttes intérieures qu'un vrai Catholique Romain peut seul comprendre, je me décidai à lire l'évangile avec un esprit sincère, mais indépendant. Cent fois précédemment j'avais fait cette lecture, mais dans un simple but d'édification, et bien déterminé à ne jamais voir dans le texte sacré que le sens qu'y attache l'église Romaine. Cette fois je résolus donc de ne m'en rapporter qu'au jugement de ma raison aidée de la prière. Or, à peine eus-je parcouru quelques-unes des saintes pages dans ces dispositions nouvelles que je fus stupéfait de découvrir dans le livre divin une doctrine que je n'y avais jamais remarquée précédemment, et qui dans les points fondamentaux me semble la négation et quelquefois la condamnation expresse des doctrines de Rome. Les limites de cette lettre ne me permettent pas d'entrer aujourd'hui dans quelque détail, mais je crois pouvoir défier qui que ce soit de lire l'évangile comme j'ai fait, c'est-à-dire, exempt de préjugés, et avec droiture de cœur, sans arriver au résultat que, par la grâce de Dieu, j'ai moi-même obtenu. Du reste, je me dispose à publier prochainement à ce sujet un petit travail, qui sera comme l'historique de mes études, de mes observations, et de mes recherches; il servira, peut-être, à guider quelques âmes dans la voie qui conduit à la vérité; en tout cas, ce sera un témoignage de la sincérité, et, (s'il m'est permis de le dire,) de la sagesse avec lesquelles j'ai procédé.

J'aurais pu m'en tenir, Monsieur, à cette double étude sur l'évangile et sur les premiers âges Chrétiens; j'avais droit dès-lors, je pense, de tirer mes conclusions contre le système Romain. Cependant, pour que nul ne pût me reprocher plus tard de m'être prononcé dans une matière aussi grave d'une manière inconsidérée, j'ai voulu tenter une dernière épreuve. J'ai fait tout exprès le voyage de Rome, afin de juger le système en question, sur place, pour ainsi dire, et dans son application immédiate. Oh! c'est là, Monsieur, c'est à Rome que les faits parlent, et, certes, un bien éloquent langage. Oh, non! je ne m'explique plus comment, à part même toute étude préalable, un homme au cœur droit, à l'esprit sincèrement ami de la vérité, peut rester ferme dans sa foi de Catholique Romain, s'il lui a été donné d'observer Rome avec un œil impartial. Presque partout la superstition a la place de la religion; ce trafic odieux des choses de la piété; ces honteuses spéculations sur la foi des simples; l'homme substitué à son Dieu recevant jusque dans le temple les hommages qui ne sont dus qu'au Seigneur lui-même, le luxe pour le moins étrange (au milieu d'une population de mendiants,) de ces cardinaux et de ces pontifes, qui n'hésitent pas à se donner comme les seuls légitimes successeurs des pêcheurs de la Galilée, et comme les premiers ministres de celui qui n'avait pas où reposer sa tête; l'ignorance et la dégradation morale et matérielle de ce pauvre peuple, gouverné par eux, élevé sous leur directe influence, et dans le cœur du quel on a peine à trouver encore la trace d'un sentiment honnête et généreux. . . . . Monsieur, je n'ai séjourné que quatre semaines à Rome, et c'a été bien avisé à moi de ne pas y rester d'avantage; mais dès les premiers moments que j'ai passés dans la ville appellée sainte, il m'a semblé que retentissait sans cesse à mon oreille cette voix mystérieuse qui fut entendue dans le temple de Jérusalem peu de temps avant sa ruine, "Sortons d'ici! Sortons d'ici!"

Et en effet, Monsieur, de ce moment je me juge obligé de renoncer à tout ministère dans l'église Romaine. Il ne m'est pas permis de servir plus long temps une institution qui se donne comme divine, quand une étude consciencieuse m'oblige à ne voir en elle que l'œuvre des hommes, je dirai même, le chef-d'œuvre de l'orgueil humain.

Toutefois, Monsieur, je ne considère pas comme accomplis tous mes devoirs envers la vérité et envers la société Chrétienne. Je vais continuer avec tout le zèle dont je suis capable mes méditations et mes recherces. Joignez-vous à moi pour prier le ciel de les bénir; et puisse venir un jour où il me soit donné de rendre quelques-uns de mes frères participants de la lumière et de la grâce que Dieu dans sa bonté m'aura départies.

Je serais heureux, Monsieur, qu'après nous être traités jadis en adversaires, nous pussions avoir désormais des relations d'emis. En tout cas, agréez, je vous prie, l'assurance des sentiments de haute estime avec lesquels je suis, votre très humble et tout dévoué serviteur,

MIEL.

Londres, 27 Janvier, 1854.

SIR—As you were the first instrument employed by God to remove the scales from my eyes, it is my wish that you may be the first person to whom I communicate the happy change which divine grace has effected in my views and in my heart.

In the first place, I will avow, without circumlocution, how deeply it has grieved me to discover, as you so accurately pointed out, not that I had deceived myself, but that our most esteemed theologians deceive us, or rather deceive themselves. Nevertheless, compelled to yield to evidence respecting the untruthfulness of one of the principal citations in my pamphlet, I thought that I was able to fall back upon the others, which were numerous, and, in my opinion, conclusive. Alas! Sir, you have too successfully shown to me that these deserved no more confidence than the first. I then fell back upon history. I thought I could find in the historical documents of the first Christian period decisive proof of the primacy of the Bishop of Rome—i.e., of the Papal supremacy. I brought forward, with confidence, the most important of the facts upon which Roman Catholic doctors base their system. But ere long a more attentive and unbiassed examination of those facts, to which I was incited by your attacks, proved to me that they were either of no weight or of doubtful authenticity; and for a few which seem to favour the Roman Catholic pretensions, I discovered innumerable instances in manifest contradiction to the thesis which I had undertaken to defend. And I thus found that if your observations upon my pamphlets were faulty in style—if they seemed, on some occasions, wanting in suitable dignity, and often wanting in softness—at least, you had the right and truth of controversy at the foundation, which is the essential point. The question at issue between us is too serious, and I brought to the controversy too much good faith to suffer me to make use of any subterfuges.

The critical and historical researches to which your observations led me was followed by another of no less importance. When I saw that the Roman doctrine could not stand before the face of history, I asked myself whether it had not, at any rate, a firm foundation in the Gospel. And let me tell you, Sir, it was a great day in my existence on which, after long internal struggles, which a real Roman Catholic alone can understand, I, at last, resolved to read the Gospel in a sincere but unbiassed spirit. I had read it hundreds of times before, but simply with a view to edification, and with a full and fixed determination never to see in the sacred text any other sense than that adopted by the Roman Church. But on this occasion, I, at last, resolved to take the opinion of my reason alone, assisted by prayer. Scarcely had I perused a page or two in this new disposition of mind when I was stupified at finding in the Divine Book a doctrine which I had never before observed in it, and which is, in fundamental points the negation and sometimes the express condemnation of the teaching of Rome. The limits of this letter do not permit me to enter, on the present occasion, into any detail; but I defy any one to read the Gospel as I have—I mean free from prejudice, and in uprightness of heart, without arriving at the result, which, thanks be to God, I have myself attained. I hope to be able shortly to publish on this subject a few remarks which will be, as it were, a historical review of my studies, my observations, and my researches; it will, perhaps, serve to guide some souls in the way which leads to the truth; at all events, it will be a testimony of the sincerity, and (if I may so say) of the caution with which I have proceeded.

I should have been justified in contenting myself with this double investigation of the Gospel, and of the early ages of Christianity. I had a right from that moment to draw my conclusions against the system of Rome. However, in order that no one might, on any subsequent occasion, have it in their power to reproach me with having declared myself in a matter of such gravity without the fullest consideration, I wished to make a last trial. I undertook for this sole purpose, a journey to Rome, in order to see the system in question on the spot and in its direct application to men and things around it. Oh! it is there—it is at Rome itself that facts speak, and, assuredly, in eloquent language. I cannot explain to myself how, without reference to any previous studies, any man, with an upright heart, with a mind sincerely attached to truth, can continue firm in the Roman Catholic faith after he has once seen and observed Rome with an impartial eye. Almost everywhere is to be found superstition occupying the place of religion, everywhere an odious traffic in objects of devotion; everywhere shameful speculations based upon the credulity of the simple-minded; man, substituted for God, receiving, even in God's house, the homage due to the Lord alone; amidst a population of mendicants, the strange luxury of cardinals and pontiffs, who give themselves out as the sole, legitimate successors of the fishermen of Galilee, and as the first among the servants of Him who had not where to lay his head: the ignorance and degradation, moral and physical, of their poor people, though governed by them, and brought up under their direct influence, and in whose hearts is scarcely any longer to be discovered the trace of a noble or generous feeling . . . Sir, I remained but four weeks at Rome, and I think I did well to stay no longer; but from the first moment of my sojourn in the so-called Holy City, I seemed ever to hear resounding in my ear that mysterious voice which was heard in the Temple of Jerusalem, shortly previous to its destruction, "Let us flee hence! Let us flee hence!"

I have, in fact, gone out of her; and, you may consider me for this moment to renounce for ever all ministry in the Church of Rome. It is not lawful for me any longer to serve an institution which claims to be divine, when a deeper study and research compel me to see in her but the work of man—I will even say, the greatest work of the pride of man.

I do not, however, consider that I have fulfilled all my duties towards truth and the Christian world. I shall continue to carry on with all the zeal of which I am capable my meditations and my researches. Join, I beg of you, your prayers with mine for the blessing of heaven upon these studies and meditations, and that the day may come when it shall be given me to bring some of my brethren to participate in the light of grace which God shall have shown me.

I should be happy, Sir, if, after having formerly known each other as adversaries, we may henceforward have intercourse as friends. But, in any event, I beg you will accept the sentiments of deep esteem with which I am your very humble and obedient servant,

MIEL.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, OCTOBER, 1854.

IN our number for April, 1853, we gave our readers a short account of the alleged apparition of the Blessed Virgin on the 19th September, 1846, to two peasant children named Peter Maximin Giraud, and Frances Melanie Mathieu, aged respectively eleven and fourteen years, on a mountain, near Grenoble, called La Salette, the authenticity of which formed the subject of a sharp controversy between M. Philibert de Bruillard, Bishop of Grenoble, and his metropolitan, Cardinal de Bonald, Archbishop of Lyons, which terminated in a letter of the latter to his clergy cautioning them against false miracles, from which the following is an extract:—

"In times of perplexity, pious, but imprudent persons are found, who wish to have it thought that God interferes in a visible manner in human affairs. An effect produced by a natural cause, which is to them a mystery, is by them transformed into a prodigy; and without waiting to examine into it, or consult men of knowledge, they allow themselves to be deceived by false appearances, and declare miracles to be true which are very questionable. Some pecuniary speculations which intrude themselves into everything, seize upon this imaginary fact, and, at the expense of the credulous, turn it into profit. Men greedy of gain soon dress out the history of these false miracles, and accompany them by false indulgences. What, then, is their grand object, but to procure dishonest gains, by trafficking in objects of superstition. We, therefore, forbid the publication of any miracle from the pulpit without previous permission, should its authenticity be attested even by another bishop."

We have not recurred to the subject for the last eighteen months, believing that but few of our intelligent Roman Catholic readers were in danger of being deceived or influenced by so glaring an imposture; and knowing that the prevailing feelings, with regard to the matter, were those of regret and shame, that the cause of religion should be compromised by such palpable frauds upon the credulity of mankind.

The asserted miracle has, however, been of late so perseveringly pressed by the ultramon-tane journals, such as L'Univers, the Catholic Standard, and the Tablet,* that we think it would be culpable in us any longer to delay placing before the public the real state of the matter as it now stands, involving, as it clearly does, much more than could have originally been anticipated from such a beginning.

Our attention has been, moreover, particularly called to the subject by some recent publications which show, that the matter still occupies an amount of attention and credit which we could scarcely have anticipated after Cardinal De Bonald's letter.

A little volume, published by Messrs. Richardson, of London and Derby, entitled, "The Holy Mountain of La Salette," by a pilgrim of the year 1854,† among other things discloses the facts, not only that the Bishop of Grenoble published a formal charge ("mandement") in its favour, dated 19th September, 1851, but that the Pope is believed to have been induced to take part with the bishop, by authorising the establishment of a sanctuary at La Salette, to which he has conceded a variety of spiritual favours.

To prevent misconception we transcribe, from this book, page 79, the following passages verbatim :—

"I. By a Rescript of 24th August, 1852, the Sovereign Pontiff declared the High Altar of the Sanctuary of La Salette, a privileged Altar in perpetuity.

"II. By a Rescript of 26th August, 1852, he grants permission to say a Votive Mass of the Blessed Virgin, to all priests who come to La Salette, on any day of the year except on the great Festivals and the privileged Ferias.

"III. By a Brief of 26th August, 1852, the Sovereign Pontiff grants to the members of the Confraternity of La Salette—

"1st. A plenary indulgence on the day of entering the Confraternity.

"2nd. A plenary indulgence at the hour of death.

"3rd. A plenary indulgence once a year, the day of the principal festival of the Confraternity.

"4th. An indulgence of seven years and seven quarantines, four times a year, on four determined days.

"5th. Sixty days of indulgence for every work of piety or of charity accomplished by them.

"IV. By a Brief of 3rd September, 1852, His Holiness grants a plenary indulgence once a year to every one who shall visit the church of La Salette.

"V. Another Brief of the same date grants—

"1st. A plenary indulgence to the faithful who follow the exercises of the missions or of the retreats, preached by the missioners of La Salette, provided they have assisted at three, at least, of the discourses.

"2nd. Two hundred days each time they assist at one of the discourses.

"VI. A Brief of 7th September, 1852, grants for ten of the missioners of La Salette, the power of indulgencing crosses, medals, and beads.

"VII. A Brief of the same date, gives the Missioners of La Salette the power of giving the Scapular to the faithful.

"VIII. A Brief of the same day erects the Confraternity of La Salette into an Arch-confraternity, under the name of our Lady of Reconciliation of La Salette.

"IX. In fine, by an Indult of 2nd December, His Holiness Pius IX. grants, at the request of the Bishop of Grenoble, the permission to solemnize each year, on the 19th of September, the anniversary of the Apparition (VEL IPSO APPARITIONIS DIE), or on the following Sunday, in all the churches of the Diocese, by a solemn Mass, and by singing the Vespers of the Blessed Virgin. In the same Indult His Holiness authorizes the clergy, if they prefer it, to celebrate the memory of the Apparition (MEMORIAM HUJUS APPARITIONIS RECOLERE), by adopting the entire office, and celebrating the Mass of the Patronage of the Blessed Virgin, under solemn rite, as a Double of the Second Class."

If the Holy See has not formally pronounced upon the fact of La Salette in the above briefs, we cannot but think that it has given, at least, to this new devotion (taking for granted that the above statements are true), an amount of countenance and encouragement which it would be scarcely proper for an infallible judge to give to an Apocryphal miracle, or even to one of the truth of which he had not satisfied himself in the most conclusive manner.

The work, accordingly, has gone on rapidly; and we read in the Tablet of 6th May, 1854, that 42,000 francs have already been received for building a fine church of black marble, on the mountain, now nearly completed; in addition to which they are also erecting two hospitals, one for men under an order of La Salette monks; the other for women, managed by La Salette nuns; and not even contented with confining these orders to the kingdom of France, we find that the Roman Catholic Bishop of Birmingham has thought it right to establish what we suppose may be considered a kind of chapel of ease to La Salette, in the good town of Stratford-on-Avon, by the following decree, published in the Tablet of 10th September, 1853 :—

"IN THE CHAPEL OF NOTRE DAME DE LA SALETTE, AT STRATFORD-ON-AVON.

"William Bernard, by the grace of God, and the favour of the apostolic see, Bishop of Birmingham, to all by whom these presents shall be heard or read, health and benediction in the Lord.

"Having taken into our consideration the petition addressed to us by the Rev. Alfred J. Dayman, missionary priest at Stratford-on-Avon, praying us that we would canonically erect in the chapel of Notre Dame de la Salette, of the said mission, a pious association of prayers and good works, under the title of 'Our Lady of Reconciliation of La Salette.'

"Having diligently considered the devout ends contemplated by this association, and the tenour of the brief of our Holy Father Pius IX., of date September 7, 1852, whereby the Sovereign Pontiff erects into an arch-confraternity the pious association of 'Our Lady of Reconciliation of La Salette,' established in the sanctuary of that name, in the diocese of Grenoble, in France;

"Having, moreover, in view the design of honouring more and more the ever-blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, and of manifesting our confidence in the efficacy of invoking her intercession under the title of 'Our Lady of Reconciliation of La Salette,' and of opening to the faithful of our diocese a new means of obtaining the grace and blessings of Almighty God, especially in the conversion of sinners to repentance, of such as are sealed in error to the truth, in the reparation of all blasphemies against God, against his saints, and against holy things, of the neglect of his holy laws, and the laws of the Church, especially the sanctification of the Sunday, and of all the crimes, sacrileges, and abandonment of the duties of religion, which brings the scourges of God upon his people;

"And with the full assurance that this pious association will contribute, through the mercy of God and the intercession of the ever-blessed and immaculate Mary our Mother, to the divine glory and the salvation of souls;

"We hereby, and through these presents, erect, in the aforesaid Chapel of Notre Dame de la Salette, at Stratford-on-Avon, the Association of our Lady of Reconciliation of La Salette, and we depute the Rev. Alfred Joken Dayman, missionary priest of that chapel, to establish this pious confraternity, and to direct the same in conformity with the statutes hereunto annexed.

"And we authorize the said director of this confraternity to obtain its aggregation with the arch-confraternity of La Salette, with the view of obtaining for the association those favours and indulgences which either have been or may be granted to it by the Holy See, and a participation in the prayers and good works of the association.

"Given at Birmingham, under our hand or seal, and the signature of our secretary, the 17th day of August, 1853.

"✠ W. BERNARD, Bishop of Birmingham.

"By command of my Lord Bishop,

"E. ESTCOURT, Secretary."

The alleged miracles wrought by our Lady of La Salette, are, as the writer in the Tablet of 6th May last, observes, "most stupendous and almost inconceivable." Two are given in some detail, as samples, which we transcribe verbatim, though some of our readers may, perhaps, censure us for giving circulation to such self-evident fabrications :—

"One was of a nun who was raised from death to life! Her history is this:—Long afflicted with internal cancer, she was also covered all over with large boils of twelve months' standing. In consequence she was bedridden, and so weakened that her recovery was wholly despaired of. Convulsive fits and paralysis followed. The Last Sacraments were administered, and prayers for the agonizing said. Before dying she made two requests of her mother—one was to have a Mass said for her the morning of her death; the other to place in her hand, after her being laid out, a small image of Our Lady of La Salette, which she had devotion to, and that it might be buried with her. These were her last words. She grew worse, and died that night. Her mother sent word to the parish church to have the Mass said, and sat up with others to wake the corpse. In the course of the night she recollected her promise, and taking the image out of a press in the same room, she had no sooner laid it on her daughter's bosom than, to the astonishment of all present, the corpse gave a deep sigh, and was heard to articulate, 'O Divine Mere, si je dois vivre, c'est pour vous servir toute ma vie sur votre sainte montagne!' Great was the terror of all present at this, but greater still did it become when the corpse gave signs of life by turning on one side. Sleep for three hours followed; and she, who had been dead, awoke in perfect health!—she who could not move herself in bed sat up, asked for her clothes, walked to church, and heard the very Mass which was to have been said for the repose of her own soul!!"

The other occurred also to a nun in the neighbourhood :—

"The mistress of the work awoke in the middle of the night, hearing, as she thought with good reason, some robbers in the workroom, where some very rich vestments then were. Imagining that the robbers would fly if disturbed, she advanced and opened the door, but they, two in number, rushed upon her and gave her several severe wounds. She fell, calling on Our Blessed Lady of La Salette for protection, and promising, if she obtained it, to make a pilgrimage to the holy mountain. The robbers escaped; she was found to have received no less than twenty-six wounds, many of which were by the surgeons pronounced mortal. But three days afterwards she was miraculously cured, no mark whatever remaining on her. The bishop gave her permission to perform the pilgrimage, which she went through, accompanied by the whole community."

We might add to these a whole chapter of similar miracles, from the work of the Pilgrim of 1854, already referred to, but our space forbids; and if those we have given do not convince the minds of "the faithful," we suppose the whole catalogue would fail likewise.

That they have all failed to carry conviction to the minds of those who have had the greatest facilities for judging of the whole matter by their proximity to the spot, may be best proved by the following widely-circulated prospectus of a work lately published at Grenoble, exclusively for the priesthood, by a considerable body of the clergy of that diocese, with the object of laying before the Pope a memorial showing the dangers attending the (Roman) Catholic Church from the adoption of such false miracles. The work is entitled: "La Salette devant le Pape, ou Rationalism et Héresie découlant du Fait de 'La Salette,' suivie du Mémoire au Pape. Par plusieurs Membres du Clergé diocésan de Grenoble" :—

"PROSPECTUS.

"The event of 'La Salette' has had immense notoriety; for in every part of Europe the clergy have accepted it and proclaimed it as a religious fact, having, to a certain degree, made it enter into the religious belief of the Catholic populations.

"The diocese of Grenoble, and some of the neighbouring dioceses, have alone resisted the movement which elsewhere was received with feelings of confidence, but which was rejected at Grenoble, Lyons, Gap, &c.; because there, on the very scene of the event, they were aware of all the machinations of this work, which was essentially human, and they foresaw that the foundations of religion would be shaken in this age of rationalism by this rash enterprise.

* The Tablet of 3rd September, 1853, says—"The appearance of La Salette is a great supernatural event, which has happened in an unbelieving age, to confound the infidel and the blasphemer." And a letter to the editor, dated Mountain of La Salette, 16th September, 1851, inserted in the Tablet, of 20th September last, commences thus—"Dear Sir—When the editor of the Univers, was lately asked if he believed in the apparition of La Salette, he answered, 'Tout L'Univers Croit!' That the editor of the Tablet believes it all the world knows; and I beg to assure him that the missioners of La Salette feel truly grateful for the good that has been done by his advocacy of the truth of the apparition."

The Tablet of 12th August, 1854, reviewing the work, published by Richardson, says—"We suppose this work will long remain the most important repository of information on the stupendous event of which it treats."

† The Catholic Standard of 26th August, 1854, in reviewing this, has the following passage—"Even in those days of coldness and unbelief, we are not without visible proofs of the Blessed Virgin's continued interest in our behalf, and of her power with God. Not only is she not repulsed by our tepidity—for the very reason that faith has waxed cold does she appear amongst us, endeavouring by fresh miracles of grace to excite us to fervour in the service of God. Rimini, La Salette, and other localities, have, in our own days, witnessed a renewal of the wonders of more faithful ages; and persons brought into the Church, or into a state of grace, not merely by the devout use of the medals and scapulars of Mary, but by her visible interposition in their behalf."

"The honour of the Catholic religion—the danger which it incurs from 'La Salette'—have determined the most intelligent and conscientious amongst the clergy of the diocese on breaking silence, under the protection of the 'disciplinary canons,' and on submitting the affair of 'La Salette' to the Pope, in a memorial which is a model of propriety and moderation, and which points out the unfortunate means by which it was endeavoured to exalt an event, exclusively human, to the dignity of a miracle.

"One of the clergy has (in a work characterized by great powers of reasoning, close logical conclusions, and deep veneration for the first principles of Catholicism, as well as by a religious spirit which drew forth the sympathy and approval of the prelates to whom it was submitted) shown the power of authority, in opposition to that of rationalism, and proves in the most decisive manner by facts, quotations, and the discussions which it has given rise to:

"1. That the recital of the lady to the two shepherds (the groundwork of the miracle) has been falsified in its essential points, and with the most aggravating circumstances.

"2. That none of the rules prescribed by the Council of Trent (Sess. 25) have been attended to.

"3. That the miracles cited are apocryphal.

"4. That the 'doctrinal mandement' of the 19th September, 1851, is based entirely upon error.

"5. That in order to force the acceptance of this 'mandement' on the diocese, persecution and bribery were by turns resorted to.

"6. That Rome has not acknowledged the apparition

"7. That the conduct and recent predictions of the two shepherds—predictions which were impious, heretical, anarchical, enslaving, and which were too well known at Grenoble and in the diocese—far from having produced faith in La Salette, cause it to be repudiated.

"8. That the apparition is reduced to the promenade, on the mountain of 'La Salette,' of a fanatical nun, who has been pointed out by name, and defied to prove an alibi.

"9. That henceforward 'La Salette' involves a capital heresy, and introduces rationalism into the Church by the sanction of authority.

"These solemn assertions will cease to surprise when the third chapter of the work has been read, and when one is forced to veil the face on seeing it proved that in 1842, 1843, 1844, and 1845, in the very same diocese, divers miracles had been attempted, and that amongst others the adoration had been commanded, and a church had been erected in honour of some blood, whose acceptance as the precious blood of our Lord Jesus Christ had been insisted on. The priest should live by truth; his lips are the depositories of learning; and if he be so fortunate as to awaken faith, and to extend it, he should not compromise its purity by the inconsiderate adoption of a false miracle.

"A false miracle throws doubt and contempt on true miracles; and in our days, with the spirit of rationalism that exists, it does more—it creates doubts and contempt as to the doctrines as well as the acts of the Church; and it is with the sole end of averting this danger, and enlightening ecclesiastics at a distance, that the clergy after God's own heart have had the courage to unite in a volume, of nearly 400 large pages 8vo., this memorial to the Pope, and a commentary, which is as rich in quotations and in facts, as conclusive in its proofs. It is addressed to their ecclesiastical brethren in France and in foreign countries. This work is a production exclusively ecclesiastic. It will be the Vade Mecum of the priest who desires truth as God would have it—who seeks for light to direct safely the belief of the flock intrusted to his care, that he may not lead them thoughtlessly into a path merely human, which, ere long, his conscience might make it a duty to attack, so that he might not be the means of supplying a new and too dangerous weapon to the enemies of religion. This work is to be had, by ecclesiastics only, at the Libraire Nouvelle, rue Bayard 13, à Grenoble, (Isère) price 4f., and 5f. 20c. by post. This may be sent either by twenty-six postage stamps, post paid, or by Post-office order.

"An order for 12 copies, at least, will be forwarded by diligence, and the price will then be reduced to 4f. 50c.

"To be had at the same library, 'La Salette fallavaux (fallax vallis), ou la Vallée de Mensonge.' Par M. Donnadieu. 2 vols., in 16mo. Price 2f. 50c.; and by post, 3f. 50c. All letters to be paid.

"LENOIR, P.P.

"It is requested that this prospectus may be communicated."

The extensive circulation of the above work throughout France, has given a severe blow to the credit of what we must consider the greatest imposture of the 19th century. The Bishop of Grenoble, however, is too deeply implicated in the matter to give up without a struggle; and we are, therefore, not surprised to find in the Univers, of the 7th inst., a long mandement of the said bishop, bearing date 30th September, 1854, not only condemning the book entitled, "La Salette devant le Pape," Grenoble, imprimerie Redon, 1854, without one syllable of disproof of its contents, but prohibiting the faithful of his diocese from reading the book, keeping, or circulating it, under pain of excommunication, or, if ecclesiastics, of suspension ipso facto; and further prohibiting, under like penalties, every one from reading, keeping, or circulating even the prospectus of the work, as also the two volumes entitled "La Salette Fallavaux," par Donnadieu, mentioned in the same prospectus!

Thus, at present, stands this important controversy, begun it will be recollected by the indignant remonstrance of a Cardinal Archbishop, denouncing those "whose object was to procure dishonest gains by trafficking in objects of superstition," and ending, for the present, by a decree of excommunication against all who have the courage to read the masterly exposè by M. Lenoir and his colleagues, of this daring and gigantic fraud upon the credulity of the 19th century, which, judging from Salette and the Immaculate Conception agitation, appears to require strong stimulants to keep its faith in an active state.

How the thing will end it is hard to say. It is publicly asserted at Grenoble that the police have been, for some time, on the track of the fanatic who played the part of the Virgin on the occasion; but we confess we much doubt whether anything serious will be brought before the public by that machinery. It is far more probable that all the weight of the government action will be thrown into the scale of the imposture. Louis Napoleon is, we fear, too deeply implicated with the parti-pretre to run the risk of covering them with shame and confusion by inconvenient disclosures; and it is much more likely that the wretched creature will be quietly removed to some place where there will be an end of her testimony; and so "our Lady of Salette" will be as firmly maintained on her pedestal as any other saint in the Roman calendar.

We shall probably return to this subject shortly, and examine it a little more particularly, merely adding, for the present, that we understand that the Abbè Rousselot, who has written three works on the subject, has made a good round sum by propagating the grounds of his belief, while M. Lenoir and his colleagues are prohibited from circulating the grounds of their belief, under the penalties of suspension and excommunication.*

* M. Ronsselot, we are informed, drives also a thriving trade by selling to the pilgrims the miraculous water from the fountain near which the virgin appeared (said to be a sovereign cure for sore eyes), though he has been sadly grieved, they say, of late, by a reverend brother, the Vicar of Corps (a village 4 or 5 miles distant from Salette, upon the road through which the pilgrims pass to the scene of the miracle), who has laid in a large store of the water in bottle, to gratify the impatience of the pilgrims to possess the magic liquid, who buy largely of him without going to the fountain head, to say nothing of the winter season, when Salette is not accessible owing to the snow, when the Vicar has all the trade to himself, of course, to the great loss and dissatisfaction of M. Rousselot, the original vendor. This is really hard on poor M. Rousselot, who has worked very hard for his privilege, not only by writing up the whole thing himself, but actually going in person to Rome, and bringing back with him the special indulgence, which authorized the pilgrimage; and but for which not one bottle of the water would ever have been sold at all! We do not exactly know whether M. Rousselot has any interest in the profits of the substantial inn which has been established on the spot for the comfort of the pilgrims; but we are informed, by a correspondent from Grenoble, that it is perfectly clear that it is the landlord of this inn who, in his double character of landlord and exporter of holy water, has profited most largely by the transaction. Of the magnitude of his gains, we may judge from a letter, published in the Tablet of 26th September, 1854, in which the writer states, that a vast number of pilgrims were then there from every part of France, as well as from Italy and Spain. The number of people assembled was not less than six thousand!

RECENT CONTROVERSY AT BOULOGNE.

A PAMPHLET having been recently published at Boulogne, entitled "A Resumé of a Controversy between a Protestant Doctor of Divinity and two Catholic Laymen," printed by Berger, Brothers, 51, Grand Rue, Boulogne, which we are informed contains a very unfair and garbled statement of the arguments of the reverend gentleman, who maintained the Protestant side, and was published without his concurrence or any previous communication with him, we consider it a duty to open our pages to a correct version of what passed on the occasion, authenticated by a letter from that gentleman, signed by himself; merely adding that, in the spirit of candour and fair play, which we are always anxious to maintain, we shall be happy to publish any reply or further argument which may be furnished to us by the Roman Catholic gentlemen in question, provided they comply with the general rules on which our periodical is conducted. We rejoice to find, from the closing passage in the "Resumé," that our offer is likely to be accepted, as it states that "the following distinct offer [printed in capital letters] was made on the [Roman] Catholic side—viz., TO GIVE UP TWO HOURS A DAY FOR A WHOLE YEAR, IF NECESSARY, TO THE DISCUSSION OF ANY POINTS PROPOSED BY THE DOCTOR OR ANY OF HIS COLLEAGUES, IN WHATEVER NUMBER OR OF WHATEVER DIGNITY."

We regret that it is out of our power, from the crowded state of our pages, to insert the whole in our present number.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Allow me to request your insertion of the following account of a discussion which took place recently at Boulogne, between two Roman Catholic gentlemen and myself; the substantial accuracy of which I can vouch for. The circumstances under which the discussion took place were briefly as follows:—

A young lady, who had become a Roman Catholic, had expressed her intention of entering a nunnery. Before taking this step she consented, at the wish of an anxious friend, to hear what might be urged against her adopted faith, provided the Protestant advocate would be prepared to meet those who were ready, on her part, to defend it. An earnest request having been made to me that I would undertake the matter, I agreed to do so, and went to Boulogne for the purpose. Before the discussion began I was distinctly informed that the young lady had not the slightest doubt upon any article of the Roman Catholic religion, and that the discussion was merely to satisfy her friends, and to be private. A report of the arguments used, entitled "Resumè of a Controversy between a Protestant Doctor of Divinity and two Roman Catholic Gentlemen," has since been printed at Boulogne by these gentlemen without any communication having been previously made to me, for authentication of its truth or accuracy; and I regret to add that the following statement, which is as nearly as possible what passed, is, in almost every essential particular, different from that given in the "Resumè." Whether those gentlemen were justified in printing, without my concurrence having been even asked, any report of our discussion, I leave them to consider; but as they have done so behind my back, and without even the authentication of their own names, I consider myself bound to publish a true account, authenticated by my signature.

I have the honour to be, sir, yours very truly,

EDWARD B. MOERAN, D.D.

Kingstown, Oct. 1, 1854.

Dr. Moeran—My time here is limited. Hence, and as infallibility is not only the great boast of your Church, but also the doctrine, which, if admitted, brings with it the admission of all tenets having its sanction, I propose it as the subject for discussion, and as no proof of it can go beyond the Scriptures, I am ready to commence with your main passage—"Thou art Peter," &c.

Mr. Gretton—There are other passages; and infallibility can be proved in three ways: by reason, tradition, and Scripture.

Dr. M.—What is the argument from reason?

Mr. G.—If a revelation has been given to a Church, there must be some infallible method of ascertaining its meaning and teaching it. If, in fact, a Church be possessed of a revelation, it must, in order to be a Church at all, and discharge the functions of a Church, be also possessed of infallibility.

Dr. M.—Was the Jewish Church a true Church?

Mr. G.—Yes.

Dr. M.—Was it infallible?

Mr. G.—Not in the same sense as the Catholic Church. The infallibility of the latter was more complete and extended.

Dr. M.—I do not understand your answer. What do you mean by "same sense." Infallibility cannot consist of degrees.

Mr. Langdon—The Jewish Church has nothing to do with the matter; there is no resemblance whatever between it and the Catholic.

Dr. M.—However different they may have been in other respects, they are quite similar in the only circumstance essential to my argument—namely, each was a Church. Mr. Gretton's argument from reason is this—a Church possessed of a revelation cannot properly be a Church at all, unless it have infallibility. My reply is—the Jewish Church was possessed of a revelation, and was not infallible. Yet it was not only a Church but the only existing Church. It was the true Church of God, though its priests spoke falsely, and its rulers rejected the Lord Jesus, and crucified Him. If Mr. Gretton's argument from reason be good, its necessary consequence is to unchurch that Church so loved, and acknowledged of God. Now, as such a result cannot be admitted, being contrary to fact, the argument which necessitates it, must be false.

No further answer was then given. On the next morning, Mr. Gretton referred to the subject, and said, he was now prepared to maintain that the Jewish Church was infallible, though not in the same perfect way as the Catholic. God had given to it a revelation. He also sent prophets—infallible teachers—in quick succession; thus He preserved Divine truth in the Jewish Church.

Dr. M.—The answer now attempted is a clear sophism. For the question between us is not whether the announcers of Divine truth be infallible, but whether, after a revelation has once been fully given, it is essential to the existence of the Church possessing it, that this Church either itself be, or have, some visible infallible interpreter. You are confounding two things totally distinct—the inspiration of the prophets as announcers of a Divine truth, with the (presumed) necessity of infallibility of a Church as interpreting it.

No further reply was attempted. Thus the argument for infallibility from reason ceased.

I now proceed with the arguments from Scripture, which are wholly omitted in the "Resumè."

The passage, "Thou art Peter," &c., first came under consideration.

Dr. M.—I desire to know, distinctly, what is the inference you propose to make from this text? Does it, to your view, establish the infallibility of Peter, and of his (presumed) successors, or their jurisdiction over the whole Church, or their infallibility and jurisdiction?

Mr. G.—Both.

Dr. M.—My reason for asking is this—there is, among the members of the Roman Catholic Church, notorious discordance in their views of infallibility. Some will have the Pope to be personally infallible; others, a general council; and a third party contend that the union of both is necessary. The fact of so great indeterminateness of opinion, where it is all-important that unanimity, if existing, should appear, proves, I conceive, very decisively, a clear insufficiency of the passages of Scripture to establish this doctrine at all. To save time, then, let me know, at the outset, what meaning you attach to the passage, and keep to that meaning. If the words, "Thou art Peter," &c., contain only a promise of jurisdiction, then you cannot use it at all, when called on to prove infallibility. If they also contain the promise of infallibility, then you must be consistent, and limit this prerogative, as the passage refers to an individual, or (to allow, for a moment, your requirement) to individuals—i.e., to the Roman Pontiffs, unless you can show a reason why it should be extended to a body—i.e., the Church. Now, then, is not any prerogative, herein contained, personal?

Mr. G.—I am an ultramontane in the most extended sense. I hold this passage to convey infallibility to St. Peter, and to his successors, the Popes.

Dr. M.—You hold, then, that the Popes are personally infallible, by virtue of their office, as successors of St. Peter?

Mr. G.—I do.

Mr. L.—Oh! Mr. Gretton does not mean to say that. What he means is—

Dr. M.—But Mr. Gretton did, very explicitly, say so. It is an opinion common to the school to which he belongs, though vehemently opposed by a great portion of his Church. I shall, however, ask the question again.

The same question was then asked, and answered in the same way.

Dr. M.—Now, Mr. L., is this your opinion, or is it the doctrine of your Church? I add the latter question, as I shall be much surprised if you produce any judgment whatever of your Church on a matter of such moment.

Mr. L.—Mr. Gretton and I are quite agreed. We both believe the Pontiff cannot err. Every Catholic child is taught to say, daily, a prayer for the Pope. Now, if "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much," my instinct (!) tells me that God, in answer to so much prayer, will pour down upon the Holy Father such an amount of grace as to keep him from all error in doctrine, and render him, in fact, infallible.

Dr. M.—You are but trying to hide—and I must strongly press upon our hearers this attempt to do so*—the manifest difference of opinion which exists between you. Mr. G., an ultramontane, holds the personal infallibility of the Pontiff, deducing it from the passage, "Thou art Peter," &c.; while you, Mr. Langdon—holding, in common with the great body of your Church, not the infallibility of an individual but of the Church itself—dare not accept the interpretation which your friend gives to this passage, since that explanation will exclude you from applying it at all to the Church. Now, you cannot afford to do this; your case will not stand without trying to jumble together what is clearly personal with what applies to the Church of Christ at large. It will not, however, do to let your hearers perceive the great difference among those who make their boast of unity. That, at all hazards, must be avoided. Accordingly, when pressed, you say you do believe, with Mr. Gretton, in the infallibility of the Pontiff; but the reason you give is, your instinct tells you that God, in answer to prayer, will, in point of fact, render him infallible. I will add here, that the difficulty which this passage, "Thou art Peter," &c., occasions to the Roman Catholic Church is no light one. It is impossible, without it, to give any colour whatever to their claim of infallibility; but when it is taken into the proof—as any prerogatives presumed to be contained therein are personal—the legitimate result is to restrict them to individuals—that is, granting your own inference to the Roman Pontiffs. The infallibility of the Church of Rome cannot, therefore, be proved by it, and it is certain it cannot be proved without it. Hence, the explanation of this notorious and striking fact—the Church of Rome has never yet declared, and I do not believe ever will declare, where infallibility is to be found. She has left it an open question. The members of her communion are free, in the absence of any official declaration, to oscillate among these conflicting doubts—whether the Pope be infallible, or the Church, or the union of both. The infallible Church has never yet determined where her infallibility can be found.

Mr. G.—She has, in her general councils, which declare that they are assembled "by the authority of the holy Roman See and in the Holy Ghost."

Dr. M.—This is no answer to the question; which is not whether infallibility has been claimed indiscriminately by Pontiffs, or by Councils, which the Church of Rome either receives or rejects. I am not speaking of a claim made by Council against Pope, by Pope against Council, or by one Council, with a Pope at its head, against a rival Council, headed by its Pontiff. I am asking for a simple decision determining who among these litigants has "the right of possession." I want a single authoritative declaration from the Church of Rome localizing infallibility, determining where it is situated. It is historically true that Councils have asserted their superiority over a Pope, and that Pontiffs have recriminated theirs on Councils. Or, to put the objection in another way, Roman Catholics profess to take every doctrine from the teaching of an infallible tribunal; but one of their doctrines is—I am, at least, so told by almost every Roman Catholic whom I ask—that the criterion of infallibility is the confirmation of a Council by a Pontiff. Now, what I want to know is, where a Council, confirmed by a Pontiff (their own criterion of infallibility), ever asserted this doctrine—namely, that such was the criterion of infallibility.* If you cannot produce this, you are convicted of doing that which you affect to condemn in Protestants—receiving doctrines on the conviction of your own judgment properly exercised—convicted of a contradiction, and furnishing an argument, because being an instance, against the need of infallibility as a ground of belief.

Mr. G.—I say again that infallibility has been always claimed and allowed; it is the foundation on which all the acts of the Church proceed; no general council has ever sat without assuming it as a claim allowed. You may as well ask me to prove a man has a head, or that he has reason. A man, acting as a man, proves himself possessed of reason. So with general councils; they always act on the claim to infallibility, and thus prove it.

Dr. M.—No one doubts that a man has a head, and that it is situate between his shoulders; but as to infallibility, Roman Catholics themselves doubt about its locality, and all other persons deny its existence. You both assert that the criterion of infallibility is either a general council or the Pontiff speaking ex cathedrâ. Others of your communion require the union of both these to secure it. The councils of Basil, Constance, Pisa, and Lateran bear witness to these disputes.

Mr. G.—But the Church has subsequently decided between them; her list of councils determines which was right.*

Dr. M.—But the existence of the disputes proves it had not been settled that the Pontiff, speaking ex cathedrâ, or a general council, did constitute the criterion of infallibility. There appears to have been no consent as to the locality of infallibility. You are, I think, chargeable justly in this matter with holding a doctrine without having that only security for its truth which you profess to admit. Nor is this the only instance. You do the same with respect to "the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary." As yet your Church has not formally pronounced upon it. It is well known to have been, for a considerable time after its introduction, the occasion of one of the fierce disputes between your two great orders of Dominicans and Franciscans. You believe that doctrine implicitly now. No subsequent authentication can add anything to your belief either of its truth or importance. Here then again, Roman Catholics, who so boast of infallibility as the guarantee for truth, are found to believe as firmly without it as with it. You save Protestants the trouble of confuting you, for you confute yourselves. My former argument was intended to show the indeterminateness of infallibility. This instance shows—you furnish the evidence—the inutility of it. While the entire absence in early church history of a single instance where the claim was made and allowed proves the novelty of the doctrine.

No additional argument having been adduced on this part of the subject, the passage—"Thou art Peter," &c., then came under discussion.

Dr. M.—You have already said, Mr. Gretton, that this passage confers infallibility upon St. Peter, and those whom you consider as his successors. Upon what principle of interpretation did you make this assertion? It must have been either upon the authority of your Church, or upon the universal consent of the Fathers, or upon your own judgment. The first of these you cannot use, since this would be to assume infallibility in order to prove it. The second you cannot allege, since it does not exist. The Fathers have been, not only not unanimous in their interpretation of the text, but not one of them, so far as I have ever heard, ascribes to it the sense which you do. None interpret it as conferring infallibility either upon Pontiff or Church. Are you not, then, driven to admit, what you cannot avoid, the Protestant principle—the use of private judgment directed by the proper means of regulating its exercise. It seems to me that, at the very outset of your attempt to prove infallibility from Scripture, you are stopped by the following difficulty:—Unless you be infallibly certain that you are right in the interpretation of this, or any other text adduced in proof of this doctrine, you cannot be infallibly certain of the conclusion. But you cannot be infallibly certain that you are correct in the interpretation, since for that you must rely on human judgment, which you always assert cannot be trusted; therefore, you cannot be infallibly certain of the conclusion—that is, your proof of infallibility is fallible, and, therefore, the doctrine itself unproved.

Again, the Council of Trent binds you never to interpret Scripture contrary to the unanimous consent of the Fathers, or to the sense which the Church always held. Yet there is no unanimous consent of the Fathers on this text, nor any unvarying sense of the Church.

Mr. G.—Protestants always make a foolish blunder about "the consent of the Fathers." The Council of Trent does not mean to say that every Catholic, before he interprets a passage of Scripture, is bound to examine the folio volumes of the Fathers, amounting to some hundreds. But simply that no Catholic is permitted to interpret Scripture, on points of faith, contrary to the universal consent of the Fathers, or the sense which the Church has always put upon it. Any other meaning is quite absurd.

Dr. M.—I am quite aware of the explanation you give to the words. But there is a convenient ambiguity in them which conveys the claim, that you really do always * Rather than give any description, or express any opinion on this attempt, I shall use an extract from a letter addressed to Mr. Langdon by one who witnessed it. The letter itself is an indignant protest against the unfaithfulness of the "Resumè":—

"In this 'true statement of the whole controversy' (words used by Mr. Gretton when describing the 'Resumè,' which he and Mr. Langdon drew up, in a correspondence with the gentlemen whose letter I now quote), I have looked in vain for Mr Gretton's admission that, being of the ultramontane school, he believed in the personal infallibility of the Pope, while you distinctly, for yourself, repudiated the notion. A curious example, as it struck me at the time, of that agreement of 'all Catholics' in Catholic doctrine, of which you so often boasted. You have glossed over this point at page 71 you felt the inconvenience of your awkward position, and attempted, clumsily, to shade off the difference by stating that 'a prayer was offered daily by every member of the Church of Rome for the Pope, and that such an amount of grace was asked for, and concentrated upon that one point—namely, the Popedom—that it was impossible to conceive he could err.' So much for Catholic unity.

"I do not perceive that Mr. Gretton has established the correctness of his ultramontane opinion in print, as he did orally, by the graphic portrait he gave us of Popes Liberius, Marcellinus, and Alexander VI., whom he described as 'awful,' 'dreadful,' and 'vile characters,' 'whose horrible conduct was equivalent to denying Christ.' So infallibly fallible were those men that, according to Mr. Gretton, they ought to have been hung, drawn, and quartered!!! So much, also, for the daily prayer and its effects to which you referred."

These statements with respect to the characters of these popes—matters, of course, of known history—were drawn out in attempting an answer to the following difficulty—What accredited test has an ultramontane Roman Catholic for distinguishing when the Pope speaks infallibly—what is the authorised (not private opinion) rule for deciding when the Pope speaks officially or unofficially? The distinction between the office and the individual who bears it is intelligible and just. But these Roman Catholics who hold the personal infallibility and admit, as they must, the monstrous crimes of some among their pontiffs, are sometimes not a little perplexed to give an account of "the sayings," as well as "the doings" of their Vicars of Christ. The gentleman from whose letter I have quoted has, at least, raised a fatal objection to Mr. Langdon—unless, indeed, the custom of praying for the Pope be as novel as the argument here founded on it; for if prayer call down so great an amount of grace as to preserve the Pontiff from doctrinal, why not also from practical errors? I notice this because a similar answer avails in a different and important part of the controversy. It is well known that one of the great arguments of Roman Catholic controversialists for the infallibility of the Pope or of the Church (which of the two they have not yet decided) is from the words, "Lo, I am with you always even unto the end of the world." A good answer to this is—If the presence of Christ be, as you assert, the guarantee for infallibility, why not likewise for impeccability? Why do you assume that the presence of the Lord secures only soundness of doctrine, and not purity of life: the heart is as important as the head. It is evident that the Roman Catholic who makes the distinction in this passage, is bound to account for it. The flagitious lives of some among the Popes is a complete answer, at least, to any Roman Catholic who uses this passage to prove the infallibility of the Pontiff.

* I had selected this criterion as being that almost invariably given. The same question is, however, equally applicable to any of the three criteria unsettled up to this day. The simple fact that there such do really exist, shows us the difficulty of settling the doctrine, the impossibility of proving it. It is some disparagement to infallibility that after all, its advocates have recourse to the wiser rule—"in the multitude of counsellors there is safety."

* Where is such a list, authorised by the Church of Rome, to be found? We showed, in our October number for 1853, vol. II., p. 116, that no such list exists. Ed.

interpret Scripture according to such consent. And Roman Catholics are continually told, and led to believe, that the Fathers are really unanimous upon the passages adduced in proof of the peculiar doctrine of the Church of Rome; whereas the very reverse is a known historic fact. Thus, the celebrated Abbé Launoy proves, by extracts from the Fathers, that they held no less than four different interpretations of the passage, "Thou art Peter," &c.

Mr. G.—The Church has always interpreted the passage, as making St. Peter head of the Apostles, and giving him the power of the keys—jurisdiction over the whole Church of Christ—to him and to his successors.

IS THE ROMAN CHURCH THE MOTHER AND MISTRESS OF ALL CHURCHES?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I have read with pleasure your leading article, on the "Catholic Church," in your last number; because, I think, you have put the question on its real point: for, I think, the dispute must turn on that article of the Roman creed, that "the Roman Church is the mother and mistress of all Churches:" is that true or false? that is the question.

My reason for writing, is this. I remarked that your Roman Catholic correspondents wrote very clearly about the Catholic Church: they would write about that, and about nothing else. Now, I hope, they won't drop it, just when you bring it to the real point. Is the Church of Rome "the mother and mistress of all Churches?" Surely they won't drop the question, just when it comes to that!

Dear sir, if you have got a letter from any of them about that, then don't mind putting in this letter; but if you have got no letter from any of them, then just put in this note to remind them that we are all waiting, now that the thing has got to a point,

Yours, dear sir,

ONE THAT WANTS TO BE A TRUE CATHOLIC.

IS THE PROTESTANT BIBLE A CORRUPT AND MUTILATED TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES?*

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I very much regret to find that you have brought to a close your interesting articles on the above important subject. You have omitted to notice passages, equally interesting and important, bearing on the controversy between Protestants and Roman Catholics, with those already noticed by you. Permit me to bring before your readers, three other texts, which are differently rendered in the two translations; on each of which, important doctrines or ecclesiastical usages are founded, and which Protestants are accused of perverting for sinister and unholy purposes. An omission, on your part to notice these, might be construed, by some of your lay Roman Catholic readers, into a tacit admission of the correctness of the present Roman Catholic version.

I refer to the three texts from John ii. 4, Ephes. v. 32, and 1 Cor. xi. 27.

1. John ii. 4.—The words, Τι εμοι και σοι, γύναι, are rendered, in the Roman Catholic translation, "Woman, what is that to me and to thee?"—in the Protestant version, "Woman, what have I to do with thee?" It has been argued that Protestants have wandered from a literal translation of the words, to adopt another which would convey an idea that our Lord desired to rebuke his mother for her untimely interference, whereas, if properly rendered, "it plainly shows that his mother knew of the miracle that he was to perform, and that it was at her request he wrought it."†

I may be permitted to observe that it is not a modern Protestant notion, that the words of our Lord were uttered in reproof. Saint Irenæus (A.D. 180) said, in reference to his mother's interference, that "the Lord repelled her untimely hurrying, said," &c.‡ Saint Chrysostom (A.D. 405) speaks of her "foolish arrogance."‖ And Saint Augustine (A.D. 430), in his comment on our Lord's address to Mary, said, "His Mother required him to perform a miracle, but he, as it were, does not acknowledge his human origin (or others translate the words, viscera humana non agnoscit, does not recognise parental authority), when about to effect a Divine work; as though He said, 'To that part of me which works the miracle thou didst not give birth.' 'Thou didst not give birth to my divinity,' &c. Therefore, because she was not the mother of his divinity, that the miracle was about to be performed, He answered, 'What have I to do with thee?'"§ And to the like effect Saint Cyril of Alexandria (A.D. 400),¶ and others; and Saint Epiphanius expressly informs us that our Lord made use of the word "woman" on this occasion, "Lest any one should think that the holy (Blessed) Virgin was a being of superior excellence."

But all this is beside the real question. Does the Protestant version give an incorrect or erroneous translation of the words of our Saviour? Fortunately, in the present instance, we need not enter into a learned discussion of Greek idioms. How have Roman Catholics themselves interpreted these very words in other places? The very same words occur eight times in the Septuagint translation of the Old Testament, and six times in the original text of the New Testament, which the Latin Vulgate, in every instance, renders by the same form of expression, "Quid mihi et tibi." In every single instance, save the one in question (John ii. 4), the Roman Catholic version now in use, has "What have I to do with thee" (or you).†

Now, sir, I think, one may fairly leave this text as rendered in our Protestant version, until objectors are prepared to show that in these fourteen different places they have themselves given an incorrect translation of the words in question.

The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Philadelphia, Dr. Kenrick, is constrained to admit the correctness of our version, and has actually adopted it in his recent translation of the New Testament!

II. Ephesians v. 32. We know that Roman Catholics teach that "marriage" is one of the Seven Sacraments instituted by Christ. That marriage is declared in the Bible to be a sacrament, we are referred to this text, which they render, "This is a great sacrament." The original word is μυστηριον—literally, mystery—and is so rendered in the Protestant Authorized Version.

We dispose of this point as we did the last. The same original Greek is used five other times in this same epistle—nay, further, it occurs twenty-two different times in the New Testament.‡ In twenty-one instances the present Roman Catholic version renders the word in question as we do, "mystery;" while, in the twenty-second instance, and in this particular place, for very obvious reasons, the same word is rendered "sacrament."

When Roman Catholics are prepared to show that in these twenty-one different places they have themselves given an incorrect translation, it will be time enough to consider the twenty-second.

What saith a cardinal of this Church? Cardinal Cajetan confesses, in his remarks on this very text—"This is a great mystery; but the learned reader cannot infer from thence that marriage is a sacrament; for he (Paul) said not it is a sacrament, but a mystery."‖

And here again Dr. Kenrick has adopted the same translation as given in our Authorized Version, in his late edition, above referred to, candidly admitting, in a note, that he preferred the literal reading.§

III. 1 Cor. xi. 27. The Roman Church denies the cup to the laity. The first official decree, on this subject, was issued by the Council of Constance, A.D. 1414, at the 13th session. While admitting that Christ instituted the sacrament under both kinds it declared "that it should be received by laymen under the kind of bread only, is to be held for a law which may not be refused.¶ In all Protestant Churches the wine, as well as the bread, is given to the laity. We act on Scriptural authority. But we are charged with the guilt of corrupting a text in Scripture to support our system. The text, 1 Cor. xi. 27, is rendered, in the present Roman Catholic version—"Wherefore, whosoever shall eat this bread or drink the chalice of the Lord unworthily." The note observes—"Here erroneous translators corrupted the text by putting and drink (contrary to the original ἢ πινῃ) instead of or drink." In the "Grounds of Christian Doctrine," Dublin, 1838, p. 31, we read, "the Protestant translators have evidently corrupted the text by putting in 'and drink,' instead of 'or drink,' as it is in the original." Mr. Waterworth declares our rendering to be "a horrid mistranslation" or "no translation at all."

Griesbach has ἢ πίνῃ, which we translate and drink; modern Roman Catholics, or drink. As establishing or confirming a matter of doctrine or custom, it is of little consequence which translation we adopt in this text, for in both versions, in the verse immediately before and immediately after, we have the words and drink. But the question is, are we Protestants guilty of corrupting the text, 1 Cor. xi. 27, by substituting and for or?

1. The Lexicographers, Schleusner and Robert Constantine (a Roman Catholic) say that ἢ ἠ is sometimes used for και, and.

2. The Alexandrine and some other Greek manuscripts have και not ἢ; and the Syriac, Coptic Æthiopic and three Arabic versions rendered this text as we do now.

3. But these last may be declared heretical versions, and of no authority, then we assert that very many of the authorized Roman Catholic editions have and and not or, a great many of the oldest vulgate editions included. I have myself examined the Paris edition of the Vulgate, edited by the Benedictine monks, A.D. 1565, and another published in 1573, declared to be "accurate recognita et emendata," &c., and another of 1543, also the Paris edition, "Apud Rob. Stephanum," 1527, and the Basil edition of John Forben de Hamelburg, 1495, all these I can testify have et (and) and not aut (or).

The following passage is from Blair's letters, on the "Revival of Popery"*:—

"1st. I find it stated, in page 492, vol. iii., of 'Curæ Philologicæ et Criticæ Wolfi,' 4to., Basil, 1741, that more than thirty of the earliest printed editions of the Vulgate translations, between the years 1462 and 1569, have et biberit (and shall drink), agreeing with our own version. 2nd. That the Missals, both printed and manuscript copies, likewise read et biberit. 3rd. I have myself examined such printed editions of the Vulgate Latin as came in my way, and have found above fifty of them to contain the same rendering of the text. 4th. I have consulted several manuscripts of the Vulgate, some at the British Museum, others in the libraries of private individuals, in which I found et biberit, &c., not vel or aut biberit. 5th. Some of the very oldest translations into German, French, &c., made from the Vulgate, by Roman Catholics themselves, agree on the disputed passage with ours. 6th. Not merely do the printed versions agree, but likewise different manuscripts which I examined, and particularly those in French, which are founded on the versions of Guiart des Moulias, or on the History of Peter Comester, so highly esteemed by the schoolmen, &c., before printing was discovered. Among the Latin Vulgate editions alluded to, are some of peculiar value—for instance, the very first Bible ever printed by Faust and Guttenburg, called the Mazarine Bible, about A.D. 1450, or soon after, but without date; the Bible executed, with a date, by the next printers, at Metz, 1462; the celebrated copy in the Polyglott of Cardinal Ximenes, with the authority of Pope Leo X.; the early Bible of Eggerstein, about 1468; also that with notes of Nicholas de Lyra; Peter Comester's Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles, written in the middle of the twelfth century; the Bible of the Louvain Doctors; that of the Paris Divines; the grand Polyglott of Antwerp; the Bible of the Salamanca University; and a multitude of others, highly important, which it would be tedious to particularize."

And, lastly, I may add that the same reading as ours is to be found in the edition published by Pope Sixtus V., or, rather, he adopted the old Vulgate, and he denounced his anathema against the man who should alter it "in the smallest particular;" notwithstanding this denunciation, Pope Clement VIII. subsequently published another edition, altered in very many particulars, and among them the one in question.

I do trust that you will permit this subject to be followed up, as it is universally admitted to be of the greatest consequence. A ready answer is at once afforded by this means to the virulent attacks made by Roman Catholics against our excellent version.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

C. H. COLLETTE.

ON THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN

SIR—As the month is very far advanced, I shall send you only a short letter, that you may be enabled to insert it in your next number.

You praised me in a late number of the LAYMAN very highly, because I abstained from vulgar abuse, or scurrility and slander, in this discussion with you. Indeed, Mr. Editor, I believe that if I had had recourse to such ignoble weapons, I would have injured the cause which I impotently and unlearnedly espouse. My religion, I say it emphatically, requires no such arms of defence. For my part, I declare sincerely, if I found any Catholic writer arming himself with abuse and slander, instead of sober reasoning, against Protestants, it would startle me extremely, and be apt to make me stagger in my faith, especially if I observed that the generality of our divines followed that method.

The reason hereof is plain, because everybody that has but a grain of common sense knows that misrepresentation and abuse are not only the foulest stains upon the credit and reputation of any cause, but even betray a consciousness in the author that the cause he maintains has not a solid foundation of its own to stand upon. For if he thought that it could stand firm upon its own bottom, he would never hazard the reputation of it by employing the most unchristian means to support it. Hence it is, that truth being able to maintain itself by fair and solid reasoning, not only disdains the ordinary little artifices of fallacy and misrepresentation, but utterly abhors to receive any assistance from the vile hands of falsehood and slander. Whereas lies can only be maintained by lies; and there is no surer mark of a bad cause than when, instead of standing a fair trial of argument and reason, it has recourse to such unwarrantable methods for its defence as no man will take if he be persuaded that he has the truth on his side. In a word, a good cause stands in no need of dishonourable ways to maintain itself, but a bad cause cannot subsist without them.

With this preface I will resume the subject of Infallibility by asking, is there such a passage as this in the Holy Book—"Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it?" You will say that there is. Well, now, I will tell you that that text incontestably proves the infallibility of the Church. For these words evidently contain a promise made by Christ to His Church. What does he promise? To build this Church upon a rock. Could Christ, in His wisdom, have promised to build a Church upon a rock, if He foresaw her future fall by heresy or error; or, did He not intend by these words that she should be so firmly established as never to be overturned? Unless this were the case, who could "liken Him to the wise man who built his house upon a rock, and the rains descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon the house, and it fell not, for it was founded upon a rock?"—Matt. vii., 24, 25. But if a shadow of doubt remained on the subject, it is immediately removed by the concluding words of the promise, "and the gates of hell shall not prevail against her." Now, faith is essential to the constitution of a Church, and faith is destroyed by heresy. Hence, if the Church has fallen, or can fall into heresy, she ceases to be a Church—she was not built upon a rock, the gates of hell have prevailed, and do prevail against her. Moreover, either Christ foresaw that the gates of hell would not prevail against his Church, or he did not. It is now I am only going to begin to argue with you. If He did not, we will be compelled to deny His prescience, and to say that He promised what He knew nothing of. If He did foresee it, as His prescience is infallible, so the event must infallibly correspond with the prediction—and it is infallibly true that the gates of hell never did prevail, and never will prevail, against the Church. In a word, to conclude this almost superfluous argumentation on so very plain a text—according to Jesus Christ, the fountain of truth, the gates of hell will never prevail against His Church. But if she fall into any error in faith, the gates of hell would prevail against her. Therefore, she cannot fall into any error against faith, and, consequently, is infallible in all articles of faith.

The infallible Church of Christ, sir, stands upon her glorious apostolical eminence—frustra circumlatrantibus hæreticis. Thigum thu shin.

"But, gracious God! how well dost thou provide
For erring judgments, an unerring guide.
Thy throne is darkness in the abyss of light,
A blaze of glory that forbids the sight.
Oh, teach me to believe Thee, thus conceal'd,
And search no farther than Thyself reveal'd;
But her alone, for my director take,
Whom Thou hast promised never to forsake."

I remain, Sir,
Your humble and obedient servant,
WILLIAM ROURKE.

P.S.—You will be so kind as to insert, in your next number, the letter which I sent you some months ago.*—W. R.

It tends very much to bring a discussion to a point, when people will consider one argument at a time, and not pass on to a second till the first is disposed of. Mr. Rourke, in his present letter, presents us with a single argument, stated in logical form, which, in order to fix the reader's attention on it, we have taken the liberty of putting in italics. Now we grant the first of his two propositions, but we deny the second; and call on him for proof of it. We admit that Christ has promised that the gates of hell shall not prevail against His Church; and we believe that He will keep this promise; but we deny that these words imply that the Church shall be infallible in every point of doctrine. The words convey a promise of perpetuity, and of ultimate victory over all her enemies; but nothing more. If a prophet had foretold the issue of the war in which we are at present engaged, in similar words, "The power of England is founded on a rock, and Russia shall not prevail against it;" no one would have a right to infer, from such a promise, that none of our soldiers should be slain, or that we must be successful in every skirmish; but he would only know that the end of the whole war would be in our favour. And it is just so with the Church. The gates of hell—the powers of darkness—make war upon it; by open persecutions, by clandestine frauds, by corruption of her morals, and by corruption of her faith. And sometimes these assaults appear, for a time, to be successful. Her enemies have, at times, by the violence of their persecutions, almost put down the public profession of her creed; vice and immorality have, at times, overspread themselves over her to such an extent that the See which claims to be her chief one, has become the seat of the most abandoned debauchery; heresy and false teaching have, at times, gained possession of some of her fairest provinces. But Christ's promise gives us confidence in the hour of her darkest suffering. We know that the victory must, in the end, be hers. If there is persecution, it cannot reach her; she will outlive her persecutors. If there is vice, or if there is false doctrine, God will, in due time, raise up instruments to bring about a reformation. But certainly the most artful device the devil ever invented to prevent a reformation, is to use Christ's own promise in order to persuade men that a reformation could never be needed;—to teach that we ought to lead the life and hold the doctrines that Pope Alexander VI. professed, on the ground that if we were to grant that his life or doctrines were reprehensible, it would follow that the gates of hell in his time prevailed against the Church.

We firmly believe that this most subtle device of the powers of darkness will, in the end, be as ineffectual as their other arts; and that Christ will not permit the figment of his Church's infallibility to be always used as a means of preventing her reformation.

* We do not know what letter Mr. R. alludes to. We have printed in full eight letters from Mr. Rourke, and are not aware that we ever received any other.—ED.

FLOWERS FOR OCTOBER.

THE flowers are almost gone, and the trees stripped of their gay summer attire, or, at best, clothed in sad and sober brown; the proudest ornaments of the garden hang their heads, mutely conscious how the unceasing wheel of time is revolving, and hourly steals their beauty! The fading flower, the fallen leaf, and the departing swallow—all tell us that the summer is over. Even the feathered tribes seem concerned in the fall of the year—

"'Mid russet-shaded leaves
The robin sits and grieves
Your hastening death, sweet flowers;
Sings your requiem all the day,
And mourns because ye pass away."

But more emphatically still does the swallow, which came to us in the spring time, and now prepares for his departure to more temperate regions, announce the coming winter. It takes knowledge of the dealings of God with the earth, which he has fore-ordained and written in the book of nature, and it makes timely preparation before the storms come to impede its flight, and the frosts fall to stiffen its pinions. It is so far wiser in its generation than the children of men, who—knowing that there is appointed to all men a time to die, and after that the judgment—postpone their preparations till disease and infirmity have paralyzed their bodies and benumbed the faculties of their minds.

But late though the season is, we have still

The Foxglove's purple bell,
On bank and upland plain;
The scarlet pimpernel,
And daisy on the dell,
That kindly blooms again
When all her sisters of the spring
On earth's cold lap are withering.

THE FOXGLOVE (Digitalis purpurea) is, perhaps, the most beautiful and stately of all our indigenous wild flowers. Everybody who has traversed the road sides in autumn must have noticed a simple flower growing to the height of three or four feet, with an erect stem, and large lanceolate leaves, rearing aloft a pyramid of freckled bell flowers of rich deep purple. Its drooping pendants are spotted within, like to "fairies' petticoats." They are found abundantly on dry hills and rocky situations; and we have gathered them recently in the highest districts of Wicklow. The name of the flower, Digitalis, is probably derived from its resemblance to the finger of a glove. Its leaves, when dried and reduced to powder, produce the powerful drug of that name.

As the season advances the autumnal CROCUS opens; we welcomed the spring Crocus in the month of February, and its autumnal follower is not the less welcome now. The autumnal Crocus (Crocus Sativus) yields the saffron of commerce, a drug formerly in great estimation, and still of considerable use. It grows wild, and in great profusion, on the Alps of Tyrol and Savoy, and is so abundant in many parts of England and Ireland, that it is commonly considered to be a native. But there is little doubt that it was introduced into England in the reign of Edward III., and first planted in Essex, at a place still called Saffron Walden. It grows most abundantly in the fields of Cambridgeshire, Herefordshire, Suffolk, and Essex; but it is grown for profit only in a few places in Essex, near its original seat. Our supplies of saffron are derived principally from France and Spain. The parts used for the saffron are the stigmata, and part of the pistil, which are picked out from the flowers in September, and pressed into cakes.

Kindred with the autumnal Crocus is the MEADOW SAFFRON (Colchicum autumnale), another field flower of October, with purple blossoms very similar in colour to the Crocus. A common observer would not distinguish the two flowers, but a naturalist would at once see they are essentially different in species. The colchicum has six stamens and three pistils, while the Crocus has but three stamens and one pistil—a distinction which enables the herbalist to avoid the Meadow Saffron which is poisonous, and seek the Crocus which is harmless and valuable. The Colchicum, however, is valuable as a medicine in skilful hands; and its roots, seeds, and blossoms are collected in large quantities. Its bells, of amethyst colour at this time, cover many fields and meadows in England and in Ireland, along the banks of the Shannon, below Limerick, like an embroidered carpet. The Colchicum has one singular circumstance attending its growth and development, that while its flowers appear in the autumn, its leaves and fruits do not appear till the following spring. Towards the end of October its flowers die away, and no one looking at the faded and withered plant would imagine that it would ever appear again; but its seeds are buried in the bulb. And while the winter snows are around and above them they are preserved in safety; and when the sunshine and showers of the spring re-appear, the seeds come forth and ripen. This is a very beautiful emblem of the resurrection of the just (or justified in Christ Jesus). The earthly tabernacle withers and is dissolved and buried in the earth; but the seed of immortal life is preserved, and will come forth to ripen when the Sun of Righteousness shall appear.

There are some varieties of the Colchicum of various colours, and many of them double, cultivated in our flower gardens, derived mostly from the isles of Greece. They all, like the wild Colchicum, await the following spring to produce their leaves and fruits. None of them, however, have any value in commerce. The name of the flower Colchicum is not without some interest to the classical reader and to every reader at present. It recalls the ancient Colchis on the shores of the Euxine, or Black Sea, to which was directed the earliest maritime expedition on record—that of the Argonauts. It is in the same locality and within a very short distance of the same spot to which has been directed the greatest maritime expedition perhaps ever undertaken—that of England and France against the Crimea and its celebrated fortress of Sebastopol. It is singular that the same locality, almost the same spot, should, at an interval of 2,000 years, be destined to be the scene of two similar exploits. The Colchicum derives its name from the abundance of its flowers at Colchis, now called Mingrelia.

Lingering still among us is the MIGNIONETTE (Reseda odorata)—

"The fragrant weed,
The Frenchman's darling."

Its name with us signifies "little darling," mignionne; but, though the name is borrowed from the French, it is strange that the Mignionette is not known by any such name in France, but as "la resede d'Egypte." The Spaniards designate it by an endearing name, of similar import to ours, Minioneta. It grows wild in the sandy plains of Barbary; but is generally believed to be a native of Egypt. Its introduction into our gardens is comparatively recent, not yet a hundred years since. The plant was well known to the ancients, and was called Reseda from its soothing and calming properties, in allaying the irritation of wounds. Pliny gives an account of a form of incantation employed when it was used as a charm. The Mignionette may, with care, be made to blow almost throughout the year. Its flowers themselves are small and not very attractive; and but for its exquisite fragrance, so far surpassing the promise of its appearance, the plant would be, perhaps, wholly unnoticed. It has been, on this account, considered a fitting emblem of the superiority of mental qualifications over personal beauty and gracefulness.

In Ireland we have two species of wild Mignionette. The Reseda luteola is found in our hedges in the autumn. It has pale yellow flowers; it is also called Dyers' rocket, being used sometimes in dying woollen stuffs yellow. The other is Reseda lutea, or Base's rocket, of a deeper yellow colour.

The crowning glory of October, and our most national shrub, is the STRAWBERRY-TREE (Arbutus unedo). The Arbutus is not only an ornament to every shrubbery, but, as everybody knows, it forms the special ornament of Killarney about this time of the year. Its greenish-white flowers hang like waxen bells among the thick and luxuriant foliage of evergreens, and its deep crimson berries, or fruit, soon take their place. It was said to have been introduced from Spain by the monks of Muckruss Abbey, but this is scarcely probable; and it is stated by Mackay to be a shrub certainly indigenous to Ireland, from whence it has been transplanted into the gardens and shrubberies of the sister country. This is extremely probable as it has been known to have been in Ireland for many centuries, and it attains a height and luxuriance in the woods of Muckruss and on the shores of the lakes of Killarney, and at Glengariff, which it does nowhere else, as if the noble shrub felt itself at home among the Irish lakes and mountains. Its very name is Celtic, "ar boise," or, austere bush, from the nature of the berries, or fruit. Unedo (una edo), is said to import that those who taste one of them will be content without trying a second. If this be the meaning of the word it appears to us a libel, as they are not so very nauseous; and the blackbirds and thrushes of Killarney would give their verdict in support of our opinion.

The Strawberry-tree is, for some reason or other, made the emblem of perfect goodness, but it is hard to say where we shall look on earth for anything which it may fairly represent. Our Saviour has said—"There is none good but one, that is God."—Matt. xix. 17. Of him only can it be said, "The goodness of the Lord endureth continually; the earth is full of the goodness of the Lord." The Apostles, in their preaching and teaching only attempted to present "Every man perfect in Christ Jesus" (Col. i. 28); by preaching and teaching salvation by faith in the finished work of Christ, Christ in you the hope of glory, and not by preaching or teaching the works of the law, "Because by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified before Him."—Rom. iii. 20, R. C. version. "For the law brought nothing to perfection."—Hebrews vii. 19.

THE NUNS OF PORT ROYAL.

Such of our readers as were not surprised at our article on the Benedictines of St. Maur, in a recent number, in which we so freely admitted the learning and virtues of Mabillon and his colleagues, will probably thank us for giving them a little further respite from the shock of controversy by a sketch of the remarkable sisterhood whose name stands at the head of this article. We trust the time is coming when it will no longer create surprise, that men engaged in bearing testimony against religious errors, should, at the same time, be ready to admit the virtues with which those errors are not unfrequently associated, and when it will be more generally admitted than it is, that true Christianity does not consist in a mere vivid perception of the faults, and an obtuse blindness to the merits of those who differ from us. We, at least, shall never be afraid to do homage to virtue wherever we find it, or to indulge a hope that there is a Catholic Church wide enough to comprehend within its limits all who, however widely separated in other respects, are earnestly and habitually striving, according to the measure of knowledge placed within their reach, to be truly conformed to the will of their Heavenly Father, and to have the love of the Lord Jesus Christ vividly engraven on their hearts. Whoever has himself caught any resemblance, however faint and imperfect, of that divine and benignant original, will, we think, at the same time, have learnt to recognise as brethren all in whom he can discern the same resemblance.

The same able writer to whom we acknowledged our obligations when treating of the Benedictines, Sir James Stephen, has given the following picturesque description of the spot in which the heroines of our present sketch—for such they undoubtedly are—enjoyed the friendship of a Pascal, a De Saci, and a Tillemont. "He whose journey lies from Versailles to Chevreuse, will soon find himself at the brow of a steep cliff or hollow intersecting the monotonous plain, across which he has been passing. The brook which winds through the verdant meadows beneath him, stagnates into a large pool, reflecting the mutilated Gothic arch, the water-mill, and the dovecot, which rise from its banks; with the farm-house, the decayed towers, the forest trees, and innumerable shrubs and creepers which clothe the slopes of the valley.

"France has many a lovelier prospect, though this is not without its beauty; and many a field of more heart-stirring interest, though this, too, has been ennobled by heroic daring; but through the length and breadth of that land of chivalry and song, the traveller will, in vain, seek a spot so sacred to genius, to piety, and virtue. That arch is all which remains of the once-crowded monastery of Port Royal. In those woods Racine first learned the language—the universal language of poetry; under the roof of that humble farm-house, Pascal, Arnauld, Nicole, De Saci, and Tillemont, meditated those works which, as long as civilization and Christianity survive, will retain their hold on the gratitude and reverence of mankind."

It was in this interesting spot, in the sixteenth century, that Jaqueline Marie Angelique, granddaughter to M. Marion, the advocate-general of Henry IV., presided as abbess of the Cistertian Monastery, founded four centuries before by Matthieu de Marli, on the eve of his departure to the conquest of the holy sepulchre.* Endowed with a superior understanding, address, courage, fortitude, and self-reliance, the Mère Angelique would, nevertheless, perhaps, have enjoyed much less remarkable influence over the minds of all with whom she came in contact, but that born in the reign and educated near the court of a Bourbon, the lighter and more gentle elements of her nature found exercise even under the paralyzing influence of an ascetic life. Had she not been immured by superstition within a cloister, but placed within the genial atmosphere of the domestic circle, the affections which she poured out on every human being who claimed her pity, would have burned with as pure and intense a flame as ever was depicted in poetry or romance. During the wars of the League, religion, by becoming a watchword, had almost ceased to be a reality; and few things, at the time Angelique became the Abbess of Port Royal, were less thought of by the French ladies of the Cistertian order, than the rules of their austere founder. Civil war, the apology for every crime, had debased the national character; and the general profligacy of manners had not been excluded from the precincts of the cloister.

To reform these scandals at Port Royal, and the neighbouring Abbey of Maubisson (in which Angelique also laboured for five years to bring back its inmates to the exact observance of their sacred vows), this remarkable woman devoted herself with an energy and a wisdom which have seldom been surpassed; and Port Royal was once more a sanctuary, whence the sacrifices of devotion rose with an unextinguished flame to heaven, thence, as it was piously believed, to draw down an unbroken stream of blessings upon earth. The nuns employed themselves in educating the children of the rich and the poor, in almsgiving and other works of mercy. Nor did her benevolent labours end there. Aided by her sister, Agnes the Abbess of St. Cyr, Angelique established a similar reform in a large proportion of the other Cistertian nunneries of France. A moral plague was stayed by their love, their prudence, and self-devotion; and excesses, which even the sensual and the worldly condemned, were banished from the sanctuaries of religion. In some, the change might, indeed, only be from shameless riot to hypocritical conformity; but though we are among those who think that even the most exalted virtues of the cloister hold but a subordinate and equivocal place in the scale of Christian graces, and some of the means of reformation introduced by Angelique de St. Arnauld were certainly but little calculated to attract our admiration, yet cannot we withhold the meed of our approbation for the pious labours of love of this self-denying and energetic woman; or think they were unaccepted by Him, in lowly imitation of whom she went about doing good. That she was not free from the "volantary humility" which attached extravagant importance to austerities, and loathsome self-mortifications, we cannot deny;† but that her heart seems to have been mainly directed to the Saviour, no one can reasonably doubt. In a book of devotion, entitled "The Secret Chaplet of the Holy Sacrament," composed or adopted by her for private use, she, indeed, gave expression to sentiments savouring so much of undivided affection to the Saviour, as not to escape the censure of the Church; for it was dragged to light and condemned at Rome. There is reason to believe that under the direction of St. Cyran, her religious sentiments and those of her whole community, became much more enlightened; and the exalted piety and humble faith she manifested on her death-bed, when in the midst of exquisite sufferings, and in the absence of the last rites of her religion, which her persecutors denied her, she expired in the full assurance of salvation through the merits of the only Redeemer, form one of the most interesting episodes in the martyrology of the Church.

To return, however, to our subject. The trials of Port Royal were not all of this sort. The wars of the Fronde succeeded; in the tedious history of which we have no intention of involving our readers. Most of the nuns fled for refuge to Paris, where they had another establishment, Port Royal de Paris. But to one inmate of Port Royal des Champs, the terrors of even civil war brought no disquietude. Angelique remained there, the guardian of the place. Hundreds of ruined peasants were daily fed by her bounty. "We are all occupied in contriving soups and pottage for the poor (we quote from one of her letters to a friend at the time). This is, indeed, an awful time. Our gentlemen, as they were taking their rounds yesterday, found two poor persons starved to death, and met with a young woman on the very point of killing her child, because she had no food for it. All is pillaged around; corn-fields are trampled over by the cavalry in presence of their starving owners; despair has seized all whose confidence is not in God; nobody will any longer plough or dig; there are no horses, indeed, left for the farmers; nor if there were, is any person certain of reaping what he sows; all is stolen. Perhaps I shall not be able to send you a letter to-morrow, for all our horses and asses are dead with hunger. Oh, how little do princes know the detailed horrors of war! All the provender of the beasts we have been obliged to divide between ourselves and the starving poor. We have concealed as many of the peasants and of their cattle as we could in our monasteries, to save them from being murdered, and and losing all their substance. Our dormitory and the chapter-house are full of horses; we are almost stifled by being pent up with these beasts, but we could not resist the piercing lamentations of the starving and the heart-broken poor. In the cellar we have concealed forty cows. Our court-yards and out-houses are stuffed full of fowls, turkeys, ducks, geese, and asses. The church is piled up to the ceiling with corn, oats, beans, and peas, and with caldrons, kettles, and other things belonging to the cottagers. Our laundry is filled by the aged, the blind, the maimed, the halt, and infants. The infirmary is full of sick and wounded. We have torn up all our rags and linen clothing to dress their sores; we have no more, and are now at our wits' end. We dare not go into the fields for any more, as they are full of marauding parties. We hear that the Abbey of St. Cyran has been burned and pillaged. Our own is threatened with an attack every day. The cold weather alone preserves us from pestilence. We are so closely crowded that deaths happen continually. God, however, is with us, and we are at peace." The inward peace, however, which Angelique was enabled to maintain during the horrors of civil war, was soon to be exposed to a still more arduous trial. But to explain this we must introduce to our readers some other personages, who played a considerable part in one of the most remarkable episodes to be found in the pages of ecclesiastical history.

Hauranne de Verger, Abbot de St. Cyran, and Cornelius Jansen, successively Professor of Divinity at Louvain, and Bishop of Ypres, were two of the most memorable names in the ecclesiastical annals of that age. They had passed six years of social study together in their youth, at Bayonne—and to their joint labours are to be traced that system of religious belief and practice, which still goes by the name of Jansenism in France. Jansen's life was one of unremitting labour. He read ten times over every word of the works of St. Augustine (ten volumes folio!); thirty times he studied all those passages of them which related to what is termed the Pelagian controversy. We are not going to inflict on our readers even an outline of that metaphysical contest. Our object is not to maintain or to refute the doctrines which he deduced from the writings of the Bishop of Hippo, to illustrate which he elaborately collated passages from all the Fathers of the Church. We are going merely to deal historically with matters of fact—and it is as such that we state that after an uninterrupted study of twenty years was finished the "Augustinus Cornelii Jansenii," and on the day which witnessed the completion of it, the 6th of May, 1638, the Bishop of Ypres, died of the plague which was then desolating Flanders.

Within two years after, the "Augustinus" appeared in print, and publicly received the approbation of above forty learned doctors, and was rapturously welcomed by the friends of the author. As its title imports, it was little more than a digest of the writings of St. Augustine, and though purporting to set forth nothing but what was to be found in the writings of that greatest of the Fathers, it at once gave the signal for a contest which, for nearly seventy years, agitated the Sorbonne (the College of Divinity in the University of Paris), and the divines of France, in a manner almost unparalleled in the annals of the Gallican Church. Though professedly written to revive the doctrine of Augustine, the "Augustinus" was felt by the society of the Jesuits as in reality an attack upon them under the name of Pelagians. To conscious delinquency the language of implied censure is often more galling than formal impeachment. And the whole efforts of the society were summoned to defeat its influence. On the other hand, St. Cyran, who had aided largely in the composition of this memorable treatise, exerted himself with great effect in building up a society for the maintenance and propagation of the principles it established; and a college of learned men, bound by no monastic vows, and living according to no positive rule, Benedictine, Dominican, or Franciscan, were gradually assembled at Port Royal. Schools for the instruction of youth in every branch of literature and science were kept by Launcelot, Nicole, Fontaine, and De Saci. Some laboured at translations of the Fathers, and other works of piety. Arnauld plied his ceaseless toils in logic, geometry, metaphysics, and theological debate. Le Maitre, and other eminent lawyers, addressed themselves to the work of arbitrating in all the dissensions of the village. From year to year, till death or persecution removed them from the valley of Port Royal, the members of this singular association, though held together by no vows, or governed by no common superior, adhered to their design, and lived together in unbroken harmony; all following their respective callings; silent, grave, abstracted, self-afflicted by fastings, watchings, and humiliations—a body of penitents on their painful progress through a world which they had resolved at once to serve and to avoid. That the immortal Pascal and De Saci (the illustrious author of the best French translation of the Holy Scriptures), were among the number, must for ever shed an undying lustre upon this singular association, even among those the most unfriendly to some of the austerities they practised. They were not, however, long left in peace.

* Some say it was founded in 1204 by Eudes de Sully, Bishop of Paris.

† The substitution of coarse serge or haircloth for linen, or the occasional dropping of melted wax on the bare arms—in which mortifying exercises the abbess showed an example to the rest of the sisterhood—are scarcely as extraordinary as that a female brought up in the vicinity of a luxurious court should have chosen as her dormitory the filthiest cell in the convent, infested by vermin and everything the most loathsome.

That St. Cyran was a patron of the fraternity, and that Antoine Arnauld, who had so often contended against the casuistry, the theology, and the morals of the Jesuits, was one of its members, was sufficient to draw down upon the whole body the direst enmity of that formidable society. One Brisacier, a Jesuit, led the assault; followed by Father Meguier, who accused the Abbot of St. Cyran and Arnauld of a conspiracy against the religion of Christ, in terms so extravagant that the accusation overstepped the bounds of human credulity and refuted itself. The mode of attack was subsequently changed by Nicolas Cornet, a Jesuit and syndic of the faculty, who was the author of the far-famed "Five Propositions" which he said were deduced from the "Augustinus" of the Bishop of Ypres, by Arnauld, and other doctors of the Gallican Church, and by them inculcated on their disciples. That these five dogmas, lying in the dim regions of psychological divinity, on the mystery of Divine grace, were actually to be found within the "Augustinus" of Jansenius, was not the original charge. The propositions were worded by Cornet with the most artful ambiguity. The phrases were so contrived, as to be capable of two or even three different constructions.* The propositions, thus carefully worded and maliciously constructed, were condemned, first by the Sorbonne, and then by Pope Innocent X. (in a Bull, dated 31st May, 1653), as heretical; and to the authority of the Holy See, Arnauld and his friends, as earnest and submissive sons of the Church, implicitly bowed. The Pope had only as yet pronounced on a matter of faith; and those who had been brought up to admit his infallibility in such matters could not resist the decision, without abandoning the Church to which they were sincerely attached. The Jansenists unanimously signed the paper; each, at the same time, adding to his signature a denial, that the propositions were in the book of Jansenius. The alleged heresies being thus disposed of, one might have supposed the controversy was happily at an end; but, there still remained the question in point of fact. Admitting even that the obnoxious propositions were heretical, were they, in point of fact, really to be found in the "Augustinus" or not? Arnauld ventured to declare that he had studied the book from end to end, and could not find them in it. That there they were, nevertheless, the Jesuits as strongly asserted. To have quoted, by chapter and page, the alleged passages, after the manner, which, in the present day, we deem the only one likely to lead to infallible results, would, however, have spoiled the most promising quarrel which had arisen since the close of the Council of Trent. Still-born must then have perished the ever-memorable distinction of the droit and the fait, the difference between infallibility in matters of faith, and matters of fact (which has since often perplexed and exasperated the combatants within the pale of the Church of Rome)—the droit being, in this instance, the justice of the papal censure of the five propositions, which all Catholics admitted; the fait being the existence, in the "Augustinus," of the propositions so censured, which all Jansenists denied. The vulgar mode of trial by quotation being discarded or refused, nothing remained but trial by authority; and the Pope, instigated by the Jesuits, promulgated a Bull which decreed that the five propositions were in the book; and a conclave of Parisian doctors, selected by Annat, the king's confessor, a Jesuit in religion, and Mazarin, the king's minister, a Jesuit in politics, required that all the ecclesiastics and all the religious communities of France should subscribe their assent to the order which had thus fastened the offensive opinions on the poor Bishop of Ypres. At the bidding of the king, a synod of the clergy of France drew up an anti-Jansenist test or formulary, to be taken by all ecclesiastics and all religious communities, male and female, fortified, of course, by effective penalties. They were all required to subscribe their names to a declaration, that the five propositions, in their heretical sense, were to be found in the Augustinus; nor was there any exception in favour of those who had never seen the book (which, by the way, is a most ponderous folio of 900 pages), or of those who could not read Latin. This was no ineffectual menace. Blow after blow fell on those who refused, and even on those who were expected to refuse, thus to condemn the long deceased Bishop of Ypres. Port Royal was foremost among such obdurate recusants, and the exquisite wit and matchless satire of Pascal's Provincial Letters has secured an immortal interest to the otherwise contemptible dispute, which has covered with ridicule no inconsiderable part of the Christian world at that period. Even the fame of Pascal, however, did not avail. The schools of Port Royal, male and female, were dispersed. The recluses were banished from the valley. St. Cyran, the leader and ornament of the party, languished, for five years, in the dungeon of Vincennes, and only survived his release by a few months, and the great Arnauld, who had once refused a cardinal's hat, died in 1684, in exile, without one servant to attend him.* The admission of novices and postulants was interdicted to the abbess; and Angelique was now sinking under the pressure of infirmity and old age. In vain she addressed to the Queen Mother a letter, justly celebrated as a model of epistolary eloquence, detailing the wrongs of her sisterhood, and the cause of their persecution. Day after day, these helpless women were torn from the arms of their dying mother. M. Perifixè, the Archbishop of Paris, imprisoned twenty-six of them. He then repaired in pontifical state to the Port Royal monastery, and again tendered the anti-Jansenist test. Angelique was gone (she died on 6th August, 1661, at the age of 70); but her spirit and her constancy survived. The simple-hearted nuns thought it would be a mere falsehood to attest the existence of "five propositions" in a book which they had never seen and could not read; and truth, they knew, was the command of God, let Pope, cardinal, or archbishop say what they would to the contrary. Perifixè interdicted their admission to the holy sacrament. "Well, my lord," they replied, "there is in heaven a judge who reads the heart, and to him we commend our cause." The prelate's reply was almost too shocking to be repeated—"When we get to heaven it will be time enough to consider that, and see how things go there."

For ten months the nuns showed no change of purpose, and remained in prison. He then ordered them to return to Port Royal des Champs, there to be excluded from the sacraments of the Church, and die without her benediction. The invincible opposition of the Port Royalists to the test had, however, awakened a more extended resistance. Men had begun to deny the right of assemblies of the clergy, or of the king himself to impose such subscriptions. Louis, however, could not retract, and desired the Pope himself, first to draw up a formula, which should declare his own infallible knowledge of matters of fact, and then to require the universal acceptance of it. Pope Alexander VII. gladly complied, and fulminated a Bull on the 16th November, 1656. Subscription to the test, or formulary, as it was called, was now exacted by Papal authority, with the addition, that the subscribers should call on the Deity himself to attest their sincerity. It was conceived in the following terms:—"I condemn, from my inmost soul, and by word of mouth, the doctrine of the five propositions, which are contained in the work of Cornelius Jansenius. A doctrine which is not that of St. Augustine, whose sentiments Jansenius has misinterpreted." Such was the celebrated formulary dictated by the realm, and extorted by the intrigues of the Jesuits. The Jansenists, to a man, refused their signature, and persecution burst forth from every quarter. The great body of the clergy of France submitted; but still the resistance of the nuns of Port Royal was unsubdued. Four years of persecution—of mean, unmanly, worrying persecution—followed. From the poor remnant of earthly comforts which those aged women had retained, the mean-spirited king and his bigotted archbishop daily stole whatever could be so pilfered. From their means of preparing for the world where the wicked cease from troubling, every deduction was made which sacerdotal tyranny could enforce. But no tyranny could induce them to attest a lie. One after another went down, with no priestly absolution, to graves which no priest would bless; strong, even amidst the weakness and mental agonies of nature, in the assurance that the path to heaven could not be found in disobedience to the immutable laws which heaven itself had established. At last a Papal Bull was obtained for the total suppression of the monastery; and in October, 1709, it was carried into effect by an armed force, under the Marquis D'Argenson.

In a grey autumnal morning a long file of armed horsemen was seen to issue from the woods which overhung the monastery. Seated in the abbatial throne, D'Argenson, in the name of Louis, summoned the nuns to his presence. Their papers, title-deeds, and property were then seized, and proclamation of a royal decree made for their immediate exile. Each pursued her solitary journey to the prison destined for her. Of these venerable women some had passed their eightieth year, and the youngest was far advanced in life. Labouring under paralysis and other infirmities of old age, several of them died under the distress and fatigues of their journey. Last in the number appeared at the gates of the abbey the Prioress Louise de St. Anastasie Mesnail de Courtiaux. To each she had given her parting benediction. She shed no tears, nor for a moment betrayed the dignity of her office or the constancy of her mind. "Be faithful to the end," were the last words she addressed to the last companion of her sorrows; and nobly did she fulfil her own counsels. She was conducted to a convent, where she endured all the rigours of a jail. Deprived of all the religious comforts which it is in the power of man to minister, she enjoyed a solace and found a strength which it was not in the power of man to take away. In common with the greater part of her fellow-sufferers, she died without any priestly absolution, and was consigned to an unhallowed grave. They died the martyrs of sincerity; strong in the faith that a lie must ever be hateful in the sight of God, though infallible Popes should exact it, or an infallible Church, as represented by cardinals and confessors, should persuade it.

The monastery and the adjacent church were overthrown from their foundations. Workmen, prepared by hard drinking for their task, broke open the graves, in which the nuns and recluses of former times had been interred. It is some slight satisfaction to know that some families besought permission to remove the bodies of their relations, and that the bodies of the Arnauld family, of De Tillemont, Racine, Le Maitre, and De Saci, were among the number removed, and who got decent burial elsewhere. No trace was allowed to remain of the fortress of Jansenism to offend the eyes of the Jesuits, or to perpetuate the memory of the illustrious dead, with whom they had so long contended. The mutilated Gothic arch, the water-mill, and the dovecot, rising from the banks of the pool, with the decayed towers and the farm-house, on the slopes of the valley, are all that now attest that it was once the crowded abode of the wise, the learned, and the good. In that spot, however, may still be seen the winding brook, the verdant hills, and the quiet meadows, nature's indestructible monuments to the devout men and holy women who nurtured there affections which made them holy in their lives, and hopes, which rendered them triumphant in death. Nor, in her long roll of martyrs, has history to record the names of any who suffered with greater constancy, or in a nobler cause; for their conflict was with the very Church which they most profoundly revered, and their cause was that of devotedness to sincerity, and abhorrence of falsehood.

* Those who are curious to understand the matter more fully may consult, with profit, the able historical introduction of Dr. Thomas M'Crie, prefixed to his translation of "Pascal's Provincial Letters," of which the second edition was published by Johnston, Prince's-street, Edinburgh, in 1848.

* Even at the risk of interrupting our main object, we cannot help recording a memorable saying of this indomitable man. Though driven from France and hunted from place to place, he continued to fight to the last. On one occasion, wishing his friend, Nicole, to assist him in a new work, the latter observed, "We are now old; is it not time to rest?" "Rest," exclaimed Arnauld, "have we not all eternity to rest in?"

HISTORY OF THE POPES.—No. II.

THE POPES OF THE TENTH CENTURY.

We gave in our last number the history of the madman, Pope Stephen VI., and his predecessor, Pope Formosus. We promised then to proceed with other instances taken from the history of the Popes.

We are unwilling to be suspected of picking instances here and there, however forcible those instances might be. We, therefore, adopt a course above all suspicion; we take up the history exactly where we dropt it—at the death of Pope Stephen VI.; we begin again with his successor, and we propose to continue the history of the Popes for ONE HUNDRED YEARS, giving each Pope in regular succession; and we take the history from no Protestant author, but from the learned Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart, in their great work, the "Concilia Generalia;" and we ask Roman Catholics to consider, when they have read it, whether this be the fulfilment of the promises which God has made to his Church?

We must first settle the list of the Popes before we can give their history. We take that list from the greatest modern authority, Bishop Milner, in his "End of Controversy."

Bishop Milner thus gives the reasons for tracing the succession of the Popes:—

"If a prince is desirous of showing his title to a throne, or a nobleman or gentleman his claim to an estate, he fails not to exhibit his genealogical table, and to trace his pedigree up to some personage whose right to it was unquestionable. I shall adopt the same precise method on the present occasion, by sending your society a slight sketch of our apostolical tree; by which they will see, at a glance, an abridgment of the succession of our chief bishops in the Apostolical See of Rome, from St. Peter up to our present edifying Pontiff, Leo XII."

In this "precise method," we must observe, that if there come in a dozen or two dozen of persons in the succession, who are acknowledged to have no lawful rights at all, the nobleman or gentleman will have a poor chance of establishing his claim. But let us come to Bishop Milner's "succession."

In the list, in letter xxviii., after Pope Stephen, he gives Pope Romanus, who closes the ninth century, and he then goes on with the tenth century. "The several Popes during this century were"—

Theodore II.	Stephen IX.
John IX.	Martin II.
Benedict IV.	Agapetus II.
Leo V.	John XII.
Christopher	Benedict V.
Sergius III.	John XIII.
Anastasius	Benedict VI.
Lando	Domnus II.
John X.	Benedict VII.
Leo VI.	John XIV.
Stephen VIII.	John XV.
John XI.	Gregory V.
Leo VII.

We think it a great matter to have the list from a modern authority who is above all exception; and we now proceed to give the history of the Popes in Bishop Milner's list, as we find it in the work of these most learned Jesuits.

POPE ROMANUS.

We begin with Pope Romanus, with whom Bishop Milner closes the ninth century. Here is his history from Labbe and Cossart:—

"Romanus, a Galesian by nation, the son of Constantine, was made Pope in the year of our Lord 900. He sat four months and twenty days. He openly condemned the acts of Stephen made against Formosus, and he crowned as emperor, Ludovic, the son of Boso, after the flight of Berengarius."* And this is all. Not much (our readers will say) for the life of a Pope; but still, surely, a most legitimate Pope.

Well, now, just look to the list of Popes given by the same Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart, in vol. xvi., p. 132, and there we find this same Romanus not given in the list or reckoned in the number of the Popes, but inserted thus, in a note, in italics:—"Romanus Gallesinus per vim intrusus"—Romanus, a Gallesian, intruded by force. The Pope before him is number 114 in this list, and the Pope after him 115; yet Bishop Milner reckons him in the succession by which the title is proved.

POPE THEODORE II.

The whole of his history is as follows:—"Theodore, the second of his name, a Roman by nation, the son of Photius, was appointed in the room of Pope Romanus, in the year of our Lord 901, in the time of Ludovic IV., emperor of the west. He sat only twenty days. But on what day he died none of the ancients has disclosed. The opinion of the moderns, derived from conjecture, varies."† In other words, for all we can tell, he was turned out, and another took his place while he was living—a thing that very often happened in that age.

POPE JOHN IX.

His history is chiefly political. Berengarius, Duke of Friuli, took the emperor prisoner, deprived him of his empire, and put out his eyes. Coming to Rome with an army, he demanded the imperial crown from the Pope, which the Pope gave him. After the death of the emperor, the Pope recalled Lambert, whom Formosus had made emperor, and declared the coronation of Berengarius void. "And when very many of the Romans favoured Berengarius, and adhered to him against Lambert, Pope John, not thinking himself safe if he should stay at Rome, went to Ravenna, and there, in a synod, declared void the acts of Stephen against Formosus; and in these most turbulent times, like another Jeremiah sent from God, he pulled up, scattered, and destroyed all those things which had been badly planted, and most wickedly built up by his predecessor, Stephen. He sat three years and fifteen days, and died in the year of our Lord 905."‡

His condemnation of Stephen seems somewhat political; and it seems it was not the first time that a Pope has fled from Rome, when the present Pope did so in 1848, because it was not safe to stay. But it does seem strange that a "successor of Peter," and a "vicar of Christ," should become "another Jeremiah sent from God,"§ by destroying all that a previous "successor of Peter, and vicar of Christ" had done! But such is the history of the Papacy, as related by the Jesuits themselves.

POPE BENEDICT IV.

We shall give this Pope's life literally, and in full. "Benedict IV., a Roman by nation, after the interval of one day, was appointed in the room of John IX., in the year of Christ 905, in the time of Lambert the emperor. Most munificent to the poor, the widows, and the orphans, he shone like a brilliant star among the Popes of these times. In the third year of his pontificate, which is the year of Christ 907, he departed this life, and was buried near St. Peter, by the entrance, by which the way leads to St. Gregory, where also his sepulchre was adorned with an epitaph, which Baronius has, copied from Manlius, in the aforesaid place."*

The Jesuits, as in duty bound, praise where they can; and we, who are not selecting instances, but transcribing history fairly, willingly record their praise.

POPE LEO V.

"Leo V., an Ardeatine by nation, was appointed in the room of Pope Benedict IV., in the year of our Lord 907, in the time of the Emperor Lambert. And when he had governed the Church forty days, being driven from the pontificate, he was thrust into prison by Christopher—an invader of the Apostolic See—in the same year, without doubt, in which he had obtained the Pontifical See."† This is the whole of his history.

POPE CHRISTOPHER.

"Christopher, an invader of the Apostolic See, was ejected from the pontificate by the invader, Sergius, in the same way in which he himself had removed from his See his own predecessor, Leo V., lawfully elected. For when he (Christopher) had held the Pontifical See seven months, being violently ejected from the See by Sergius, and loaded with chains, and cast into prison, being compelled by force, he undertook the life and habit of a monk."‡ This is the whole history of Pope Christopher.

Thus a lawful Pope, Leo. V., was thrust out, and an usurper seized the See, while the lawful Pope was living; and yet that usurper is counted in the succession by which Bishop Milner proves the title of the present Pope! But let us go on, for the succession still gets better—or worse, as you may call it.

POPE SERGIUS III.

"Relying on the most powerful arms of Adelbert, Marquis of Tuscany, that cursed Sergius, a man the slave of all vices, and the most wicked of all men"—these are the words of the Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart, "who, together with Stephen VI., had raged above measure against Pope Formosus, invaded the See of Christopher, and, therefore, by all, is counted not a legitimate Pontiff, but an invader of the Apostolic See." . . . . "Through ambition of the Apostolic See, he betook himself to the Franks, says Sigebertus, and by their assistance, seizing the invader, Christopher, and thrusting him into prison, having privately entered Rome, he invaded the Papacy, and drove the Romans, by threats and terrors, to count all the ordinations of Formosus void; that he also ordained over again all who were ordained by Formosus, and superinduced new ordinations of them, Auxilius testifies."§

But if this man is counted by all to be "NO LAWFUL POPE, but an invader," how comes it that Bishop Milner reckons him in the succession by which the title of the present Pope is proved? Is it no flaw in the succession to have those in it who were not lawful Popes?

That this re-ordination of persons already ordained was sacrilege according to the Church of Rome, we have already shown in our account of Pope Stephen in our last number.

But is there no explanation of all this? Of course there is; the Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart, were able to explain it, and we give their explanation. "But, lest any faint-hearted person should take scandal at this deed, let him remember that these things were perpetrated by invaders and intruders, usurping the name of Pope, and unlawfully invading the Apostolic throne, and who, by the censure of the Church, were to be called not so much Apostles as APOSTATES; but those who were lawfully created Roman Pontiffs, such as John IX., vehemently execrated those things. Whence it is not wonderful that Sergius, with Stephen, the most potent invader of the Apostolic See, should have attempted and usurped things which cannot be granted by the sacred laws. The invader of others is A RONNER; and who would expect from him all things just and lawful?"‖

These men were no Popes, it seems. They were APOSTATES, not Apostles; yet, Bishop Milner's succession, by which he says the title of modern Popes must be proved, could not be made out without them! The present Pope traces up his succession through APOSTATES. Mind that. But "who would expect honest dealing from a robber?" A very fair question, we think; and one which any plain man can answer. But what a defence is this of the papal claims? Can the Church of God be imposed on by one who enters into office as its head, BY ROBBERY? Is this the fulfilment of the promises which God has made to his Church? Does not our Saviour say that his sheep will not follow a robber, but fly from him?—John x. 1, b, 8. Douay Bible. And was the Church not imposed on? Let us hear what follows:—"And although, what is wonderful, Sergius was such a one, and to cursed sacrilege he added most foul unchastity; and by Marozia, the daughter of that famous harlot Theodora, (of whom we very often speak farther on, from Luitprand in the second book, thirteenth chapter), he begot a son, John by name; yet, ALL THE FAITHFUL, especially the northern people at a distance from Rome, followed the Roman Church with such honour and reverence, that whoever they heard was sitting in it, a Pope only by name, wonderful to be said, without any discussion of how he got in, him they worshipped as Peter!"* And they go on to prove it by several instances! And what conclusion is to be drawn from all this? Hear the conclusion which is drawn by Labbe and Cossart, the Jesuits! "Whence there is no one who does not understand with how great providence the good God rules and governs the universal Church, which, when it is inflamed at the pleasure of harlots, and all evils and scandals increase, and it is to be feared that it will be torn asunder with a great schism, he yet so defends the same from all heresy and schism, that all the faithful of the nations everywhere rather persevere, conjoined in the same bond of faith and league of obedience, and firmly adhere to it."†

The Jesuits think it a wonderful providence that the world did not then turn Protestant—but that the Church continued obedient to the Papacy, when a false Pope, a robber, a sacrilegious debauchee, the most vicious of mankind, had usurped the place of the head of the Church, and vicar of Christ! That the Church should bow down to a robber, and acknowledge him as her head, was a miracle of God's providence, that the Church of Rome only could produce!

But, O God of truth and holiness, is this the performance of thy promise to the Church? Or can any interpretation of thy promises be correct, which rejoices in such a fulfilment as this?

POPE ANASTASIUS III.

This Pope sat two years, and as many months. The only fact that arrests our notice in his brief history is this: "he decorated the Church of Ticina with many, and those, too, magnificent, ornaments; conceding to its bishop the use of the canopy, and to be drawn by a white horse, to have the cross carried before him on a journey, and to sit on the left of the Pope in Councils."‡

And if he never did worse, knowing Popes as we now do, we will not complain of him for having never done better: let him rest in peace.

POPE LANDO.

"Lando, a Sabine by nation, the son of Transo, succeeded to Pope Anastasius, in the year of Christ 912, in the time of Constantine, Emperor of the East. This Pope, at the pressing entreaty of that most powerful, most noble, and most impudent harlot, Theodora, who had prostituted one of her two daughters, Marozia, to Pope Sergius, and the other, Theodora, to Adelbert, Marquis of Tuscany, and by this means had obtained the dominion of the city (Rome), created John, whom she was most fondly in love with, Bishop of Bononia, from being Presbyter of Ravenna; and when Peter, Archbishop of Ravenna, was dead, translated the same to be Archbishop of that same Church of Ravenna. And a little after he had done so foul an act," says Luitprand, Book 2, ch. 13, "he departed this life."§

Et paulo postquam rem tam fœdam perpetravit, inquit Luitprandus libro 2, cap. 13, ex hac vita migravit.—Labbe and Coss., vol ix., col. 548.

There you have the whole history which the Jesuits have to give of Pope Lando! We might comment upon this, but why should we, when we look at what is to follow!

POPE JOHN X.

"John, of whom we have spoken above, in the life of Lando, from being Archbishop of Ravenna was made Pope, or rather FALSE POPE, in the year of our Lord 912, in the time of Constantine, Emperor of the East. The most impudent harlot, Theodora, being vehemently inflamed with the beauty of his appearance, procured him to be appointed in the room of Pope Lando, whom Lando himself had ordained Archbishop of Ravenna from being Bishop of Bononia. Theodora did that, says Luitprand, lest, in consequence of the distance of two hundred miles, by which Ravenna is separated from Rome, she should only very rarely enjoy the concubinage of her lover. Thus an unchaste man, bearing rule by the power of the prostitute of Rome, was made false Pope, and a wicked invader of the See; which, that you may believe that it could have happened, remember reader, that Theodora (as Luitprand testifies) had two daughters—the one Marozia by name, whom she prostituted to the false Pope Sergius; the other Theodora, who, in adultery with Adelbert, Marquis of Tuscany, conceived Alberic, who, at this time, had usurped the principality of the city of Rome, and ruled over it almost alone; besides (remember) that Marozia, after the death of Sergius, had married Wido, Prince of Tuscany, the legitimate son of Adelbert, whose power was so great that he appeared to be called a king rather than a marquis."*

Well, this is a reason for having such Popes. These women, in their fornications, and in their marriages, surpassed the common wickedness of mankind. This woman, Theodora, married the son of him by whom her own sister had a son in adultery. And these women, by the political influence which they gained by prostitution and adultery, made the Popes! No wonder that the Popes were the most infamous of mankind!

So the Jesuits go on—"By these waves the ship of Peter was tossed. But Christ sleeping in it, suffered it to be covered and overwhelmed by those storms; but not to be wholly sunk. For being freed from infinite heresies, he rendered it so safe against the most heavy scandals, that FOR THE VERY CAUSE for which the heretical innovators (the Protestants), like impious men, blaspheme the Church, for that very cause the sons of the same Church, in gratitude to God, praise and bless God."†

But if any of our readers do bless God for such Popes, elected by such means, we confess we know not what to say to them.

But was this infamous wretch a false Pope or a true one? Bishop Milner considers him essential to the succession; and let us hear the Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart—"From the things transacted under this Pope it is gathered as very probable, that he who had entered as an invader, a thief, and a robber, began to be reckoned as a legitimate Roman Pontiff, by the consent of the clergy accruing to him, when his own troops being joined with Alberic, the son of Adelbert, Marquis of Tuscany, he came to battle with the same against the Saracens. For, after the Saracens were conquered, various embassies are read of, sent to him from different parts of the world for imploring palls‡ and other things,"§ of which several instances follow. One of them is worth notice—a boy under fifteen years of age was made Archbishop of Rhemes; which (the Jesuits say) Pope John not only did not condemn, but he confirmed the election, which led to a common practice, in after ages, of appointing boys to such offices! And of this the Jesuits very fairly say—"truly a work worthy of such a Pope, whom an infamous woman, by her infamous work, had intruded into the throne of Peter.‖

The history of Pope John X. thus concludes—"And when after all these things, Pope John had held the See SIXTEEN YEARS, Wido, Marquis of Tuscany, at the persuasion of Marozia, his wife, who formerly had been prostitute to Pope Sergius, threw into prison him (Pope John) removed from his See, on account of Peter the brother of the Pope, whom they (Wido and Marozia) persecuted with the greatest hatred; and not long after, this invader and unjust possessor of the Apostolic See, died in that same prison, or was most wickedly suffocated by a pillow placed on his mouth, and met with an end worthy of his crimes. So that he who had violently seized the Holy See by means of the unchaste mother, Theodora, being hurled from it and cast into prison by the just judgment of God, was deprived of it, and of his life together, by the equally unchaste daughter."*

And this man, John X., was VICAR OF CHRIST, and HEAD OF THE CHURCH, for SIXTEEN YEARS! Or, if he was not, WHO WAS? The Jesuits call him a FALSE POPE, and yet say that he came to be taken for a true one! But Bishop Milner reckons him in that SUCCESSION of Popes, through which the claim of the present Pope must be proved!

The reader is now, perhaps, as much disgusted with the history of Popes as we are. Gladly would we turn from such a subject; but while so many think that the Popes are the inheritors of the promises which Christ has made to his Church, we must needs try and disgust them with that false notion, that they may learn to look for the performance of the promises of Christ to those who have been his true Church in every age—all those who have taught and sought salvation by the name of Christ, and have departed from iniquity. We shall, therefore, continue the history of the Popes of the tenth century in our next number. In the meantime, let our readers consider what Bishop Milner (a Roman Catholic bishop, in England, in the nineteenth century), says of the tenth century:—"This age is generally considered the least enlightened by piety and literature of the whole number. Its greatest disgrace, however, arose from the misconduct of several of the above-mentioned Pontiffs, owing to the prevalence of civil factions at Rome, which obstructed the freedom of canonical election; yet in this list of names there are ten or twelve which do honour to the Papal calendar; and even those who disgraced it by their lives, performed their public duty in preserving THE FAITH and unity of the Church IRREPROACHABLY."

Thus it seems Bishop Milner thought such infamous men were quite capable of being, and actually were very good Popes, and very efficient VICARS OF CHRIST. But, in our opinion, a Christian bishop who, for the sake of bolstering up his cause, can give no harsher name than "misconduct" to such horrible iniquities, does misconduct himself very grossly.

ORIGIN OF THE DOCTRINE OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

In the approaching month of December, the city of Rome will be the scene of a grave and imposing spectacle. On the 8th of that month, as we learn from various sources, a large number of Roman Catholic bishops and dignitaries, gathered together from all parts of the world, will assemble under the presidency of Pope Pius IX; and it is confidently expected that the result of their deliberations will be, to decide the question of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary, which has long been a source of bitter controversy in the Church of Rome, and to make it an article of faith, for all present and future members of that Church.

We have already, on more than one occasion, brought this subject under the notice of our readers,† but we think that it may be useful, at the present crisis, to make a few remarks on the origin of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. In a question which the head of the Roman Catholic Church deems of such pressing importance that he has called to his aid all his best and wisest councillors, to help him to come to a decision, we are sincerely anxious, for our part, that every intelligent member of that Church should be able to form an opinion how far the Pope's decision (whatever it may be) is in conformity with the ancient doctrine of the Christian Church or not.

On the Feast of the Assumption in the present year, a pastoral letter was addressed by the most Rev. Dr. Cullen to the Roman Catholic clergy and laity of Dublin, in which the following passage occurs:—"It is our sad lot to have been born in original sin, and to have inherited from our first parents the maledictions which they brought on themselves by transgressing God's commandments; whilst Mary, by a privilege granted to her alone among all the children of Adam, was conceived free from every stain of sin. Such is the received doctrine of all the Catholic world, and SUCH IT HAS EVER BEEN." It becomes, then, an interesting subject of enquiry, to ascertain the real facts of the case, with regard to the doctrine in question. If, as Dr. Cullen so positively asserts, the Christian Church has always believed in the Immaculate Conception, it is plain that we ought to find some traces of this doctrine, either in Holy Scripture, or in the works of the ancient Fathers. Dr. Cullen, perhaps through inadvertence, forgot to add any proofs of his assertion; we will endeavour to supply the deficiency, so far as it may be in our power.

When a sect of heretics called the Collyridians, who lived in the fourth century, began to worship the Virgin Mary as a goddess, and to offer up to her little cakes in sacrifice upon her festival, their superstitious practices were at once condemned by Epiphanius Bishop of Salamis; and one of the chief arguments which he employed against these corrupters of primitive truth was as follows: "What Scripture hath told us any thing concerning this?"* In like manner, when a sincere and pious Christian desires to satisfy his mind respecting the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, the first question to which he would naturally desire an answer is this, "what Scripture hath told us anything concerning this doctrine?"

Let us suppose our enquirer to turn for information to Cardinal Bellarmine, the great storehouse of dogmatic theology, and what is the result of his enquiry? Not one single text of Scripture can be adduced in support of the doctrine in question. Nay, more, the learned Cardinal seems almost inclined to be cross and peevish, as if the request for Scriptural authority, or even Church authority, on this point, was quite unreasonable. "People must not expect," saith he, "that we can bring forward an express text of Scripture in this matter, or any certain definition of the Church."† But why must we not expect a plain text of Scripture on this point? The Apostles, it is evident, either believed the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, or they did not. If they did believe it, why may we not look for some declaration of their belief, in those holy Scriptures which contain the record of the doctrines they taught? If they did not believe it, what becomes of Dr. Cullen's assertion, that the Church has always held this doctrine?

But we are not left to mere conjecture on this subject, and it was not without good grounds that Bellarmine felt a strong dislike to appeal to Scripture, upon the question of the Immaculate Conception. The Bible has repeatedly described the corruption of the whole human race in such plain and general terms that it is inconceivable, if the Virgin Mary had been really free from sin, that her case would not have been specially excepted by some one or other of the inspired writers. But of such an exception no trace whatever is to be found in the whole of the New Testament. What emphatic language, for example, does St. Paul make use of in his Epistle to the Church of Rome of his day, as if he almost foresaw the rise of grievous errors upon this very point—"All have sinned, and do need the glory of God."—Rom. iii. 23. "As by one man sin entered into this world and, by sin, death, and so death passed upon all men, in whom all have sinned."—Rom. v. 12. "The Scripture hath concluded all under sin."—Galat. iii. 22. And, if the meaning of these texts be not sufficiently clear, let us listen to the direct and special application which St. Augustine makes of them to the Virgin Mary. "Mary, sprung from Adam, died, because of sin; Adam died because of sin; and the flesh of our Lord, derived from Mary, died to take away sin."‡ Death, we are told in Scripture, is the penalty of sin; and if we believe, as St. Augustine teaches, and as the Christian Church always held, that the Virgin Mary was subject to death, it is plain that, in some shape or other, she must have sinned; and, therefore, her nature could not have been wholly pure.

We cannot place the Scriptural evidence on the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception in a clearer light than by quoting the words of Melchior Canus, a distinguished canonist of the Church of Rome—"The dogma which holds that the Blessed Virgin was free from original sin is nowhere delivered in the Scriptures, according to their proper sense: nay, the general law which is delivered in them embraces all who were descended from Adam, without any exception. Nor can it be said that this doctrine has descended in the Church by apostolic tradition; for traditions of this kind cannot have come to us through any other persons than by the ancient bishops, and the holy authors who succeeded the apostles. But it is evident that these ancient writers did not receive this doctrine from their predecessors.§

Hitherto, then, we have not seen much reason to rest satisfied with Archbishop Cullen's positive assertion, that the Church has always believed the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. Perhaps, however, when we come down a few centuries later, to the times of the early Fathers, we shall find some evidence that they held this doctrine, which is now deemed so vitally important that it is about to be erected into an article of faith. And, accordingly, when we examine their writings, we do find several clear statements of their views on this head; but, unfortunately, one and all held the very opposite opinion to that which Dr. Cullen advocates, and which he states to have been always held and believed by the Church!

We do not ask our readers to take this fact merely upon our word; we shall adduce evidence of its truth, from the statements of many eminent Roman Catholic divines. Cardinal Cajetan, for example, reckons up fifteen Fathers, whom he calls "Irrefragable," who believed that the Virgin was conceived in sin; and the Jesuit writer, Salmeron, reporting the judgment of some Romanist writers on the same side, says, "Some of them reckon up two hundred Fathers" who agree with them; "others—for example, Bandellus—reckon up three hundred."*

It is needless, however, to quote any further authorities, for the testimony of Melchior Canus, which we are about to cite, is so clear and explicit that it ought to set the matter at rest. We may observe, in passing, that this learned writer was himself inclined to believe in the Immaculate Conception, as a pious and probable opinion; but he was far too honest and too upright to misrepresent the views of the early Fathers, even for the sake of supporting his own conclusion by the weight of their venerable names. His words are as follows: "All the saints, who have made mention of this question, assert with one voice that the Blessed Virgin was conceived in sin."† He then gives references to the works of S. Ambrose, S. Augustine, S. Chrysostom, S. Bernard, and a host of other writers, in proof of his statement. It would be easy for us to cite these authorities at length; but the quotation we have given above from S. Augustine may be taken as a sufficient specimen. And, finally, Melchior Canus winds up his catalogue with the emphatic declaration, that—"nullus sanctorum contravenerit"—not one of the Fathers contravenes the statement, that the Virgin was conceived in original sin.

After the foregoing citations, we think we may fairly ask our readers, what weight ought, in reason, to be attached to Dr. Paul Cullen's deliberate assertion that the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin has always been the received doctrine of the Catholic world?" If a lawyer in a court of justice were to state to the jury that he had several witnesses to prove a certain fact, and if these witnesses, one and all, proved the very opposite, would not the jury have reason to question either his ability or his good faith? For we must remember that the point on which we are now at issue with Dr. Cullen, is not as to the truth or falsehood of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception itself, but solely as to a matter of fact—namely, did the ancient Church believe this doctrine, or did it not? The belief of the early Church can only be learned from the writings of the Fathers and other authors of the time; and if these, as Melchior Canus states, assert with one voice that the Immaculate Conception was not then believed by the Church, on what ground does Dr. Cullen assert that it was, and has always been believed?

We can easily conceive a Roman Catholic writer to speak thus:—"I do not care for ancient authorities; I do not mind what two, or three, or ten, or a hundred Fathers or Doctors have said; I am only anxious to adopt that opinion which will best secure and defend the honour of Mary."‡ Such a line of conduct might not, indeed, be very consistent in a member of the Church of Rome, which has always prided herself on the immutability of her doctrines; but it would at least be plain and intelligible. To assert, however, as Dr. Cullen has done, that the Church has always believed a doctrine which it can be proved, on the most unimpeachable testimony, that she did not believe, is a mode of argument little likely, we should imagine, to bring conviction to any impartial and unprejudiced mind.

Perhaps, however, some of our readers may ask—If the ancient Church did not believe the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, at what time was it invented? To this question, we fear that we can give no certain reply. It may, perhaps, have been held by some few individuals about the ninth or tenth centuries, but it did not come prominently into notice until the time of S. Bernard, about the middle of the twelfth century. That eminent writer, as we formerly stated, set himself vigorously to oppose this innovation in the faith; and he denounced both the festival of the Immaculate Conception and the doctrine itself to be "false, new, vain, and superstitious."* But, nevertheless, this newly-invented doctrine, unknown to the best and purest times of the Church, gradually crept in; until at length, about fourteen centuries after the Christian era, the feast of the Conception was formally enrolled among the sacred festivals of the Church of Rome.† If, therefore, novelty be a proof of error in religion, as Roman Catholic writers are so fond of asserting, we know not how those who believe the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception can defend themselves from the charge.

We have met with one allusion to this doctrine, indeed, as early as the seventh century; but it may amuse some of our readers to be told that this allusion occurs, not in the work of any orthodox Father, but in the Koran of Mahomet. In the third chapter of that work, the writer, in giving an account of the birth of the Virgin Mary, speaks of "driving Satan away with stones," in which words, according to the Jesuit Maracci, the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin is hinted at.‡ One of the Mahometan commentators on this passage of the Koran writes, that according to a tradition of Mahomet's, every person that comes into this world is touched at his birth by the devil, and, therefore, cries out, Mary and her Son only excepted. The citation is given at length, in the original Arabic, in Maracci's notes on the Koran; and it is with reference to this curious theory, that Gibbon observes—"The Latin Church has not disdained to borrow from the Koran the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin."§ If this statement of the historian be well founded (and Gibbon's learning is rarely at fault), it would furnish a remarkable illustration of the progress of human error. Strange, indeed, would it be, if the doctrine, which, in the course of a few weeks, a venerable conclave of Christian bishops, with the Pope at their head, are about to stamp with the seal of infallibility, should have had its first rise, more than a thousand years ago, in the wayward fancy of an Arabian impostor!

But it is time for us to draw our remarks to a close. The question of the Immaculate Conception has proved a source of bitter contention and animosity, within the bosom of the Church of Rome, for a space of more than three centuries. Successive Popes were frequently supplicated to put an end to those disgraceful quarrels between the rival sects of the Dominicans and Franciscans, which we described at length in a former number, and to terminate the struggle by an infallible decree. One of the last of these attempts was made in the year 1617. At that time Philip III., King of Spain, sent an embassy to Pope Paul V., with this special object in view. The Pope made answer,‖ that he acknowledged the great probability of the opinion of those who defended the Immaculate Conception; but he said, that the adversaries of that opinion still maintained, that if the question came to a formal definition of faith, the sentence must needs go on their side, because of the authority of the Scriptures, the Doctors, and St. Thomas Aquinas. The Immaculate Conception, therefore, was still allowed to remain "a pious opinion."

At last, after the lapse of more than two centuries, the formal definition is about to be pronounced. Will Pius IX. be governed by the authority of "the Scriptures, the Doctors, and St. Thomas Aquinas," or will he throw them all aside, and set up a new article of faith in the Church, which was unknown to the Fathers and Apostles? A few short weeks will decide. Meanwhile, we would earnestly commend to the attention of our Roman Catholic readers the solemn warning and encouragement which was given to the Jews of old, by the mouth of one of God's ancient prophets—"Thus saith the Lord: Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, which is the good way, and walk ye in it; and you shall find refreshment for your souls."—Jer. vi. 16.

After leaving France, I next visited the principal cities of the Low Countries, that gave birth to Emperors and Crusaders, and exercised a decided influence not only on the religious and political, but also the commercial state of Europe for several centuries. It would be unsuitable to my purpose in writing this sketch, to attempt to describe the noble churches, the rich galleries of paintings, and the high state of agriculture and manufacturing industry, which I witnessed with admiration in the Netherlands. I cannot, however, refrain from making a few remarks on the agriculture of these countries, in which subject many of the readers of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN take a lively interest.

I have never seen, in any part of England or Ireland, such a universal school of industry, or a better or more skilful cultivation of the soil than in these countries. Their stock is excellent, and more beautiful and luxuriant crops of corn are nowhere to be seen. The farmers appear to adopt very generally the three-crop shift, and for cleanliness and absence of weeds, I have seldom seen any tillage equal to that of Belgium. Their cattle are seldom to be seen in the fields during the summer's heat, at the mercy of their indefatigable tormentor, the gad-fly; but tied up, under shelter, during the heat of the day, and fed with clover, which greatly augments that indispensable ally of the farmer—manure. The manure-heaps are, indeed, often larger there at the end of autumn than ours generally are in the beginning of April. Nothing can surpass their neatness. No thriftless or slovenly practices are to be seen in either Flanders or Holland. All their stock-yards are clean and trim, and their manure-heaps are never exposed either to the sun's evaporation in summer, or to the chilling rains of winter, and no farm is wanting in that essential requisite, the cistern or tank for liquid-manure. It was too late in the season for me to see Flora decorated in her vernal dress, and I cannot, therefore, say anything that might be acceptable to the admirers of flowers, beyond this, that I purchased in a seed-shop, in Bruges, a few bulbs of the double ranunculus, anemone, tulip, narcissus, and lily, which, it will be seen hereafter, were not without influence upon my future life and happiness, in a way I little anticipated at that time.

At Ghent I became acquainted with a priest named Vandergelt, who was the only man of his class who, at that period, ever spoke freely to me of the necessity of a reformation in the Church of Rome. He condemned the use of the Latin language in the Liturgy, the celibacy of the clergy, abstinence, and jubilees; and reprobated, above all, the withholding the Word of God from those for whom it was originally intended. He even went further, and said that the Pope's infallibility was a doctrine got up by the Jesuits to uphold the dogmas of the Church, and to support their own favourite principle—"Let her be what she is, or let her not be at all." If all priests were at liberty to speak their private sentiments freely, who can tell how many now in communion with Rome might, at this moment, wish for her reformation as sincerely as Vandergelt did.

There was, however, one religious institution in the Netherlands, which I cannot help mentioning with respect. In nearly all the large towns are to be seen numbers of Béguines or nuns, with small baskets in their hands, containing medicine, and refreshments for the sick and indigent. They do all this, and even dress wounds of the most repulsive character, by profession; and, they add, that they would do more for the glory of God. I am, however, very much mistaken if they would not fulfil the ends of their creation, to more effect, by bringing up a family in the love and fear of God, and thereby add fresh stars to the kingdom of Heaven. They are, generally, young ladies of high birth and education, who devote themselves to those works of mercy.

As I was speaking one day to the above-mentioned Vandergelt, in Ghent, one of those fair Béguines came up and spoke to him in the French language, most earnestly and pathetically. It was in favour of a fresh instance of distress, that came under her observation, in one of the public hospitals of the city, and to the funds of which she contributed largely. The priest assured her the case should be immediately attended to, whereupon she took leave and went on with her labour of love. He told me she was the daughter of a rich merchant in Brussels, who bestowed her fortune on the public institutions of the country, and devoted her whole time to relieving the poverty and sufferings of her fellow-creatures. She had a superior figure, great dignity of demeanour, and charming elegance of manners; she had also a melancholy cast of countenance, which induced me to think that something else led to this melancholy expression, besides the footsteps of care. Perhaps, however, this air of melancholy gained her more of public sympathy and feeling, than if the picture was possessed of the highest degree of colouring. When the priest said he would at once attend to her application, I shall not easily forget the smile of religious fervour that evidently sprang from the heart, at the feeling, that immediate relief was to be imparted to the object of her solicitude. I was taken so much by the warmth and energy of her appeal, and the consequence of it, that had I met her on the plains of Indostan, I would have reverenced her with more true devotion, than would a Hindoo a venerable Brahmin. Shall the names of Vanderveist (or Nightingale) be forgotten, when those of Alexander and Celestine still continue to hold a place in the annals of Europe?

From Ghent I started in one of those heavy coaches that drag their unwieldy lengths along to Bruges, where I arrived in the month of September, 1834. All the cities of the low countries are very commercial and fortified, and are connected with more historic, warlike, and commercial associations than any other cities in central Europe.

I must not, however, intrude on your space by mere historical reminiscences, suffice it to say, that after a tour of a year and a half, the only truly happy period of my life, I sailed from Ostend, and arrived in Cork, after a very tempestuous and dangerous passage; and after visiting that land of enchantment, our own incomparable Killarney, I proceeded at once to call on the titular bishop, of whose diocese I was an alumnus, who lived on the way between Cork and the residence of my family, and was one of the old aristocratic Roman Catholics of that part of the country, who prided himself not a little on being descended from one of those Danish Princes who invaded Ireland at an early period of her history. He received me more courteously than cordially; and after some conversation, said there was a parish vacant by the death of a very worthy priest who died of fever in the discharge of his duty, and ordered me to it on the Sunday following. As obedience is the primary law in a bishop's code, which they exercise with uncontrolled jurisdiction, there was little use in saying that I would be happy to spend some time with my family, so I made a virtue of necessity, and after a week's delay with my parents, I set off to my mountain parish on Sunday morning, accompanied by a boy who had a horse and car, containing a bed and bed-clothes, a flitch of bacon, a pound of tea, and a stone of sugar, with some bread given me by my mother. With this slender store of provision I journied along to commence the world; yet small as it was, it was quite sufficient, as the parish revenue, after the first week, was amply sufficient to render me independent of any extraneous aid. With this stock of provision and furniture, I commenced housekeeping in my highland home, a cabin not sufficiently respectable for the poorest cottier, nor even for the horse I rode. However, I had no alternative, it was in it the last priest lived, and most probably the only vacant one then to be found. It consisted of one room, with an earthen floor, without any overhead ceiling, and a kitchen with a fixed settlebed for the servant. Whatever furniture my predecessor had was removed by his friends, except an old crazy table, not worth the carriage, and a poor attenuated vestal who acted as his housekeeper, and who waited to see if his successor would take her, as she said, to earn an honest penny. She talked so often, and so well of the last priest, that she gained me over to her interest, and I never had less reason to regret my choice.

As the boy who drove the horse knew where the last priest lived, I pushed forward to the chapel, which was covered with straw, with a forge and a small toddy house, as its only appurtenance. Before I left home, I understood there was no respectable Roman Catholic in the parish, and I found them all frieze-coated persons of the same class, and almost uniform in their dress. They appeared to have a good deal of intelligence in their expression of countenance, without any marks of craft or duplicity, and with every manifestation of unsophisticated honesty, which subsequent experience proved to be really their character.

The priest's clerk, who is most commonly a sort of hereditary heirloom, was very assiduous, and made his responses as audibly, and with as much self-sufficiency, as if he understood the Latin language as well as Tacitus. After the service was over he accompanied me to my "mountain home," where the old vestal had our dinner prepared, which she placed upon the old kitchen table, that was bolstered up by the clerk with some bogwood, which was left as useless by the friends of the late priest. This old crazy table answered also as a bedstead for some time, until I could procure one from the county town. This poor man took care of my horse, and went to market on Saturday, as we had neither a butcher or baker in the neighbourhood, and in a little time, he learned to plant his early Yorks and Savoys with as much precision as any vegetable gardener at Fulham. After the experience of ten years, I found this man to have but two faults, one in common with all the priests' clerks from Brandon Head to Donegal, that is, that he knew not one word of the responses he made at Mass; the other, in common with some of the priests themselves, that he sometimes took a little too much of the "mountain dew," which was to be found in abundance in those mountain ranges. The only circumstance that gave me pain was the want of society, as man without it generally degenerates into a misanthrope. A mutual communication of ideas, and sometimes a collision of sentiment, generates a desire to come at the foundation of truth. Yet, with my poor uneducated parishioners there could be no companionship.

That I should wish to avoid a life of seclusion, and possess a relish for a little society was very natural. Disguise it as Romanists may, man was created for society; even in his uneducated and natural state he is gregarious, but when educated, he must either find, or form for himself, a social state. Not one of the numerous monastic institutions that peopled the eastern deserts, or the monasteries of the Levant, or of the interminable number of religious houses to be met with on the Continent, or in England, before the Reformation, fulfilled the ends of their creation, nor have they given to the world that good example which it expected from them. More Popes than one were obliged to issue an inquisitorial inquiry into the scandalous and disreputable conduct of those monastic institutions, particularly when the abbeys were in proximate contignity. Besides, I may be pardoned for the want of that peculiar taste, which placed Stylites upon a pillar, and condemned the monks of La Trappe to perpetual silence.

Possibly, too, I may be forgiven for feeling somewhat painfully the contrast between the mountain cabin, which I very appositely denominated Misery Lodge, with its odour of bogwood and turpentine, compared to the room I occupied in the Rue de St. Honore, near the Boulevard de Madeleine. Yet, there was no alternative; and as I was taught that obedience was better than sacrifice, nothing remained but to bear my fate with implicit submission. This was, however, but a small part of my trials. The priest, however reluctant, must think as the bishop thinks; and, moreover, bear with patient endurance the irrational and unmeaning ceremonies and ritual observances of a mechanical religion as subservient acquirements. It may be worthy of remark, that those priests who are the sons of small farmers or artisans, are much more submissive to the will of their superiors, than those of the more opulent who are better educated, and whose minds are generally more independent, and more indifferent to the ritual observances of the Church of Rome.

In the country where I was located, there was but one resident Protestant gentleman to whom most of the parish belonged; he was always high on the grand panel of the county, drove four horses to his carriage, was a high-church-and-state-man, and upon bowing intimacy only, with the former priests. His lady, however, was a person of the most amiable manners, a florist, and kind to the poor. As I had no garden, I forwarded the Dutch bulbs to her, with directions in French, how to prepare compost, and to protect them, when in bloom, from the heat of the sun, which I had received from the seedsman in Bruges. How the Maynooth priest came by the Dutch flower roots was to her quite enigmatical.

To a thinking man, it must appear of no rare occurrence, what great effects are produced, either good or bad, by causes seemingly trivial. How true to life is that observation of Pascal, that in every state and condition of life, "C'est une roue de cuivre qui fait mouvoir une aiguille d'or." How little I thought that those few flower roots which I purchased in Holland, would be the means of procuring for me the friendship of the veriest of aristocratic proprietors, and a family who hated a priest as much as Byron did a monk. Before I proceed further, however, I must mention a circumstance worth the reader's attention as showing how antagonistic the teaching of the priesthood is with their practice. The first Shrovetide after my induction, I married all those that presented themselves upon the "voluntary principle," and without any previous bargain. All the priests complained to the bishop that they would be inevitably ruined if I persevered upon this plan. The consequence was that the bishop sent down a priest the next Shrovetide that made as close bargains as he would in the ordinary transactions of life; and to whom I was obliged to give a per centage. Now, if the bishops and priests believe matrimony to be a sacrament, what becomes of the teaching of St. Peter, when he says to Simon (Acts, chap. 8, v. 20) "thy money perish with thee, because thou hast taught that the gifts of God can be purchased with money." If they disbelieve them to be sacraments, to the crime of simony they add that of hypocrisy which is condemned in the most forcible language that could be uttered by St Paul. I might, perhaps, add, that to those sins they added, in my case, that of usury; for I was obliged, under pain of disobedience, to give this priest 20 per cent. out of the money which he so unfeelingly wrenched from the pockets of my reluctant parishioners.

The spring following I received a note from the lady of the manor, to come and see the flowers in blow, and to spend the day; I accordingly went "nothing loth," and spent a happy evening with a family well educated, and of highly polished manners. The gentleman of the house was a Protestant "of the right sort," and would not allow the word "expediency" into the vocabulary of his religion or politics. To the ease of a gentlewoman, the lady superadded the most refined manners, and the young ladies were not only familiar with the round of female accomplishments, and spoke French grammatically, but were able to converse critically upon most subjects, and particularly on one in which I felt much interest, the decay of ecclesiastical architecture in Ireland since the Reformation. At this period the country was greatly disturbed by the agitation of the tithe question; and the proprietor considered it very prudent to build a military barrack near his residence, as he lived about ten miles from the county town where the military were stationed. He accordingly built one, and a detachment was ordered out for his and the public protection; so that the want of society which I dreaded so much, was obviated by the box of flower-roots, and the barrack which O'Connell's giant agitation caused to be erected. If the Sunday evening dinner was not improved by the zest of the classical literature of the different officers quartered in the new barracks, yet the frank manners of a soldier combined with the polish of a travelled gentleman, contributed exceedingly to our Sunday happiness, and I need scarcely add, made his society particularly welcome to the young ladies as well as their seniors. As the life of a priest is so monotonous, that the history of one week is almost an epitome of his entire life when once placed in a parish, it will be sufficient to say, that ten years thus passed off in the happiest manner, enlivened by the society of this Protestant family, and the different officers that were quartered in the barracks.

One circumstance connected with this family made a serious impression on my mind, which I cannot omit making mention of, as it is one deserving of warm commendation, and which ought to be practised in every family in the kingdom—I mean family prayers, that the blessing of God may descend upon them. We read in the gospel of St. Matthew, 15th chapter and 20th verse: "That where two or three are gathered in His name, He is in the midst of them;" and the 11th chapter and 9th verse of St. Luke tells us: "And I say unto you, ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you." Would that every family, in accordance with this precept, had at least on Sunday evenings united prayer, and with one voice and sincerity of heart, asked "those things that are requisite and necessary as well for the body as the soul." I am not ashamed to confess, that though in the commencement of my acquaintance with this family, I only joined in these family prayers, I subsequently was permitted to read them myself, and experienced no remorse in doing so. How little Roman Catholics usually know of that beautiful liturgy which the Church of England has compiled for the use of her people.

In a little time after this a dark and heavy cloud was seen to loom on the horizon of my hopes, which no exertion of mine could dissipate or sunshine illume. The unexpected death of the proprietor cast a general gloom on the surrounding country, and the sorrow of the family and of the tenantry was loud and pathetic on this mournful occasion. The stock and effects were sold by public auction. The lady of the house, with her daughters, went to reside at Bath, and both her sons, who were in the army, were in the East Indies. Family incumbrances required the property to be put under the control of the Chancellor. The agent, who was well acquainted with the condition of the tenantry, was removed, and another appointed, who was perfectly unacquainted either with them or the nature of the different soils, and consequently of their value; and many of the unhappy tenantry were, within the short space of two years, reduced to seek a shelter in the workhouse from this unfeeling tyrant. It was thus the cup of happiness was at once dashed from my lips, and the seat of hospitality and cheerfulness plunged into the gloom of the desert. It is generally observed that one misfortune seldom comes unattended by her twin sister. All the military detachments in Ireland were called into head-quarters, and replaced by the constabulary, so that, in the space of a few months, I lost not only the society of a highly-respectable family, but also that of Captain S., as fine a fellow as ever cast five yards of mohair into a river—a modern Raleigh, the Ivanhoe of chivalry; and I was once more plunged into that solitude which I so much dreaded at the commencement of my missionary labours:—

> "Thus hope unmoors her little boat,
> And boldly tempts the main,
> Winning the daring height she sought,
> To fall to earth again."

But God, who does every thing for the best, was all this time working invisibly for my future happiness, as will be seen hereafter.

THE SURE TITLE; OR, FATHER FLYNN AND PHIL RYAN.

Father Flynn had been lecturing us on the greatness and power of the Church, and commanding us to leave the care of our souls entirely to the clergy, and to be satisfied that what they told us, and nothing else, was right. There was a bold fellow present, one Phil Ryan, a decent farmer, with some small holdings, in a place near us. When they were dismissed, all but myself, and two or three more, that were in the priest's confidence, Phil came back, and making his best bow, said:—

"Plase your riverence, I just forgot how I want to lodge a complaint against Mike Connor; he is contrary, and scrupulous, and suspicious."

"Well, be short, man; it's little I'm likely to do in settling your differences; but I always held Mike to be a decenter fellow than yourself," says Father Flynn.

"Well, then," says Phil, "to make short of it, your riverence, I want Mike to rint of me a snug cabin, and a matter of two acres of good land, on a lease."

"Well?"

"Mike is unreasonable, your riverence, all out; he wants to see my title, to be sure it's good, and to examine all about the little property; which I take very unkind at his hand, seeing he has my word for it all."

"Why, man alive!" says the priest, who had a liking to Mike, "what's got into your head, now? Do you suppose any but a natural would take your bare word in a matter where himself, his interest, and his comfort, are all concerned? Go give him the satisfaction he wants, and don't be setting yourself up in the place of justice, lease, and all."

But Phil did not move. "Plase your riverence," said he, "I have the head landlord's authority to say, that he executed the lease, putting me in possession of these premises, to let as I like; and why should any man stand doubting me for want of proofs?"

"Get along, sir," said Father Flynn, to him again. "Produce your lease, show him the title, satisfy the honest man's mind, that his own will be good, or else he's a fool if he has anything to say to you or your holdings; it's what every tenant has a right to," says he again to us; "and ye know that, boys, very well.

But what a change came over Phil! He stood as bold as a lion, and as brisk-looking as a kid; and never moving his eyes from the priest's face, that grew all scarlet and blue, as he spoke, he said:—"Why, then, your riverence, will you please to show me your title to grant me an entrance into the kingdom of heaven; and satisfy me that if I take it at your hands, I am safe in possession, let who may object to it?"

The priest was like one mad. He made as if he would close in upon him and chastise him; but Phil was a powerful fellow, and not to be trifled with. He stood on his guard firmly, but not disrespectfully, and so went on—

"It's but a cabin, sir, and a patch of ground; and the longest possession a man can have of it is but a few years. And in case he don't get it, there's scores of places just as good to the fore; or, if he's turned out, he needn't want a shelter to go to. But the place that we're depending on your riverence to engage for us when we leave this world ——"

Here the priest interrupted him with a worse word than I would like to write down; and turning to us, he said—

"Hoys, will you see your priest insulted by a swaddling apostate, that sold himself to the devil and the Bible-men for a few coin? My curse on ye if ye don't stop his blasphemous mouth, and drive him out!"

"They needn't," says Phil, looking coolly at us; "I'm not going to trouble your riverence any further, as I've incensed you into my meaning about the everlasting habitation. I meant you no disrespect, sir; but a poor man's soul is precious; and I must have better warrant than the bare word of any living man before I hazard it for ever."—American Paper.

We have been so little in the habit of boasting of what we have done in the field of controversy, that it is very probable many of our most constant readers are actually ignorant, even at the present time (though our periodical has now been in existence nearly three years), to what extent its columns have been circulated, and read throughout the British dominions. The official returns made by the Revenue department, and recently published, of the number of stamps issued to the several newspapers in this city, have, however, made public the enormity of our proceedings; and we were somewhat amused a short time since by a story told us by a warm friend, of a worthy man, sincerely anxious for the success of Protestant missions in this country, but apparently wholly ignorant of the existence or nature of our paper, who confessed to him that he had been greatly discouraged by seeing, from the public returns, the increased circulation of a "Popish" paper, called the Catholic Layman, which, within the preceding twelve months, had actually risen to an annual issue of 120,000 copies! As it is useless to deny that our misdemeanours really amount to that formidable number, we must only hope that our numerous readers will rejoice to find that they have so many to sympathize with them, and that they will cordially aid our efforts to make our circulation still greater, so as to bring it within the reach of all who are able and willing to use the reason which God has graciously bestowed on them, in "proving all things, and holding fast that which is good." Nor can we help feeling gratified by the numerous encouraging letters which reach us from various quarters, expressive of cordial approbation of the tone and spirit of our paper. We also think it right to acknowledge the flattering allusion to our labours, made by an ably-conducted contemporary, the Irish Church Journal, in a recent number, couched in terms of praise, which, though they may exceed our merits, certainly but justly describe what we would earnestly desire to become, if in our power. We trust none of our readers will attribute our citing it to mere vanity or a spirit of boasting, which we hope we have never indulged in, but rather to a sincere desire to encourage our readers, by showing them that their partiality for our columns is participated in by others well qualified to judge of the object we have in view, and our mode of attempting to effect it.

"Let that admirable periodical, the Catholic Layman," says our respected contemporary, "which has already done so much good, in the most solid, but least obtrusive form, be generously supported, and the sphere of its operations extended on all sides. It reaches the minds that lead others. It exercises an influence not only on the middle classes, the shopkeepers, and more intelligent farmers—but upon the priests themselves. It is a missionary whose advent provokes no riots, and brings about no breach of the peace—a missionary who can be present with the same talent, learning, good taste, and wisdom, at the same time in every house in Ireland—a missionary who runs no risk of broken bones himself, and whom every man may listen to without compromising his position in society, or drawing upon himself the universal notice of his neighbours."

Should the above passage meet the eye of the worthy friend of Irish Protestant Missions, above referred to, we hope it will go far to reconcile him to the idea which so grievously alarmed him when he discovered that the circulation of the Catholic Layman, within the last twelve months, amounted to 120,000 copies. Our appeals he will find are all to the reason, and never to the passions of our readers, either Roman Catholic or Protestant; and, therefore, afford, we hope, some prospect of ultimately leading men to the truth. We have good reason, also, to believe, that the Irish Church Journal is not far wrong in the allusion made in the passage cited to the Roman Catholic priesthood, and that no inconsiderable number of the priests in this country are among our regular readers. It would be too much to suppose that the majority of them are friendly to our exertions, or that they do not still look upon our pages with a somewhat jaundiced eye, as calculated to exercise an injurious effect upon their own interests. Some, however, we sincerely believe, are capable of taking a higher and more noble-minded view of the matter, and would willingly (or even, like the worthy Dutch priest described in another column, gladly) see a reformation in the Church of which they are members, did they not fear that a disclosure of their wishes might subject them to the wrath of their ecclesiastical superiors, and tend to their personal ruin. We confess it ever gives us pain to think that even the transition from the most fatal error to the most glorious truth should injure, even in a temporal point of view, the welfare of any one, whether priest or layman; and we would gladly see the same happy result again, which has, in some instances, we believe, already occurred even in this country, of the priest and his flock simultaneously repudiating the errors of a Church which has long arrogantly claimed to be "the mother and mistress of all Churches," without being able to give any rational proof to satisfy an unprejudiced inquiring mind, that she really deserves that title. It is cheering, however, to learn, as we read in a letter from Monsieur Ernest Vent, pastor at Brussels, dated 5th October, 1854, published in the same periodical above referred to, that Roman Catholic priests, who have the courage, like the Abbe Miel (whose interesting letter we printed in our last number), to follow their conscientious convictions, by renouncing the Church of Rome, are not always, even in that eminently Romish country, Belgium, pecuniary sufferers by their change.

"Until 1839," writes Monsieur Vent, "there were in Brussels only two Anglican Churches, and the French and German Church, which latter consists of about 3,000 Protestants. In that year, pastor Von Maerdyck, formerly a Roman Catholic priest, opened a Flemish Church. At first, there were but thirty or forty hearers. Last year, the Flemish congregation numbered more than fifteen hundred, of whom more than twelve hundred were converts. This congregation has become so settled, and is progressing so regularly, that the government could not help allotting a salary to its pastor, three months ago. Thus, this Church is now publicly acknowledged, and forms but one with the French and German one. M. Von Maerdyck has, during the whole year, two religious lectures in two different parts of the city, for adult Romanists—these lectures are attended by from sixty to seventy persons."

We are not altogether without hope that we may yet live to see the day when similar results may not be uncommon in our own beloved country. Be that as it may, however, we are determined to do our part, under the Divine blessing, and leave the result to God. Will not our readers assist us in this devout wish, by circulating our pages, if they approve of them, by every means in their power?

Dr. M.—It is not the fact that the Church has always interpreted the passage, "Thou art Peter," &c., in the manner you state. We have distinct proof of this in the reason assigned for giving the Bishop of Rome a primacy of place—namely, the rank of his metropolitan city;* that, and not the passage "thou art Peter," &c., was the foundation of the precedence of place allowed to him. But I must ask you to remember your own assertion, that these words conferred both infallibility and jurisdiction over the whole Church, upon St. Peter, and the Roman Pontiffs. Produce, therefore, if you please the decree of the early Church giving that passage.

Mr. G.—The great Council of Nice, held in the year 325, declared that the Church of Rome always had the primacy and jurisdiction over the whole Church.

Dr. M.—No such decree was made. The Roman legate, at the subsequent Synod of Sardica, referred to a canon of the Council of Nice, and, when quoting it, interpolated the words you mention. Reference was made to the genuine canons, when this addition was convicted, and rejected. Again, I must ask you what even this has to do with infallibility? Why do you not produce a decree of the Church, if any such really exist, on this head? If the infallibility of the Roman Pontiff or Church, was recognised is it not strange that we do not find it either urged or submitted to, which, if true, it assuredly would be, as the effectual means of checking or ending the multitudinous disputes which distracted the early Church. Not only is this not the case, but we have decisive testimony to the reverse. This infallible interposition was not only not exerted, but decisions of the Roman Bishop were even disbelieved. Take, for instance, the memorable Donatist schism, when the Emperor commanded the Roman Pontiff (with whom he associated other bishops) to examine the matter. The Donatist bishops refused submission to this Pontiff's decision when adverse to them, alleging, as a reason for so doing, that the judgment of a few western bishops—the Pope being one of them—should not be weighed against that of so many Numidian ones. Now, is it credible, that such a plea as this could have been made—and it appears, moreover, to have been allowed—if the infallibility of the Roman Pontiff or Church had been then a recognised doctrine? With respect to the jurisdiction of the Roman Pontiff, I just wish to ascertain what you understand by it; has the Pope supreme power in temporal as well as in spiritual matters?

Mr. G.—In both; he has a direct and supreme authority in spiritual things; but, since you cannot separate these from temporal, he has, indirectly, jurisdiction over the latter also.

Dr. M.—I ask the question because, whatever claim you make, it is that and not something else which you must prove. Is there any doctrine of your Church on the subject, or is it not true that here, as in other most important matters, there is a variety of opinion? Thus, on the one side, Pope Innocent III. claims express temporal jurisdiction over kings—God, said he made two great lights, the greater to rule the day, &c., these are, said he, the papal and the regal; the former superior to the latter.

Mr. G.—I never heard that illustration before; it is beautiful, and quite expresses the truth.

Dr. M.—Well, let us see, here are Cardinal Wiseman's words directly contradicting the Pope—"There is nothing taught in the Catholic Church on the subject; it is no principle of her belief whatsoever, that the Pope does possess, or can possess, any temporal power, and that if we speak of those kingdoms which are not in anywise connected with his temporal government, it is the belief of all Catholics that the Pope has not the slightest jurisdiction or right to interfere upon earth" —"Lectures on the Church," p. 170

* For this reason, the Bishop of Rome must long since be disentitled even to this primacy of place.

Mr. Langdon.—I shall proceed to show the doctrine from the Scripture. Walking one day in Galilee with His disciples he halted and said to them:—

"Whom do men say that I am? And the disciples answered: Some say that thou art John the Baptist, and others Elias, and others Jeremias, or one of the prophets. He then said to them: But whom do you say that I am? Simon Peter, answering, said: Thou art Christ the Son of the living God. And Jesus, answering, said to him: Blessed art thou Simon Bar-Jona, because flesh and blood hath not revealed it to thee but my Father who is in heaven. And I say unto thee: Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth it shall be bound also in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose upon earth it shall be loosed also in heaven.* And at the last supper, suddenly turning towards Peter, He said to him: Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat: but I have prayed for THEE that THY FAITH FAIL NOT: and thou being once converted, CONFIRM THY BRETHREN." † After His resurrection, Jesus one day said to Peter: Simon, son of John, lovest thou me more than these? Peter answered: Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus said to him: feed my lambs. He said to him again: Simon, son of John, lovest thou me? He answered: Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. Jesus said to him: feed my lambs. He said to him the third time: Simon son of John, lovest thou me? Peter was grieved because Jesus said to him the third time, lovest thou me? And he answered, Lord thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee. And Jesus said to him: Feed my sheep.‡

"In virtue of these words addressed to him by Christ, Peter exercised his apostolic prerogative on the following among other occasions.

"In the Cenacle—Acts, chap. 1st, v. 15 and following.

"On the day of Pentecost—Acts, chap. 2nd, v. 14 and preceding and following verses.

"The first miracle wrought by him—Acts. chap. 3rd, v. 6, 12 and following.

"Addresses the princes, ancients and scribes in answer to the question, by what power they taught. &c.—Acts, chap. 4th, v. 8th and following.

"Judges Ananias and Sapphira, and executes judgment upon them—Acts, chap. 5th. v., 3rd, and following.

"Visits the Churches—Acts, chap. 9th, v. 32 and following,

"Cornelius sent to him by the Spirit of God—Acts, chap. 10th, v. 5th and 6th.

"First invites the nations to the Faith—Acts, chap. 11th, v. 34th and following.

"And, to sum up all, he is always put forward most prominently in the Scriptures much oftener than, and in a manner quite different from, any other apostle."§

Dr. M.—Now, Mr. Langdon, remember what you have undertaken to prove by these passages—jurisdiction over the whole Church of Christ, in the sense of power to be submitted to, given to St. Peter and to his successors. You have read, it is true, a number of passages, now interpret them, and prove their meaning to convey that doctrine which you want us to believe. But here you are again met by the insurmountable difficulty which meets you everywhere, when you attempt any argument from the Scriptures. What is the principle of interpretation which you employ? Are you going to use your own judgment for the explanation? Then, why do you so peremptorily prohibit a like use of it for Protestants? Whatever objections you make against it must (try to evade the fact as you will) recoil in full force on yourselves. It is impossible for either Roman Catholics or Protestants to avoid exercising their own judgments upon the Scriptures—you must do it, and cannot help it. Are you about to use the infallibility of the Church as the warrant for your interpretation? This you cannot here do; you cannot assume what you are called on to prove. Are you going to assert the unanimous consent of the fathers? Then give me the proof that it did really assign to the passages you address that meaning, and none other, which you now assign to them; produce explicit declarations to this effect. The question is one of simple fact, to be established by an appeal to history.

Mr. L.—I am not arguing for heretics! but for a Catholic lady who has eyes in her soul,‖ and can understand truth. No one but a Catholic can perceive Catholic doctrine.

Mr. G.—A Catholic writer reckons up the number of times wherein mention is made of St. Peter, more than of any other Apostle; the proportion is very great indeed.

Dr. M.—Suppose we grant it all, the fact is unavailing, unless he or you prove, in addition, that each occasion of mention establishes the present doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church. If you use the fact you speak of as an argument, you are clearly bound to show the reason of mention in all these cases to be the distinct declaration of your modern doctrine. It is easy enough, I think, to show, that while some of them establish the reverse, not one of them proves your case. Here is your perpetual device and sophism; you assert one thing, and prove something utterly different, which you hope may be mistaken for it. Why do you not keep to the point at issue? Prove what you assert, and prove nothing else. Can anything be more weak than Mr. Langdon's attempt? It is simply to read a number of passages, wherein Peter is mentioned, and then assert, without any proof, that they establish a jurisdiction of power to have been committed to that Apostle and to the Roman Pontiffs. That Peter had a primacy of place is not even made out by them; that he had a primacy of power over the whole Church is, I think, refuted by the best possible testimony—the history of the transactions of the Church—while he was yet alive and exercising all the functions of his office.

Take, for instance, one of the cases, mentioned by Mr. Langdon—Peter's visit to Cornelius—Upon his return, he was called to account for acting as he had done—"Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and did eat with them." Is this a mode of address likely to be used by those who admitted his jurisdiction as an acknowledged fact? Does his reply make a claim or even a reference to such authority? No such thing; his defence is, he remembered the words of the Lord foretelling this reception of the gentiles unto the Church, and then adds, "what was I that I could withstand God." So far, then, as this passage adduced by Mr. Langdon bears on the question, it gives a double evidence—that of Peter and his accusers—against the doctrine he desires to establish by it. That the Apostle should, in this summary way, be called on to defend his act, is inconsistent with the idea that the Church admitted him to have supreme jurisdiction, while the manner in which he makes that defence, proves he had no idea of it himself.

With respect to another of the passages just quoted—"I will give to thee," &c.—did it convey this supreme jurisdiction and infallibility to St. Peter?

Mr. L.—Certainly.

Dr. M.—Bellarmine has found a considerable difficulty where you see none. If infallibility be conveyed here to St. Peter, how does it occur that shortly after he denied the Lord? He was not, surely, infallible then, and, therefore not before the act of denial. Now, though Roman Catholics very commonly press this whole passage as the great proof of this Apostle's infallibility, yet it is clear, that Cardinal Bellarmine felt it would not do to say this without some qualification. He felt the difficulty I have mentioned; and asserts, accordingly, that the words, "Thou art Peter," &c., did not convey infallibility, but only promised it, the conveyance being through a subsequent address—"Feed my sheep," &c.

Short of express passages, absolutely condemning and rejecting the alleged prerogatives of Peter (which cannot be found, simply because the claim itself was an usurpation introduced in times long subsequent), we have as strong evidence as it seems probable to have that no such thing existed; circumstances, of which we have the account, occurred, which must have drawn it out, had it been true; statements are made absolutely inconsistent with it. Let us take the case of St. Paul, the same who declares that he did not build on another man's foundation. He must, beyond all doubt, have usurped Peter's asserted prerogatives (if such existed) when he asserts that on him, not on Peter, was "the care of all the Churches." He does more, since he limits expressly this Apostle's superintendence in Church matters; for he terms him, by way of distinction from himself and restriction, "the minister of the circumcision," while he claims for himself the wider province over the gentile Church. He speaks, moreover, of such distinction and limitation as a thing admitted and acknowledged in the Church, "when they"—i.e., the heads of the Church at Jerusalem—"saw that the Gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to me, as the Gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter," &c. Here is a division of superintendence distinctly asserted and allowed: the limitation of the smaller portion to Peter; the reservation of far the larger part of the gentile Church (under which, be it well remembered, the Church of Rome itself was included) to Paul. How can this be reconciled with the alleged claim of (made for, not by) Peter to undivided jurisdiction over the whole Church. Is it not absolutely inconsistent with it? And in strict accordance with his own extent of jurisdiction, St. Paul addresses his epistle to the Church at Rome, expressly asserting as his reason for doing so, the fact, that the whole gentile Church was his province. "I am debtor," he says—that is, I am bound by the duty consequent upon this province to preach—to the gentiles. So—because the Church of Rome was a gentile Church—I am ready to preach the Gospel to you that are at Rome also." Here the principle which refutes your doctrine is clearly laid down. But there is also an especial instance personal to these Apostles which again contradicts it.

St. Paul says—"When Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face," &c.

Mr. G.—We consider that to be a great proof of St. Peter's humility, he submitted to rebuke from an inferior. The fact also that St. Paul mentions him so especially proves his peculiar dignity.

Dr. M.—You will, I think, find it difficult to adapt what you say to the recorded facts of the case. I am afraid the whole transaction will press as severely against the infallibility of Peter as it does against his supreme jurisdiction. The charge which Paul makes against him is expressly this—that, by his conduct, he was giving encouragement to the false doctrine which the Judaising teachers disseminated in the Galatian Church. This doctrine was one which Paul incessantly opposed as contradictory to the truth of the Gospel. St. Peter, by his example, gave strength and countenance to the great error, that observance of the Mosaic law by gentile converts was essential for their salvation. This Paul everywhere opposed; and he opposed Peter for sanctioning it. It was no "mere act of imprudence" which he condemned, it was a grievous error. St. Peter's humility had a deeper foundation than the frivolous one you assign. It was from the consciousness of having strengthened a grievous error to the great detriment of truth. And the peculiar mention of him, which you say proves his peculiar dignity, is declared to arise from the simple fact, that he "had come to Antioch."

It is certainly very strange if Peter be, as you assert, the only infallible Apostle, that he alone should be mentioned, after the day of Pentecost, as the only fallible one. Does it not seem as if distinct provision was here made against the modern allocation to him of any such prerogative? Before the day of Pentecost he denied Christ, though it had been said of him, "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven."* After the day of Pentecost, he alone of the Apostles is found on the side of error. How does actual special fallibility accord with presumed especial infallibility? Again we are informed (Acts viii. 14), "When the Apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the Word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John."

Mr. G.—There is no force in that. The prelates of the Church may, on some important matter, meet and request the Pontiff to go and settle it in person. His supremacy would not be affected by this.

Dr. M.—I am very sure if they did, which is unlikely, they would not record the act in these words, "they sent" the Pope. The expression would surely have been more deferential. I use the passage, however, simply as an indication that the doctrine of Peter's primacy of power was then unknown, as I use, for the same purpose, these other statements which appear to repel the supposition that Peter was believed to be elevated, as you would have him to be. "James, Cephas—i.e., Peter—and John who seemed to be pillars." If Peter was known to be supreme in jurisdiction, would he be spoken of along with others as seeming to be a pillar; or, if the Corinthian Church knew of such doctrine, would they have literally gone against it, as they did when one of them was "of Paul," another "of Apollos," another "of Cephas." No such doctrine, it is plain, was heard of at Corinth.

There remains another proof to which I beg to direct your attention, for it appears to me very decisive, Acts xx. 26, &c.† Here you will observe St. Paul is warning the elders of the Ephesian Church, that certain errors would creep in—that, of their own selves, "men would arise speaking perverse things," and "seeking to draw away disciples." Now, is it possible to conceive that St. Paul, if he knew the doctrine of Peter's infallibility or of the Church's—which, if either existed, he must have known—would, upon the very occasion where it is most essential he should assert it as a decisive preventive of those very evils which it was most essential to prevent, not only omit all mention of it, but state instead and enforce other preventives. For he says—"Therefore watch, and remember," &c. He points out evils which he apprehended as certain; those evils were erroneous doctrine and schism. Infallibility, and jurisdiction of power in a particular person or Church, if acknowledged, would have stopped both, by extinguishing the right to think at all. How is it possible to account for St. Paul's omitting to mention them, under circumstances which were exactly those requiring their mention, unless the true explanation of his silence was, that he knew nothing of them.

The following extract is taken from the Resumé as the answer given by Mr. Gretton to this argument:—

"That nothing of so negative a nature could be adduced as proof. That great existing facts are often passed by in silence by contemporary writers as too well known to require mention. That in extracting doctrines from the Bible, it was always necessary to compare one part with another. That if the Doctor's line of argument held good hardly any doctrines could be proved by the Bible. That in the 'whole counsel of God,' preached by St. Paul, no doubt entered the necessity of submission to one visible head of one visible body, as the only means of preserving unity, and this the experience of nineteen centuries had victoriously proved, for it is a well-known and

§ The passages in small type are taken verbatim from the Resumé.

‖ Coupling this with Mr. Langdon's previous statement about "instinct," it appears that this gentleman came much nearer to heresy than became his determined orthodoxy. Condemning the exercise of judgement, however well regulated and directed, he yet approves of "instinct" as an argument, and gives "eyes of the soul" to Catholics Thus he is in hazardous proximity to the old extravagancies of Methodism, to Quakerism, and to some of the ancient Gnostic modes of defending their deadly errors. So true is it that "extremes meet."

* Whenever and in whatever particular case the Holy Spirit was the teacher there, of course, was truth taught and uttered. The force of the argument is to show that infallibility was not attached (according to the Roman Catholic doctrine) as a permanent gift to the person of Peter, and, therefore, not to his imaginary successors.

† For this argument I am indebted to a sermon, preached by his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, on this passage, from the Acts. It is so decisive, that I see no possibility of answering it, except in one way, and that is, by supposing the doctrine of development to have extended to St. Paul. It would not in the least surprise me to hear this asserted yet; for, as there has been introduced "a development of doctrine," so the doctrine of development may itself be developed. The principle applied to itself will produce it. An intelligent Roman Catholic controversialist, Dr. P. Murray, of Maynooth, after some time, undertook an elaborate answer to his Grace's sermon—(see CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. I., p. 101). The inference from this reply appears inevitably to be this—that the argument cannot be refuted, except by the fatal admission, that infallibility is not at all necessary for the perpetuation of Divine truth.

avowed fact that out of the Catholic Church there is no visible unity."—Resumé, page 14.

Dr. M.—The silence of Scripture respecting any doctrine is a decisive argument against its truth. Contemporary historians would scarcely omit, if writing for posterity, facts of prime importance, as being too well known to be mentioned. But your parallel assumes the fact which is wholly denied—namely, that infallibility and primacy were known at all. There is very decisive evidence afforded by Mr. Newman's doctrine of development, that all early history is against you; for it is a plain declaration on his part, that the doctrines of the Church of Rome, as they now exist, cannot be found in the records of the early Church. Their germs only are, on this theory, to be found either in the Bible or in such records. These were subsequently to be expanded or developed. This settles your assertion that the facts were too well known to be mentioned; for it admits that the present doctrines of your Church were not known at all. Moreover, would not that historian be judged unfaithful, who, when writing for future ages, should omit most important facts which they could not know except through history. Acting thus, although the circumstance which he was describing called expressly for mention of such facts, still more would he be to be reprehended were he, though aware of their importance to futurity, not only to suppress but apparently to supplant them by other statements very difficult to be reconciled with them.

Nothing can be safer than your rule—"In extracting doctrines from the Bible it was always necessary to compare one part with another." It is precisely because such comparison of passages, as well as the separate examination of each, negatives your peculiar doctrines that we, Protestants, reject them.

You say, "that in the whole counsel of God, preached by St. Paul, no doubt entered the necessity of submission to one visible head &c. This is, of course, a mere assertion, plainly without a shadow of proof. Nay, more, it is not only irreconcilable with the systematic silence of Paul in all his epistles, but against the clear witness of those several instances where he makes express mention of Peter. He wrote fourteen epistles. He treated of discipline, and delivered doctrine. He is, in every case, silent on the infallibility and supreme jurisdiction of the Church or Peter, though the circumstances which he mentions were just the fitting occasions to enforce these doctrines, if they were true.

The beloved Apostle, St. John, is another witness against you. He lived until the end of the first century, presiding over the seven Asiatic Churches. During his lifetime there were several succeeding Roman bishops. If your imagined prerogatives of St. Peter were transmitted to imagined successors in the See of Rome, it would follow that the inspired Apostle, John, must have been inferior in spiritual privileges, and subordinate in authority to successive bishops of Rome.

Mr. G.—So he was.*

Dr. M.—Now, you directly contradict the Scriptures, which declare, "God hath set some in the Church. First Apostles (1 Cor. xii. 28), secondarily, &c." Here it is very clear from the context, that "first" includes foremost in dignity. This could not be if, as you say, St. John, though an Apostle, was subordinate to the bishops of Rome, who were successively his contemporaries, and who were not Apostles.

* I am pretty sure it was Mr. Gretton who gave this answer, which is in strict harmony with, or rather a necessary consequence of the inheritance of St. Peter's asserted privileges; and is, therefore because of its absurdity, a refutation of them. Mr. Langdon, on another occasion, replied to me—"We have one (the Bishop of Rome) just as good as St. Paul!"

Correspondence.

IS THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND AND IRELAND SCHISMATICAL?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Carlow, October 29, 1851.

Sir—I take the liberty of resuming a correspondence that I had with you last August, on the title "Catholic." In answer to your strictures on my last letter, you say, that "the Irish Protestant Church does not owe its existence to any act of separation, which has never committed any act of schism;" and you say this is the Church to which Christians of this country ought to belong.

If I am to understand, by the foregoing, that the present Protestant Church of Ireland is identical with the Church of Ireland four hundred years ago, I am wonderfully deceived. In the first place, what is a separation, but simply a change of belief from one set of opinions to that of another, and I call this a separation, more or less, according to the nature of opinions changed; to use a military phrase, you have circumscribed our field of action, therefore the fight will be more decisive.

In Bede's Eccl. Hist., bib. 1st., you will find that Celestine, Pope of Rome, sent Palladius to convert the Irish, and afterwards St. Patrick.—See, also, St. Prosper, Chron. St. Columbanus calls the Pope his master, the steersman, the mystic pilot.

The ancient monasteries, and the remains of other holy buildings, with their crumbling altars, holy water fonts, stone crosses, the chalices of ancient times yet in the land, and the remains of other church plate with monkish devices thereon, fairly indicate, beyond a shadow of doubt, that they belong to another and different religion to the one now occupying the land, having the title "Irish Protestant Church, or Church of England and Ireland." St. Bridget and her abbeys, her religious houses, and virgins of her pious order—where are her followers to be seen in the Protestant Church of England and Ireland? Where? Oh, yes, I could multiply testimony on testimony of the non-existence of this new and alien Church, from this fertile land of Catholic antiquity; and oh, I could trace the changes of religion, aye, painfully too, and as true as it is painful. When Patrick became our island saint, it was with crozier in hand, with a halo round his path, and a blessing marked his footsteps, and he onward came, the apostle of peace, an image of his Heavenly Master, and he evangelized the land. Thenceforward Ireland became like Rome in Paul's days; their faith and piety, and learning, were spoken of throughout the world.

We can learn from ancient historians and their cotemporaries that Ireland, from Patrick to the British rule, kept up a faithful and submissive chain of correspondence with the Pontiff at Rome. In my next letter, please God, if you will, I shall enter more largely and in detail, peering my way, by strict, undeniable, historical information, that will leave a reasonable impression on the minds of your readers that I have not begun this correspondence empty-handed as regards "proof positive" of the justness of my cause.

I am, dear sir, yours respectfully,

A Roman Catholic.

Our correspondent appears to us to confound the obvious distinction between "opinions" and "actions." We admit, that at the Reformation, the Church of Ireland changed many erroneous opinions; we deny that it committed any act of separation or schism. Our correspondent thinks that he disproves this statement by saying, that, at the time of the Reformation, the Irish Church did alter some of its opinions. But this is no contradiction to what we said; as far as it goes, it exactly agrees with what we said. If our correspondent wants to contradict what we said, he must show what act of separation or of schism the Irish Church committed at the time of the Reformation. This he does not attempt to do; and we are justified in supposing that he does not attempt to point to any act of the kind, simply because he can find no act of the kind to point to. We feel sure that if our correspondent could point out any act of separation or schism committed by the Church of Ireland, on any particular day, or in any particular place, he would not fail to do so. Until he can point out such an act, it is useless for him to affirm that such acts have been committed.

All he attempts to do is to affirm that, in his opinion, every change of opinion is an act of separation. With the history of the Church before us, we think such an opinion quite untenable. We recommend our correspondent to change that opinion at once; and in doing so, he will find, by his own personal experience, that changing an opinion does not necessarily involve any act of separation. Surely he can change this untenable opinion without separating from any body. If other people separate from him because he changes it, the act of separation will be committed by them, and not by him. This was precisely the case of the Irish Church at the Reformation. She changed some erroneous opinions; and for that the Bishop of Rome separated from her, and persuaded as many as he could to do the same; but she committed no act of separation. If she did, let our correspondent point out the when, and where, and how.

In the third century, St. Cyprian and the African Church held a totally opposite opinion to Pope Stephen and the Church of Rome, in a matter which the Council of Trent treats as a question of faith—viz., the rebaptizing of heretics. Does our correspondent mean to say that St. Cyprian and the African Church at that time committed any act of separation from the communion of the Church of Rome? All history is against such a notion.

Under the guidance of St. Augustine, the African Church altered that erroneous opinion, and adopted another, opposed to St. Cyprian, and equally opposed to Pope Stephen. The whole Church has since adopted the opinion of St. Augustine. Does our correspondent mean to say that the Church of Africa, by correcting that error, did separate from herself or from any other? If he think so, let him say it. But if he feel, as he must, that such an assertion would be false and absurd, with what truth or reason can he say that every change of opinion or belief must needs be an act of separation?

We will give him one instance more. Respecting the Immaculate Conception, Bishop Milner says—"The Church does not decide the controversy concerning the conception of the Blessed Virgin, and several other disputed points, because she sees nothing absolutely clear and certain concerning them, either in the written or the unwritten Word."—End of Controversy, letter xii. The present Pope, Pius IX., has confirmed this in his letter of February 2, 1849, in which he distinctly admits, that "this honour has not yet been decreed to the most Holy Virgin by the Church and the Apostolic See."* It is clear, therefore, that, up to the present time, the Church of Rome has been of opinion that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, whether true or false, is not an article of the Christian faith which all men are bound to believe. But the Church of Rome is now going to change this opinion. On the 8th day of December next, the Church of Rome will decide that this doctrine is an article of the Christian faith, which all are bound to believe. Now, when the Church of Rome shall have thus changed her opinion about no less a question than whether a certain doctrine be an article of the Christian faith or no, will our correspondent then be ready to say that the Church of Rome of December will have separated from the Church of Rome of November? We think the Church of Rome will have changed its opinion for the worse, and will have still further corrupted the Catholic faith; but we do not see that any act of separation will be thereby committed, or will necessarily follow; although we are quite clear that if any members of the Church of Rome should thereupon separate from her, on the ground that she had corrupted the faith, they would be quite justified in doing so.

We hope our correspondent now understands the difference between altering an opinion and committing an act of separation. Actions may follow from opinions; but it does not therefore follow that opinions are actions. An act of separation may follow from a change of opinion, or it may not. To say that a Church has changed some opinions, can never be a proof that that Church has committed an act of separation, until that act of separation can be pointed out. Let our correspondent, therefore, show us when, and where, and how, the Irish Church derived its existence from an act of separation or schism, or ever committed such an act?

Our correspondent says, at the end of his letter—"That Ireland, from Patrick to the British rule, kept up a faithful and submissive chain of correspondence with the Pontiff at Rome." Now, it is our opinion that if our correspondent was at all acquainted with ancient Irish Church history, he would never have ventured on so rash an opinion as this. However, as he promises to write to us again upon this subject, we will keep our observations upon that point till we hear from him again. And we hope he will not fail to perform that promise.

ON PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—If it be allowed to notice some of your leading arguments against the doctrine of Purgatory, I shall, in the first instance, respectfully direct attention to Catholic Layman, vol. i., p. 81, where, with respect to "W. C. Search," quoting Tertullian, you say—"We are surprised he should venture to do so." Again—"Now, the fact is, that both the passages which 'W. C. S.' quotes from Tertullian, are both taken from books written after he became a Montanist and a heretic!" Then, you ask—"Is it not strange that men who call themselves Catholics should turn away from what Tertullian believed while he was yet a Catholic, and preach to us only the deadly heresies he fell into after he had left the Catholic Church?" Again, you pointedly ask—"Why do they (Catholics) not quote to us Mahomet and the Koran?" Your opinion, thus dogmatically expressed, decides the character of these two books of Tertullian; they are thus declared by your fiat, to contain only the heretical and impious doctrines of Montanus; yet, immediately after, you tell us—"the first passage (De Corona Militis, p. 200) speaks only of offering for the dead:" thence, we are to conclude from your own arguments, that offering for the dead is a part of the heresy of Montanus. With respect to the passage I have referred to, I perceive that you and Mr. Collette are in the antipodes of opinion; but, in your charge on Purgatory, perfectly unanimous. In Catholic Layman, vol. iii., p. 86, Mr. Collette says—"Tertullian speaks of a custom then existing in the Church among some Christians." In page 87, he admits, that in this book, which you stigmatize as heretical, and no better authority than the Koran, and in the identical chapter from which "W. C. S." quotes, Tertullian has enumerated certain usages of the Church (not the impious heresies of Montanus), and among them oblations for the dead, on the anniversary days of their heavenly birth." This passage he further vindicates, and thus establishes its genuine character beyond exception, by collateral and corroborating passages from St. Cyprian's epistles; and, in doing so, he has evolved no mystery, enunciated no new principles, but only given us what is the teaching of the Catholic Church now, as well as in the days of St. Augustine; that prayers and sacrifice offered for the Apostles, martyrs, &c., and for all those whose lives are very good, acts out of thanksgiving; yet, from this principle, Mr. Collette undertakes to disprove the doctrine of Purgatory! And, in order to make this conclusion available to the end he proposes, he tells those for whose edification he writes, by an egregious mistake, no doubt, that, "according to the modern Roman doctrine, all the faithful—all those who die in the faith of Christ—go to Purgatory, before they can be in a fit condition to appear before God!" But the poor gentleman has been reckoning without his host. I wish he had informed us where and how and from whom he has learned this novel feature of modern Roman theology. In Catholic Layman, December, 1852, page 141, col. i., I observe you fell into a like mistake; you say, "whenever Roman Catholics read any prayers for the dead, or any commemoration of the dead, they always take for granted, that it must be for getting the souls of the dead ont of Purgatory." Now, I ask you, and let me have a fair reply—Where do yon find that Catholics hold such a belief? Again, in same page, you say—"Well, then, when we read of any sacrifice or commemorntion for a dead person, in the early Church, what right has nny Roman Catholic to say, that this is proof that that person was in Purgatory, and that sacrifice or commemoration could nnt be for any other purpose than getting the soul ont of Purgatory?" I answer, he has no right at all to say so; his religion teaches him that such sacrifice, &c., could be, have been, and still continue to be offered for another purpose. You continue—"If the Church of Rome now thinks, that there are any other reasons for offering her sacrifice and making her commemorations now, for souls that are not in Purgatory, much more might the early Church offer her very different sacrifice, &c., for souls that she never believed to be in Purgatory." That the sacrifice offered by the carly Church of Rome differed from that offered by the modern Church of Rome, remains to be yet proved; in this respect, the Church of England does not agree with either of them; she offers no sacrifice at all, either for the living or the dead. This she proves for me thus—"We must, then, takeheed, lest, of the memory, it be made a sacrifice; lest, of a communion, it be made a private eating; lest, of two parts, we have but one; lest, applying it for the dead, we lose the fruit that be alive."—Homily of the worthy receiving of the Sacrament, 2nd book Homilies, page 375. Next you say—"How absurd, then, for any Roman Catholic now to say, that sacrifice and commemoration for the dead cannot be for any other purpose besides getting the soul out of Purgatory!" Yon love to harp upon this string; your starting note is still the same; but I fancy I will spoil the tune, by referring yon to CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. ii., p. 83, col. 1, where "J. B." quotes from the "Sincere Christian Instructed," &c., thus—"Question: For whom is the Mass offered? Answer: For those in heaven, in thanksgivings to God for all their happiness, for the Church on earth, &c., and for the souls in Purgntory." In order to evnde the force of this plain statement, yon have no course left, save the old mistake; and the whole force of your argument is, that "we rely on this gross absurdity," which you cannot deny to be "contradicted even by our own practice."

To contradict every word of your mistaken arguments, I will have recourse to no more mighty authority than yourself; I mean your severo animadversions on the Catholic Church for her faithful record of a number of holy personages, in every age, since the Apostles, whose heroic sanctity and supernatural virtues shone forth with a heavenly effulgence that cannot be disputed. In illustrntion, I will select St. Bernard, of the twelfth century, and I will ask you, did Catholics ever contradict their practice by praying for him, as if he should pass through Purgatory on his way to heaven? The same I repeat with respect to the holy St. Francis Xaverius, the Apostle of the Indies? You decry the Church of Rome for thus paying a just tribute to the exalted virtues of numbers of her children, and thus you establish the fact, that the Church of Rome believes nnd teaches, that many of her members go to heaven without passing through Purgatory. And to pray for a saint, with the notion that he was in need of the suffrages of the Church, can be no more repugnant to Catholic doctrine, than it would be to offer sacrifice and prayers for the damned; and St. Augustine says, that even in this case, "though they afford no relief to the dead, they are an advantage to the living."—Enchiridion cap. cx., t. vi., p. 238. The Church of England, you say (CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. iii., p. 71), "honours the undoubted saints of the primitive Church;" you might add, she honours King Charles I. in the same way, and even with the highest honour—that of a martyr. What is allowed in the Church of England in this respect, cannot be refused to the Church of Rome. Luther grants, in Apol. Resp., ad. Arg. p. 99, that St. Anthony, St. Bernard, St. Dominick, and St. Francis, though all members of the Church of Rome, are to be numbered among the saints; deny, if you can, that they have not as good a title to this distinction as many of those in your calendar.

The second passage (Monogam, cap x., page 155) cited by "W. C. S." may, I consider, be fairly assumed to be genuine, and to enunciate, as well as the first, a practice of the Catholic Church; and this assumption is fully warranted by a corroborating passage from St. Cyprian, Epist. xlvi., page 114. The widow is not said here to offer a thanksgiving that her husband "is now placed, liberated in the presence of God, to hold fast without delay a heavenly kingdom;" but she prays, supplicates, and offers sacrifice, to seek a favour for him; the idea of which is to be conceived from the general term refrigerium, to which, in the passage of Cyprian, the term dormitio affords an exact parallel. That the prayers and sacrifice offered in the early Church, for the Apostles, martyrs, &c., were purely commemorative and acts of thanksgiving, and materially different, as to their object, from those offered for the ordinary dead, is fully evinced by St. Cyril in his explanation of the Liturgy. He says—"When that spiritual sacrifice, that unbloody worship is finished, we supplicate God, over this victim of propitiation, for the common peace of the Church, &c., &c. We all beseech thee, and we offer this sacrifice to thee, that we may commemorate all those who have died before us; in the first place, the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and martyrs, that God, through their prayers and intercessions, may receive our supplications." Thus, he inculcates the invocation and intercession of saints, with as much perspicuity as that dogma hath been defined by the Council of Trent, Sess. xxv.; as an integral portion of Catholic doctrine, set forth in the liturgical offices of the Church—through this medium they offered up their supplications, even for the other dead. For, the saint continues, "then we pray for our deceased holy fathers and bishops, and, lastly, for all our departed, believing that the souls receive great advantage, for whom supplication is offered up in the celebration of the holy and tremendous sacrifice."—Myst. v., page 328. The refrigerium of Tertullian, the dormitio of Cyprian, and the μεγιστην Ονησιν of Cyril are, evidently, as many different modes of expressing this "advantage;" and, hence, they are strictly explicable in one particular sense only; and, as they all express the object supplicated for the dead in the sacrifice of the altar, the language of the Liturgy must determine their precise meaning. In the Liturgy of St. James, tom. ii., Bib. Patr., Paris, 1624, p. 11., the priest, in offering the sacrifice, entreats God to receive it εις αναπαυσιν των προκεκοιμημενων ψυχων. That αναπαυσιν means rest, relief, &c., from pain, torment, &c., is beyond contradiction—Apoc. xiv. 11. Approved version. "And they have no rest day or night," &c.,—και ουκ εχουσιν αναπαυσιν ημερας και νυκτος, &c.—Greek Testament. That it means the rest enjoyed in heaven by the blessed, in contradistinction to all pain, trouble, persecution, &c., is proved from v. 13—ινα αναπαυσωνται εκ των κοπων αυτων—"that they may rest from their labours," &c. Thus, in the 2nd and 3rd centuries we see the Church offering sacrifices for the relief of the dead, for their repose, rest, &c.; this doctrine explained by St, Cyril, in the 4th century, nnd confirmed, not alone by the Liturgy of St. James, but by all the ancient Liturgies. Moreover, in addition to prayers and sacrifice for the dead, we see, that as early as the year 350, the Church supplicates God through the intercession of the saints, with many other practices as papistical as anything in the present day; and how the Fathers and doctors of the Church, at whatever period these novel doctrines were introduced, could conspire to cajole the Christian world out of their Church, in which, according to the doctors of the Church of England, they had no sacrifice, no intercession of saints, no prayers, &c., for the relief and repose of the dead; and how such a change was effected, so secretly that no one could detect it, and, yet strange, without their knowing it, all became arrant Papists; nnd, at what time this revolution took place, with the names of the innovators, and the principal details of the event, I beg you will inform me. St. Cyril says, with regard to prayers for the Patriarchs, &c.—ινα μνημονευωμεν—that we may celebrate their memory; but of the other dead he says, supplication is offered for them—η δεησις αναφερεται. The same distlnction is observed in all the Liturgies. This distinction you have endeavoured throughout, to confound. The restoring of pro natalitiis (De Corona Militis, p. 209) is of the utmost importance, as by the use of it we can discern, even in the Church of the second century, a recognition of the distinction I have just noticed: a distinction between the oblations and sacrifices to celebrate the memory of the martyrs who "have arrived at the presence of the Lord, the Lord himself rejoicing," and those offered by the widow to supplicate relief for her husband's soul—a distinction confirmed by the testimony of the most emlnent Fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries. St. Epiphanius says—"We pray for the just and sinners in quite a different manner, &c., that for the latter we may obtain mercy" (ελεους θεου δεομενοι).—Hær. lxxv., t. l, p. 911; and in the same manner the other Fathers.

Are we, then, to conclude, I ask you, that all the Fathers, in this respect, taught only the impious and deadly heresies of Montanus; and that Aerius, who maintained that the prayers, alms, &c., of the living did no good for the dead; "and that we must not pray or sacrifice for them; that the solemn fasts appointed by the Church should not be kept, and that every one was to fast as he pleased; that he might not seem to be under the law" (St. Augustin, Lib. de Hær. liii., &c.); are we, I ask you, to believe that Aerius was the only living portion of Christ's Church to be found then in the world? for, the more than incipient doctrines of Popery had, as I have already shown, taken deep root throughout Christendom. The noxious sacrifice of the Mass differs nothing from the sacrifice of the early Church as explained by St. Cyril, in the paragraph immediately preceding my first citation from him; he says—"We invoke the most benign God to send down the Holy Spirit on the things offered, to make the bread the body of Christ, and the wine the blood of Christ—ινα ποιηση τον μεν αρτον σωμα Χριστου, τονδε οινον αιμα Χριστου. All the ancient Liturgies invariably agree with St. Cyril; having the words ποιη, αποφηνη, αναδειξαι, ποιησον, ποιηση, &c., all of which express precisely the action, to make, to render, &c., the bread the body, &c.; whilst the prayer of consecration in the Ritual of the Church of England make the bread and wine to be totally different things from the body and blood of Christ. The oblations made in the early Church appear to be very different from doles to the poor; St. Irenæus, the disciple of Polycarp, who was himself the disciple of St. John the Evangelist, says—"Christ giving instructions to his disciples, to offer their first fruits to God, &c., he took bread into his hands, and, giving thanks, said, 'this is my body.' Likewise he declared the cup to be his blood, and taught the new oblation of the New Testament." And, again—"therefore, the oblation of the Church, which the Lord taught to be offered in the whole world, was deemed a pure sacrifice before God."—Adv. Hær. Lib. ix.. cap. xviii., p. 251. He generally uses the word oblatio for the sacrifice of the altar, but never in the sense of a dole to the poor; hence, it is plain, that the oblationes pro defunctis of Tertullian and the early Fathers must be understood of the sacrifice of the altar, offered for the living and the dead.

Your arguments, as already remarked, as far as I have considered them, are formed on a wrong principle, and are, therefore, utterly inconclusive; and Mr. Collette's are, on the same account, equally so. All your other statements, including your citations from St. Augustine, shall in due course be fairly and candidly disposed of; when it will be made to appear that all these, as well as those noticed, are equally fallacious.

Although I have far exceeded my proper limits, I cannot omit noticing another mistake of yours, in CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. iii., p. 71, col 1, where you quote a passage, from Council of Trent, Sess, xxv., de Invocatione Sanctorum, so thoroughly eviscerated, and in such a mutilated and spurious shape, that the original could not be recognised; and instead of explaining Catholic doctrine, goes to establish as deadly a heresy as ever could be inspired by the father of lies—a heresy from which Origen defended the Church against the attacks of Celsus. You make us pray directly to the saints, as by them alone to obtain favour from God. This, though not connected with the other portion of my letter, I thought essentially necessary to observe.

You will kindly accept my endeavours to elucidate the truth as an apology for this long essay.

I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

EDMOND POWER.

Sept. 30, 1854.

We are afraid it will not prove very satisfactory, to such of our readers as are seeking for truth, to have their time and our space occupied by a discussion which they can scarcely understand or appreciate, without taking the trouble of reading again, a long past discussion of two years ago; nnd we feel some apology is due for asking them to do so. We must beg them, however, to remember that it is Mr. Power who has dragged them into it, and not we; and we cannot help observing, that that gentleman, with whom we had so many earnest discussions upon the doctrine of Purgatory, must be rather hard pressed for arguments, in support of his opinions, when, after six months' consideration and ransacking our pages, from vol. i., p. 81, to vol. iii., p. 86, he has been able to take hold of nothing more worthy of criticism than a supposed discrepancy between our views and that of our respected correspondent, Mr. Collette. So far from that criticism affecting our "leading arguments" against the doctrine of Purgatory, we are satisfied, if Mr. Power will only consider a little more carefully the nature of the arguments which we have used nbout the proof of Purgatory, he will himself see that he is, in fact, proving the truth and force of our own observations; and we are truly glad to have our arguments supported by so intelligent a writer. To make this more clear, we must take leave to repeat the passage to which we allude in his letter.

After citing correctly a passage from our columns, in page 141, vol. i., in the following words—"Well, then, when we read of any sacrifice or commemoration for a dead person in the early Church, what right has any Roman Catholic to say, that this is proof that that person was in Purgatory, and that such sacrifice or commemoration could not be for any other purpose than getting the soul out of Purgatory," Mr. Power goes on to say, "I answer, he has no right at all to say so. His religion teaches him that such sacrifice, &c., could be, have been, and still continue to be, offered for another purpose." Now, what is this but exactly what we have so often said, that prayers or sacrifices for the dead do not prove Purgatory, even by way of implication, because they "could be, nnd actually are offered for another purpose?" We are quite satisfied with this answer, and only hope that Mr. Power will have the candour not to attempt hereafter to withdraw the admission how far he really agrees with us.

With respect to Tertullian our correspondent hardly treats us candidly. It is true we did say, in vol. i., p. 81, "Is it not strange that men, who call themselves Catholics, should turn away from what Tertullian believed while he was yet a Catholic, nnd preach to us only the deadly heresies he fell into after he had left the Catholic Church." But Mr. Power takes no notice of the fact which led us to say this; yet it was a remarkable fact. The great champion of Rome, Cardinal Bellarmine, produced a passage from Tertullian as a clear proof of Purgatory; that passage is clear for Purgatory; but in that very place Tertullian says that he learned that from Montanus (a wretched fanatic who believed himself to be the Holy Ghost!). Might we not well express our horror at a Cardinal of Rome seeking to impose upon Christians a doctrine of Tertullian's, which Tertullian himself says he had learned from Montanus? We now ask Mr. Power, "is it not strange?"

We have nowhere said that everything contained in the books written by Tertullian after he became a Montanist was taken from Montanus, nor do we think Mr. Collette has ever said so, though we shall not presume to interfere as far as Mr. Collette's letter is concerned, that gentleman being well able to defend himself; but when we see that Tertullian does expressly say that he learned the doctrine of Purgatory from Montanus (see vol. i., p. 67, col. 3, at the foot), then we do object to any proof of Purgatory brought from the writings of Tertullian after he became a Montanist; and we think it not creditable in professing Christians to quote such a proof. At the same time we think it quite open to ourselves, or to Mr. Collette, to show that many of the passages which are produced from Tertullian to prove Purgatory do not prove it at all. One passage, we admit, does speak of Purgatory, but that one professes to be the teaching of Montanus.

We have nowhere asserted that the Church of Rome has defined that prayers for the dead, or sacrifice offered for the dead, can only be for the sake of getting souls out of Purgatory; but we have complained, over and over again, that almost every Roman Catholic controversialist that we meet with, both in their own books, and also in our own pages, does argue, not only as if the Church of Rome had defined this, but as if it were a thing so clear that even Protestants must admit it. Is not this the common way that all Roman Catholics argue about Purgatory? They produce a passage which speaks simply of "prayer for the dead," or "sacrifice for the dead," and they expect us to take that as proof of Purgatory! To that we have always answered that these prayers might have been for a very different object besides getting the souls out of Purgatory; and, therefore, that such prayers were no proof of Purgatory, unless it could be shown that the prayer was intended to refer to Purgatory—a thing that never can be shown, because not one of the ancient forms of prayer for the dead ever makes any mention of Purgatory. Hitherto we have found that Roman Catholics were very slow to admit the fairness of this answer of ours; they seem always inclined to stick to the one notion, "there is a prayer for the dead, and that must mean Purgatory;" whicli, of course, can be no argument at all, unless it be supposed that prayer for the dead can be for no other purpose except to get the soul out of Purgatory. And it is this which makes us so much delighted now to see that our argument has at last succeeded, and that its force is now admitted by so intelligent a writer as Mr. Power. We beg leave to thank Mr. Power again for his clear admission; and we hope all our correspondents in future will remember it.

Mr. Power makes the same admission, also, about "sacrifice for the dead:" and we thank him for that too. Sacrifice for the dead is no proof of Purgatory, unless it can be shown that the sacrifice was offered for that purpose to get a soul out of Purgatory. Now, will Mr. Power produce to us any passage, from any ancient form of offering for the dead, which professes to make the offering for that purpose? We ask him can he, or can he not, produce such a passage? Until he, or some one else can produce such a passage, we are justified on his authority in saying, that "offering for the dead" is no proof for Purgatory.

Whether the ancient notion of the Christian sacrifice, or offering, be the same as that now held in the Church of Rome, is too large a question to go into now; we will treat that separately again. But if the modern Roman notion be the true one—namely, that it is "a propitiatory sacrifice for sin"—then for what purpose can it be offered, except to free the soul from the punishment of sin? Will Mr. Power undertake to answer this?

Whether St. Anthony and St. Francis, &c., were saints or not, is a question which we are not much disposed to judge of. We leave that to God. Considering how many lying stories we have read about them, and how stoutly the claims of some to saintship were denied by great numbers of Roman Catholics, the question becomes quite too perplexing for us.

But Mr. Power says, "to pray for a saint with the notion that he was in need of the suffrages of the Church, can be no more repugnant to the Catholic doctrine, than it would be to offer sacrifice and prayer for the damned." Can this argument be serious? Can "prayer for the damned" be "the prayer of faith?" and, if not, what is it? Might we not as well pray for the devil; as poor "Uncle Toby," in the exercise of a charity, more sentimental than believing, was almost tempted to? And can it be any justification of the practices of Rome that they are not worse than this? Yet how natural, in those who quote Origen in proof of Purgatory!

But Mr. Power quotes St. Augustine, to prove, that if praying for the damned can do no good to the dead, it may to the living! Aye, and if St. Augustine lived now, he might say that in earnest; for sure it is by that they get their living!

The passage which Mr. Power quotes from St. Cyril (Myst. v.) does not speak of the invocation of saints, as Mr. Power says—that passage makes no allusion at all to Invocation; and the intercession it speaks of is very different from what the Church of Rome means; there is a great difference between "intercession" with invocation, and without it. Many Protestants believe it to be very probable that God's people, who are at rest, do, in their prayers, remember His people who are still contending with the world; we have no means of knowing, with certainty, whether this be so or not; some things seem to make it likely; we find no fault with those who think it likely. But it is a very different matter when we are told that we must pray to them, in order that they may intercede for us; and this is exactly what St. Cyril does not say in this passage; he says not one word of invocation of saints.

We have no objection to the prayer of St. Cyril's liturgy, "that he may make the bread the body of Christ;" we no more object to these words than we do to the words of Christ himself, "this is my body;" the question is, in what sense did St. Cyril understand these words? There are two ways of understanding them; some think the bread is made the sign and sacrament of the body of Christ, and that in that sense it is called his body; others think that it is turned into his body. Both parties agree in applying to the bread the words, "this is my body;" but it is clear that they must differ as to the sense in which those words are applied. Now, what did Cyril think of this? Did he think that the bread was the actual body of Christ itself; or the sign of that body? Whichever way he thought about this, it is clear he must have understood the words, "this is my body," in a corresponding sense. Now, in this very sermon, which Mr. Power quotes, St. Cyril says—"When we taste, we are bidden to taste not bread and wine, but THE SIGN* of the body and blood of Christ." This is a way of speaking that no Roman Catholic ever uses; because they feel that speaking in this way is, in fact, giving up the doctrine of transubstantiation; yet, this was the way that St. Cyril thought fit to speak; and it is, therefore, clear that he must have understood the words in his liturgy, "to make this bread the body of Christ," in that very sense in which Protestants understand the words of Christ; for, after this prayer has been offered, he still calls the bread, "the sign of the body."

Mr. Power is very much mistaken, indeed, in supposing that Aerius was the only person in the early Church who questioned the efficacy of prayer for the dead; and we do think that Mr. Power should not have made such an assertion after reading that sermon of St. Cyril, which he quotes; for, in the very next sentence to that which Mr. Power has quoted, St Cyril does say, "I know that many do say, what is a soul profited which departs from this world either with sins or without sins, if it be commemorated in the prayer." St. Cyril does not say that these persons have departed from the faith; nor does he answer them from the doctrine of the Church; he merely tries to answer them by arguments drawn from the conduct of earthly kings; and the way the word commemorate is used in this passage, applied alike to those who depart with sin, or without sin, goes far to destroy the distinction which Mr. Power endeavours to draw as to the use of that word.

We trust that for the future it will be remembered, that neither prayer nor sacrifice for the dead afford any proof for Purgatory, unless it can be directly shown that the prayer or sacrifice was actually intended to get a soul out of Purgatory. Only let this be attended to, and we shall have few such passages brought forward as proofs of Purgatory.

We think we have some reason to complain of the terms in which Mr. Power speaks of our quoting the Council of Trent in "such a mutilated and spurious shape, that the original could not be recognised." We can assure him we had no intention to misrepresent either the Roman Catholic doctrines, or the Council of Trent. We cited, of course, merely as much as was necessary to elucidate our purpose, and gave those words only which applied to the particular subject of which we were treating.

If Mr. Power is disposed to write an "essay," in reply to our articles on the invocation of saints, we shall be very happy to hear from him, and to defend every proposition we have put forward on the subject; but we anticipate that Mr. Power will find it just as hard to reconcile the decree of the Council of Trent with the writings of his favourite author, Origen, as we have done.

FLOWERS FOR NOVEMBER.

YES; even in dreary, dark November, we are not without our flowers; and though many are dead and gone, others still appear in that wonderful and regular succession which a kind and merciful Creator has ordained. A November sky, however gloomy, cannot deter the LAUREL (Cerasus lauro) from opening its bright-looking flowers, as cheerfully as if they were to meet the clear sunshine of June; and, with its kindred shrub the Portugal Laurel, it will continue flowering till the spring has introduced her train of gay attendants. The common Laurel is a native of the south of Europe, and its leaves are poisonous. The Laurel of the poets, and with which the victorious generals of Rome were rewarded, is not our common Laurel, but the sweet bay tree (Lauro nobilis), an evergreen worthy of its high distinction from the elegance of its form and the aromatic fragrance of its leaves. The Laurel has always been the emblem of glory. The crown of Laurel wreathed the conqueror's brow. St. Peter tells us that when the Prince of Pastors shall appear, those pastors who feed the flock of God, taking care of it, and being made patterns for the flock, shall receive a never-fading crown of glory. Of what materials shall that crown be composed which is for those pastors, who are patterns to their flocks of cursing on the Sabbath-day from the altar, denouncing to death and destruction their neighbours and fellow-countrymen? Can such be the pastors spoken of by St. Peter?—1st Epistle v. 2-4.

The LAURISTINUS is another shrub of great beauty that cheers us now with its wintry blossoms of purplish red, tinged with white. When fully expanded, its flowers are almost entirely white, and in the midst of its evergreen leaves their clusters form an agreeable contrast; dark blue berries succeed the flowers. The Lauristinus is a native of southern Europe, and found on the hills and plains of northern Africa. It was introduced among us about the year 1596. Its ancient name was Tinus, and its leaves being evergreen, and like the laurel it was called Lauristinus. Its botanical name is Viburnum tinus.

The SNOWBERRY (Symphoria racemosa) is another elegant bushy shrub, which favours our November with its small white or rose-coloured flowers. It is a native of both North and South America, but has long since become a favourite ornament in the foreground of our shrubberies. It is not an evergreen, but rather a delicate deciduous shrub. It bears two crops of flowers and an abundance of snowy berries or fruit. The PYRACANTHUS (Crataegus) —or fiery thorn—is another beautiful shrub, bearing a rich profusion of scarlet berries, like those of the mountain ash in their winter splendour. They remain throughout the severest part of the season, and only fall when spring provides a fresh relief.

The MICHAELMAS DAISY (Aster Tradescanti), with its large purple flowers and yellow disk, a native of the fields of Virginia, generally lingers in our gardens to the end of this month, and then departs. There is another herbaceous plant of the same name, but a native of our own isles (ASTER TRIPOLIUM, or SEA STARWORT), a blue daisy, with lilac flowers. It was supposed to change its colours three times in the day—to have been white in the morning, purple at noon, and crimson in the afternoon—whence the Greeks gave it its name of TRIPOLIUM. But we cannot find any evidence of those changes in our sober climate.

If we wish to add a more sprightly flower to our winter nosegay, we have at hand the last representative of the ROSE, the monthly or Chinese rose (Rosa Indica), whose delicate and odoriferous flowers never looked more pure or engaging than they do now, emblematic of beauty, always new. We may add to our wreath the flowers of the EVERLASTING, a most interesting family of plants, consisting of many members—all remarkable for the property of retaining their beauty for years after they are pulled, if gathered in dry weather. One of these is the CUDWEED, of which there are nine or ten varieties in Ireland. Their botanical name is Gnaphalium, from the soft down with which their leaves are clothed. The common Cudweed (Gnaphalium Germanicum) is found on sandy heaths, its stem and foliage covered by a soft woolly down. The yellow species, called, by the Parisians, "Immortelle," and met with at every step in that most romantic resting-place for the dead, the Cemetery of Pere la Chaise, is the Gnaphalium Orientale, a native of Africa and Asia, growing wild on the slopes of Lebanon and Carmel. There is something very touching in the display of sentiment evinced by that gay, and perhaps giddy people, when you see the graves, which have evidently closed upon their tenants several years since, freshly decked with wreaths of the Everlasting, their blossoms dyed of a deeper yellow, and interwingled with others of a jet black, and carefully renewed year by year—fitting emblems of never-ceasing remembrance.

> "That look as infants do, who smile when dead,"

There is another plant which passes by the name of Everlasting, the Xeranthemum, or dry flower, which also retains its brightness and colour for many months after it is gathered. The purple, white, and yellow Xeranthemums are popular annuals among us now, and are natives of southern Europe.

Another annual flower, also entitled to the name of Everlasting is the IMMORTAL AMARANTH (Gomphrena globosa). Its name indicates its immunity from decay. Milton represents the angels as crowned with it:—

> "Their crowns inwove with amaranth and gold—
> Immortal amaranth; a flower which once
> In paradise, fast by the tree of life
> Began to bloom."

The French call it "Violette Immortelle;" and it appears to have been dedicated, by the early Greeks, to the same funereal purpose to which the Parisians apply the Gnaphalium. Homer introduces the wreath of Amaranth as used at the burial of Achilles. He was a hero and demi-god; and, perhaps, thought worthy of immortality—not the lot of meaner men. The heathen notion of immortality was a narrow one, an indistinct glimmer of truth, till "the illumination (or appearing) of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath destroyed death, and hath brought to light life and incorruption (immortality), by the Gospel."—1 Timothy i. 10.

THE PRIEST'S POWER IN FORGIVING OF SINS.

No. I.

Of all the anxieties which must press upon the mind of a Roman Catholic priest who is earnest in the execution of his office, none can be heavier than those which relate to the forgiving of sins.

To sit in judgment on a fellow sinner—to decide whether his sins shall be forgiven or retained—to exercise "this discretionary power,"* is surely the most solemn responsibility which can rest upon a mortal man. Which is most awful, to retain, or to remit sin? To send away a guilty wretch, refusing him that sacrament of penance, "to which belongs in so special a manner the efficacy of remitting actual guilt, that without its intervention we cannot obtain or even hope for pardon" (Catechism p. 261)—to refuse him this, and send him away in a state in which death must be eternal damnation—what an awful responsibility! how it must oppress the mind of a priest who thinks himself bound to do it!

On the other hand, to pronounce the awful words, "I absolve thee," and to send away the sinner under the conviction that he has no longer to seek forgiveness from God; how fearful, if there be any room to doubt whether that man's sins are forgiven by God.

This is the position of the priest, "who sits in the tribunal of penance as his legitimate judge . . . the priest represents the character, and DISCHARGES THE FUNCTIONS of Jesus Christ"—Catechism, 260. A task awful in itself; but how distracting to him who has to perform it without that knowledge of the hearts of men, which enabled Christ to perform it unerringly! Christ could say, O generation of vipers; Christ could say, thy sins are forgiven thee; because he saw the hearts of men. But priests confess that they have not this knowledge; and, then, to have to discharge the functions of Jesus Christ, without that knowledge which enabled Christ to discharge it; to have to give or to refuse salvation, on his own frail and human judgment; what task like this, for its perplexities and anxieties, was ever imposed upon man?

We have often thought that there must be many Roman Catholic priests, sincere and earnest in their profession, deeply feeling many responsibilities, but this the most intolerable of them all.

With all the care that can be used, how is it possible that an erring man, with nothing but mere human judgment to guide him, should pass his life in thus judging of the hearts of others, and yet avoid the involuntary, but still fatal error, "to kill souls which should not die, and to save souls alive, which should not live?"—Ezekiel xiii. 19, Douay Bible.

And if the priest resolve to deliver his own soul, by explaining the real state of the case to the people, how great his difficulty!

There are three different views of the form of absolution.

The first, which teaches that all that man can do, is to DECLARE what he finds reason to believe that God has already done.

The second, that the words spoken do actually and always accomplish the thing expressed.

The third, that the words spoken do actually accomplish the thing, only on certain conditions; and, therefore, only in some cases, and not in others.

Those priests who have not a serious and solemn sense of responsibility about their office, will, perhaps, choose between these three without much difficulty.

It will seem to them out of the question to let the people believe that the priest can only declare a forgiveness already given by God; because the people would hardly consider this worth paying for: and they will think the third explanation little less dangerous; because if the people once come to think that there is no certainty of sins being forgiven, when the priest has said "I absolve thee," the people will hardly continue to believe that there is any efficacy in the words. Such priests will at least not be unwilling that the people should believe that the words spoken do always and necessarily produce the effect. And there is too much reason to fear that many of the people do hold this belief, because their priests are at least content to let them hold it.

But these are not the men of whom we are writing now. There must be some priests who have a fearful sense of responsibility towards God and man, in the execution of this office; and to them it must be a source of great embarrassment and perplexity, which of those three explanations they are to give to the people.

Some few, perhaps, may have already felt that there is some reason to suspect that the first explanation is the true one; that Christ alone can really perform his own functions; that God alone can really forgive sin; and that all that man can do, is to declare a forgiveness already given, where he has reason to believe that God has given it.

But this is so contrary to the doctrine of the Church of Rome, that it can only be a new source of perplexity and distraction to any priest who even suspects that it may be true; for, "unlike the authority given to the priests of the old law, to declare the leper cleansed from his leprosy, the power with which the priests of the new law are invested, is not simply to declare that sins are forgiven; but as the ministers of God, really to absolve from sin."—Catechism, p. 259.

Such priests as we speak of now, can never think of adopting the second explanation; because they know that, however common among the people, it is yet given up as incapable of being defended, by most writers in the Roman Catholic Church, distinguished either for piety or learning. Such priests must ever feel that they are in danger of being guilty of other men's souls, if they suffer them to think that the words spoken do necessarily produce pardon of sin.

But if any such priest should adopt the third explanation, and apply himself earnestly to teach, that absolution can have no effect but where the hearts of men are prepared as God requires; and that, therefore, the effect of absolution can be known with certainty to God only, who alone knows the hearts of men; he would probably find, not only great trouble from without, but great perplexity in his own mind within.

Many priests around him would probably think him a troublesome fellow, who was stirring questions that ought not to be raised among the people; a pestilent fellow, and a ringleader of sedition, he might be called; and it would be thought very inexpedient to disturb people's minds and set them thinking, in a time when any inquiry is found dangerous.

But this is not our subject. We are writing of the sincere and earnest men, who would face troubles from without, but are distracted with perplexities within; and for them this third explanation is full of difficulty.

They will, of course, find that "contrition" is the first and greatest "condition," in order that the words "I absolve thee," may really have the effect of forgiving sin, as if spoken by Christ himself.

They may, perhaps, without much difficulty, see their way to this, that under the Gospel perfect contrition does of itself procure forgiveness of sin direct from God himself, without waiting for the priest to say—"I absolve thee;" and that, therefore, in this case, the words, "I absolve thee," when spoken by the priest, are only a declaration of forgiveness already obtained from God. This much they might easily see their way to; because the Catechism of the Council of Trent expressly says—"As soon as we have conceived this contrition in our hearts, our sins are forgiven . . . . of this we have a figure in the ten lepers, who, when sent by our Lord to the priests, were cured of their leprosy before they had reached them;" to give us to understand that such is the efficacy of true contrition, of which we have spoken above, that through it we obtain FROM GOD, the immediate pardon of our sins."—Catechism, p. 270. This much, then, they may easily see.

But, then, this is a case that seldom arises; and, therefore, the catechism goes on to say—"This is a degree of contrition which few reach; and hence, through perfect contrition alone, very few, indeed, could hope to obtain the pardon of their sins. It, therefore, became necessary that the Almighty, in His mercy, should afford a less precarious and less difficult means of reconciliation and of salvation; and this He has done, in His admirable wisdom, by giving to His Church the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven."—Catechism, p. 271. So "the Church" lets in whom God would keep out.

Here, it appears to us, is where the great responsibility and perplexity of a priest must arise. He has not merely to judge whether a man be "contrite" or not, but he has to judge of the precise degree of contrition at which he will adjudge to damnation, or admit to salvation.

For, "if the sinner have recourse to the tribunal of penance, with a sincere sorrow for his sins, and a firm resolution of avoiding them in future, although he bring not with him that contrition which may be sufficient of itself to obtain the pardon of sin, his sins are forgiven, by the minister of religion, through the power of the keys."—Catechism, p. 271. In this case (the most general case) there is no forgiveness, without actual absolution; and the priests are "judges in the causes on which this discretionary power is to be exercised."—Catechism, p. 273.

Here, indeed, is a fearful weight of responsibility for earnest-minded men.

But the question we are about now is, how far in this case the priest is at liberty to proclaim the third view of absolution—viz., that the words, "I absolve thee," produce their effect of forgiving sin, only where the necessary amount of contrition is present.

Can the priest tell, as Christ can, the precise amount of contrition which exists in any man's breast? We think it is admitted that the priest can only form a human and an erring judgment upon this. Therefore, on the supposition that the third view of absolution is the true one, the case stands thus—if the amount of contrition be sufficient, the man is forgiven by God; but if the amount be not sufficient, the man is not forgiven by God. And as the priest cannot

* Catechism of the Council of Trent, translated into English, by the Rev. J. Donovan, Professor, &c., Royal College, Maynooth. Dublin, 1829. P. 273.

To save space, whenever the word "Catechism," with a number after it, occurs in this paper, it refers to the pages of the above translation.

* This story is to be found in Luke xvii. 14. In a passage above quoted from the Catechism of Trent, a contrast is drawn between the power of the Jewish priests in only declaring lepers cleansed, and the power of priests of the new law in "really absolving from sin." If this were so, was it not strange that our Saviour should declare these lepers himself, and then send them to the priests to be declared clean, as a figure of the pardon of sin?

The reader may, at first sight, think this difficulty is solved by the fact of these ten lepers being an example of true (or perfect) contrition. If it were so, that would be an answer; because this Catechism of the Council of Trent confesses that, where contrition is perfect, pardon comes immediately from God, and absolution only declares it. But the difficulty is that "the ten lepers" was not a case of true or perfect contrition. We read in the account that only one came back to give thanks—"and Jesus, answering, said, Were not ten made clean, and where are the nine? There is no one found to return and give glory to God, but this stranger." Was there perfect contrition in the nine? Is contrition perfect which does not lead to thanksgiving for pardon received? If not, then "the figure" expresses one case of perfect contrition, and nine cases of imperfect contrition; yet Jesus treated all alike, and sent all alike to be only declared clean by the priest; and the Catechism of the Council of Trent holds this up as a pattern of the forgiveness of sins by the priests of the Gospel. And still that Catechism tells us that while those who have perfect contrition get their forgiveness from Christ, and are only declared forgiven by the priest, those who have imperfect contrition are sent by Christ to the priest, to get their actual forgiveness from him. Is not this very strange? Does it not perplex us? Will any serious, earnest priest try and explain it to us?

see into the man's heart, he cannot tell him, with certainty, whether his sins are really forgiven by God or not.

But may the priest tell the man that his forgiveness is dependant on the amount of contrition in his own breast, and, therefore, known with certainty to God only; and known to man himself only so far as he knows and can judge of the sincerity of his own repentance?

No; the priest may not tell him this. "The faithful are to be informed, in the first place, why the Redeemer was pleased to give it (penance) a place among the sacraments. His object was, no doubt, to remove, in a great measure, all uncertainty as to the pardon of sin pronounced by our Lord. . . . Pronouncing upon his own actions, every man has reason to question the accuracy of his own judgment; and hence, on the sincerity of interior penance, the mind must be held in anxious suspense. To calm this our solicitude, the Redeemer instituted the Sacrament of Penance, in which we cherish a well-founded hope that our sins are forgiven us by the absolution of the priest; and the faith which we justly have in the efficacy of the sacraments has much influence in tranquillizing the troubled conscience, and giving peace to the soul."—p. 256. So that the man's assurance of pardon is not to rest on his own judgment of the "sincerity of interior penance," but upon the absolution of the priest, as having been expressly instituted to free the man from uncertainty about his own sincerity.

And this is made plainer still by the words that follow—"The voice of the priest, who is legitimately constituted a minister for the remission of sins, is to be heard as that of Christ himself, who said to the lame man, 'Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee.'"—p. 256.

We can understand, and deeply feel for, the overwhelming anxieties of a sincere and earnest priest, who has longed to tell the people that they were not to rest upon his words, "I absolve thee," even after the most careful exercise of his fallible judgment; but that they must judge of God's forgiveness by the sincerity of their own contrition. We can understand, and deeply feel for, his perplexity, when he comes to find that he is expected to tell them that his words are meant to secure them against any doubt of their own sincerity; and that they are to hear his words as if they heard Christ himself saying to them "thy sins are forgiven thee."

The difference is, that Christ could see into the hearts of those he spoke to, and the priest cannot.

It is this that must overwhelm the heart of a conscientious and earnest priest with a sense of responsibility too great for man to bear.

How can he "discharge the functions of Jesus Christ," without having the knowledge required for it?

If Christ had called any man to "discharge his own functions," would he not also have given him the requisite knowledge wherewith to do it?

Gladly would we aid any sincere and earnest man to see his way in such perplexity.

We must consider the means of knowledge which God has given us. Our faculties are very limited; when we strive to see every little detail at one view, we lose sight of the whole, and get into an inextricable maze, as the able writers of the Trent Catechism did. We must be content to begin by seeing LEADING TRUTHS and LEADING ERRORS. When we see so much, we can go on to examine the details. This is the way of knowledge among men.

There is a matter in this question, which is EITHER a leading truth, or a leading error. It is the very form of "the Sacrament of Penance." Let us examine this well.

"Every sacrament consists of two things—'matter,' which is called the element, and 'form,' which is commonly called the Word. . . . . In the sacraments of the New Law, the form is so definite, that any—even a casual deviation from it—renders the sacrament null. . . . These, then, are the parts which belong to the nature and substance of the sacraments, and of which every sacrament is necessarily composed."—Catechism, pp. 145 and 146.

"The words that compose THE FORM (of the Sacrament of Penance) are—'I ABSOLVE THEE.'"—Catechism, p. 259.

Let it be observed, then, that any deviation from this form, renders the sacrament null.

And so Thomas Aquinas says—"In sacramental absolution it would not be sufficient to say—Almighty God have mercy on thee, or, God grant unto thee absolution and forgiveness; because, by these words the priest does not signify that absolution is done, but only entreats that it may be done."*

And Cardinal Bellarmine says, that absolution given with such a condition as this—"If thou dost believe and repent as though oughtest to do," would not be valid.

And the Council of Trent itself says—"The holy synod also teaches that THE FORM of the sacrament of penance, in which its force is especially contained, is placed in those words of the minister—"I ABSOLVE THEE."† So, without those words, there can be no sacrament, no pardon, no salvation, for the vast majority of men whose contrition is imperfect.

Yet, no fact in the history of the Church is more certain than this, that those words, "I absolve thee," were never contained in any form of absolution used in the Church, for more than a THOUSAND YEARS.*

During all that time, the forms of absolution used in the Church were always in that form which the Church of Rome now pronounces to be ineffectual for the pardoning of sin. "Almighty God have compassion on thee, and put away all thy sins," was the ancient form of absolution in the Church of Rome itself.†

So here is A LEADING ERROR at the foundation, and the whole system of the Church of Rome about absolution breaks down altogether.

Those who would get free from the perplexities in which the Council of Trent and the catechism involve priests, in the matter of forgiving men's sins, must seek elsewhere for something that can stand examination, and satisfy the conscience of an earnest man.

It is at least something to learn why and in what, we have laboured in vain. Let any such priest as we are writing of, only try and imagine himself living in the Church of Rome 800 years ago, and using the form of absolution she then used; and let him consider what opinions he would then have entertained, and what instruction he would have given to the people about absolution; or let him suppose himself at liberty now to use only the ancient forms, and let him consider how easily he could then satisfy his own mind and conscience, about the way he would explain it to the people.

In this way alone, can he understand the cause of his perplexities, and the way to escape from them.

To aid those who may wish to investigate this further, we shall, in a future number, show what were the views of the Fathers about absolution, while the ancient form of absolution was in use.

CELIBACY OF THE CLERGY.

VARIOUS attempts at reform have, from time to time, been made within the bosom of the Church of Rome, both before and subsequent to the great movement of the sixteenth century, which restored religious freedom to a large part of Europe, and which is commonly known by the name of the Reformation. These attempts, it is true, have, for the most part, failed to bring about any important change, either in the doctrine or discipline of the Roman Catholic Church; but the consideration of them is important, especially at the present time, inasmuch as they prove that a deep-rooted feeling of dissatisfaction with many parts of the system of the Church of Rome has always more or less existed within that Church, and has rarely failed to manifest itself, whenever external circumstances permitted its members to declare their real sentiments openly and without reserve.

One of the most remarkable circumstances which has characterized these movements of the popular mind is this, that the same points of the Romish system have almost always been selected, as those in which reform was most imperatively demanded. From the contests of the Calixtines and the Taborites of the fifteenth century, down to the religious movements in Germany, in our own time, the instinct of sober, thinking men has always fixed upon some few crying grievances in the system of the Church of Rome, which were felt to press most heavily, and which were seen to be plainly repugnant to the Word of God. If a patient always complains to his physician that he feels pains in the same part of his body, it is an evident sign that some evil is lurking there, for which a remedy is needed; and the same maxim is no less applicable to the disorders of the religious system.

Among the grievances just adverted to, there is one, against which the most urgent remonstrances have at various times been addressed to the Court of Rome—namely, the compulsory celibacy of the clergy. We are anxious to invite the attention of our readers to this subject for two reasons. In the first place, we believe that the social evils resulting from this rule, both to clergy and laity, can scarcely be overrated; and we have reason to think, moreover, that not a few of the Roman Catholic clergy themselves would be glad to be set free from a restriction, which, as we hope presently to prove, is condemned alike by Scripture, reason, and experience.

We can hardly adduce better proof of the sentiments of many of the clergy on this important question, than is afforded by a remarkable Encyclical Letter, addressed by the late Pope, Gregory XVI., to the bishops of Poland in the year 1831. At the outset of this letter, the Pope alludes to certain unquiet spirits who had been for many years troubling the Holy See with unreasonable requests—requests, which though always refused, were, with unconquerable pertinacity, continually renewed; and that the repeal of the law of clerical celibacy was one of these "unreasonable requests," is evident from the passage which follows—

"We desire, venerable brethren, to excite your constancy on behalf of religion, against a most disgraceful conspiracy with regard to clerical celibacy, which you know is spreading more widely every day, and which is promoted not only by pernicious philosophers of our time, but even by certain persons of the ecclesiastical order, who, forgetful of their character and office, and hurried away by the blandishments of pleasure, have even dared, in some places, to address public and repeated requests to their princes for the overthrow of this holy rule of discipline."*

We consider that the facts here stated, which were so reluctantly alluded to by Pope Gregory XVI., are deserving of the serious attention of all who are anxious for the welfare of the Roman Catholic Church. It must have been a deep consciousness of the evils which the law of constrained celibacy was inflicting on the Church, that induced a large number of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics to appeal to their temporal princes against the known wishes of their spiritual head. Gregory XVI. stated, as we have seen, that the feeling against clerical celibacy was entertained both by clergy and laity, and was "spreading more widely every day." We do not believe that the movement for reform in this matter, to which the Pope alludes, ever extended to this country; but we see no reason why the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland should feel less deeply, or be less vitally interested in this question, than their brethren on the Continent. In approaching this subject we have no wish or intention whatever to discuss it in an unfriendly or hostile spirit. Our only object is to set before our readers some of the serious objections to which the law of clerical celibacy is liable. For the present we shall confine our remarks to the case of the clergy.

Let us suppose, then, some young priest, who has just been ordained, to be confined to the retirement of a country parish, in a village where he has only the society of his clerk and his servant. His parishioners, being, for the most part, plain country folk, devoid of literary tastes and acquirements, are unable to afford him any comfort in his solitude. His duties, save on the Sunday, consist chiefly in the performance of a few routine services, which habit soon renders monotonous. Study, perhaps, has few charms for him; for during his education at Maynooth his reading was, for the most part, confined to dry treatises on dogmatic theology. The young man, previous to his ordination, had anticipated a pleasant existence in the ecclesiastical state; but he very soon begins to experience a foretaste of the irksome feeling of privation and constraint which compulsory celibacy almost inevitably occasions. Should he be placed within the reach of female society, he is obliged to regard it with suspicion and distrust. However carefully he may guard all approaches to his heart, yet nature cannot be thwarted with impunity; unless he be singularly cold and apathetic, his breast will probably be the scene of many a weary struggle, because his vow obliges him to fight incessantly against feelings which are constituent parts of man's nature, and can never be wholly eradicated. All the diversified attractions which others find in mixed social intercourse are so many new snares and temptations in his path. And, as if to crown the difficulties of his position, he is obliged, by the nature of his ministry, to be constantly brought into contact with young persons of the other sex, whose hearts are laid open before him, and whose most secret thoughts he is forced to inquire into. Surely, it is most unreasonable to expect that human nature can bear this trial without a struggle of the most painful kind.

Nor is this all. If there was a prospect, however remote, that this state of things would ever come to an end, perhaps our young priest might be enabled to bear it with composure. If he could look forward to a time when he would be set free from this yoke of bondage—when the loneliness of his solitary dwelling would be lit up by the smile of kind, familiar faces, knit to himself by the dearest ties of earthly relationship—then, perchance, he might be enabled with more ease to school his wayward heart into submission. Hope and fancy might then combine to diffuse a bright glow of anticipated happiness over some future stage of his existence, some rays of which would cheer and enliven the period of his early probation. But, alas! the future has no such prospect in store for him. His celibacy is to last for life. The stern law of his Church even forbids him the companionship of any female relative of his own; and thus, if he looks forward at all into futurity, he sees himself lonely and desolate, with faculties impaired and strength decayed, dependant upon strangers for the simplest acts of kindness that he needs. As he gradually drops into the grave, there is no one to cheer or console him; no voice of kindly sympathy to greet his ear. Can we wonder, then, if gloom, moroseness, and austerity should too often take possession of the minds of those who through life have been exposed to such an ordeal as this?

And now, what reason is alleged for the maintenance of a system, the features of which we have thus faintly attempted to delineate? If any young priest, as he paces his solitary chamber, should ask himself, "Why am I and others subjected to this cruel and unnatural constraint?" what answer can he give to the inquiry? Weighed down, as too many of them are, by a yoke which presses heavily upon every hour of their existence, it can surely be no just matter of surprise that this law of compulsory celibacy should suggest to them to inquire into the right which the rulers of their Church had to impose it.

If a Roman Catholic priest opens the first page of the Bible, what declaration does he find inscribed on it? "It is not good for man to be alone."—Gen. ii. 18. These words were spoken by God, who had created man, and who knew what was in man. Marriage was the remedy which the Almighty himself appointed; and if human nature required this remedy before the fall, while man's feelings and affections were yet pure and unsullied, how much more necessary to his happiness is this remedy now, when sin has introduced so many elements of disturbance into his system!

It is said, indeed, by Bellarmine and others, who have attempted to defend the law of clerical celibacy, that the married state is inconsistent with the sanctity of the clerical character. "Matrimony," saith he, "prevents the priest from performing the duty of sacrificing, because the utmost purity and sanctity is required in it."* Such an argument comes with a very ill grace from a divine of the Church of Rome, which holds that marriage is a sacrament, and that, like the other sacraments, it "confers grace."† How can the same ordinance confer divine grace, and destroy personal holiness? The two things are manifestly inconsistent.

But we need not argue the question upon this ground. A glance at the history of the Old and New Testaments is sufficient to prove that the married state is perfectly consistent with the proper discharge of the holiest and most solemn duties. The 21st chapter of the Book of Leviticus, which specially enjoined the Jewish priests that "they should be holy, because the Lord their God was holy," in the very same passage lays down numerous rules regarding the marriage of priests. The High Priest himself, whose duty it was to offer sacrifice on the great day of atonement, in the Holy of Holies, in the immediate presence of God, was distinctly commanded to be married.—Lev. xxi. 13. So weak is Bellarmine's assertion that the duty of offering sacrifice could not fitly be performed by a married priest, if we should even grant that it is any part of the duty of a Christian minister to offer sacrifice—an assumption which we have in another column proved to be untenable.

When we come to the New Testament, however, the evidence for the lawfulness of clerical marriage becomes abundantly convincing. If, as many Romanist writers are fond of asserting, it be really a profanation that the Eucharist should be consecrated by married men, how comes it to pass that St. Paul speaks of this so-called profanation without the slightest trace of censure or disapproval? "A bishop," saith he, "must be blameless, the husband of one wife, having his children in subjection with all gravity."—1 Tim. iii. 2, 4. And, again, he thus writes to Titus—"For this cause I left thee in Crete, that thou shouldst ordain priests in every city, if any be blameless, the husband of one wife."—Tit. i. 5, 6. If our Lord were again to come upon earth and to act as the Church of Rome does, He would, doubtless, choose unmarried men for his Apostles. Yet, whom did He choose? If we believe the early Fathers, the great majority of the Apostles were married men. "All the Apostles," writes St. Ambrose, "with the exception of St. John and St. Paul, were married."‡

As early as the time of Clemens Alexandrinus, certain heretics began to condemn marriage; and Clemens, as Eusebius tells us, "reckons up the Apostles that were married, to refute those who disapproved of it. Will they," said he, "condemn the Apostles themselves? For St. Peter and St. Philip begat children."§

Scripture alludes to St. Peter's marriage on two occasions; once, where it speaks of his wife's mother (Mark i. 30); and, again, St. Paul, at a later period, refers to St. Peter's wife in one of his epistles.—1 Cor. ix. 5. Did our space permit, we should wish to quote the account given by Eusebius, of the touching interview between St. Peter and his wife, before the latter was led away to martyrdom. We think that the Church of Rome has hardly done justice to the domestic partner of him whom they claim as their own immediate founder. That Church has obviously no liking for Peter's wife. Rome has granted the honours of canonization to all the holy persons named or alluded to in the New Testament, and even to some who are not named there—for example, the father and mother of the Virgin Mary; but she has taken special care not to grant this honour to the wife of St. Peter although St. Paul represents her as accompanying the Apostle in his painful and perilous journeys. So successful has the Church of Rome been in saying nothing about this lady, that a great many Romanists never heard her mentioned all their lives; and, perhaps, it may be new to many of our readers, to be told that St. Peter ever had a wife at all.

To return, however, to the arguments which are alleged on behalf of clerical celibacy. We are saved the trouble of citing any further texts from Scripture, because Bellarmine is fairly obliged to surrender this part of the question. "There is no precept for celibacy," saith he, "in the whole of Scripture."* This is an important admission; but we may go a good deal further than this. The prohibition of sacerdotal marriage is unknown to the oldest monuments of the Church. No vestige of the prohibition is to be found in the long lapse of three hundred years after the apostolic age. We will quote but a single testimony from Clemens Alexandrinus:—"God," saith he, "allows every man, whether priest, deacon, or layman, to be the husband of one wife."† An attempt was made, indeed, in the Council of Nice, to impose the yoke of celibacy upon the clergy, but the council rejected the proposal. Surely, the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland may ask with reason, why they are subjected to a restriction not only opposed to Scripture (which places "forbidding to marry" among the "doctrines of devils."—1 Tim. iv. 1, 3) but unknown to the best and purest ages of the Church.

It would be tedious to go through the various steps by which this law of clerical celibacy—the child, not of religion and Christianity, but of superstition and worldly policy—was at length imposed upon the clergy of the Western Church. For many centuries, indeed, no attempt was made to enforce a prohibition which had always been found to be productive of the most serious evils, both to religion and morals. In the Canon Law, a long list is given of Popes who were either sons of Popes or also of other bishops. "Many persons," saith Gratian, "are found to have governed the Apostolic See, who were born of priests."‡ Osius, Boniface, Felix, Agapitus, Theodorus, Silverius (who was son of Pope Silverius), Deusdedit, Felix III., and various other Popes, were all in this condition. We have given conclusive evidence, moreover, in former numbers of this journal, that the ancient bishops of the Irish Church were married, and that the law of clerical celibacy was a late innovation, unknown to the early Church history of our own Island.

At length, in the middle of the eleventh century, A.D., 1074, Pope Gregory VII., after a fierce struggle, succeeded in imposing this heavy yoke upon the clergy of the Church of Rome. We have no space to detail the fearful amount of misery and disorder which the enforcement of this arbitrary law, by an old man, then tottering on the verge of the grave, occasioned throughout Europe. Perhaps there is no single enactment of ancient or modern times which has proved so fatally effective in destroying the happiness of countless thousands who have since come under its influence. We have no wish to judge Gregory VII. hardly. Perhaps he thought he was acting for the benefit of the Church in severing her ministers from all worldly ties, and binding them more closely to their spiritual head. There can be no question that it is to this, more than to any other law of the Church of Rome, that we are to attribute the enormous temporal power which that Church has since possessed; but we can confidently affirm, that all who feel a due regard for the interests of morality, and are familiar with the gloomy annals of ecclesiastical biography, will have reason to feel that this temporal power has been too dearly purchased.

In 1561, Charles IX., King of France, addressed a petition to Pope Pius IV., praying for the repeal of the law of clerical celibacy. The petition was referred to the Council of Trent, which was then sitting; and the historian of the council informs us of the purport of the speech then delivered by Cardinal di Carpi, which induced the Tridentine Fathers to reject the petition. "It is plain," said he, "that married priests will turn their affections and love to their wives and children, and they would thus be drawn away from their dependance on the Pope. In a little while the authority of the Holy See would then be limited to the city of Rome."§ Those of our readers who are inclined to feel surprise that the Court of Rome has always adhered with such pertinacity to the law of clerical celibacy, will find, in this short extract, the key to the policy which she has so long and so steadily pursued.

Writing, as we have done, with an anxious desire to convince the judgments of our readers, we have hitherto touched but lightly on the physical sufferings of some of the unhappy victims of compulsory celibacy. Jerome, who was one of its votaries, drew a vivid picture of the misery he endured. He describes himself as acting with scorpions in a frightful solitude, parched with the rays of the sun, clothed in sackcloth, pale with fasting, quenching his thirst from the cold spring, while his blood boiled with restless emotion.* St. Francis frequently threw himself, in winter, into a pit full of icy water.† Godric, an English hermit, clothed himself in haircloth, and, during the wintry frost and snow, he immersed himself in the stream of the Wear, up to the neck, and spent the whole night singing psalms.‡ Ulric, another English saint, fasted till the skin was the only covering of his bones, and nightly descended into a vessel filled with freezing water, in which he continued during the hours of darkness.§ Benedict, the father of the Benedictine Order, was obliged, according to the Breviary, to roll his naked body in nettles and thorns, till the lacerated carcass, through pain, had lost all sense of pleasure.‖ Such are a few specimens of the austerities men have inflicted on themselves, in the vain and mistaken effort to be wiser than God. Whether we consider, then, the wide-spread immorality of the many, or the self-inflicted misery of the few, it was not without good reason that Pope Pius II. gave utterance to the well-known sentiment which his historian Platina has recorded, that "though there was good reason for taking away the right of marriage from priests, yet there was far better reason for restoring it to them again."¶

And why should not the attempt to restore this right to the clergy be made? Bellarmine and all the great authorities allow that the Pope can dispense with vows of celibacy. Popes have done this before repeatedly for individuals, why not for an entire nation? The object to be gained is certainly worth an effort. Why should not Pope Pius IX. give effect to the recorded sentiments of Pius II.? Sure we are that the repeal of the law of clerical celibacy would be hailed by the clergy with more heartfelt satisfaction, and be productive of more real benefit to the Church, than the new dogmatic decree on the Immaculate Conception.

CHRISTIAN MINISTERS NOT SACRIFICING PRIESTS.

THERE is an obvious connection between the idea of the Lord's Supper, regarded as a proper sacrifice, and that of the Christian ministry considered as a sacrificing priesthood. One of these notions implies and involves the other. Which of the two was first in order of historical development is an interesting subject of inquiry, into which, however, we cannot now enter. Suffice it to say, that the weight of probability is on the side of the priority of the notion of a Christian priesthood, which then necessarily gave birth to the correlative notion of a proper sacrifice in the Eucharist. The Council of Trent, indeed, decided that both one and the other—the sacrifice and the priesthood—were instituted by our Lord himself; the appointment of the priesthood being subsequent to, and a consequence of the institution of the sacrifice. The following are the words of the decree*—"Sacrifice and priesthood are, by the ordinance of God, in such wise conjoined, as that both have existed in every law. Whereas, therefore, in the New Testament, the Catholic Church has received, from the institution of Christ, the holy visible sacrifice of the Eucharist, it must needs also be confessed, that there is in that Church, a new, visible, and external priesthood, into which the old has been translated. And the sacred Scriptures show, and the tradition of the Catholic Church has always taught, that this priesthood was instituted by the same Lord, our Saviour; and that to the Apostles, and their successors in the priesthood, was the power delivered of consecrating, offering, and administering His body and blood, as also of forgiving and retaining sins."

In proof that our Lord constituted his Apostles and their successors proper sacrificing priests, the Council here refers us to the testimony of Scripture, and to the tradition of the Catholic Church. We propose to consider the validity of both these alleged proofs, and we shall begin with the testimony of Holy Scripture.

How little support Scripture lends to the dogma of a human priesthood under the Christian dispensation, was implicitly acknowledged at the Council of Trent itself, by a learned Portuguese theologian,†† who counselled the Fathers to abandon the attempt to prove from Scripture that the Eucharist was a sacrifice, and to content themselves with resting the weight of their proof upon the testimony of tradition. He even went so far as to discuss, one by one, the passages of Scripture which were alleged, and showed that there was not one from which a clear proof of the sacrificial character of this sacrament could be drawn. It is hardly to be wondered at, then, if the Protestant cannot find in the Bible satisfactory proof of the institution of a Christian priesthood; but, on the contrary, feels convinced that such an idea is utterly irreconcilable with the letter, as well as with the spirit, of Bible Christianity. In order to exhibit more fully to our Roman Catholic readers the grounds upon which this conviction is based, we beg their attention to the following considerations.

The idea of a mediator between God and man arises naturally from the intuitive consciousness which man feels that he is by nature in a state of enmity with God. This feeling prompts him to shrink from an immediate approach to the divine presence, and to seek for indirect channels of communication. Hence, every form of Paganism, whether ancient or modern, had or has its priests—that is to say, certain persons—usually a peculiar caste—supposed to be divinely authorized to mediate between the offended Deity and his worshippers, and to whom were delegated those acts of religious homage which the worshippers deemed themselves unworthy to perform in their own persons.

In the Jewish economy, a positive divine sanction was given to what natural feeling had spontaneously prompted, and a human priesthood was divinely appointed to mediate between God and his people. The reason of this appointment is to be found in the fact that, under the Jewish dispensation, sin—that hateful thing which separated fallen man from his Creator—though it was susceptible of pardon through prospective faith in the promised Redeemer, was not actually taken away; and, therefore, "the way into the holiest"—the immediate presence of God—was not yet made manifest to all believers. God and man were not yet brought into perfect union in the person of the incarnate Son; and, consequently, man's redemption, and his direct access to God through Christ, were as yet not matters of experience, but of faith. All, therefore, that could be vouchsafed to the believer, under the Jewish law, was a typical or symbolical representation of future blessings. Hence, the law necessarily made use of the machinery of a human priesthood and animal sacrifices; the felt insufficiency and imperfection of which were calculated to lead the reflecting Jew to infer their typical and transitory character.

Now, Christianity does not abolish the idea of priesthood. It fulfills, on the contrary, what Paganism had unconsciously predicted, and realizes the divinely-appointed types and shadows of the Old Testament dispensation. The entire of the Jewish ceremonial law was typical, prefiguring the character and offices of the future Saviour. The sacrifices of the law all pointed to the one great sacrifice to be offered up upon the cross; the Levitical priesthood was typical of the heavenly priesthood of Christ. It was to Him, as the one true and perfect Priest and Mediator between God and man, that all the types and prophecies bore reference. Through Him all believers now have direct and immediate access to God. We neither need nor have any other priest, any other advocate with the Father, but him.

Such is the plain testimony of Holy Scripture upon this momentous subject; of all Scripture generally, but particularly of that portion of it, the special purpose of which is to exhibit the relation which the priesthood of Aaron bore to that of Christ. The Epistle to the Hebrews furnishes an inspired commentary on the Levitical law; and from it we learn, not only that a human priesthood does not exist under the Gospel, but the reason why it does not—namely, because Christ himself, in his office of Priest, is a real, abiding, sole, perfect, and all-sufficient Mediator between God and man. The following are a few of the passages bearing on the subject:—"By so much is Jesus made a surety of a better testament. And the others [the Levitical High Priests], indeed, were made many priests, because by reason of death they were not suffered to continue; but this [our great High Priest], for that He continueth for ever, hath an everlasting priesthood, whereby he is able also to save for ever them that come to God by Him, always living to make intercession for us. For it was fitting that we should have such a High Priest—holy, innocent, undefiled, separated from sinners, and made higher than the heaveus: who needeth not daily (as the other priests) to offer sacrifices, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, in offering himself. For the law maketh men priests who have infirmity; but the word of the oath [God's oath, recorded in Ps. cix. 4. (Douay)], which was since the law, (maketh) the Son, who is perfected for evermore."—Heb. vii. 22-28. "For Jesus is not entered into the holies made with hands, the patterns of the true, but into heaven itself, that he may appear now in the presence of God for us. Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the High Priest entereth into the holies every year with the blood of others: For then he ought to have suffered often from the beginning of the world; but now once at the end of ages, he hath appeared for the destruction of sin, by the sacrifice of himself. And as it is appointed unto men once to die, and after this the judgment: so also Christ was offered once to exhaust the sins of many; the second time he shall appear without sin, to them that expect him unto salvation."—Heb. ix. 24-28. "And every (Jewish) priest, indeed, standeth daily ministering, and often offering the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins: but this man (Christ) offering one sacrifice for sins, for ever sitteth on the right hand of God. For by one oblation he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified. . . . . Now, where there is a remission of these [sins and iniquities] there is no more an oblation for sin."—Heb. x. 11-18.

Now, we put it to any Roman Catholic of ordinary candour and plain common sense, whether the above extracts, considered simply in themselves and without reference to controversy, or the dogmas of conflicting creeds, do not convey the following truths—Firstly, That the priesthood of Christ is unique, and uncommunicable, inasmuch as it, and it alone, is perfect, perpetual, and all sufficient. Secondly, That the oblation or sacrifice which He offered was offered once for all, and can never more be repeated. Thirdly, That He now sitteth at the right hand of God, and shall remain there perpetually making intercession for his people, until his second coming at the end of the world. Fourthly, That a human earthly priesthood is, in its very nature, preliminary and typical; and, as such, was superseded and abolished, when that to which it was preparatory and of which it was typical was revealed. Indeed, so far is Scripture from countenancing the idea of a proper Christian priesthood upon earth, that, on the contrary, we find a distinct assertion in the passage above quoted (Heb. ix. 24) compared with ix. 7-14, to the effect that even Christ's priestly office was not complete till he had ascended into the heavens, and there presented, in the true Holy of Holies, his own blood before the mercy seat of the Most High. And, in the 8th chap. of the same Epistle it is stated, with equal distinctness, that Christ's priestly functions could not be fully exercised on earth, and for this reason, that the earthly priesthood of the Levitical Law was typical, not of another visible and earthly, though more exalted, priesthood, but of a priesthood, the scene of whose operations should be heaven itself. "If, then, He were on earth, He would not be a priest; seeing, that there would be others, to offer gifts according to the Law, who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things."—Heb. viii. 4-5. We again ask, would any unbiassed man, calmly and carefully reading over the above and kindred passages of this Epistle, ever dream of inferring from them that the Levitical priests were typical of another order of earthly priests? would he think that, when the inspired Apostle positively declares, there is but "one sacrifice for sins" (x. 12); and that "by one oblation Christ hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified" (x. 14); and that "there is no more an oblation for sin" (x. 18); would any plain and candid man, we ask, think that Scripture was fairly dealt with by saying—True, there is but one bloody sacrifice and oblation for sin—that offered upon Calvary—and, but one priest who could offer this sacrifice—Jesus Christ; but, *un*bloody sacrifices and oblations may and must be offered upon earth, to the end of time, and there may and must be an order of sacrificing priests to offer them? And, yet, this is the interpretation which the theology of Rome is obliged to put upon the plain words of inspiration.

And when we turn to other parts of the New Testament, we find that the writers are in perfect harmony with the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews upon this vital subject. We find them all, without exception, abstaining, when speaking of the Christian ministry, from the use of terms belonging to the Jewish sacrificial system. Christian ministers are described in Scripture by a variety of terms—pastors, rulers, teachers, ministers, evangelists; but not once is the name Hiereus—i.e., sacrificing priest—applied to them; not once are they spoken of as, in their ministerial capacity, offering sacrifice. It is not that the New Testament writers wholly abstain from the use of these terms—priests and sacrifices—in reference to the religion of the Gospel: far from it; they frequently mention and allude to them, but they invariably apply them either to Christ himself, or to the whole body of Christian believers. Jesus Christ is styled "Priest," a "High Priest," a "Sacrifice," an "Oblation." All Christians are declared by St. Peter to be a "holy priesthood" (1 Pet. ii., 5), a "kingly priesthood."—ib. v. 9. St. John (Rev. i. 6) says, that Jesus Christ "hath made us [all Christians] a kingdom, and priests to God and his Father." The same statement is repeated (Rev. v. 10) in reference to those who were redeemed out of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation. Again, all Christians are spoken of as offering sacrifices to God—their own bodies (Rom. xii. 1); the spiritual sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving (Heb. xiii. 15); the sacrifice of benificence to the poor (Heb. xiii. 16). The same remarkable change in the established meaning of the Old Testament terms, when applied to the Gospel dispensation, is observable in the case of the word temple. The Jewish Temple has no material counterpart in Christianity. Nowhere in the New Testament do we meet with any such use of the word. But we do frequently find believers themselves spoken of as temples consecrated to the Divine service. Thus—"Know you not that your members are the temple of the Holy Ghost, who is in you" (1 Cor. vi. 19); "Be ye also as living stones, built up a spiritual house" (1. Pet. ii. 5); "Ye are fellow-citizens with the saints, and the domestics of God, built upon the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone; in whom all the building, being framed together, groweth up into an holy temple in the Lord, in whom you also are built together into an habitation of God in the spirit."—Eph. ii. 19-22. Now, when we remember that the New Testament writers, from whom the above quotations have been made, were men who previously lived under a system in which a material temple, sacrificing priests, and sacrifices were essential elements, and all whose natural associations and tendencies would, accordingly, have led them to reproduce the same ideas under the new dispensation, it certainly does seem wonderful that they not only abstained from so doing, but distinctly and studiously excluded all mention of the words in the sense in which they had been hitherto employed. Nothing, perhaps, furnishes stronger evidence of the Divine origin of our religion than this very fact, that the writers of the New Testament, in direct opposition to all their natural tendencies, purposely and pointedly exclude from it the notions of a material temple, sacrificing priests, and material sacrifices.

That all mention of a material temple is excluded from the Gospel system is a fact of so much importance, that we must dwell a moment upon it. The Temple at Jerusalem was the great centre of the religious ritual and ecclesiastical polity of the nation, and the visible bond of union among all the synagogues of Jews throughout the world. The exclusion from the New Testament of anything corresponding to the material temple, proves that Christianity was not designed to have a visible centre of unity, to which all the individual Churches of the world should be joined by a visible external union. The bond of connection between the various Churches of Christ was to be of a higher, because a spiritual kind—namely, their common relation to the one invisible temple, "the mystical body of Christ, or blessed company of all faithful people," and to its one invisible High Priest and Head, who is at the right hand of God, and ever liveth to make intercession for his people.

That the idea of a sacrificing priesthood is utterly foreign to the Gospel system appears, also, from the following consideration:—We have three epistles of St. Paul, addressed to Christian ministers (Timothy and Titus), in which the duties of their office are laid down at considerable length; but we search in vain for any instructions as to the mode of offering up the body and blood of Christ. In fact, the whole New Testament does not furnish the slightest trace of a Eucharistic ritual, or a prescribed form for the consecration of the elements. Omissions of this kind, especially in epistles which were obviously designed as a manual for the pastor, are utterly unaccountable, on the assumption of the Christian ministry's being a proper priesthood. For, a visible priesthood and sacrifice being supposed, they constitute so important and central an element in the religious system of which they are a part, that they must stand out in marked prominence beyond every other institution of worship. It was so under the Jewish law; it is so now in the Church of Rome. In that Church the Sacrifice of the Mass constitutes the central point of divine worship; and, compared with it, every other act of religious service—prayer, reading, preaching—sinks into insignificance. If St. Paul had regarded Timothy and Titus as priests, we might, therefore, reasonably expect that he would have given minute directions respecting the discharge of their sacerdotal functions of sacrifice and intercession; at least, we can hardly think it possible that he would wholly omit all allusion to them, as he does.

And so, throughout the entire New Testament, the ministerial gifts which are spoken of have no connection with sacerdotal functions. They all point to the services of the synagogue and not those of the temple. Thus we find St. Paul dwelling on the "ministry of the Word" or teaching, and on aptitude for governing, as the principal qualifications of the Christian minister: and these were precisely the duties which devolved on the elders of the synagogue. But under a sacerdotal system, the teacher necessarily occupies, as compared with the priest, a subordinate place. Thus, under the Jewish law, teaching was no part of the proper priestly functions, as we may conclude from the fact that no directions upon that head are found in the portions of the Pentateuch, which treat of the duties of the priests. Indeed, we know that the Scribes, whose peculiar office it was to expound the law, belonged indiscriminately to all the tribes, and not exclusively to the tribe of Levi. To offer sacrifice and to intercede, were the proper functions of the priest; to teach, to admonish, to govern, to administer discipline, were the duties of the presbyter or elder. No reader of the New Testament need be told to which of these offices that of the Christian minister, as described by St. Paul, bears the greatest resemblance.

Such are a few of the arguments against the sacerdotal character of the Christian ministry, derived from the very genius of the Gospel, as a spiritual system, and from the invariable tenor of the whole New Testament. We cannot now enter into a discussion of the particular texts on which it has been attempted to base the doctrine of the sacrifice of the Mass, neither can we examine the alleged support which that doctrine receives from early Church writers. To these branches of the subject we will hereafter address ourselves. For the present we have preferred to confine ourselves to the plain statements of Holy Scripture, and to equally plain inferences from them.

PIOUS FRAUDS, NO. II.—RELICS.

THE waywardness of the human mind has so often led men astray, when left free to guide and govern itself, that we cannot deny there is much plausibility in the theory of those who would confide the management of the masses to those few who are supposed to be more enlightened and learned than the rest. Thus it is, that implicit submission to authority has become, in the creed of many, a test of both virtue and faith; and it cannot be denied that if we could always secure leaders, either civil or ecclesiastical, who were exempt from the ordinary vices of human nature—pride, cupidity, and selfishness—mankind would do well to submit to their authority with the most unreserved and implicit obedience. Alas! however, for poor human nature; experience and history too plainly prove, that there is no post so likely to be unworthily filled as that of irresponsible power, and that if the people but consent to close their eyes, and walk blindfold, as their leaders would have them, without putting any check, or using any precaution, against the abuse of power, their ease soon becomes that of those blind leaders of the blind, both of whom fall into the ditch.

There is no vice to which irresponsible rulers, however, seem more prone than that of cupidity. The thirst after wealth appears to be inherent in all classes; and when men once attain the power of ruling others, whether by physical force, or mental influence, they seem irresistibly to use that power to the ends of personal or family aggrandizement. The feudal barons were little more than aristocratical robbers. The ecclesiastics of the middle ages, little better than a huge conspiracy against the property and privileges of the laity around them, under the guise of encouraging them in the practices of piety and devotion. To no other origin can we trace the complicated and enormous frauds which disgraced the Church for many centuries, and which, in modern times, we believe, many would gladly renounce, if it were possible to do so, without admitting the fallibility of the system, out of which they originated, and perilling that piety which is supposed to have been supported by them.

Among the frauds, miscalled pious, which have been practised on a large scale by Roman Catholic ecclesiastics, with the connivance of their Church, to excite the devotion of the people, or replenish their own coffers, one of the most prominent and palpable (to those who dare open their eyes and examine into such things) is, the wholesale manufacture of spurious relics.

We believe that few well-informed Roman Catholics of the present day, would deny that the greatest part of the relics displayed throughout Europe are mere fabrications, impudently put forward by impostors, to deceive the pious, but credulous multitude, who are thought to require such visible and tangible objects to stimulate and keep alive their devotion; forgetting that veneration for such material objects naturally leads the mind away from spiritual religion into superstition; and too often, among the unenlightened and ignorant classes, becomes the parent of actual idolatry.

Our present object, however, is not to consider whether genuine relics are just objects of public or private veneration, or whether they do tend to lead mankind into superstition or idolatry; but to expose, as briefly as we can, the frauds which have been practised, on a large scale, by pawning off false relics as genuine ones; and the unholy traffic, which has been carried on for centuries in such spurious wares, to the great profit of those authorized by the Roman Catholic Church to deal in such things.

One of the simplest and most satisfactory modes of coming at the truth in this matter, would be to visit the principal churches of Europe, and keep a brief register of the various objects of veneration preserved therein, and calculate how many duplicates of the same pretended objects are publicly exhibited in various places, by ecclesiastics of position and credit. But as it is not possible for every one to travel extensively enough, even in these days of rapid locomotion, to make such observations for himself, it may assist such inquiries, and induce some to reflect more seriously on the credit due to the character and faithworthiness of their ecclesiastical superiors, to give a few cases of duplicate relics, of which it is manifest that one or other must be false and supposititious.

Such cases are very numerous, and it has sometimes happened that these duplicate relics were found in such an awkward proximity, that it became necessary to suppress or conceal one of them, to avoid the natural surprise and ridicule which would arise from such a discovery, even in an age when few could be found bold enough to speak out and expose such deceptions.

Thus the canons of Treves and the canons of Liege each had a head of St. Lambert; and as it was somewhat hard to believe that St. Lambert had two real heads, and those towns were scarcely sixty miles apart from one another, the canons of Treves compounded, for a sum of money, with those of Liege, not to show publicly the head in their possession, lest it might throw discredit on the genuineness of their own rival relic.*

Sometimes, also, long and expensive law-suits have been carried on between rival Churches, who could not or would not condescend amicably to compound matters by buying off their opponents in the discreet fashion of the canons of Liege; but, in the great majority of instances, the duplicates were at such a distance from one another, that either, neither of the claimants were aware of their rivals, or both could afford to disregard the trifling chance of discovery, and still smaller chance of exposure, possibly thinking more of present gain and credit to themselves than of possible consequences to the credit and character of their Church in after ages, when the curious and inquisitive traveller might begin to run "to and fro" over the world, and with prying eyes look more closely and steadily into such matters.

One of the law-suits we have alluded to was that between the Church attached to the convent of Selle, at Poitiers, in France, and the Church dedicated to St. Hilarion, in the same place, as to which of them possessed the real body of St. Hilarion; and whether the suit is now going on, or whether it is still suspended, as it was for almost an indefinite period (during which time the faithful worshipped two bodies of the same saint, at Poitiers) we are really unable accurately to inform our readers.

Another instance is, the long and severe contest between Arles and Vienne, in France, as to which of them possessed the true body of St. Anthony, which, we believe, has never yet been determined, but left in all its original confusion—to say nothing of a third body shown at Novgorod, in Russia, which, of course, in the present day, we shall readily believe not to be the true one.*

Another remarkable law-suit was that between the Abbey of St. Denis, in France, and Ratisbon, in Germany, as to which of them possessed the true body of St. Denis, the great evangelist of France; and, strange to say, we believe, that this suit was decided against the Abbey of St. Denis, in favour of Ratisbon, without, however, diminishing the credit of the one at St. Denis by a single worshipper.

While on the subject of duplicates, we may as well add that two bodies of St. Honoratus are to be seen, one at Arles, the other in the Island of Lerins, near Antibes. St. Giles, also, has a body at Toulouse, and a second in a town bearing his name in Languedoc.

We have, however, to go a step or two further than cases of mere duplicates. Poets tell us a legend about a King of Spain who had three heads, which, is, perhaps, about as credible as that Lazarus, whose body our Lord raised from the dead, should have three bodies, one of which is at Marseilles, another at Autun, and the third at Avalon. Another protracted law-suit took place between the two last-named towns concerning the validity of their respective claims to the possession of the real body of this saint; but, after an immense expense, both parties may be said to have gained their suit, for neither forfeited its title to ownership.

This, however, is nothing to the far-famed St. Sebastian, whose remains were said to have the wonderful power of curing the plague. He is fortunate enough to have four bodies; one in the Church of St. Lawrence, at Rome; a second, at Soissons; the third, at Piligny, near Nantes; and the fourth, at his birth-place, near Narbonne. In addition to which, it may be scarcely worth noticing, that he has a head at St. Peter's, at Rome, and another in the Dominican Church, at Toulouse; that the Franciscan monks at Angers claim to have his brains; and that the Churches of St. Sternin at Toulouse, Case Dieu in Auvergne, Montbrisson, and that of the Dominicans at Angers, each possess one of his arms, to say nothing of smaller fragments of his body, which may be seen in many other churches.

We are almost ashamed to proceed with this sad catalogue of fraud and credulity; and can assure our readers that we do not continue it in any spirit of undue sarcasm, or triumph over any class of our fellow-countrymen, but with a sincere desire to open the eyes of some who have never seen these things in their true light, and lead them to reflect on the sad consequences of trusting too implicitly to their ecclesiastical superiors, and turning from the direct worship of the living and true God, to seek after the perishing remains of fellow-mortals like themselves. Well would it have been for the Christian world, if they had followed the examples of the first Christians, who left the bodies of the saints in their graves, obeying the universal sentence, that "all flesh is dust, and to dust it must return," instead of attempting their resurrection before the appointed time by disinterring them in pomp and state, in order to glorify and worship them. Had the practice of primitive Christianity been followed, Europe would never have been the dupe of hawkers who pawned off, as relics of saints, the commonest rubbish, as the well-known cases at Geneva prove, where what was long kept in a shrine, and kissed, and worshipped, as an arm of St. Anthony, turned out, when examined, to be the bone of a stag; and where what was long preserved on the high altar, and considered the undoubted brain of St. Peter, proved, when subjected to a close inspection, to be a piece of pumice-stone.

We shall not attempt to recapitulate all the relics alleged to be connected with our blessed Lord himself, most of which, if genuine, would, we should think, be more legitimate objects of horror than veneration—such as the instruments of his excruciating sufferings, the cross, the nails, the spear, and the crown of thorns. Suffice it to say, that it has been calculated, and, we believe, justly, that if all the wood exhibited, in various places, as pieces of the true cross, were collected together, they would form a whole ship's cargo; and that the three nails have multiplied into, at least, twenty-seven, to be found at Rome, Siena, Venice, Cologne, Treves, Paris, St. Denis, Bergues, Tenaille, Draguignan, and a dozen other places, each of which alleges that it has certain proofs to establish the genuineness of its relic. In a similar manner the spear has multiplied into four; one of which is at Rome; a second, at Paris; a third, in the Abbey of Tenaille in the Saintonge; and a fourth, at Salve, near Bourdeaux.

What must have been the amount of ecclesiastical fraud and cupidity involved in the exhibition of so many fraudulent objects of veneration in the various churches we have mentioned; but if all the things, of a similar kind, contained in two or three thousand bishoprics, twenty or thirty thousand abbeys, more than forty thousand convents, and an almost infinite number of parish churches and chapels, were collected into one mass, and could be arranged in one catalogue, we doubt whether a single intelligent worshipper would be left in connection with such a system. All men would see clearly how much they had been deceived and blinded, and what darkness and folly had overspread the earth.

Let us begin with the pretended relics of our Blessed Lord himself, about whose blood there have been, and still are, such fierce disputations. Many have erroneously maintained that He had no blood, except of a miraculous kind; and as a proof, we suppose, of the error, the natural blood is exhibited in more than a hundred places! They show at Rochelle a few drops of it, which, they say, was collected by Nicodemus in his glove. In some places they have phials full of it, as for instance at Mantua and elsewhere; in other places they have cups filled with it, as in the Church of St. Eustache at Rome; to say nothing of the blood mixed with the water as it flowed out of his side when pierced on the cross, which is preserved in the Church of St. John Lateran at Rome.

Is it possible to believe that the blood of Jesus Christ was found, after the lapse of several hundred years, distributed over half the world, without the slightest notice of such an astonishing fact having been recorded either by the Holy Scriptures or one of the Fathers of the ancient Church? And, if it be not possible, what becomes of the veracity and credit of those ecclesiastical leaders who have been deliberately and unblushingly continuing such frauds for so many centuries?

We next come to the things which are said to have touched our Lord's body. In the Church of Madonna Maggiore at Rome, they show the manger in which he was placed at his birth; in St. Paul's Church are preserved the swaddling clothes, and in another his cradle, and the shirt his mother made for him; at the Church of St. James, in the same city, is shown the altar on which he was placed at his presentation in the Temple, though it will be recollected that both the Temple and the whole of Jerusalem was destroyed about fifty years after the death of our Lord, to say nothing of Rome, which was itself several times taken, pillaged, and almost destroyed after the date at which, if at all, such things could have been deposited there.

After them come the relics belonging to the period between the childhood and death of our Lord—such as the water-pots in which he changed water into wine at the marriage feast of Cana in Galilee. St. John tells us in his Gospel (chap. ii. 6), that they were six in number; but the six have been multiplied into at least three times that number, and are now to be seen, among other places, at Pisa, Ravenna, Cluny, Antwerp, Salvaterra, St. Nicolo of the Lido, at Venice, at Moscow, Boulogne, Tongres, Cologne, Beauvais, Port Royal near Paris, and Orleans. It is almost needless to say that they are made of very dissimilar materials and of very different measures, though there can be but little doubt that the real originals were of uniform size and make, being as St. John records, "water-pots of stone, set there after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins a piece."

At Orleans they go somewhat further, for they have even the wine which was obtained by that miracle; and once a year the priests there give to those who bring offerings a small spoonful, saying, that they shall taste the very wine made by our Lord at the marriage feast, the quantity whereof never decreases, the cup being always refilled!

The cup in which Christ gave the sacrament to the Apostles is shown at Notre Dame de L'Isle, near Lyons; there is another in a convent of Augustines in the Albigeois; and, if we can credit the historian Sigebert, there is a third, made of emerald! devoutly preserved in the town of Genoa.

The towel with which our Lord wiped the feet of the

* The good canons of Treves do not seem to have heard of the ingenious mode of explaining such apparent discrepancies said to have been hit upon in Hungary, if we may credit an anecdote related by Miss Pardoe in her "City of the Magyar." A museum of curiosities was kept in the chateau of Prince Grassalkovich, which was usually shown to strangers by the parish priest of that place. This worthy man was once conducting a traveller over the collection and showed him, amongst other curiosities, two skulls, of large and small size, saying of the first, "This is the skull of the celebrated rebel, Ragotzi," and of the second, "and that is the skull of the same Ragotzi when he was a boy!" Perhaps both heads of St. Lambert were equally genuine with those of Ragotzi, if the good canons could get at the real truth of it.

* The legend concerning St. Anthony's arrival at Novgorod is curious. It is said that this saint, while at Rome, was commanded by an angel, in a dream, to go and convert the inhabitants of Novgorod. In obedience to the angelic injunction, St. Anthony embarked on a millstone, and floated on this extraordinary craft down the Tiber, passed over the Mediterranean, Atlantic, and Baltic seas, and arrived safely at the river Wolchow, upon which Novgorod is situated, having accomplished the whole voyage in four days—a marvellous speed, putting to shame the wonders of modern steam navigation. It adds but little to the wonder that the date assigned to the voyage is a few centuries after St. Anthony's death!!!

Apostles is shown at Rome, at the Lateran; a second is at Aix-la-Chapelle, and a third at St. Corneille de Compiègne. Two at least of these must be a gross imposture; and whether the third be a bit more faithworthy may well require proof somewhat more satisfactory than those usually produced in defence of such exhibitions.

Here we must pause for the present, and merely ask our readers, in sober earnestness, whether, if these things be so, such a mass of imposture can be accounted for, consistently with the belief that the Church which sanctions and permits such things is the best, and most faithworthy, and safe guide into all truth?

BREVIARIUM ROMANUM.

No Christian Church can employ a more effectnal instrument to fashion and mould the minds of her members, than the form of prayer and worship which she sanctions for daily use. The Church of Rome has not neglected this powerful means of fashioning the modes of thinking of her people; and the Brevlary, or clerical Prayer Book of the Roman Catholic Church is an unerring test of the standard to which she wishes to reduce the minds and hearts of her clergy, from the highest dignitary to the most obscure priest.

For the sake of those who are not familiar with the Service Books of the Church of Rome, we may premise that by the "Breviary" is meant the volume or volumes containing an abridgment of the divine offices appointed for the several canonical hours of each day during the course of the year. The first conception of thus abbreviating the long services nsual in the earlier ages of the Church, has been traced to Pope Gregory VII., who flourished in the second half of the 11th century. This Pope, we are told,* being overwhelmed by the multiplicity of important affairs in which he was engaged, found it necessary to curtail the long services or courses which had hitherto been customary; and, accordingly, drew up such a "Breviary" or abridgment, for his own chapel at Rome. This example was followed by the Franciscan and Dominican Orders, and by the bishops of various dioceses; so that, within no long interval of time, almost every diocese and monastery had its own Breviary, compiled and arranged according to the particular inclinations and judgments of those who drew them up. The eminent Roman Catholic ritualist, Zaccaria, enumerates more than one hundred and fifty different Breviaries which were in use in the West prior to the Reformation.†

The particular Breviary, however, which we propose to consider is not that of any obscure diocese or monastery, but that sanctioned and approved, at the present day, at Rome itself. And the value which the Church of Rome sets upon the Breviary may be known from the strictness with which she demands the perusal of it. Whoever enjoys any ecclesiastical revenue; all persons, of both sexes, who have professed in any of the regular orders; all subdeacons and priests, are bound to repeat, either in public or private, the whole service of the day, out of the Breviary. The omission, indeed, of any one of the eight portions of which that service consists, is declared to be a mortal sin—i.e., a sin that, unrepented of, would be sufficient to exclude from salvation. We have reason, also, to believe, that in some places, at least, the person guilty of such an omission loses all legal right to whatever portion of his clerical emoluments is due for the day or days in which he neglected that duty; and cannot be absolved till he has given the forfeited sums to the poor, or redeemed them by a donation to some other religions object. With such sentences and penalties, it may well be believed, that no part of the priestly duty is performed with more scrupulous exactness; and, as we are assured, the task can scarcely be performed, even with the most rapid enunciation, in less than about one hour and a half daily, it follows that if a Roman Catholic clergyman is unable, from press of other duties, as is not unfrequently the case, to devote more than that portion of his time daily to reading, his Church, virtually, places him under a practical necessity of deriving nearly his whole knowledge from the Breviary.

Valuable, indeed, should be the contents of snch a privileged volnme, if we trust the authority which thus paramountly enforces its perusal; and in it we may fairly look for the true extent of the pious belief to which she would train that portion of her flock, and the true stamp of those virtues which she boasts of as her models of Christian perfection.

We have now before us the "BREVIARIUM ROMANUM," published in Dublin, by Richard Coyne, printer and bookseller to the Royal College of Maynooth, in 1845, with the license and approbation, under his hand and seal, of the late Most Rev. Dr. Murray, dated 6th July, 1845; and which purports, in its title-page, to be published by the order of Pope Pius V., according to a decree of the Sacred Council of Trent, and afterwards sanctioned by the authority of Popes Clement VIII. and Urban VIII. We intend, in our next number, to give a little more of the history of this remarkable book. Our present business is rather with the nature of its contents; and, as it would be impossible to give an adequate idea of them in one number, we propose to continue the subject until our readers are fully acquainted with them; and shall at present only present them with a few brief extracts, without much regard to classification or even order, giving, however, as usual, the exact references to volume and page, as we have been accustomed to do in our columns.

It may facilitate our readers in finding the passages, to state that the work is in four vols. or parts, corresponding to the four seasons of the year—pars Verna, pars Æstiva, pars Autumnalis, pars Hiemalis—which we shall specify with the pages from which our extracts are taken.

On 26th May, the Feast of ST. PHILIP NERI, Confessor (pars Verna, p. 554-5), the 4th, 5th, and 6th lessons contain the history of that saint; and all faithful priests are encouraged to cultivate the love of God, by believing what is therein narrated; first praying solemnly that God would mercifully grant that they might profit by the example of his virtues (we give the prayer itself in the note).*

After narrating that St. Philip was born at Florence, and had betaken himself to Rome, where he instituted the congregation of the Oratory, the 5th lesson proceeds thus:—

"Wounded by the love of God he continually languished; and with such ardent love did his heart beat, that, when it could no longer be contained within its boundaries, the Lord miraculously enlarged his bosom, by breaking and raising up two of his ribs! Moreover, when performing the sacred offices, or fervently praying, he was sometimes seen lifted up into the air, and shining on all sides with a wonderful light!"†

That he was rescued from a pitfall by an angel (as the narrative goes on to state), and was favoured frequently with apparitions of heavenly spirits, and even of the Blessed Virgin herself, or that he saw several souls surrounded by splendour ascending into heaven, or that, having restored many sick and dying people to health, he actually recalled one dead man to life, will probably seem but commonplace and everyday occurences in comparison with the previous story, about the love of God having broken his ribs; or (what is related with equal gravity) that, in consequence of having preserved the most spotless purity, he arrived at so refined a sense of smell, that he could even distinguish those who preserved their chastity by their odour! and, of course, detect others "ex fœtore." We give the original Latin verbatim in the note.‡

On 19th October, the Feast of PETER of ALCANTARA (Pars Autumnalis, p. 402-3), the lessons are equally edifying:—

"The love of God and his neighbour diffused in his heart, after some time excited in it such a burning flame, that he was obliged to break out from the confinement of his cell into the open fields, to moderate, by the coldness of the air, the burning heat engendered in it!§ He was frequently seen suspended in the air, and shining with a wonderful effulgence! He passed over rapid rivers without wetting his feet! A staff fixed by him in the ground immediately grew up into a flourishing fig tree! While he was making a journey by night, in a heavy fall of snow, he took refuge in a ruined house without a roof, but for him the snow remained suspended in the air, and acted as a roof, that he might not be smothered by it!"‖

The manner of his passing the rivers is not particularly stated, but we may assume it was in the orthodox fashion of other saints, of whom we read in the same volumes. For instance, we find that (2nd April, Pars. Verna, p. 466) St. Francis de Paulo crossed the Strait of Sicily on his own cloak, taking another monk as a passenger!¶ So also St. Raymond de Pennafort (23rd January, Pars. Hiemalis, p. 476), who, being about to return from the island of Majorca to Barcelona, spread his cloak upon the sea, and performed the voyage of a hundred and sixty miles in six hours, finishing by entering his monastery through the closed doors! So, also, St. Hyacinth, the Pole, ferried over, in like manner, on his cloak, a number of his companions across the flooded Vistula.—(16th August, Pars. Æstiva, p. 572).††

St. ANDREW AVELLINI (10th November, Pars. Autumnalls, p. 450) seems to have been an equally useful travelling companion in his own way; for, returning home one tempestuous night, after confessing a sick man, when the rain and wind had extinguished their torch, not only neither he nor his companions were the least wet, but the whole company had the advantage of seeing their way in a pitch dark night by the radiance of the saint's person.*

ST. STANISLAUS, of Cracow, seems also to have possessed this light-emitting quality. After performing the remarkable miracle referred to in our October number, p. 118, of raising up a man who had been dead three years, as a witness, to prove that he had purchased certain lands, poor St. Stanislaus was barbarously murdered by the king, who was his enemy, and seems to have been too hardened to profit by this great miracle; and his body was quartered, and scattered about the fields. The wild beasts would have made a repast of the holy relics, but for the watchfulness of some eagles, who never allowed any of them to touch them, until the Canons of Cracow, led by the light thrown out by the scattered limbs, collected them the ensuing night! The most wondrous part of the tale remains, however, to be told, for the different parts of the body, when properly adjusted together, suddenly united as closely as kindred drops, and not a mark was left of the effects of the knife!† What a pity it was that poor Stanislaus derived no benefit from all those marvellous interpositions; for though his body was so wonderfully put together again, he seems to have been past resuscitation himself, though, to make up for it, after his death he did many miracles, no doubt equally faithworthy as those so particularly narrated,—(7th May, Pars. Æstiva, p. 321-2)

This recalls to our mind the miraculous joining together of the links of the chain of St. Peter, recorded in the Breviary lessons for the feast of St. Peter ad Vincula.—(1st August, Pars. Æstiva, p. 503.)

Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius the younger, being on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, received as a present the chain with which St. Peter was said to have been bound in prison, when he was liberated by the angel. This chain, set in jewels, was forwarded by the pious empress to her daughter, then at Rome. The young princess, rejoiced with the gift, showed the chain to the Pope, who repaid the compliment by exhibiting another chain, which the holy Apostle had borne under Nero; but no sooner had the Pope brought the two chains into contact, than lo! it came to pass, that the links at the end of the two chains miraculously became joined together, and had all the appearance of a single chain wrought by the same artificer!‡

The Pope, no doubt, at once claimed the whole, which is still to be seen as one of the standing miracles at Rome, and is occasionally held out as one of the inducements to the faithful to visit the holy city.

A somewhat similar miraculous conversion of property is recorded of another pontiff, Pope St. John.—(27 May, pars. Verna, p. 558.)

His Holiness being on a journey, near Corinth, and in want of a quiet and comfortable horse, borrowed one which the wife of a certain nobleman used to ride. The animal carried the Pope with the greatest docility, and when the journey was over, was honorably returned to its master. So wicked had the horse become, however, that he always afterwards threw his mistress, "as if," says the Breviary, "feeling indignant at having to carry a woman, since the Vicar of Christ was on his back!" It is needless to add, that the horse was subsequently presented to his Holiness as unfit to be ridden by a less dignified personage.§

Such are a few of the edifying and instructive "lessons" which every Roman Catholic priest is bound to read daily under pain of mortal sin, and taught to pray that he may emulate. Might we not venture to ask, if our readers can believe, that any intelligent or educated priest in the nineteenth century, can sincerely give credit to such old wives' fables? and if they do not believe them, how long will they submit to the humiliating indignity of reciting with their lips what they disbelieve in their hearts?

Will it be, until their intelligent and educated flocks gain courage enough (as the day is coming when they will) to ask them plainly whether they believe such things to be truths or falsehoods?

Before I proceed further, I must say a word upon a a subject which no words can ever give an adequate idea of to those who had not the misfortune to be themselves witnesses of it—I mean the famine caused by the mysterious potato blight of 1847. At least one-half of my parishioners fell victims to it, either in their own cabins or in those abbatoirs or slaughter-houses of human beings, the temporary workhouses, from which they were carted out into the churchyards, to make room for others who were to succeed them. At no period of Ireland's history had the ministers of religion more arduous and melancholy duties to discharge, with less means to alleviate the distress, of which they were the hourly witnesses. The priests were living next door to pauperism, and the clergy of the Established Church, most of whom had families to support, were impoverished by a double poor-rate unjustly charged upon their rent-charge, and scarcely better able to relieve them. I shall not stop to criticise the abortive though, doubtless, well-meant efforts of the government, to give useless employment through the Board of Works, in making skeleton roads and destroying good ones, nor to lament that the large views of that eminent man, Lord George Bentinck, to construct railroads at the public expense, were not adopted instead. In spite of every effort, practical or speculative, many poor families died off day after day, and after full one-half of them had passed into an untimely grave, I felt it my duty to advise the others to depart to the New World, whilst a remnant of property remained in their hands; and according to the accounts since received, the greater part of them now form an independent and respectable colony on the banks of the Missouri. I at the same time resigned my living into the hands of the bishop, and betook myself to reading as the only resource now left to me. The results to which this reading led me I shall now endeavour briefly to communicate, not indeed in the order in which my own mind arrived at them, which it would be difficult for me now to retrace or analyse, nor in that fullness in which they were by degrees brought out in my mind, into a clearer light, which would occupy much greater space than would be reasonable to expect at your hands, but I hope with sufficient distinctness to lead, and, perhaps, assist others to examine and reflect for themselves whether they are following truth or error in adhering to the system taught by the Church of Rome.

It was a gloomy and tempestuous evening that I took down from the bookcase a volume of Johnson's works; and, in the course of the night, met the following observation—"that, at fifty, a person should be in earnest about his religion." As I was myself approaching this age, the observation struck me with the greater force, and I awoke at once to a dreadful perception of my own danger in having thought so little of my personal state; and I determined upon a decided and impartial examination of my state of mind and, among other things, of the truth of the doctrines of the Church to which I belonged. I at once placed the catechism and the Maynooth class-book on one hand, and the Bible on the other—the great charter of man's salvation—and, having invoked the Spirit of Truth to enlighten my understanding and to dispel prejudice, I set to work according to the advice of St. Paul, 2nd of the Corinthians, chapter the 13th, and 5th verse—"Examine yourselves, whether you be in the faith. Prove your own selves." As I was resolved to examine every point seriatim and impartially, I began at the beginning, by inquiring if, as the catechism teaches, "the Church of Rome was the first Church, the matron and mistress of all other Churches," and whether the Church of Rome was founded by St. Peter.

On consulting the New Testament, which I exchanged in Paris for that veritable book called the Breviary, I found that the Churches of Corinth, of Thessalonica, of Ephesus, of Antioch, of Phillipi, together with the Churches of Galatia, were in existence, and had bishops and deacons, before there was a Church in Rome; and, consequently, the Church of Rome was not the first Church, the matron and the mistress of all other Churches.

Besides, is it not more in accordance with the nature of things that the first Churches should radiate round the theatre of the crucifixion than that an Apostle should start "tout a coup" to establish a Church in the most heathen city in Europe. Moreover, the Apostles took advantage of the miracles performed by Christ, before and after his death, to establish the first Churches in the adjacent provinces whilst the recollection of these miracles was still fresh in their memories.

St. Peter, so far from having founded the Church of Rome, probably never saw the Eternal City. St. Paul in his epistle to the Colossians, which was written from Rome (chap. iv.), mentions the names of his fellow-labourers in the vineyard of the Lord—Tychicus, Onesimus, Aristarchus, and Justus—and if St. Peter was then at Rome, surely he would not have omitted making mention of his name. St. Paul also says that no person stood by him at his first defence, which could not be if St. Peter was in Rome.

We read in the first chapter of St. Paul to the Galatians, eighteenth verse, that St. Paul abode in Jerusalem with Peter for fifteen days, and that he again met him, in the same place, after an interval of fourteen years. St. Paul salutes many persons in Rome, but does not mention St. Peter. There is, besides, one other position which must appear evident to the most sceptic, and superior to all argumentative opposition to establish that St. Peter was not at Rome. It is that the Emperor Claudius banished all Jews from Rome, and, consequently, St. Peter, if there, must have been amongst the number; but it is evident he was not, as St. Peter would sooner make mention of his name than of Aquila, whom he came to see from Athens to Corinth.

Moreover, St. Peter was an Apostle, and could not remain stationary in any one place, as Christ said to his Apostles (St. Mark xvi. 15)—"And he said unto them, Go ye into the whole world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

But, for the sake of argument, let me suppose that St. St. Peter established the Church of Rome. What security, in point of doctrine, would that confer on the Church of Rome? I say none; as it is admitted by Protestants, as well as by Romanists, that the Church of Antioch was founded by St. Peter, yet that the Church of Antioch fell, not merely in matters of discipline, but into errors of the most vital importance in point of doctrine. From what has been said, and proved by the infallible authority of the Word of God, I found that the Church of Rome was not the first Church, the matron and mistress of all other Churches; and although the proofs that the Scripture affords to establish that St. Peter was not the founder of the Roman Church are negative, still these proofs are equivalent to positive proofs, when the contrary is not supported by positive and direct evidence.

The next question I had to inquire into was, what was the creed the first Churches professed? I found the Apostolic creed to be the first and only creed of the primitive Catholic Church for 300 years after the death of our Redeemer. In the year 325, I found that the Council of Nice augmented the Apostle's creed, and made it more explanatory, and, of course, more easy of comprehension, by its interpretation. The acts of this council were confirmed by the Council of Constantinople, held in the year 351. The Council of Ephesus, held in 431, approved and confirmed the decrees of Nice and Constantinople; and, to crown all, I find that the Council of Chalcedon had sanctioned the proceedings of Nice, Constantinople, and Ephesus, in the year 451. L'ecriture et les symboles sont les temoignages des premiers chretiens et de l'Eglise qu'ils forment. The nearer we approach the times of the Apostles and their successors, the purer must the doctrine be; just as the nearer we come to the head of a fountain the more limpid the water. Notwithstanding the anathema pronounced by the Council of Ephesus against those who shall dare to alter, add, or take from this creed, yet we find Pope Pius IV. adding twelve new articles to the ancient creed, in the year 1564, and six commandments, which are explained more frequently by the priests, and considered of even more importance, than the commandments of God.

Every question which involves the momentous interest of man's salvation should be investigated with all the energy of the heart and soul; but, at the same time, with that calm and deliberate attention which a subject of such importance eminently deserves. The Mass is a grave subject, and of paramount and everlasting practical Importance to the salvation of man, according to the doctrine of the Church of Rome, and deserves, therefore, to be inquired into with grave consideration. Let us, then, follow the advice of the Prophet Isaiah, c. 1, v. 18—"Come now and let us reason together." The doctrine of the Church of Rome is—that in the Mass there is offered to God a true, proper, and propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead, and that the sacrifice of the Mass is the same as the sacrifice of the Last Supper; and that in the Eucharist there are truly, really, and substantially the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and that there is made a conversion of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and of the whole substance of the wine into the blood, which conversion is called Transubstantiation—Trent, Session 13.

There are here three important questions to be examined. The first is, Is the Mass a propitiatory sacrifice for the living and the dead? The second is, Was the Lord's Supper a sacrifice? And the third is, Are the bread and wine converted, by the sacerdotal action, into the body and blood of Christ? Let us examine each of these questions seriatim, and with that cool and deliberate attention which they deserve, as they are of cardinal importance to man's salvation, according to the doctrine of Trent. As these questions are bare allegations of the Council of Trent, unsupported by a single scintilla of proof, the burthen of proving them rests on the Church which asserts them, and not on its opponents to disprove them. But I will here state some reasons, taken from Scripture, which afford proof that the Mass is not a propitiatory sacrifice. We read in Leviticus, c. xvii., v. 11, "For it is blood that makes atonement for the soul." This doctrine of the Old Scripture is confirmed by that of St. Paul (Hebrews, ix. 22), "And without shedding of blood there is no remission of sin." We find also, in the same epistle, c. vii., v. 27, "Who needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifices, for this he did once." Again, we read in the same epistle, c. 10, v. 12, "But this man, after he offered one sacrifice for sin, for ever sat down on the right hand of God." Therefore, as our Saviour offered but one sacrifice, that was the sacrifice of Calvary, it follows that there is no propitiatory sacrifice in the Mass, nor the smallest necessity for it, as the atonement of the cross was all-sufficient, and the most august that was ever offered to an offended deity. Besides, the Apostle speaks in this entire chapter in the singular number, which he would not have done if the future Mass was to be propitiatory, and ancillary to the sacrifice of the cross.

The next question is, Was there a sacrifice at the Last Supper? I answer, most certainly not. The above proofs are equally applicable to the Lord's Supper, and prove that it was not a sacrifice. Moreover, there was no sacrificial act performed, there was no altar, no victim offered, no blood spilled. Christ was simply at table, surrounded by his disciples, to whom he gave bread and wine, as a lasting memorial of his love for them, and, therefore, there was no propitiatory sacrifice at the Last Supper.

The third question to be examined is, Are the elements of bread and wine changed by the sacerdotal agency into the body and blood of Christ? To which I answer, hear the proofs from Holy Writ, and judge for yourself. We read in the xxii. chap., 19th and 20th verses of St. Luke—"And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying—This is my body which is given for you. This do in remembrance of me. Likewise, also, the cup, after supper, saying—This cup is the New Testament in my blood which is shed for you." The Church of Rome, on the authority of the bishops of Trent, maintains that the word "is," in the 19th verse, should be taken literally, and that Christ actually converted the bread and wine into his own body and blood, and gave them to his Apostles.

In innumerable passages of the Old and New Scripture, the monosyllable "is" is taken to mean "represents." In the 17th chap. and 10th verse of Genesis, where God was speaking of the circumcision, says—"This is my covenant." It must appear evident to every person that the circumcision was not transubstantiated into the covenant, but that it must be taken in a figurative sense, and only as a memorial of the covenant. In the 12th chap. of Exodus we read, when God was speaking of the lamb that was sacrificed in memory of the passing over the houses of the Israelites and smiting the first-born amongst the Egyptians—"It is the Lord's passover." Here also the word "is" must be taken as represent, as the lamb could not be transubstantiated into the passover. I could multiply proofs from the Old Scripture where that monosyllable "is" must be taken to mean represent. But as proofs from the New Scripture seem to have more weight with most people, let us come to it, and see if it is so in that also. In the 13th chap. of St. Matthew, v. 37, our Saviour says—"He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man." In verse 38 of the same chapter, he says—"The field is the world." And in the 39th verse, same chapter—"The harvest is the end of the world." And St. Paul, speaking of the Church, says—"It is the body of Christ." Now, as the monosyllable, is, must be taken figuratively to have any meaning in all those passages, it follows, as analogous, that "is" must be taken in a figurative sense, and to mean represent, in the 22nd chap. 19th verse of St. Luke, where we read—"This is my body." Besides, was it not thus the institution of the Lord's Supper was taken in the early ages, when the religion of Christ was inculcated in its sublime simplicity, and before the doctrine of Transubstantiation was propounded by Paschasius-Radbert—an abbot of the ninth century.

There is another argument taken from the nature of things which places this question beyond the reach of argument and scepticism, and is, I believe, de la premiere main, to which I take leave to call the reader's attention. The properties of all created things are either contingent or essential; the contingent properties—such as colour, shape, or particular configuration—cannot subsist by themselves without a subject of adhesion; but the essential and vital properties are necessarily constituent, and without which no subject can subsist; whereas the contingent properties do not of necessity appertain to any object. Thus, a circle must be equidistant from its centre, as rotundity is the essential property of a circle; but that circle may be large or small, as these are accidental properties. A man cannot exist without lungs, blood-vessels, muscle, and tendons; but he can be black or white, short or tall, as these are only contingent properties. The essential properties of things are truths existing from eternity, and are founded in the nature of things, and are immutable and intransitive. That it is in the power of man to change the accidental properties of things cannot be denied; but no known agency can either commute or annihilate the essential and constituent attributes of things. There was no antecedent time, nor will there be a future time, when it was or will be true that things could exist without their essential and distinctive properties. Buffon, in his theory of the earth, when speaking upon this subject, says (page 364, vol. ii.)—"Aucun agent connu ne sera jamais capable de faire sortir les propriétés du circle de combinaisons propres a leur nature." I am not here to be understood as limiting the power of him who does all things well, as God could annihilate all things with their essential and accidental properties; but, as soon as anything is created, it must of necessity possess its vital and essential attributes, because it is founded in the nature of things.

Bread and wine must have their essential and elementary properties in common with all created things, and must retain their immutable and intransitive character, independent of any external agency. Besides this metaphysical argument, we find the same substantial identity after the sacerdotal action as before. We have a metaphysical certainty arising from the nature of things, that no subject can exist without its peculiar and distinctive properties. The evidence of our senses establishes the same identity after the ministerial agency; and, to crown all, the omniscience of God confirms both, as He knew that the nature of created things could not be altered; and, consequently, he must have spoken figuratively. What weight can the Council of Trent have when placed in juxta-position with the above proofs? Yet, in her 13th session, she pronounces an entire conversion of the elementary properties of bread and wine.

Perhaps it will be objected to me that He who created the heavens and the earth—the fixed stars with their concomitant planets, all things visible and invisible, who changed the rod of Moses into a serpent, who changed Lot's wife into a pillar of salt, who changed the river of Egypt into blood, and the water into wine at the marriage feast of Cana—could change the elementary properties of bread and wine into his own body and blood, by a miraculous interposition. To this I answer, that a miracle is a suspension of the natural law to promote a moral advantage. All these miraculous changes were intuitively, and by immediate perception, apparent to the senses of every person present, and reason bowed in affirmation to their decision. But, in the case of Transubstantiation, there must be not only a suspension of the natural law but an entire subversion of the fundamental principles of physics—an entire prostration of the senses, with marks of no confidence stamped upon their creation. But in order to have a parallel case with Transubstantiation, the wine, at the wedding feast, should still have retained, after its conversion, the colour and taste of water, together with all its pure and elementary properties, instead of satisfying, as it did, the combined energies of the senses of all who witnessed it, that a real change had taken place, from actual water into actual wine, with all the qualities of taste, colour, and smell naturally incident to it.

From these proofs, taken from the sacred Scripture, it must appear evident that there was but one propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of mankind, and that was the sacrifice of Calvary. That there was no sacrifice at the last supper appears from the same proofs, and that no change has, or could be effected by the sacerdotal action, so as to transubstantiate a particle of dough into the God of the universe.

How melancholy, then, is the reflection, that so many, who profess the religion of Rome, run on from the cradle to the tomb without inquiring if they are following the religion of Christ and him crucified, or without ever opening the Bible—the great charter of man's salvation, which, in every page, points out the way to eternal life. How true to life was that remark of Addison, which says—"If you tell the same story to a man for several years consecutively he will believe it to be true in the end." This observation is confirmed by the conduct of the followers of Rome, who hear their priests say, every week, that the mass is a continuation of the sacrifice of the cross, and that the bread and wine are changed into the body and blood of Christ, without ever inquiring into the truth of this doctrine, which is entirely refuted by the teaching of the New Scripture.

If we compare the worship of Roman Catholics of the present day, though to them the light of revelation has been made known, even with the simple, yet sublime, homage of the uneducated Indians of Peru, what a melancholy contrast! They worshipped the sun—the parent of life and vegetation, of time and seasons, of all things visible, yet unapproachable. What more solid foundation to build natural religion upon? A perpetual fire burned on the altar of the Indians. What a beautiful representation of their divinity! This sun worship seems to have been widely spread, and was known to the Phœnicians, Chaldeans, Babylonians, and even to the Irish people in their natural state. A fractional remnant of this untaught religion may even still be seen in this island, when fires are lit when the sun is at its highest altitude at the summer solstice. Possibly this adoration of the Indian was only secondary, but at any rate it was the sublime poetry—the dignified and refined religion—of nature's uneducated children. Place this pure, sublime, and ætherial homage of uneducated Pagans in contrast with that of modern Roman Catholics, and how great is the difference? The former adored the parent of life, the latter a particle of dough. As rational and accountable beings, I shudder for the consequences. Idolatry though unconscious is still idolatry. If Transubstantiation be an error, as I have demonstrated it to be, what must be the guilt of those in the sight of God, who, in spite of both their reason and their senses, persist in practising a mimic and idolatrous adoration.

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XXVI.

"Them's hard times, Jem," said Pat.

"That's true anyway, Pat," said Jem; "it's not easy keeping the meal to the children these times. But sure we have a right to be thankful it's no worse."

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "I heard Mr. Nulty talking of that, and he allowed that if the crops was short this year, it's the famine we would have back again; so we have a right to be thankful sure enough."

"And it's the poor thing, too, that the Rooshians with their fighting, should stint the childer of the meal," said Jem; "I wonder will it soon be over."

"Well, I heard Mr. Nulty allow it wouldn't," said Pat; "and he allowed there would be mighty heavy taxes on the farmers and the gentlemen to pay for it; so you see all gets their pinch by it as well as we."

"Well, it's not bad times yet with the farmers," said Jem; "they're pretty snug for a while anyway. But I suppose they will get their turn of the pinch too."

"Well, most all comes in for it by turns," said Pat; "but there's some getting the pinch sore enough these years back, that there isn't much said of."

"And who would that be?" said Jem.

"Why it's the priests, Jem," said Pat; "sure it's they got the pinch in earnest in the famine times, and hasn't come round yet like the farmers."

"Well," said Jem, "I don't think times is hard on Father John, and sure there's Father Peter, the curate, and Father Brady of the next parish, and enough more of them, that keeps their hunters as fine as ever."

"Well, there's some of them not much the worse," said Pat; "but even Father John hasn't near what he had; and there's a deal of the priests that got it sore in the famine times, and that isn't much better yet; you see, Jem, where the farms is good, and the farmers strong, the priest gets his share now as well as ever; but where the priests were depending to the little man, it went to the bad with them entirely. Sure the poor people can't pay them now the way they used; and there isn't the marrying and the christening there used to be; and there's a deal of places where the poor people itself isn't in it; and what can the priest do there? and where there's large Protestant grazing farms, and the poor people's houses down, sure the priest may go starve."

"Well, it's the poor thing, sure enough," said Jem, "for them that was bred to be clargy, and had such a rule in the country, to come to that. Sure they can't do without it no more nor ourselves, and they're not used to it; and it doesn't come natural to clargy, the way it does to the like of us. Sure I would be sorry for Father John himself, if he was at a dis-short; but it makes again them greatly when some of them keeps their hunters, and goes a skevying across the country after the hounds; 'deed I thought many a time it would be no worse for them if they would take after the Prosestant clergy in that. But what becomes of them at all where they gets nothing?"

"Well, I heard a deal about that, when I was down at the fairs in Connaught," said Pat. "I was talking to the men that driv up the cattle from the out-of-the-way places, and they allowed there wasn't half the priests in it there used to be; and them that was there had little enough to live on; and maybe it's getting less was the little."

"And where are the priests that's not in it?" said Jem.

"Why, there's some in America, and some in Australia," said Pat.

"Well, sure if they follow the people, won't they do as well as ever?" said Jem.

"They won't, Jem," said Pat; "by all accounts the people isn't the same in America as they is here. Don't you mind Father Mullen's letter that we read in the newspaper* that made it out that two millions of the Irish had turned in America. Sure it isn't them the priests can live by. You see, Jem, America is a kind of place where every man does what he likes."

"Well, I wonder why people doesn't do what they like in Ireland, as well as in America," said Jem; "but, sure enough, they don't; what's the reason at all?"

"Well, I had a talk about that, with a man that drove up the sheep that Mr. Nulty bought at Ballinasloe," said Pat; "he was a mighty cute sensible man; and we fell into talk, and I asked him that very same; and says he, 'do you mind them sheep,' says he; 'now, while you keep them together on the road, where the one goes, they'll all go,' says he, 'and you'll just have no trouble at all; but, if you wonst let them get one in one field, and another in another field, why, then, every sheep goes after its own nose, and no two goes the same way; and its the more they'll scatter,' says he, 'and the harder on you to gather them; and that's the way with men, too,' says he; 'keep them together, and they'll go the one way; but, once they scatter, then every man goes the way he likes, and no man thinks no more about what every body does; so you mind the sheep and keep them all together,' says he."

"And will the Irish people go the one way for ever in Ireland, without minding the way they would like to go?" said Jem.

"Why, man alive," said Pat, "don't you see yourself, if a bully of a sheep just makes a bolt at the hedge, all the rest goes bolt after him too; and sure it's in the field they will be in spite of you. Sure it's in the field they would all like to be; and, when the bully goes, won't they be after him?"

"Aye," said Jem, "I see that surely; but where will we get the right sort of bully in Ireland? Sure it's sheep we are, but there isn't the bullies in it."

So Pat looked Jem right hard in the face, as if he was going to be the bully to make the bolt himself—only he wasn't. So said Pat, looking as hard as he could, "Jem, it's a right bully of a priest I would like to see, of the right sort; and wouldn't he have the following?"

"And what would you have him to do, at all? said Jem.

So Pat looked harder at Jem than ever; and he said, with a fire that seemed to be dancing in his eye, "Jem, as I'm a living man, there's a something afore us in Ireland; and a PRIEST, with THE BIBLE in his hand, is what Ireland wants."

"And would you have him to turn, and have the bishop on his back?" said Jem.

"I don't want him to turn neither backward nor forward," said Pat, "but to hold up the Douay Bible in his hand, and to call on the Irish people; that's the man that Ireland's waiting for, and that's the man for the following; and it isn't the bishop on his back he need think about, for it's Ireland he will have at his back."

"And would he be a Protestant all out, Pat?" said Jem.

"Well, that isn't so easy seen, Jem," said Pat. "You see, if a man quits the Mass, and goes to Church, he changes his name plain enough; but, if a priest only stands up in the chapel, and holds up a Douay Bible in his hand, and says, 'Boys, it's the Word of God that is able to save our souls,' it isn't so easy seen if that makes them all Protestants. Anyway, it's not as plain as a man walking, by himself alone, out of the chapel into the church."

"Aye, but where would that stop, Pat?" said Jem.

"It wouldn't stop short of the Word of God, Jem," said Pat; "and why should it; and who could say again it. Who could stop it, at all? Neither crook nor crozier, if that bolt was made by the right bully. Wouldn't all Ireland turn round to the priest with the Bible in his hand?"

"And will the like of that ever be, Pat?" said Jem.

"Jem," said Pat, "there has been trouble from God in Ireland. His hand done it. There was trouble on the people, and trouble on the priest. And it's not for nothing. The hearts of the people is stirred, like what they never was before; and there seems to be something that the hearts of the people wants; and it can't be nothing but the Word that comes from God. There's a something afore us; and it's THE MAN we're waiting on."

Time will tell if Pat has rightly comprehended the feeling of poor men like himself. And, perhaps, "the man," when he comes, may look back to the words of Pat.

THE OLD IRISH CLERGY.

No. IV.

WE have been obliged by press of other matter, so long to postpone the following paper, that it may be necessary to remind our readers, that we have already shown in former numbers,* that so far from the celibacy of the clergy having always prevailed in Ireland, for many centuries of our history, ecclesiastical benefices descended in this Island of Saints from one member of a family to another (often from father to son or grandson), much in the same way, as did secular landed property, according to the old Irish law or custom, known by the name of Tanistry.

We showed, that from A.D. 753 to A.D. 1134, the same custom prevailed through 12 generations at Clonmacnoise, that it also prevailed for a period of 300 years in the churches of Lusk, Monasterboice, Iona, Derry, Kildare, Armagh, and many others.

We concluded our last paper, by noticing the strange contrast between the accounts given of the death of Murtogh, A.D. 1134, by the Irish Annalists, the Four Masters, and St. Bernard, in his life of Malachy.

According to the former, "Murtogh, successor of St. Patrick, died penitent—yea, triumphant." According to the latter, "Murtogh—no bishop but a tyrant, an ecclesiastical adulterer, went from this world to be damned; yet still, to live in an heir, provided for the purpose of adding to his deeds of damnation!"

The quiet remark of the very learned Father Colgan, on this curious difference between St. Bernard and the Irish Annalists, is to the following effect:—"St. Bernard," says he, (speaking of Primate Niall,) "is more severe on this individual than are our native Annals;" which Dr. O'Donovan quotes in his "Annals of the Four Masters" (A.D. 1139, p. 1062, note b.) as "a very appropriate remark." We do not however, think it so. It would not appear to us at all an appropriate remark to say, "Dr. MacHale is more severe on the Achill Scripture-readers than the Protestant clergy are." It would rather seem a stupid remark, and likely to have come from some one who did not understand the matter, or know how to represent it fairly; because the Protestant clergy are not at all severe on the readers, but countenance and favour them. So neither are the Irish Annalists anywhere, or in anyway, severe on Primate Niall or his family, any more than on their opponent Maelmogue and his helpers. On the contrary, they speak of them as they do of all the good and pious men whom they notice generally, and mention their deaths as those of any other ordinary ecclesiastical persons, whether the earlier successors of St. Patrick, or any other of the ancient worthies of the Irish Church.

Father Colgan, on the other hand (although, perhaps, not having looked into the facts brought forward in these papers in their full connection, and in the accurate way in which we have endeavoured to present them to the reader), appears to have been sorely perplexed and distressed at the evidence furnished in the "Annals," of the fact that the old Irish clergy, including those of the highest rank and eminence among them—culdees, bishops, abbots, &c.—were commonly married men, and in so far nothing different from those reforming bishops and clergymen (Geo. Browne, of Dublin, &c.), who, in the time of Queen Mary and Cardinal Pole, were branded as adulterers, and put out of their Sees, for having married wives, according to the permission of the Lord by his holy Apostles. Father Colgan, therefore, labours with much ado to confuse what is in itself so plain and intelligible; seeking, if possible, to dissipate the force of the evidence in question. In order to enable the reader to see what so learned a person, of such views, is able to make of the case, it will be best to let Colgan speak for himself; and we shall, accordingly, for this purpose, set forth here his statement of the matter, though rather a long one, in full, as follows:—

"As to what he (i.e., St. Bernard) says concerning the hereditary usurpation of that See (i.e., Armagh) for some fifteen generations, provided it be rightly understood, I regard it as being either wholly true, or very near the truth, and can show this to be the case. For by a generation, he doth not (as some erroneously understand it,) mean the age of one man, nor even the space of twenty years, much less a full century (seeing that Christianity itself was not so old as that in Bernard's day), but either the succession of one bishop to another of the same family (for, as I shall demonstrate presently, we find fifteen such generations or successions of bishops of one family, actually on record); or, at least, by a generation he understands the age at which the period of generating begins, which is, in men, that of fourteen years—as is to be inferred from his own adding immediately after, 'who had now for about 200 years kept possession of the sanctuary of God.' Therefore, by some fifteen generations he means only about 200 years. And that such a sort of hereditary succession did continue for so many years, or more, is to me evident from two reasons—

"First, Because the aspect of the Irish Church, which, from the year of Christ 440, to about the year 840, had been in a most flourishing condition, and, for so long, second to no other in Europe, began gradually to alter for the worse, for the course of some 200 years then following, during which, in engagements, fightings, and conflicts—not of annual, but almost monthly, and, at times, of daily occurrence—was spent the period of that unceasing warfare between the Irish and the ferocious, and then dominant, race of the Normans—i.e., the Norwegians and the Danes, and other adjacent clans—who, not content with their own vast extent of territory, conquered and subjugated England, Scotland, and the rest of the British Isles, and some of the maritime districts of Gaul, burning and destroying with pagan fury the dwellings of clergy and laity, their churches and cities, and occupying for themselves certain ports and maritime towns. These tedious disasters having reached their close, and the Normans having been beaten and slaughtered in the battle of Clontarf in the year 1013, another trouble succeeded, which was no less ruinous to the whole country and its Church's discipline and religion. The princes of the realm, engaging in quarrels relative to the chief supremacy, which occasioned constant battling from the year 1013 to 1105, and subsequently, Church discipline and religious influences received so severe a shock as well nigh annihilated them; until, at length, in that year, 1105, St. Celsus having been created Archbishop of Armagh, did his utmost for the restoring of piety from her exile, and discipline from the neglect into which she had fallen. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at, if, in such disastrous times, some powerful family, especially the one which had bestowed various lands on the erection and endowment of the See of Armagh, made an effort to have prelates of their own tribe appointed to that See, and in this way to possess, as if by hereditary right, the sanctuary of God.

"The second argument which I promised above, not only establishes the credibility of that hereditary succession of prelates in the same family, but even seems to demonstrate the fact of its having really existed. For (as it appears from what has been already said in this Chronological Catalogue), from the year 925 (in which, on the death of St. Maelbride, son of Tornan, Joseph succeeded as Bishop of Armagh,) to the year 1129, (in which St. Celsus, the last of them, died,) fifteen bishops of the same family are found to have succeeded one another for the space of about 200 years, as is clearly evident from the following catalogue of them, according to the order of their succession, and the years in which, respectively, they died:—

"Maelpatrick, son of Maeltila, died the same year (925), having sat for nine months.
"Casey, son of Alcheus, died A.D. 946.
"Murray deposed, and Dudalehe, son of Kellach, substituted in his stead, an. 965.
"Murechan occupies the See, an. 993.
"Maelmury, son of Scanlan, died 994.
"Maelmury, son of Hoey, 1020.
"Awley, 1049.
"Dudalehe, son of Maelmury, 1064.
"Cumuscach, 1075.
"Melisa, son of Awley, 1091.
"Donald, son of Awley, 1105
"S. Celsus, son of Hugh, son of Melisa, died an. 1129.

"Now, from these entries we deduce that fifteen bishops of the same family did, for the space of about 200 years, retain possession, as by hereditary right, of the See of Armagh, as S. Bernard states. For from that powerful family was descended S. Celsus himself, who, happily degenerating from the unprincipled custom of his kindred, alienated the sanctuary of God from his own family to S. Malachy; for he was grandson to Melisa, Prelate of Armagh (by his son Hugh), of whom above, as is inferred from the remarks already made at A.D. 1105. It appears further, from the same entries, taken in connection with what else has been said above in this catalogue, that the statement is either true, or nearly true, which is contained in the words of S. Bernard afore-cited—viz., that there were eight before Celsus (i.e., styled Prelates of Armagh) who were married men, and without orders, but, however, men of education. For of these eight married and unordained persons were Murechan, father of Murray, Prior of Armagh, of whom above, at A.D. 986; Maelmurry, son of Hoey, father of Dudalehe, another bishop of Armagh, of whom above, at A.D. 1064; Dudalehe himself, father to Hugh, Archdeacon [rather vice-erenach] of Armagh, of whom above, at A.D. 1108; Awley, father to Melisa and Donald, Prelates of Armagh, of whom [we have spoken] at A.D. 1091, 1105; Melisa, father to Flannagan, of whom at A.D. 1114; Donald, father of that pseudo-bishop [Murtogh, or] Maurice, who, supported by the secular power, thrust himself into the place of Celsus, according to what we shall state presently. The other three appear to have been, Murray, 965; Dudalehe II., son of Kellach, who was substituted in Murray's place; and Cumuscach, who died in the year 1075.

"Hence, then, arose all that relaxation of Church discipline, powerlessness of censures, and annihilation of religion, above complained of by S. Bernard. Yet were there, in the time of these pseudo-bishops, others legitimately ordained, who, acting as their suffragans, did perform episcopal offices in the diocese of Armagh—as Casey, son of Murchadan, who died A.D. 966; Arvey, son of Cosgry, 1006; Maelmury, son of Hoey, A.D. 1020; Maeltila, 1032; Hugh Ua Forrey, 1056; and Kencorach, who died A.D. 1106.

"But you will say first, that some of the aforesaid persons enumerated by us among the married prelates, are described as having closed a laudable career by distinguished penitence; as Dudalehe the 2nd, who died June 2, A.D. 998; Dudalehe the 3rd, September 1, 1064, Melisa, December 20, 1091; Donald, son of Awley, who died August 2, A.D. 1105; and that they ought not, therefore, to be reckoned among the pseudo-bishops, or married men. I answer, that this inference doth not hold; for even Murtogh (who, after having seen S. Malachy elected before himself, according to the will of S. Celsus, and by the votes of the clergy and laity, still thrust himself, by the aid of the secular power, into the same See) is described afterwards as having ended his days in laudable penitence. And why should not Christian men, observing the sins and errors of their past life, have recourse to laudable penance at its close?

"You will say, secondly, that Prelate Awley administered the sacrament of Extreme Unction to Malachy, King of Ireland, when dying, in the year 1022; and that he, therefore, should not be enumerated among the married men.

"I answer, that we nowhere read of Awley's having administered the sacrament of Extreme Unction to King Malachy; but only that King Malachy was anointed in his hands. But that Awley begat two sons—viz., Melisa and Donald, who were afterwards numbered among the prelates of Armagh, is a matter evident enough from what is aforesaid. We must rather, therefore, class him with the married and unordained prelates, of whom S. Bernard speaks, than suppose him, contrary to the dignity of his position, and all right views of his order, to have begotten children by adultery and sacrilege. And seeing that, even in the present day, when ecclesiastical discipline is more strictly enforced than it has been for many ages past, we may observe in Germany, and various other countries of Europe, many persons numbered among the bishops, archbishops, and even cardinals, who have never been admitted to the sacred orders corresponding to such office, who can wonder, that in those ages of turbulence, amid so many tempests of wars, many should come to be numbered among the archbishops of the Church, who had received no sacred orders?"—Colgan's Trias Thaumaturga; Septima Appendix ad Acta S. Patricii, p. 301, col. 2, seq.

Such is the extraordinary account of the matter given by this most learned Roman Catholic writer. It is one, however, which will not stand examining very closely, as we shall easily prove to the reader.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER, 1854.

SINCE our last number appeared, an event has taken place which is full of import to the Christian world. Although we have not yet received actual intelligence of it, we may assume that on Friday, the 8th of December, the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception has been decided as an article of faith in the Roman Catholic Church.

Perhaps no fact of greater importance to Christendom has taken place in our day; for it brings to a point, and it brings under our own view, the great question which so long has distracted the Christian world.

The great question has been, whether the Church of Rome has preserved unchanged the faith which Christ and his Apostles delivered to the world.

If the Church of Rome has preserved that faith unchanged, then all who differ from her must be wrong; but if the Church of Rome has changed that faith, then to "contend for the faith once delivered to the saints" is the duty of all who will follow the blessed Apostles as they followed Christ.

This great question has been argued in reference to many particulars, in respect of which it is said that the Church of Rome has formerly altered her faith; but these alterations are said to have taken place many centuries ago; and it is, perhaps, not easy for plain people to judge about past events with the same certainty with which they judge of the events which happen in their own day, and within their own knowledge. But now the question, whether the Church of Rome has preserved the Apostles' faith unchanged since the Apostles' days, must be argued upon a fact which is actually taking place while we write these pages.

The Council of Trent professed to deliver nothing concerning matters of faith but what had been handed down unchanged from the time of the Apostles. Speaking of the purity of the Gospel, that Council says, "seeing that this truth is contained in written books and unwritten traditions, which, being received by the Apostles from the mouth of Christ himself, or delivered by the Apostles as with their own hands, at the dictation of the Holy Spirit, have come down even to us. . . . . Moreover, these traditions, whether pertaining to faith or morals, it (the Council) receives with equal affection of piety and reverence, and venerates, as being dictated by word of mouth, either by Christ or the Holy Spirit, and preserved in the Catholic Church by continual succession."*

And when they come to declare their doctrine

* "Perspicuous hanc veritatem et disciplinam contineri in libris scriptis, et sine scripto traditionibus, quæ ipsius Christi ore ab Apostolis acceptæ, aut ab ipsis Apostolis, Spiritu Sancto dictante, quasi per manus traditæ, ad nos usque pervenerunt. . . . . Necnon traditiones ipsas, cum ad fidem, tum ad mores pertinentes, tanquam vel ore tenus a Christo, vel a Spiritu Sancto dictatas, et continua successione in Ecclesiâ Catholicâ conservatas, pari pietatis affectu ac reverentia suscipit et veneratur."—Sess. quarta.

on particular points, they profess to do it on the principles above laid down. Thus, they teach their doctrine of justification as being that "which Jesus Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, the author and finisher of our faith, taught, which the Apostles delivered, and the Catholic Church, at the suggestion of the Holy Spirit, always retained."* And so in all their doctrines they profess to teach nothing else but what Christ himself taught, the Apostles delivered, and the Church always held.

It is true that Protestants deny that all their doctrines were so delivered. For instance, they say it is hard to see how the words "I absolve thee," could have been instituted by Christ himself as the form of a sacrament, when no trace is found of those words in the Church for a thousand years, as shown in another column of our paper. But still this fact remains, that the Council of Trent professed to teach nothing but what had been taught and delivered by Christ and his Apostles, and always held in the Church. This is a great fact, which should be carefully attended to now. This principle of taking the whole faith from the actual teaching of Jesus Christ and his Apostles, handed down either by writing or by tradition, has the supposed infallible sanction of a Pope and a general council.

But now this principle itself is about to be given up.

It is not merely that a new article is to be added to the faith of the Church of Rome, but the principle itself is to be abandoned, that Christ is the author and the FINISHER of the faith; that everything ought to be drawn from what He taught and the Apostles delivered. We shall call attention to both these points as we proceed.

That the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, although believed as an opinion by many Roman Catholics, has never yet been held as a matter of faith by the Church of Rome, is very easily proved; for it is, in fact, confessed.

St. Bernard, in the 12th century, declared that the doctrine was then newly invented, without any tradition to support it, but founded on a false revelation.

In the year 1483, Pope Sixtus IV. forbid any one to call those heretics who denied the Immaculate Conception; and for this reason—"Because it has not yet been decided by the Roman Church and the Apostolic See."

The Dominicans, one of the orders of the Church of Rome, always denied this doctrine.

The Council of Trent expressly declared that they did not decide on this doctrine; and they expressly renewed the above decree of Pope Sixtus IV.

The Roman Catholic Bishop Milner, in England, declared, not forty years ago, "The Church does not decide the controversy concerning the conception of the Blessed Virgin."†

And the present Pope declared, about five years ago, "This honour has not yet been decreed to the most Holy Virgin by the Church and the Apostolic See."

We have given these authorities fully in vol. 1, p. 20, and again in vol. 3, pp. 96, 97, and none of our correspondents has ever ventured to deny or question any of them.

Thus, we may fairly take it as confessed, that this doctrine is new; never before established by the Church of Rome.

It is true that many Roman Catholics have believed in the Immaculate Conception; but, then, they held it as an opinion of their own, not as the doctrine of their Church. They were equally at liberty to deny it, if they thought fit. So Doctor Milner says expressly, "The Church leaves her children to form their own opinions concerning it." This makes the difference between the opinions of individuals, and the doctrine of a Church.

But now, this doctrine is to be made an article of faith in the Church of Rome.

As the doctrines authorized by Rome stood a week ago, a man who denied this doctrine, and denounced it as false and unholy, as St. Bernard did, might die and go to heaven, where, we hope, St. Bernard is; but if that man does not now immediately change his opinion, he must certainly be damned, for denying an article of the Roman faith.

So the Roman faith is changing, or has changed, within the last week, under our very eyes.

But it is not merely the change in the faith of the Church of Rome, that makes this decision so important. It has changed THE PRINCIPLE which lies at the root of all faith.

Hitherto, as we have seen from the Council of Trent, the Church of Rome professed to hold no doctrine but what Christ taught to his Apostles, and the Apostles delivered to the Church. Pope Pius IX. and his assembled bishops, by adopting as an article of Catholic faith what is confessed not to have been taught by Christ, or delivered by his Apostles, have now virtually renounced this principle.

We say this is confessed. It is explicitly confessed by Bishop Milner, when he says "the Church sees nothing absolutely clear and certain concerning it, either in the written or unwritten word, and, therefore, leaves her children to form their own opinions concerning it."

It was confessed by Pope Sixtus IV., when he said, "it has not yet been decided by the Roman Church and the Apostolic See." It was virtually confessed by the present Pope, when he said, "this honour has not yet been decreed to the Most Holy Virgin by the Church and the Apostolic See."

If the Church of Rome now believes that the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception was taught by Christ, and delivered by the Apostles to the Church, how can she defend HERSELF for allowing her members full liberty to disbelieve it for 1850 years?

It must, therefore, be confessed that this doctrine was not taught by Christ, nor delivered by his Apostles.

Whoever now adopts this doctrine as an article of the faith, does thereby abandon and reject the principle that faith must be limited to the teaching of Christ.

We know that some have done so already. Dr. Newman, the much-boasted convert, has actually published a book, in which he openly avows that some of the present doctrines of the Church of Rome were not taught by Christ and his Apostles, and cannot be proved either by Scripture or tradition; and that no such proof is required for doctrines sanctioned by infallible authority.

Until now this principle has not been adopted by the Church of Rome; but now, as we have shown, this principle is both adopted and acted on by the Pope and his assembled bishops.

This is the most fearful step ever yet taken by the Church of Rome.

It is one which calls on every member, and every priest, of that Church, to consider his position.

We know that there are many priests who were shocked at Mr. Newman's startling doctrine, and at the reception which he, and his doctrines, met with in high quarters.

An able Roman Catholic Review in America (Brownson's) exposed and condemned that book, and had great support in doing so.

What are those priests to do now, when the principle of that book is adopted and acted on in matters of faith?

We trust that there are many priests who have hitherto sincerely believed that they were teaching nothing but what Christ taught, and his Apostles delivered. What are those priests to do now, when they see a new article of faith concocted before their eyes, which it is impossible to believe was taught by Christ and his Apostles?

If they will have a good conscience towards God, they must adhere to what they believe that Christ and his Apostles taught.

Solemnly, earnestly, affectionately, we call on the Roman Catholic priests of Ireland to consider this question.

Did Christ teach the Immaculate Conception to the Apostles?

Did the Apostles deliver it to the Churches?

Can it be shown that this doctrine was ever heard of in the Church for a thousand years?

If Christ taught, and the Apostles delivered it, how came it to be so long unknown? How came it that it was never yet established in the Church of Rome?

If not so taught, can any one now make it a part of "the faith once delivered to the saints?"

If these questions need a discussion, our pages are open for it; if this doctrine can be shown to come from the teaching of Christ, then, in the name of God, let all our readers be convinced of it; but if this cannot even be attempted, then, in the name of God, let the priests look every man to his own soul, and stand up for "the faith once delivered to the saints," without addition or subtraction.

We have ever desired to deal with candour and kindness towards the Roman Catholic priests. Where we have had to censure, we have confined it to those whose acts deserved it. Where we have seen conduct deserving of respect, we have accorded it freely. We have now no object in view but to awaken them to the solemn importance of their position at this time.

There are among them men of ability and learning, we trust, men of sincerity, too, who have not disgraced their position by exciting the passions, or imposing on the ignorance of the people. We call on these men to consider the principle of the Council of Trent—that nothing can be of faith but what Christ taught, and his Apostles delivered. We call on them to consider the vast importance and the deep responsibility of their own position, now that they are driven by their Church, either to abandon or to stand up for that principle.

No greater or more solemn question has ever been forced on the consideration of priests; and those whose hearts may be stirred to meet it with a zeal for God, and for the faith which Christ delivered, will earn for themselves no ordinary position in the Church of God.

Have the priests of Ireland always hitherto maintained that the Church can teach, and has taught, nothing but what Christ taught, and the Apostles delivered? and are there no champions among them now to take their stand upon this sure foundation, ere it pass from under their feet for ever?

Let them awake, and arise. The trial may be great and the struggle fierce, both without and within; but no more certain call to everlasting victory was ever proclaimed in the Church of God.

Let them come forth, and fight the good fight of faith in this; and let them trust that God will make their way plain in other things.

Nor is there wanting much prospect of encouragement and support.

The doctrines advocated in this paper, and the means by which those doctrines are advocated, may well lead priests to hope that they have something sounder and more ancient to look to, than what they have been accustomed to suppose that Protestantism is; and though all means, both human and ecclesiastical, would, no doubt, be resorted to against such a priest, yet, surely, the priests must be well aware that any man of character and ability who should now take this course, would probably find his people nearly as ready for it as himself, and both able and willing to support him.

* "Quam Sol justitiæ Christus Jesus, fidei nostræ auctor et consummator, docuit, Apostoli tradiderunt, et Catholica Ecclesia, Spiritu Sancto suggerente, perpetuo retinuit."—Proem. Sess. sexta.

Are there no mighty men in Israel, to stand forth before the world and the Church!

We beg to state that, with a view to facilitate fair discussion, we shall be happy to forward the Catholic Layman henceforward, without charge, to any Roman Catholic clergyman who will be good enough to intimate either to the editor or publisher, 9, Upper Sackville-street, his desire to receive it in future, direct through the post. We also beg to express a hope that our regular subscribers will be good enough to forward their subscriptions for the ensuing year (together with any arrears due) on or before the 1st of January next. We need scarcely remind them, though 3s. 6d. is a small sum, that when a large number of such sums is in arrear, it imposes a serious difficulty in the way of the conductors. The sums paid for stamp duty during the past year alone, amounts to nearly £400.

1. Colgan represents the system of hereditary succession as an abuse which crept into some Churches in Ireland, (at least into Armagh); and this long after the first planting of Christianity in the country; that it commenced, in fact, subsequently to the year 840, and after the face of religion in the country had been miserably darkened by Danish barbarism. Whereas we have seen that it was a prevalent custom among the Irish Christians, elsewhere, as well as in Armagh, from a much earlier age; as illustrated in several examples given in the last paper, and as having, according to ancient Irish tradition (as we saw at the outset, and subsequently,) the sanction of S. Patrick himself, and of the other eminent luminaries of early Christianity in this island.

2. Colgan pretends that King Malachy the great was not anointed in his dying hour by "Awley, successor of Patrick" (as the Irish Annals call him), but by some deputy bishop or priest whose name is not given, nor his presence in any way alluded to in the "Annals." And when the "Annals" say, (as already quoted, in No. III.) that he was anointed in [or. at] the hands of Awley, Colgan would seem to have us understand, that Awley only held him, for some other person to anoint; but Dr. O'Donovan, whose object was only to translate the passage correctly, without having any crooked argumentative purpose to serve, renders it thus—"after being anointed by the hands" of Awley; the original Annalist's intention having been, obviously, to tell who actually performed the rite, and to mention by name such of the more dignified clergy as were present at King Malachy's death-bed, and saying masses, with psalms and hymns, for his repose in that hour.

3. Colgan's mode of representing the testimony of the Irish Annalists concerning the family so long possessed of the See of Armagh is most unreasonable. Those Annalists, in recording the events which appeared worthy of note in the history of their native Church, were utterly unconscious, as far as we can see, of any wrong done to that Church by the family in question. The custom complained of was certainly liable to abuses; but it was not, after all, attended with worse evils, nor was it any worse founded in right, equity, or Holy Scripture, than the system which succeeded it, of papal and regal squabbling, against local influences not less worthy of support, for the control of episcopal appointments. The Irish Annalists nowhere say a word against the family which opposed St. Malachy; though Bernard, in the spirit of a partisan of the Church of Rome (whose influence and authority were concerned in the struggle), was led to use such very strong language on the subject. Colgan, looking into the "Annals" for some expression to harmonize with those ideas of Bernard's, could find none more to his purpose than the statement, that some of those whom he calls pseudo-bishops (i.e., nominal bishops, no real bishops), died penitent; and he seems to think this penitence may refer to their usurpation of the primacy. But that expression is used of men of piety and worth, according to the opinion of the Annalists, and does not by any means imply conversion from a life of grievous impiety, in its ordinary use. Thus, Malachy the great, above named, who, whatever his sins, was no usurper, is said by them to have died after "intense penance." (A.D. 1022.) And so at A.D. 1147, we find "Murray O'Flanagan, a choice priest, died after intense penance;" and at 1149, "Bishop O'Gormly, a noble, devout senior, died, after suffering [or 'penance,' according to O'Donovan], and after intense penitence." But on a point so absurdly plain to any fair and unprejudiced mind, it were foolish to multiply illustrations.

4. As the old Irish Annalists, whose records are embodied in the compilation of the Four Masters, nowhere allude to, or seem conscious of, any ecclesiastical defect connected with the married prelates of Armagh, which could interfere with their ministrations about holy things, but rather represent them as saying masses, anointing men for death, &c., as clerical persons; so neither have they the slightest allusion to any of those suffragans, or deputies, with which some learned men, in late ages, have kindly supplied them. We meet, indeed, in the "Annals" with instances of vice-abbots and vice-erenachs; but those vice-primates, vice-bishops of Armagh, or deputy successors of Patrick, of whom Colgan speaks, are persons altogether unnoticed by them in that capacity. Colgan is, indeed, lamentably inaccurate on this point. For, whereas he includes Primate Awley among the unordained married men, who required of necessity to have deputies to perform their duties; and Maelmury, son of Hoey, among the deputies, or suffragans, who performed such clerical functions in their stead; the Annalists, on the contrary, testify that Awley held the very office which this Maelmury had previously held, and actually succeeded him in it.—See the extract at A.D. 1020, in our last paper. But Colgan seems to have confusedly interchanged in the above place the name of this Maelmury, son of Hoey, who was actually primate, with that of Maelmury, son of Scanlan, who was only Bishop of Armagh, (see at A.D. 994, No. III.), though he had a little previously enumerated both among the fifteen usurping primates.

The truth of the matter would seem to be simply this, that in the ages preceding the time of Kellach and Malachy, the offices of Primate, or Successor of St. Patrick, and of Bishop of Armagh, were, generally speaking, altogether distinct; differing much in their natures, as well as held by distinct individuals, although they might occasionally be found united in one person. And it was only in the time, and also in the person, of St. Malachy, that an attempt was first made to unite and consolidate the two offices permanently, with a view to assimilate the Church discipline of Ireland to that of other branches of the Church, and securing for the Archbishop of Armagh, as such, whatever of dignity, prestige, wealth, or influence, had previously been enjoyed by the Successors of St. Patrick, as such—in other words, by the abbots of Armagh. These remarks will, perhaps, be more fully understood from an inspection of all the obits of such persons (i.e., either abbots or bishops of Armagh), which occur in the "Annals" during the sixth and seventh centuries, which are as follows:—

A.D. 525, Ailill, Bishop of Armagh, who was of the Hy-Breasail [race], died.

A.D. 535, Oilill, Bishop of Armagh, also of the Hy-Breasail [race], died.

A.D. 550, David ——, Bishop of Armagh —, died.

A.D. 577, Felimy Finn, Abbot of Armagh, died.

A.D. 587, S. Caorlan, Bishop of Armagh, died.

A.D. 597, Hoey, son of Dermot, Bishop and Abbot of Armagh, died.

A.D. 609, Seanach, Abbot of Armagh (from Clonygreek), died.

A.D. 622, Mac Laisre, Bishop and Abbot of Armagh, died.

A.D. 660, S. Tomian, son of Ronan, Bishop of Armagh, died.

A.D. 686, S. Segenius, of Aghaclive, Bishop of Armagh, died.

Some learned writers have supposed that the Annalists had a confused way of writing "Bishop of Armagh," or "Abbot of Armagh," where, if they had learned to express themselves accurately, they should have said, "Archbishop of Armagh," adding, perhaps, "Primate of all Ireland," or other like titles of dignity, accommodated to more modern ears. But the student, who carefully examines the original "Annals," will see little in them to countenance any such notion; and will rather conclude that when a "Bishop of Armagh" is named, it means simply the person exercising episcopal functions in the establishment at Armagh, the function of ordination especially; and, in like manner, that the "successor of Patrick," or "Abbot of Armagh," implies simply the ruler of the religious establishment there, its head, to whose authority even the bishop, when a distinct person, was subject; although the abbot was, at times, as is evident from the above entries, bishop also. When he was not, he still, no doubt, ruled, but left ordination to the bishop. As for what St. Bernard says of Primate Awley and the other seven, whom he calls unordained persons, the statement must be received with some hesitation and qualification, considering the quarter whence it comes; and it can, in all probability, signify no more, at the utmost, than that the parties concerned were not elected and ordained with canonical regularity, according to the usages of the Church of Rome—any ordination independent of which Bernard would probably ignore.

5. But that those married prelates of Armagh were possessed of such orders as were considered, by the Irish people, sufficient to constitute them clergymen at least, if not even bishops, is most certain; not only from the general way of mentioning them in the "Annals," where their occupying of the primacy, collecting of visitation rents, &c., are mentioned, without the least hint of there being anything sacrilegious in such appropriation of ecclesiastical property, but also from other circumstances which we may there find noticed concerning them; as, for instance, Awley's having anointed King Malachy, which Colgan so lamely endeavours to disprove. And, again, Murchan, whom he sets down as the first of these eight married and unordained persons, is introduced at A.D. 972, of the "Annals," as inaugurating, or consecrating to his kingly office, Hugh, son of Donnell, Lord of Oileach—i.e., the prince of one of the most famous provincial royalties in Ireland. This act it were very absurd to suppose performed by a mere unordained layman, who was, in that character, at most, but an inferior prince to the one who received his blessing. Maelmurry, son of Hoey, another of these married prelates, is called by the Annalists (A.D. 1020), "the head of the clergy of all the north-west of Europe, and flood of dignity of the western world;" whereas, according to Colgan, he must either have been no clergyman at all, and, in that case, guilty of sacrilege, or else, if a clergyman, then both sacrilegious and adulterous, in his marrying and begetting children in holy orders. Awley, the next of those prelates (ib.), was appointed by the suffrages of the laity and clergy, and acknowledged as primate through all Ireland, even in the most southern parts, being received and honoured with visitation dues, &c., in Munster (A.D. 1021); which was not very likely to have happened if he was a mere layman in the estimation of the Irish people. Again, Dudalehe, son of Kellach, whom Colgan mentions in the last place but one, as likely to have been one of the married and unordained men, was so highly esteemed as primate, both in Ireland and beyond its limits, that, a vacancy occurring in the office of Successor of Columkille (or chief ruler of his monasteries in Iona, Derry, and elsewhere generally), he was, by the common choice of the Irish and Scots, elected to fill the situation; so that, if Dudalehe was unordained, then, contrary to all that has ever been suggested on the subject, not only the electors to the See of Armagh, but also the religious congregations following the rule of Columkille in Scotland and Ireland, must voluntarily have selected a mere layman for their head; which it is not very likely that any person acquainted with the history of those times will regard as a probable hypothesis.

The short and the long of it is, that Father Colgan has made a very sad mess of this whole matter; nor could he, approaching it with his invincible prepossessions and prejudices, have done any better. Nor will any person do better at it, who approaches a subject of the kind with a determination to squeeze it into some particular shape, suitable to his own preconceived notions, though sanctioned by the traditions of centuries; and who is not rather prepared to listen to what an original authority says for itself, and receive, as its testimony, whatever it seems naturally intended to convey to the reader. It was a neglect of this that led Colgan to that sensible remark, that St. Bernard is more severe on Primate Niall, and others of our old clergy, who married wives, and begat sons and daughters, than are our native "Annals." The degree in which the two sorts of authorities differ, is certainly worthy of our attention. According to the one, those married ecclesiastics were guilty of sacrilege and adultery, perpetrators of deeds of damnation, and cunning enough to add to their crimes even after death; tyrants, not clergymen; profaners of the sanctuary of God. So speak St. Bernard and Colgan, and other upholders of the supremacy of Rome. According to the other view, Conn-na-mbocht, Head of the Culdees of Clonmacnoise, and an anchorite, although himself a married man, and the descendant, in direct lineal succession, through ten generations, of abbots and bishops, erenachs and anchorites (covering a space of three hundred years), was, after all, "the glory and dignity" of the religious establishment in which he flourished. So speak our native "Annals."

If any member of the Church of Rome, in this country, be disposed for a moment to think that, perhaps, the Irish Church was actually in so bad a state as to deserve the severe censures of St. Bernard, that, in fact, so eminent a person would not have given utterance to them without cause, it may suffice to remind him, that such was not, certainly, the general opinion of Christendom concerning the Irish Church, in those early ages preceding the coming of the English, throughout which, we have shown this system of marrying, among the abbots, bishops, and other clerical persons in Ireland, and hereditary succession to ecclesiastical offices and benefices, to have prevailed; the Irish Church having been famous, throughout Europe, for its men of eminence, for learning and piety, schools and missions, in the same ages. And, even in the later age, when St. Bernard flourished, she little needed, according to the opinion of Dr. Lanigan and other authors of like sentiments, any foreign interference to revive her discipline or piety; her own sons having not only sufficient information, ability, and zeal, for engaging in the task; but having actually engaged in it with no little energy, and having set, of themselves, about introducing such reforms as to them appeared to be needed, before any foreigners came to assist in the work—as did, subsequently, under a Papal sanction, the King of England and his helpers in the subjugation of Ireland.

But, whatever ecclesiastical reforms the Irish themselves, or the Danes, or English, or bishops of Rome, may have introduced or attempted in this country, subsequently to the Anglo-Norman invasion, sufficiently certain it is that the abolition of marriage among the clergy was not, at all events, a feat of their accomplishment. But, as its use was allowed among the said clergy, from the days of St. Patrick to the date of the Invasion,* so was it also continued in the ages which come after, from the Invasion to the Reformation; as we hope satisfactorily to prove to the reader of our next paper.

THE WAR.

As many of our readers, like ourselves, may have a deep personal interest in friends and loved ones engaged in the present war, we think it may be acceptable to them to be provided with a form of prayer for those on whom their affections are so engaged.

We ask our readers to consider, if every family in Ireland were daily to join in offering up such prayer to God, might we not hope for an answer to our prayers, from Him who heareth prayer?

In ancient times, such prayers were always "Litanies"—that is, the prayers were so drawn up, that all might join and take their part in them. It is a cold thing for one to pray, and all the rest to listen. Who would not wish to pray themselves, for those they love, in their hour of danger? Our Litany is intended for this purpose. It is intended that the one who leads the prayer, should read with reverence what is written in the usual print, and that all the rest should join in answering what is written in the italic or sloping print. Thus all join in praying. This was the method of the ancient Litanies.

While we are on this subject, we invite our readers to give their contributions to "the Patriotic fund," which is now being raised for the relief and support of the widows and orphans of the soldiers and sailors who fall in this war. Who would not contribute to such a fund? Who would not wish to give comfort to the soldier's heart, as he lies bleeding on the battle field or mangled in the military hospital? and what comfort can we give them, like the assurance that those they have loved best on earth, in whom their dying wishes centre—their widows and their orphans—shall have their inheritance in the gratitude of their country? This is the object of the Patriotic Fund. The soldiers hear of it. How many a soldier as he stands steadfast before the hail of bullets, or rides to death as the light cavalry so lately did, will think upon that "Patriotic Fund"! What Irishman would not contribute to it?

We deeply regret that some, to check the flow of national sympathy, have circulated the unfounded calumny, that this fund is to be used for proselytizing purposes. If there be any ground for such a charge, let a memorial be presented to the Queen; or, let a motion be made in Parliament now assembled. If grounds can be shown, none are more ready than we to join. The Samaritan did not stop to say to the Jew, "If you will worship at Gerizim, I will heal your wounds;" that was not our Saviour's story, when he said "Go, and do thou likewise." Any such abuse of the "Patriotic Fund" would be a foul iniquity; for that which is morally wrong can never be religiously right. Nothing could be more wicked than such an abuse of such a fund, except the conduct of those who seek to stop the generous current of a nation's sympathy, and then shrink from coming forward, in the light of day, to prove their dark insinuations. If, then, as we venture to predict, no such memorial will be presented to the Queen—no such motion made in Parliament, that inquiry should be immediately instituted, and exposure made—let our readers believe that the calumny is unfounded, and let them come forward, like Irishmen, to show their generous sympathy with the gallant defenders of their country.

Wherever there are not local associations to receive such contributions, we are ready to receive post-office orders, payable to our publisher, William Curry; or postage stamps enclosed to him, and to acknowledge the receipt in our pages.

And we ask the prayers of our countrymen for the soldiers, the sick, the wounded, and the mourners in this war.

A LITANY TO BE USED IN TIME OF WAR.

Almighty and Merciful God, the aid of all that need, the helper of all that flee to thee for succour, we beseech thee, in this time of war, for our country and for the Queen whom thou hast set over us, for her councillors and officers, for her soldiers and sailors, and for all who are in trouble or sorrow through the war,

We beseech Thee to hear us good Lord.

That Thou will be her defender and keeper, giving her victory over all her enemies,

We beseech Thee to hear us Good Lord.

That thou will grant her councillors wisdom, and endue her officers with courage and humanity,

We beseech thee to hear us, Good Lord.

That Thou wilt bless the arms of our country, to the restoration of peace, justice, and equity, in the world,

We beseech Thee to hear us, Good Lord.

That Thou wilt be merciful to our soldiers and sailors (especially we pray thee for . . . . .*), that thou wilt succour and comfort them in all their distresses, and preserve them in the day of battle, and make them merciful in the hour of victory; and so teach them to number their days, that they may apply their hearts unto wisdom.

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

That Thou wilt look down from heaven upon the sick and the wounded (especially . . . .*); behold, visit, and relieve them, and restore them to health, if it be thy gracious will,

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

That Thou wilt sanctify their sufferings, that they may lead the rest of their lives in Thy fear and to Thy glory; or else fit and prepare them for their departure hence, in the faith and fear of Thy Holy name, and lift up the light of thy countenance upon them, and give them peace, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ our Lord,

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

That Thou wilt be gracious to those whose souls are in trouble for sin, that they may have hope through Christ; that Thou wilt not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax,† nor shut up Thy tender mercies in displeasure,‡ but make them to hear of joy and gladness, that the bones which Thou hast broken may rejoice,

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

That Thy blessing may be upon all who have gone forth to minister to their spiritual or temporal comfort,

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

That Thou wilt have compassion upon all who are in affliction or sorrow for the danger or the loss of their dear ones; that Thou wilt heal the broken-hearted, and comfort all that mourn,§

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

That when Thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world may learn righteousness,‖

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

That Thou wilt accomplish the time when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more,¶

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

That Thou wilt accomplish the number of thine elect, and hasten thy kingdom; that we, with all those that are departed in the true faith of thy Holy name, may have our perfect consummation and bliss, both in body and soul, in thy eternal and everlasting glory, through Jesus Christ, our Lord,

We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord.

Our Father, which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name; Thy kingdom come; Thy will be done on earth, As it is in heaven; Give us this day our daily bread; And forgive us our trespasses, As we forgive them that trespass against us; And lead us not into temptation, But deliver us from evil; For thine is the kingdom, And the power, And the glory, For ever and ever. Amen.

Almighty God, who hast given us grace at this time with one accord to make our prayers and supplications unto Thee; and dost promise that when two or three are gathered together in Thy name, thou wilt grant their requests; fulfil now, O Lord, the desires and petitions of thy servants, as may be most expedient for them; granting us in this world knowledge of thy truth, and in the world to come life everlasting. Amen.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with us all evermore. Amen.—2nd Cor. xiii. 14.

* Additional evidence on this point will, it is believed, be furnished, when the important collection of the Brehon Laws, now in course of preparation for publication, shall have issued from the press.

RECENT CONTROVERSY AT BOULOGNE.

The following arguments, are given in the Resumè as those urged by Mr. Gretton in support of the authority of the Roman See, p. 9:—

"Before the end of the 1st century under St. Clement, the 4th Pope, a schism, or, as St. Clement himself described it, 'a foul and unholy sedition,' having broke out in the Church of Corinth, an appeal was made to the Church of Rome for its interference and advice. The Epistle which the Holy Father addressed to the Corinthians is to be found in the Epistolæ Patrum de Prey, Basle, 1742."

"On the authority of Father Lacordaire, whose works (from whence they are quoted) have received the sanction of the Catholic Church, the following were offered:—

"At the end of the 2nd century, the Churches of Asia persisted in celebrating Easter on the fourteenth day of the moon, like the Jews, whilst the Christians of the west on the Sunday which follows that day; the Pope, St. Victor I., excommunicated them."

"In the 3rd century, St. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, with a council of sixty bishops of Africa decided that the children of heretics should be rebaptised; the Pope, St. Stephen I., opposed it and menaced them with excommunication, and St. Cyprian, great man as he was, was obliged to bend."

"St. Denis, Patriarch of Alexandria, the first of the patriarchates of the east, issued certain doubtful propositions on the Trinity; many bishops, being alarmed, addressed the Sovereign Pontiff, and St. Denis was obliged to write an apologetic letter to the Pope."

"St. Irenæus, a writer so near the Apostolic times as to have had for his instructor in Christianity, St. Polycarp, a disciple of St. John the Evangelist, says—"

"We can enumerate those bishops who were appointed by the Apostles and their successors down to ourselves, none of whom taught or even knew the wild opinions of these men (heretics). However, as it would be tedious to enumerate the whole list of successions, I shall confine myself to that of Rome, the greatest and most ancient and illustrious Church, founded by the glorious Apostles, Peter and Paul; receiving from them her doctrine which was announced to all men, and which, through the succession of her bishops, is come down to us. Thus we confound all those who, through evil designs, or vainglory, or perverseness, teach what they ought not; for to this Church, on account of its superior headship (potentiorem principalitatem), every other must have recourse—that is, the faithful of all countries, in which Church is preserved the doctrine delivered by the Apostles."—Adv. Hæres, Lib. 3.

"St. Cyprian—Primacy was given to Peter to show that there is but one Church and one Chair. Does he who abandons the Chair of Peter, upon which the Church is founded, flatter himself that he is in the Church?"—De Unit. Ecc.

"St. Cyprian—Moreover, after all this, having had a pseudo bishop set up for themselves by heretics, they dare to sail and to carry letters from schismatic and profane men to the Chair of St. Peter, and to the principal Church, whence the unity of the priesthood took its rise; nor do they consider that the Romans are those (whose faith was praised in the preaching of the Apostle) to whom faithlessness cannot have access."—Ep. 55, ad. Cornel.

"St. Cyprian also calls the Roman Church the Root and Matrix of the Catholic Church."—Cyp. Op., Ep. 65, Perisse Freres. Paris.

"St. Optatus, Bishop of Milevis, in Numidia, in the fourth century—You cannot deny that St. Peter, the chief of the Apostles, established an Episcopal Chair at Rome. This Chair was one, that all might preserve unity, by the union which they had with it, so that whoever set up a Chair against it, should be a schismatic and an offender."—De. Schism. Donat. Paris and Mayence.

"St. Jerome—I am following no other than Christ, united to the communion of your Holiness—that is, to the Chair of Peter. I know that the Church is founded on that Rock. Whoever eateth the Lamb out of that house, is a profane man. Whoever is not in the ark shall perish by the flood."—Ep. 15, ad. Damas.

Dr. M.—It certainly is very striking that you so systematically avoid the Scriptures, and the real questions at issue. The reason why you are thus anxious to escape from the former is plain enough—they give no support to your doctrines. For this cause. Those doctrines were never derived from the Bible, but grew gradually into existence, and in assumption. In order to support them, recourse was had, in after years, to God's Word. Certain passages, from which they were not at all derived, were tortured into proof. Hence, the true reason of the extreme weakness of the Scripture proof which you attempt to give of your peculiar tenets. That such has been your mode of procedure is evident from this circumstances. You dare not attempt the only proof which can, upon your own principles, fairly establish your case by Scriptural testimony. If the passages from the Bible which your Church now adduces, had really been the source from whence her doctrines were derived, it will be easy for you to establish this, by showing that early Christian writers did take those passages, and did explicitly assign to them that meaning which your Church, since the Council of Trent, has ascribed. But this you will not attempt. You cannot produce a single instance where it was done. Hence, it is clear such passages were not the originals from whence your peculiar doctrines were deduced. The Scripture was an afterthought. The doctrines, as you now hold them, grew gradually in assumption from century to century, and their growth can be easily accounted for. It was, of course, necessary to make some defence of them from revelation. But as your Church could not find in it, as might be expected, any good defence, she was constrained to take the best she could get, and make up for lack of evidence by asserting her infallibility, for the truth of her modern interpretations. She has put a sense which she did not find in them on such passages, and, by authority, created a new meaning. If this account of the present Scriptural argument be untrue, you can at once refute it, by taking seriatim the passages of Scripture which you maintain to be the basis of your claims, and then show, from those early writings which we possess, that their authors did really, by their own words, give to them that interpretation which you now give. This you will not attempt to do.

* Here any may be mentioned in whom the persons assembled are especially interested.

In point of fact, what I am now requiring is the only proof, by your own principles, open to you. For, you do not permit men to exercise their own judgment upon those passages of Scripture which contain articles of faith. Infallibility you cannot assume when called on to prove it. Take, then, now, the questions at issue in our present discussion, the infallibility of, either Church or Pontiff—which it be, or whether it be of both, you have nowhere yet decided—take your present doctrine of the Pontiff's supreme jurisdiction of power over the whole Church of Christ. How will you proceed in the Scriptural proof? What is your rule for the interpretations of the passages you adduce? It must be one of three things. The natural judgment of men duly exercising the same reason which they use in all matters of practical importance; or it must be infallibility interpreting them; or the universal authority of the Fathers testifying, by their united sanction, to the truth of your present interpretation.

But the first of these methods you prohibit; the second you cannot assume when called on to prove it. You have, therefore, nothing left but to test the truth of your doctrines by the only criterion which remains, and which you assert to exist—the according and universal consent of the Fathers.

Here again your pretensions have driven you into a fatal difficulty. If your Church did not assert that there really was such an according witness from the earliest times—if she did not allege that there really was a flowing stream of consentient testimony to the truth of her doctrines—it is manifest she would have no proof at all left her. Such testimony she does assert; and she has succeeded in imposing upon her members the reception of an assertion instead of the truth of a fact. She has so jumbled together infallibility with assertion, that her members do not distinguish. They take her infallibility not only as a guarantee for interpretations of Scripture, but likewise as proof for the truth of historic allegations. They do not limit the claim to the proof of doctrines from the Bible, but believe, moreover, that she is as infallible when asserting a fact, as when deriving a doctrine; as a witness or as an interpreter.

My present position is this—your pretensions have forced you to make a claim which is fatal to you. Equally fatal would it have been had you not made it. Prohibiting the exercise of private judgment upon passages of Scripture containing articles of faith debarred from assuming infallibility when called on to prove it, you had no option, because no other proof of your pretensions, but the dogmatic averment that there really did exist one united voice of all antiquity deposing to the truth of your doctrines. Nothing less than this could prove your case. It would not do simply to say that some Fathers held your views; for if there was any difference of opinion among them, this would be to let in what you, with so much worldly wisdom, so well prohibit—private judgment. Hence, you were constrained, by your position, and because of your pretensions, to hazard the daring assertion, that there really did exist—that full proof can be produced of its existence—the consentient authority of the Fathers deposing, with full unanimity, to the existence of your modern doctrines in the Church of Christ from the earliest period. This you do assert; this you do teach; and this I shall now put you to prove in the two questions which we are at present discussing; and here I say your pretensions will fall by their own weight.

ARE THE PRIESTHOOD SINCERE?

[We have great pleasure in presenting to our readers a translation of the following letter from the Abbé Miel, which we think valuable, not only as coming from the pen of one intimately acquainted with the state of the priesthood in France, of which he was so lately a distinguished member, but as evincing the same spirit of Christian moderation which rendered his former letter, published in our September number, so touchingly interesting.]

(TRANSLATION.)

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I have every day occasion to observe that many evangelical Christians are persuaded that the greater part of the Roman Catholic priesthood are wanting in sincerity, and do not themselves believe in what they are commissioned to teach to others. That it may be so, more or less, in Protestant countries, is possible, though I am not aware of it. But as concerning the countries where the Roman system is dominant, and especially as concerning France, of which the clergy everywhere enjoy particular and deserved consideration, I know, and owe it to truth, as well as to justice, to say, that the clergy in general do not feel the least doubt with regard to the doctrines which they preach in the name of Rome. How that comes to pass, and what is the nature of that sincerity, it will not be difficult nor, perhaps, needless to explain, and such is the object of this letter.

If there be any one point of its organisation in which the Church of Rome shows herself particularly skilful, it is beyond contradiction in the education of her clergy. You cannot imagine how marvellously everything is combined in order to fix firmly in the intellect and affections of candidates for orders what is called faith—faith, be it remarked, not in our Saviour, nor in Scripture, but faith in the Church herself. What precautions are taken to prevent a doubt from reaching the understanding, or to repel it victoriously if ever it should present itself there! The principles inculcated in young candidates for holy orders, the lessons given to them, the books placed in their hands, every thing concurs and tends to the same object. And these operations are certain of success, because they are directed against simple, unsuspicious souls, who, as it were, lend themselves of their own accord, without resistance, to the impressions. The seminaries are recruited, in fact, from the country districts. The pupils are, for the most part, children of the lower orders, who have attracted attention by their happy disposition, by their assiduity in attending religious ceremonies, and by the docility they display to the lessons of the priests. When they quit their families to enter the first or lower seminaries they certainly have but little knowledge of religion. This, however, they know perfectly well (for they have been taught it from their infancy), that in order to be Christians they must believe firmly, and under pain of damnation, everything which is believed and taught by the Roman Church. And as they have been equally taught that the Church means the parish priest and every priest approved by the bishop, they have an unbounded reliance in the word of the priest. The priest is in their eyes a man altogether beyond and above the rest of mankind, he exercises over them all the ascendancy not only of learning and virtue, of which they form to themselves a very high opinion, but of a celestial mission of a divine nature. They listen to him as the oracle of God, not admitting the possibility of deceiving them, or of his deceiving himself. His lessons are the more impressive from being given with all the force of simple affirmations—"That is so;" "That is not so." So far is this carried, that they have not even an idea of a religious discussion or controversy. Even in the world, in which they are received before their admission to the college, and where they again appear from time to time during the vacations, no discussion is ever heard upon these subjects. By common agreement, in all Roman Catholic countries, the study of religion is considered the business exclusively of the priest, the believer has only to gather at the foot of the pulpit the fruits of that study. The few exceptions which might be produced against this rule would only serve to establish its truth.

Nevertheless, when the understanding of the pupil of the seminary is a little more developed—when he commences to make use of his own judgment in the domain of natural science—it sometimes happens that reason endeavours to vindicate her right to be heard in matters of religion also, and seeks to qualify the doctrine presented to her as alone containing eternal truth. But the confessor is ever at hand to guard his spiritual son against this dangerous snare. Reason is silenced as being merely the voice of pride; or else is deluded by the promise of having her suggestions examined at another stage, during the term of study at the upper seminary.

At last arrives the solemn epoch, in which the theological education is completed—an epoch the most critical of all. If the edifice of belief does not crumble then, it is usually fixed for ever. Every history which is not in every point in perfect harmony with the doctrine of Rome is strictly forbidden. Even Bailllie's Treatise on Theology, which has for a number of years been almost exclusively used in our seminaries in France, has just been placed in the index of forbidden works, on the ground that it does not profess Ultramontanism with sufficient openness. This is the doctrine which must, at any sacrifice, prevail. Whether knowingly or not, the teachers do not hesitate, with this object in view, to mis-state facts and to misquote texts, as I shall soon have occasion to demonstrate. And yet, upon the slightest reflection, how flimsy are the foundations upon which is reared so colossal a structure!—how weak the arguments!—how inconclusive the evidence!

Well then, would you believe it, the circumstance which ought to shake the faith of the neophyte is precisely that which in most cases serves to fix it. Taking this proposition as a starting point, which they deem exempt even from the possibility of attack—viz., that whatever is taught in the name of Rome is infallibly true, the argument proceeds thus:—"Reason is inadequate to demonstrate such or such a truth: faith, therefore, is a matter of necessity." And, closing their eyes, they precipitate themselves into the bosom of a faith justly called blind.

It is an analogous reasoning to what I have often heard repeated by sincere Roman Catholics after visiting the eternal city. Deeply affected by the scandals of every description pervading the city of the Pontiffs, they deduced from these very scandals a proof of the divine nature of the Church of Rome, and of the permanent protection afforded to it by the Holy Ghost, alleging it to be manifest that that Church could not, without such protection, exist for an hour in the midst of such corruptions.

Nor is this all, although it would be something, no doubt, to have thus brought the young student in theology to admit as a necessity this belief in the Church. But, after having thoroughly impressed the idea in his mind that a simple doubt kills faith—after having exhibited in the most hideous colours all who have ever shaken off the yoke of Rome—then they extol beyond all measure the excellence of an humble submission to the authority of the priest—or what they term "foi de charbonnier" [faith of a charcoal burner—i.e., of an uncultivated, ignorant person]. Such a submission is incessantly placed before the pupil as the basis of all virtue, as the source of every grace, and of every light; and the result is that the neophyte, terrified and cajoled in turns, throws himself unhesitatingly into the extremest opinions opposite to that from which he has been warned. Not only does the shadow of a doubt terrify him—he flies from it as he would from the serpent of impurity. For this is another rule incessantly impressed upon him, that temptations against faith are to be placed in the same category as temptations against chastity; that the only security against such is in flight. Nay, he even goes beyond this—he at last comes to love faith for itself, and for the love of faith to despise, I had almost said to hate, reason. He persuades himself that there is supreme merit in believing without proof; he does not desire to examine, or to be convinced by any examination which he may make—he would rather preserve all the merits of an unreasoning assent.

I have read in the life of St. Louis [Louis IX. of France], that when some of his courtiers came to announce a miracle which he might have an opportunity of witnessing, by which our Lord showed himself visibly in the consecrated host, under the form of a child, the pious monarch replied—"Let those who doubt concerning the real presence in the holy sacrament go and see this miracle: for myself, I believe in that Presence as firmly as if I saw it bodily with my eyes." I do not hesitate to assert, that the majority of our young ecclesiastics, on leaving the seminary, would be disposed to hold similar language under similar circumstances. Such is the state of belief to which it is possible at length to arrive by willing that one should believe; by continually repeating to one's self "I believe."

I hope, sir, that your readers can now understand the two things which I proposed to myself to show in this letter—viz., how it happens that (at least in France) a Roman Priest may be sincere in his teaching, and in what sense it is true that he is a man of faith.

I am, with respect,
Your very humble servant,
C. MIEL.

PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Permit me to make a few remarks on that point of Mr. Edmond Power's letter, in your last (No. 35, p. 135), which refers to myself.

The object of my previous letter (No. 31, p. 86) was to expose misquotations made by two of your Roman Catholic correspondents in their endeavour to prove "that the doctrine of Purgatory was taught by the early Fathers." As Mr. Power has not attempted a justification on this head, I presume that he admits the accuracy of my references. He, however, calls in question one of my statements. He writes—

"Mr. Collette undertakes to disprove Purgatory! and in order to make this conclusion available to the end he proposes, he tells those for whose edification he writes, by an egregious mistake, no doubt, that, 'according to the modern Roman doctrine, all the faithful—all those who die in the faith of Christ—go to Purgatory, before they can be in a fit condition to appear before God.'" Mr. Power then desires to know whence I learned this novel feature. He does not, however, deny such to be the teaching of his Church. He will admit that his Church makes a broad distinction between those who die in mortal and those in venial sins. Those who die in mortal sin go "to hell for all eternity" (Dr. Doyle's Abridgment of Christian Doctrine), and those who die in venial sins, we are told, "go to Purgatory till they have made full satisfaction for them, and then to heaven." Then we read in the Catechism of the Council of Trent—"Besides this (namely, hell), there is a purgatorial fire, where the SOULS OF THE PIOUS are, for a certain time, expiated by suffering, by which an entrance may be gained to the eternal abodes, into which nothing unclean can enter."*

Pope Gregory I. (if, indeed, the work attributed to him by Romanists be genuine) stated, that the fire of Purgatory was for those only who had committed "peccata minuta atque levissima."†

Now, I believe Mr. Power will admit that those who die in venial sin, and the "pious," such as stated in the Catechism, are the faithful, and such as die in the faith of Christ. All these must go to Purgatory before they go to heaven.

* Cat. Conc. Trid., pars i., cap. iv., Quæst. iii., p. 80. Lips. 1801.
† Gregor. Magn. Dialog., Lib. iv., c. 39.

That all, and the best of us, have sinned, and do sin, cannot for a moment be denied. Let the following texts of Scripture be carefully examined on this head:—1 Kings viii. 46; Job xv. 14; xxv. 4; Ps. cxxx. 3; Pr. xx. 9; xxiv. 16; Eccl. vii. 20; 1 John i. 8.

The Blessed Virgin Mary herself is charged with errors and failings, even of want of faith, by many of the early Fathers, among whom we find Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Basil, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Cyril of Alexandria.

Is Mr. Power prepared to assert that any one Christian dies without some taint of sin upon him, or wholly perfect? Now, Dr. Wiseman in his 11th Lecture, p. 57, vol. ii., London, 1851, writes—

"Moreover, we are assured in the New Law that 'nothing defiled shall enter' into the heavenly Jerusalem. Suppose, then, a Christian dies, who had committed some slight transgression [Is there any Christian who has not?], he cannot enter heaven in this state, and yet we cannot suppose that he is to be condemned for ever. What alternative, then, are we to admit? Why, that there is some place in which the soul will be purged of the sin, and qualified to enter into the glory of God. Will you say that God forgives all sin at the moment of death? Where is the warrant for that assertion? This is an important point of doctrine; and if you maintain that God at once forgives sins, on any occasion, you must allege strong authority for it. If you find nothing of such a doctrine in his revelation, but if, on the contrary, you are told—first, that no defilement can enter the kingdom of heaven; and, secondly, that some sins are forgiven in the next world, you must admit some means of purgation whereby the sinner, who has not incurred eternal punishment, is qualified for the enjoyment of God's glory."

Again, in explanation of the text from Rev. xxi. 27, we read in Keenan's "Controversial Catechism" (London, 1854), cap. xxi, sec. 2, p. 148—"There must be some place for the purification of souls after death; because the Scripture assures us, that even the just man falls seven times; and can any one in his senses suppose that many will not die without expiating these faults? With these they cannot enter heaven, which receiveth nothing defiled; they cannot be sent hell, for they are, according to Scripture, JUST; therefore, there must be a third place, where these failings of even the just man will be expiated."

Thus, then, it is very evident, that all Christians who do not die in mortal sins do go to Purgatory; they, nevertheless, are the pious who die in the faith of Christ.

I am quite aware that some Romanists assert that martyrs go direct to heaven and their sins are at once forgiven; but this is only a private opinion, and not a doctrine of the Church of Rome.

For instance, Keenan's Catechism (reference as above) in explaining away the text, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, for they shall rest from their labour," asserts that it "only alludes to martyrs and such as die free from all sin and debt of temporal punishment; and such, of course, required no purification." But this is not only an unsupported and unwarrantable interpretation of the text, to get over an obvious difficulty, but it assumes that any mortal can be declared to die "free from all sin;" free from (as Pope Gregory has it) of the lightest and most trivial sin for whom Purgatory is said to be reserved!

I think you, sir, at least, will agree with me, that I have made no "egregious blunder."

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

C. H. COLLETTE.

ON THE INFALLIBLE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I will begin this letter by saying, it is true that if the infallibility of the Church were to depend on the natural weakness and fallibility of the members who compose her, the unbeliever might have some specious pretence for refusing to submit to her authority. But the eternal wisdom of the Father, who "reacheth from end to end strongly, and disposeth all things sweetly," took especial care to provide His chaste spouse on earth with an infallible guide, to preserve the integrity of that faith which He had purified in His blood.

Now, it would be unreasonable and preposterous that the Church, in the law of nature, or the Mosaic law, should be endowed with greater privileges than the Church in the law of grace; yet we find, from the beginning of the world to the promulgation of the new law, that all true believers had, ordinarily, no other grounds for their infallible faith than the infallibility of the Church, or body of faithful then existing, in proposing the traditions which she or they had received. And it would be repugnant to the wisdom of Christ, and He would have acted contrary to all other legislators, if He had left a law, mysterious from its own nature, and subject to a thousand different interpretations, from the various interests, prejudices, and passions of those for whom it was intended, without having constituted an infallible judge to expound its meaning. What more simple than the obedience required from Catholics to the dictates of a Church with which Christ has promised to abide for ever? There is no one so humble, so ignorant, or unlettered, but may safely follow this rule, which, with a Divine and admirable impartiality, renders the attainment of saving faith equally easy to all.

Common sense tells us, sir, that the Church which our Lord founded on earth, ought to possess the power of teaching by authority; and it is sufficiently clear that this is the only method whereby—

First—The ignorant, the dull of apprehension, and those who have not leisure to examine the Scriptures—that is to say, the greater part of mankind—can be at all instructed; whereby—

Secondly—The learned themselves can be so instructed as to remove all fluctuation and doubt from their minds; whereby—

Thirdly—Both learned and ignorant are furnished with the same motives of belief, and the same foundation for their faith; whereby—

Fourthly—All heresies, schisms, and dissensions about religion, are prevented; whereby—

Fifthly—The spirit of peace, of meekness, of humility, of diffidence in ourselves, of submission and obedience—that is to say, the characteristic virtues of a disciple of Christ—are inculcated, and are formed in us; whereby, that pride and presumption of the human heart, which, as St. Paul says, "raiseth itself up against the knowledge of God," is beaten down and subdued, and every understanding is made captive to the obedience of faith; whereby we are guarded against the wildness of imagination, the illusions of self-love, the spirit of party, the bias of education, the influence of prejudice, and so many sources of error and vice; whereby, in short, that holy, that rational, that amiable religion, which Christ brought down from heaven as a blessing to mankind, can be taught, can be enforced, and can be constantly maintained.

Now, as the method of instructing by authority is that which answers all these heavenly purposes, and leads man to virtue and happiness, in a manner conformable to his nature; and as the contrary method, whereby people are desired to shake off authority and judge for themselves, naturally leads to so great evils, and is so ill suited to the state and condition of mankind, it follows, undeniably, I repeat, that the Church of Christ has, and ought to have, power to exercise it. Indeed, Mr. Editor, in matters of faith and religion, we must be as humble and obedient to the Catholic Church as young children to their parents. "Amen, I say to you, whosoever shall not receive the Kingdom of God as a child, shall not enter into it."—St. Luke.

I remain, Sir,

Your very obedient servant,

WILLIAM ROURKE.

Passage.

Mr. Rourke observes that "from the beginning of the world to the promulgation of the new law, all true believers had, ordinarily, no other grounds for their infallible faith than the infallibility of the Church or body of faithful then existing." In saying this, he must surely have forgotten the state of the Jewish Church in the time of our Blessed Lord. We ask him, where was then the infallibility of the Church, at a time when of all others she most needed to be rightly instructed on the question of our Lord's claim to be the promised Messiah? Were not the chief priests and scribes our Lord's bitterest enemies? Did they not threaten to put out of the synagogue every Jew that believed on Him, and did they not finally condemn Him to death? Surely, if Mr. Rourke reflects on this for a moment, he cannot but see that the case of the Jewish Church is fatal to his favourite theory of infallibility. We have stated more than once that the Jews, as a visible existing Church, had far clearer evidences of divine guidance and instruction than any that the Church of Rome can point out. Yet we know that on the most important of all questions, the heads of the Jewish Church proved false and treacherous guides: and, if our Lord's hearers had not exercised their private judgment—if they had not "searched the Scriptures" which testified of Him, not one of them would have ever attained to a saving knowledge of the Gospel. What Pope of the Church of Rome could ever truly say that he prophesied, and spoke under the influence of the Holy Ghost? Yet we are told in Scripture that Caiaphas, who was high priest in the time of our Lord, did this, in virtue of the office that he held.—John xi. 51. And, nevertheless, he was the most active conspirator against the life of our blessed Lord. Arguing a priori, we might say, "what more simple than the obedience required" from a Jew "to the dictates of a Church with which God promised to abide? There is no one so humble, so ignorant or unlettered, but may safely follow this rule." Yet it is plain that if the Jews in our Lord's time had followed this safe and simple rule, they would most certainly have perilled Their eternal salvation; and from hence we conclude that the promises which God has left to his Church, never can dispense with the duty incumbent on each member of the Church, to satisfy himself of the truth and reasonableness of the doctrines which she teaches.

We fully admit that the Church possesses the power of teaching by authority; all that we deny is, that this authority is an infallible authority. The example which Mr. Rourke adduces at the close of his letter sufficiently illustrates this distinction. Every parent has an authority over his child, to which the child is bound to submit; yet the parent is not infallible. He may command his child to do what is wrong, and if the child's moral faculties are sufficiently instructed to know this, it is clearly his duty to disobey his earthly parent, and to "obey God rather than man." It may, doubtless, seem to us, that mankind would have been placed in a more safe and secure position, as regards their spiritual welfare, if they were not exposed to the perils arising from error and unbelief, if no heresies existed in the Church, to draw the unwary from the truth—if, in short, the path to virtue and happiness was as plain and easy as Mr. Rourke would fain represent it. But the simple answer to all this is, that God has not willed it so. He has seen fit to place us in a position where we must exercise habits, not of blind, unquestioning submission to authority, but of sober, rational inquiry. These precautions are necessary, to secure our temporal welfare; and they are almost equally necessary for our spiritual well-being. In short, to use the words of the Apostle, it is our duty to "prove all things, and hold fast that which is good."—1 Thess. v. 21.

ON PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I have been brought up a Catholic, but have lived several years in a Protestant family, and amongst them the second coming of our Blessed Saviour and the end of the world are often talked of as being very near.

Now, without troubling myself as to whether or not they are right in the opinion some of them hold on this matter, I do confess that I am troubled in my mind about one point connected with the end of the world, and the more I think of it the more it puzzles me. I would ask the question myself from a priest, but I was once told when I made an inquiry about another subject, "that such questions were only a tempting of God to take away my faith." The answer quieted me at that time, but I do not say and do not think it would satisfy me now.

The family I live in takes the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, and, as you must know, there have been many papers in it about Purgatory from both Catholic and Protestant, still there is one question about it that (as far as I have seen in these papers) has never been publicly asked, and, what is more, I have never read a word about it in any Catholic prayer-book I have now, or ever have had. It is not mentioned in any way in either the Daily Companion, the Garden of the Soul, the Key of Paradise, the Manna of the Soul, the Missal, or the Office for the Dead, or the notes to the Douay Bible. I can find no reference to it in either the double or single Douay Catechism, or any English or Irish one; still I do not mean to say that it has never been alluded to or explained, but only that I have never been able to find any mention of it.

Sir, I have not much expectation that you can tell me anything satisfactory on the subject; but I do hope that some one or other of the Catholic gentlemen who have written you such long and learned letters may assist you in doing away with my difficulty—I may say not mine only, but that of many others with whom I have talked about it. What I want to know is this—supposing the Protestant notion to be true, that the end of the world is really near at hand—say next week, or next month, or next year—what will become of me if I should die in venial sins so shortly before the Day of Judgment that I should not have time to atone for them by the pains of purgatory, or should not be released by the masses or the private prayers of my relations and friends, or be taken out of Purgatory by the Blessed Virgin on account of the scapular, or any other of the means the Church has appointed for the release or relief of the souls in purgatory—I ask again, what is to become of me?

Ought I to be received in Heaven with some of my sins unsatisfied for, or must I be sent to Hell for sins that I have been taught do not deserve eternal punishment?

I know that you, sir, can get rid of my question at once by saying that you do not believe in purgatory, and that there is no use in your arguing about it. But I would gladly impress on you that to Catholics purgatory is a very terrible reality, which no unbelief on your part can destroy.

We have the testimony of many fathers of the Church to the fact of there being a purgatory; and that angelic doctor, St. Thomas, says—"That the pains of it exceed the pains which Jesus Christ suffered in his holy passion, which, notwithstanding, were the most bitter that ever any creature endured in this life; over and above which they are not torments for an hour or a day, as those of this world, but they may, and do, last twenty, thirty, or a hundred years."

My mother has been dead more than fifty years, and prayers are still said for her on her anniversary. Her life was not half the length that mine has been, and I cannot think she committed more sins than I have done; yet the priests evidently show, by taking money for celebrating mass for her, that they think she still requires to be prayed for. What then, I ask for the third time, is to become of me if I should die within a short time of the Day of Judgment?

Sir, you say you are sincerely anxious that people should know what they ought to believe and trust to. Will you add your request to my supplication, that some of your Catholic correspondents will give me, through your paper, a clear and plain answer as to what we are to believe on this important subject. For, without giving in to the Protestant supposition that the end of the world is so very near at hand, as that those now alive may live to see it, still the Day of Judgment must come sometime, and there can be no reasonable objection that we should know now how we may expect to stand then.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

In Earnest.

We gladly insert the above letter, and shall be glad if any of our Roman Catholic correspondents will give a clear and plain answer to it. Fifty years in such a place as Purgatory is represented to be, is, indeed, a very terrible idea to those who believe it to be a reality. The question is all the more important—is it a reality or a fiction? We believe it to be a fiction; first, because it is never once mentioned in the Holy Scriptures, where Heaven and Hell are spoken of in places innumerable; secondly, because it is inconsistent with those passages in Scripture, in which the blood of Jesus is stated to cleanse from all sin, and which, therefore, renders needless any other mode of purification; thirdly, because no tradition of it is traceable to the times of our Lord and his Apostles; fourthly, because, in the fifth century, St. Patrick, in his works, never once alludes to it, and even negatives its existence in his treatise on "The Three Habitations"—Earth, Heaven, and Hell; fifthly, because Gregory the Great treats it as a new discovery in his time—viz., the sixth century; sixthly, because we have clearly traced its origin to Paganism and heresy, and not to the Fathers of the Primitive Church. We earnestly invite our respected correspondent to an investigation of these reasons for believing that Purgatory, though truly terrible to those who believe in it, is not a reality, but a mere delusion, which we are satisfied has done more to render mankind miserable and vicious, than any other popular error which has ever prevailed in the world.

FLOWERS FOR DECEMBER.

Almost the very last representative of the glorious flower family is the "golden-anthered, ever-fair Chrysanthemum." It appears in the middle of November, and continues flowering till the close of December. A favourite flower it would have been in June, but in the midst of winter, smiling as it lifts its cheerful eye to heaven, through storm and rain, it is tenfold welcome—

"Like'an old friend's pleasant face,
Though all the earth is void of grace,
And the very birds are dumb,
Cheerful, gay, Chrysanthemum."

So bright is its countenance, and so pleasant its smell, that it seems almost unnatural to the season; and we might fancy some rose tree to have slept the summer months, and awakened now to find all its gay cotemporaries departed.

"But though thy wintry doom may seem severe,
Uncheered by songs of birds or kindred flower,
I do believe thou dost not blossom here
But by the will of that Almighty power
Who makes thy fragile bloom an instrument
To teach the proud and murmuring content."

And most aptly fitted to teach this lesson of content is the flower that shows itself so cheerful and bright, in the midst of gloom and storm. It is the philosopher of its race, and the appropriate emblem of contentment under adversity.

The term Chrysanthemum, or gold-flower, is a generic name, given by botanists to several plants bearing star-shaped flowers. The ox-eyed daisy is the C. leucanthemum; the corn marigold is the C. segetum—both natives of Ireland. The Chrysanthemum that flowers just now is the Chinese Chrysanthemum (C. Sinense). The old-fashioned red kind was introduced into England in 1795; but it is far surpassed in beauty by the varieties more recently cultivated, and brought to such great perfection. Though a native of the warm climates of China and Japan, the Chrysanthemums have become acclimated and hardy among us, and grow as freely in the open air as in the greenhouse.

The Passion Flower is another of those visitants of the closing year that seem to irradiate the winter day. It is a member of a numerous family of twining plants, chiefly found in a wild state in America, and in parts of central Europe. In the American forests, the Passion Flower climbs the loftiest trees, and clothes them richly in festoons of bright green leaves and gay-coloured flowers. It is there chiefly valued for its fruit, which never ripens with us; though a very interesting object in the early months of spring. The common Passion Flower (Passiflora cærulea) is a native of Brazil. Everybody has heard how it derives its name from a fancied resemblance between the instruments of our Lord's crucifixion and the several parts of the flower, which were supposed to indicate the accompaniments of our Redeemer's death and sufferings. In the five anthers were supposed to be represented the five wounds of the body; in the triple style, the three nails by which he was fixed to the cross; in the centre pillar, which elevates the germen, the pillar to which he was bound; in the rays of the nectary, the bright halo which encompassed him, or the crown of thorns with which he was crowned; and so on. There is much of poetical fancy and natural sentiment in all this; and did these things end here, we could have no possible objection to such symbols, but would entertain a lively interest in the innocent emblems of sacred things, which have a place in the reverential recollection and gratitude of every Christian.

No man can pass with indifference the spot where a faithful martyr has perished; nor look unmoved on the fragments of the stake to which his body was bound; and every man of feeling—not to say of pious gratitude—would be disposed to regard with affectionate interest every emblem of our Lord's crucifixion, and especially the cross itself. And our Roman Catholic friends are mistaken if they suppose that any right-minded Protestant regards with aversion or indifference those outward signs which they (the intelligent portion of them) profess merely to reverence and respect, and not to adore or to worship. Why, then, do we not set up the cross and the images of saints and martyrs in our churches and thoroughfares? Are we stoics in religion, and callous to all those recollections and associations connected with Christian history and Christian hope? Far from it; but our reasons are—first, that these reverences, and these settings up of outward signs and symbols, are not commanded or encouraged where we might expect to find them recommended if they were safe and salutary incentives to devotion; but are, on the contrary, expressly forbidden by Him who is wiser than we are, and who understands human nature, its frailties, and its tendency to idol worship, better than we do. And, secondly, because our own experience, and the observation of every honest and intelligent man in the kingdom, tells that these emblems have become the source, not merely of harmless enthusiasm or amiable weakness, but of the most downright and stupid idolatry. We do not wish or mean to impute this to any peculiar perversity of Romanism, but to the natural tendency of our common nature. The natural impulse of the human heart is to make a superstitious use of those sacred emblems and memorials, and thereby to give a misdirection to the religious sentiment, from God and Jesus Christ to canvas, wood, and stone; and it is vain to escape the tremendous responsibility of sanctioning such reverences under metaphysical distinctions of Latria, and Dulia, and Hyperdulia. The Church of Rome itself did not discover these degrees of reverence until the Reformation coerced the Council of Trent, in self-defence, to invent and to promulgate distinctions which—if not without a difference—it is preposterous to imagine that any ignorant peasant can either comprehend or observe. It is a serious question, then, for any conscientious and enlightened Roman Catholic priest (of whom we are satisfied there are many in Ireland) to consider—Do you, in your heart and conscience, believe it possible to hold up any material object—whether it be a golden calf, or a golden image, or a cross—to a mixed congregation of educated and uneducated worshippers, for adoration—as is done, for instance, in Rome, on every Good Friday—and expect that God's law shall not be broken—"Thou shalt not make to thyself a graven image, nor the likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath; thou shalt not adore them nor serve them."—Exod. xx. 5.

When the Spaniards who invaded Peru first beheld the Passion Flower growing on every lofty tree, they regarded it as a token that the American Indians should become their converts. History tells us a humiliating tale of their mode of preaching the Gospel of Christ, and how much the most sacred emblems and objects may be desecrated and abused. The Passion Flower has, for reasons too obvious, become the emblem of religious superstition. Would that the cross of Christ was the rallying point of intelligent Christianity, based exclusively on the meritorious sufferings and bloodshedding of Christ, and that men would look more to the substance and reality of that atonement, and be less concerned about the outward emblems of perishable wood and stone.

There is another flower whose pale beauty is displayed amid the desolation and storm of December—the Christmas Rose (Helleborus Niger)—as beautiful as any that the summer produces. Like flakes of snow or large white roses, its flowers contrast vividly with the dark evergreen of its leaves. It is an Alpine plant, but long since common in our gardens. The Helleborus Orientalis was the black Hellebore of the ancients, which they believed to possess virtue in the cure of insanity. Anticyra, a city of Greece, was famous for its Hellebore, and the proverb, "Naviget Anticyram," was equivalent to send the lunatic to Anticyra. It enjoys a happier association with us, being the emblem of Christian faith.

Christmas, too, is associated with the Mistletoe, the Holly, and the Ivy. The Mistletoe (Viscum album) is a simple, modest plant that cheers the woods at Christmas time. The Druids used it in their sacrificial offerings, and gathered it with superstitious rites, supposing it to possess the virtue of curing certain diseases. The early Christians appear to have borrowed its use from the Druids, as they did the Maytlower on May-day, and employed it as an emblem of joy and gladness at Christmas time. The Holly plant (Ilex aquifolium), with its fearless, hardy leaves, bristling like a hedgehog, was, from an early time, used in decorating churches at Christmas, whence it was called Holy Tree, now corrupted into Holly Tree.

The Ivy is, perhaps, the latest flowering plant of the year; and on a warm winter's day the poor bees may be seen hovering round its sickly-green blossoms. Its berries do not ripen till April. The common Ivy (Hedera helix) displays its clusters of green blossoms in almost every part of the world, and is everywhere linked with the warmest associations, whether it climbs the lofty heart of the forest oak, or mantles the decaying ruin of departed greatness. Among the ancients the Ivy was associated with the festive board, and revelry and mirth, which seems so strange and foreign to its natural haunts and habits.

"Oh, how could they crown with thee,
In ancient days, the god of wine;
And bid thee at the banquet be
Companion of the vine?
Ivy, thy home is where each sound
Of revelry hath long been o'er,
Where song and story once went round
But now are known no more."

There is indigenous to Ireland a very remarkable variety of the Ivy (the Hedera helix vegeta, or Irish or Giant Ivy), prized and cultivated on account of the large size of its foliage and its very rapid growth. The common Ivy attains a great age, and ultimately becomes so thick and strong as to be capable of supporting itself. It is, perhaps, the only climber that is not destructive to the tree that bears it, or that can be reared alongside of a dwelling-house without rendering it damp. How often do we see the trunk of a blighted oak, that had flourished in its pride and glory for ages, at length yielding to the irresistible influence of time, till it sinks into slow decay, and is left leafless and sapless, indebted to its once weak and lowly companion, the Ivy, for its bloom and freshness.

"Round which a luxuriant Ivy had crown,
And clothed it with verdure no longer its own."

But have we learned the lesson it is calculated to teach, and to prize the companion that will cling closest and longest to us?

"Then, in thy youth, beseech of Him
Who giveth and upbraideth not,
That his light in thy heart become not dim,
And his love be not forgot.
And thy God in the darkest of days shall be,
Greatness, and beauty, and strength to thee."

Reader, we must now bid farewell to the flowers. We have been permitted for an entire twelvemonth to walk the garden of nature, and to cull out some of its choicest ornaments, from the Snowdrop of January to the Chrysanthemum of December. We have seen that every month has its flowers, many of which are able to admonish, to instruct, and to cheer us. Our Blessed Lord called upon the lilies of the field to teach an unbelieving people the lesson of faith; and in much humility, and with a desire not to indulge in mere sentimentality or scientific disquisition, we have ventured to present the flowers of the year, as they succeeded each other, in such associations as they seemed to suggest, and, we trust, without offence to one of our numerous and kind readers.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR DECEMBER.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

Wheat may still be sown, but should be got in, if possible, before Christmas. Lea land may be sown as fast as the land can be ploughed up; but in the case of old broken land, if too wet, the sowing must be postponed till it becomes sufficiently dry.

Russian or Winter Beans, Peas, and Winter Vetches may still be sown. For details see former operations.

Lifting and Storing Roots—Advantage of dry weather should be taken henceforth in lifting and storing the several root crops before severe frosts come on. The site chosen for their storing should be cool and dry, and the best aspect is that facing the north; when facing the south or east, early sprouting is encouraged; whereas, if stored at the northern sides of walls, plantations, or hedges, their sprouting is prevented as long as it is possible to do so; when lifted, topped and tailed, the roots are carted off, and built in longitudinal heaps—mangels and turnips about six feet wide at the base, and tapering to a point to the same height. If brush-wood can be conveniently obtained, and laid in in layers, as the roots are being piled up, it will prevent them from tumbling down. Parsnips and carrots should be made up into narrower and lower heaps—say four feet wide and four feet high; they will also be much benefited if packed in sand or moderately dry turf mould. After the roots are packed, the heaps should be thatched, to keep out rain and frost.

Early Potatoes.—In dry weather early sorts of potatoes may still be planted. At this season the lazy-bed system for planting them will be much preferable to the drill. A liberal coat of fresh stable-dung will be requisite, and six inches of cover will preserve the tubers from frost.

Ploughing should be continued in favourable weather, so that all stubble land, and lea for oats, may be completed before the new year.

Draining and Subsoiling should be proceeded with vigorously where needful. After securing a good outfall, begin with the lowest fields, so that each field may fall into its proper places as the works are proceeded with.

Water Meadows.—Obstructions from dead leaves, deposition of silt, &c., should be looked after, and removed from the supply ducts as discovered, so that the water may flow evenly without loss by overflowing. If severe frost comes on, the water must be kept running; but in fine, open weather it should be changed from one quarter to another, as the former becomes saturated, which may be known by a scum rising to the surface, and again returned when the water has sufficiently drained off.

MODERN WORSHIP IN ROME—THE VIRGIN MARY.

It is the policy of the Roman Catholic Church to disguise some, at least, of her practices from those even of her communion, whom they might revolt; and only to disclose them to those, whose minds are fully prepared for their reception. Hence, we sometimes find her educated laity not only ignorant of, but ready to deny (perhaps indignantly) the imputation of such practices to their Church. We have no desire to call into question the sincerity of this denial, or to blame the feeling with which it is sometimes, and not unnaturally, accompanied. But, we think, we have a right to remind such persons, that their denial can only exonerate themselves, but not their Church. That Church must be judged of on these points, not by the private and unauthorized assertions of individuals, but by the conduct of her public functionaries. And where can the proceedings of these latter be more accurately ascertained, than in Rome itself? There the Sovereign Pontiff is supreme in matters civil as well as ecclesiastical. There, not a book can be published, not a theatre opened, not a manufacture commenced, not a railroad constructed, not a steamer launched, without his permission. The religious observances, then, which are there not merely permitted but promoted, may, without mistake, be regarded as essentially hers, and as such ought to be exposed—not more to confirm those who disown her, than to undeceive her too confiding followers elsewhere.

On this account, we have in former numbers described some of the superstitious observances publicly solemnized in Rome.* And we would now call attention to the character of the private worship, sanctioned and daily offered there to the Virgin Mary.

For this purpose, we shall make use of two manuals of devotion published, under authority, in Rome itself.

One of these is entitled, "A daily tribute of affectionate prayers and praises, &c., to the most Holy Mary, Immaculate Mother of God, the Mother of Mercy, and Refuge of Sinners, &c., extracted from the works of the seraphic Doctor St. Bonaventura,"† &c.

The other is styled, "Daily Prayers to the Mother of God, to obtain a happy death; taken from the Psalter of Saint Bonaventura. New translation. Rome, 1834."‡ The language of this translation is more select than that of the former, and the Latin of the saint is given throughout on the opposite page. These circumstances show that it is intended for a higher class of readers. It also is arranged according to the days of the week, so as to be used throughout the year.

Both these little books are published under the highest sanctions that the Roman Church supplies—1st, that of the "Master of the Holy Apostolical Palace," who is at once a leading member of the Inquisition, and of the Congregation of the Index; 2nd, that of the "Vicegerent of the Cardinal Vicar," who, in these matters, is the Pope's representative. These "Imprimaturs" united, may, therefore, be regarded as equivalent to that of the Pope himself.*

Some eminent Roman Catholic authors have disapproved of the Psalter of Bonaventura, and have endeavoured to exonerate him of its authorship, and their Church of its adoption; but the Church of Rome has, at his canonization, fully sanctioned it.†

We may also observe, that the publications themselves supply two practical proofs, that the Pope's decision in this controversy is in favour of the Psalter.

From these manuals we shall, in the present and following numbers, give a few extracts; which will satisfy the candid reader, that the private homage offered to the Virgin in Rome, and offered, as we have proved, with the approbation of the Pope and his two great councils (the Congregations of the Index, and the Inquisition), is of the same character as that offered to God himself.

Our first extracts shall be from the latter of the above books, because in it the Latin of Bonaventura is given opposite to the Italian translation; and we have thus two means of ascertaining the true mind of the Pope, who equally sanctions both.

We shall commence with the Saint's Parody of the "Te Deum;" in which he appropriates to the Virgin, the honour, and praise, and worship, which the Church, in that sublime canticle, had for so many years offered up to God alone.

PARODY OF THE TE DEUM LAUDAMUS.

This production was evidently intended for the humbler classes, being written in a familiar style, and sold for little more than one penny (3 Baj). And in 1849, it had already reached the eleventh edition.

‡ The "powers," "virtues," and "dominations," according to Romish doctors, are three of the angelic orders of Paradise.

* "Tetina beatissima Trichinii nobile Trichinum." The saint seems here to have indulged in a holy play on words. The Italian is not open to this grave objection, as "Trichino" is generally taken to mean, not a couch, but a supping or dining room. We have felt it, however, more reverential to translate it as in the text.

O Pious Virgin Mary, oh, cause that we, together with thy saints, be rewarded with eternal glory.

Let thy people, O Lady, be saved by thee, that we may be made partakers of the inheritance of thy dear Son.

Be thou our guide, be thou our support and defence throughout eternity.

Day by day, O Mary, our Lady, we reverence thee. And we desire with mind and voice to sing thy praises for ever and ever.

Deign, sweetest Mary, now and ever to preserve us from sin.

Have mercy upon us, O Pious (Virgin), have mercy upon us. Be merciful to thy children, because in Thee, O Virgin Mary, have we placed all our trust.

In Thee, sweetest Mary, all we do hope: defend us throughout Eternity.

To Thee be praise, to Thee dominion, to Thee power and glory, without end. Amen.

O pia Vergine Maria, deh! fa che insieme coi Santi tuoi siamo della eterna gloria rimunerati. (Æterna fac, pia Virgo Maria, cum Sanctis tuis nos gloria munerari.)

In ciascun giorno, O Maria Signora nostra, ti salutiamo. E bramiamo cantare le lodi tue colla mente e colla voce in sempiterno.

Abbi, O Pia, di noi misericordia: abbi misericordia di noi. Fa misericordia ai figliuoli tuoi: ché in Te, O Vergine Maria, abbiamo riposta tutta la fiducia nostra.

In te, dolcissima Maria, noi tutti speriamo: difendici in eterno.

A Te le lodi, a Te l'impero, a Te virtù e gloria pei secoli dei secoli. Così sia.

(Te decet laus, te decet imperium, tibi virtus et gloria in sæcula sæculorum. Amen.)

We might safely leave the above extraordinary production without comment to the consideration of the candid reasoner. The Scripture-reading Protestant cannot fail to be grieved, as well as shocked, at finding any body of professing Christians offering to a mere mortal the homage that is due to the Triune God alone. Even the pious Roman Catholic must feel, that in the above overflowing effusion of adoration and praise, something more is conveyed, and intended, than what he has been accustomed to call Hyperdulia. And if he would compare it, clause by clause, with the Scriptures of truth, he would, we are convinced, abandon its defence. This process, however, we can only suggest to him as a private and personal duty. We cannot at present do more than point out a few obvious instances, the consideration of which, may, perhaps, induce him, to complete the inquiry himself. Take for example the second verse of the above. Bonaventura's Latin is—

"Te æterni Patris Sponsam, Omnis terra veneratur."

The Latin of the "TE DEUM" itself is—

"Te æternum Patrem, Omnis terra veneratur."

Thus the very same words omnis terra veneratur are used in the "Te Deum" and in its parody; and, therefore, the very same worship that in the one is ascribed to God, is in the other ascribed to Mary.

Further, the English of this verse of the "TE DEUM," according to the translation sanctioned by Cardinal Wiseman and his twelve suffragan bishops* is—"Eternal Father, by all earth adored."†

Now, "adore," is the word used in the Douay Bible (Ex. xx. 5.) to express the worship which is there forbidden to be offered to any being but God; and which the Roman Catholic Doctors call "Latria." Hence, the Cardinal's authorized translation proves, that these words of the "Te Deum," express the highest worship that can be rendered to Deity. And the above canticle (both in the Latin and Italian) shows, that the appropriation of this worship to the Virgin is sanctioned by the Pope. If, therefore, the will of his Holiness could be made binding through all the earth, we should see "all men honour the" Mother, "even as they honour the Father"—that is, the Virgin would, in point of worship, be placed completely on a level with the Father and the Son; for our Lord hath declared, that the Father "hath" given all judgment to the Son, that all men may honour the "Son, even as they honour the Father."—Douay Bible, John v. 22, 23.

In verse 22 of the above canticle, we find the Virgin addressed as the mediatrix between God and man ("Tu Mediatrix Dei et Hominum"). But the testimony of the Apostle is, "There is one God, and one Mediator of God and man, the man Christ Jesus."—Douay Bible, I Tim. ii. 5.

Immediately after, she is represented as the dispenser of celestial gifts. These, however, by the inspired writers, are ascribed to the Holy Ghost. "The fruit of the Spirit is charity, joy, peace, patience, benignity, goodness, longanimity, mildness, faith, modesty, continence, chastity."—Douay Bible, Gal. v. 22, 23.

Further on, she is described as the "light of truth to the Prophets, the glory and instructress of the Apostles," and the Mistress of the Evangelists. ("Præconium et doctrix Apostolorum, magistra Evangelistarum.") But Peter has assured us, that "prophecy came not by the will of man at any time, but that holy men of God spake, inspired by the Holy Ghost."—Douay Bible, 2. Pet. i. 21. And as to the Apostles and Evangelists, our Lord left not them to the teaching of a woman; but plainly declared to them, "The Paraclete, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things, and bring all things to your mind, whatsoever I shall have said to you."—Douay Bible, John. xiv. 26. "But when He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will teach you all truth. For he shall not speak of himself: but what things soever he shall hear, he shall speak: and the things that are to come he shall show you."—Ibid. xvi. 13.

The effect of all the preceding glorifications of the Virgin is, to set her up as a threefold usurper—a usurper of the worship which is due to God only, of the Mediatorial Office which is essential to Christ, and of the celestial graces, divine teaching, and prophetic inspiration, which proceed from the Holy Ghost. And thus the Pope and his advisers are chargeable with the guilt of sanctioning in Rome a daily devotion, which sins against each person of the Sacred Trinity.

The ignorant and misguided devotee who has thus been instructed to ascribe worship, and mediatorship, and sanctifying grace to the Virgin, is easily led to look to the same being, as all-powerful to protect, to pardon, and to save.

Hence, he is next taught thus to address her—"Make us to be rewarded with thy saints in glory everlasting." "Save thy people, that they may be partakers of the inheritance of thy dear Son." "Be thou our guide, and support, and defence throughout eternity." "Deign both now and ever to preserve us free from sin." "Have mercy upon us, have mercy upon us." "Take pity on thy children, since we have placed all our trust in thee." "All of us hope in thee; defend us throughout eternity." "To thee be praise, and dominion, and power, and glory, world without end!!!"

Could more be ascribed to the Lord of all? could more be sought from Christ himself?

Will the enlightened Roman Catholic of Great Britain join in this worship? and, if not, can he be safe in adhering to a Church, whose ruler, one from whose decision there is no appeal, has already sanctioned it, and who will, if in his power, render it universal?

ROMAN CATHOLIC LITERATURE.

WE have already had occasion to point out, that Roman Catholic writers may be divided into two classes, who present the doctrines of their religion in two very different forms. The one class, who intend their writings to come into the hands of Protestants, take care to soften down all those doctrines which Protestants regard as objectionable. They are careful to distinguish between the authoritative teaching of their Church and the opinions of private divines; they do not like to commit themselves to the defence of more than is asserted in express words by the Council of Trent; and they include, in the class of optional opinions, many of the doctrines which are most firmly believed by Roman Catholics. The other class of writers, who intend their works to circulate among Roman Catholics, make no such distinctions; and, without any reserve or hesitation, teach as certainly true those doctrines to which Protestants are told their Church is not committed. But when we want to know what the Roman Catholic religion really is, it is to the latter class of writers we ought to look rather than the former. We must remember (what their controversial writers often tell us) that the truth of their doctrines does not depend on their being formally declared by the Church, but on their having been always believed. There was a time before councils had explicitly declared any of their doctrines; but still they hold that these doctrines were no less true, and had been no less generally received before. When, then, we want to know what the Roman Catholic religion really is, what we ought to inquire is, what are the doctrines, which are generally believed by Roman Catholics, which are publicly taught by the priests, and which are contained in works circulated with the approval of Roman Catholic authorities? Such doctrines, if not yet declared to be articles of faith, which men are bound to believe on peril of their salvation, are liable to become so at any moment, whenever the Church shall be pleased to declare her belief in them.

We have, accordingly, already devoted a few articles to the consideration of the literature which is circulated, with approbation, among Roman Catholics, and hope, with God's blessing, from time to time, to give our readers some further information on the same subject; from which they will be able to judge what a mass of doctrine has been developed since the time of the Council of Trent, and is ready to be elevated into the rank of articles of faith, by the next general council that may be assembled. But we have had opportunity to observe, that even the controversial writings of Roman Catholics may be divided into the same two classes. Besides those, which are expected to come into the hands of Protestants, in which some caution is used in the selection of arguments, and some degree of fairness and honesty in the quotations employed, there is another class of works, intended merely for the use of Roman Catholics, in order to make their minds comfortable in the belief of the doctrines of their Church; and in these a very different method is pursued. We shall, in this article, give our readers a specimen of one of these books, but we must first tell how our attention happened to be directed to it.

Those who possess our first volume will notice there the names of two or three Roman Catholic correspondents, who have not continued to give us the benefit of their communications; and we may recall to their memories the occasion on which one of these, who signed himself, "Warner Christian Search," discontinued his letters to us. In the course of his correspondence with us, "Warner Christian Search" quoted Bishop Jeremy Taylor as expressing himself in favour of the opinions which he advocated. But we found it easy to point out that in the passage in question, Bishop Jeremy Taylor was not expressing his own opinions at all, and that the words, "says the Romanist," which would have made this clear, had been cut out of the quotation. From the calm and temperate tone of the letters of "Warner Christian Search" to us, we felt assured that he had been imposed upon by others, and had not been guilty of the dishonesty of himself garbling the citation from Jeremy Taylor; but we called on him in justice to his own character, to tell from what book he had taken his quotation, otherwise he should bear the blame himself. "Warner Christian Search" replied, that he had not taken the quotation in question from Bishop Taylor's own writings, but from a controversial work on Purgatory, by a Roman Catholic writer. As he still did not give the name of the work from which the quotation was derived, we again called on him, as he valued his character for honesty and truth, to give up his authority, otherwise, though he was not guilty of fraud himself, he could not be exculpated from the charge of screening from exposure, the writer who had been guilty of imposture.

We have never had any reply since from "W.C. Search;" and we confess that we noted his silence with regret. He seemed to be a person disposed to conduct controversy in a candid and Christian spirit; discussion with whom might have been expected to be profitable, had he not unfortunately trusted to a treacherous guide, whom, even after proof of his unfair dealing, he had not moral courage to disavow.

We had never happened to fall in with the "controversial book on Purgatory," to which "Warner Christian Search" referred, until our attention was lately again drawn to the subject by an English correspondent. He tells us that, having recently met some of the numbers of our paper, he had been induced to order the back volumes, and had thus become acquainted with our controversy with "W. C. Search." He turned over our pages in vain to find where "W. C. Search" had answered our appeal for the name of his authority, when it happened that he was enabled himself to detect the guilty party. A Roman Catholic friend put into his hands a most "convincing and unanswerable" defence of Purgatory, which turned out to be the very book from which "W. C. Search" had drawn his quotation. The title of it is "The Doctrine of Purgatory, Patriarchal, Perpetual, and Universal—Scriptural, Patristical, Protestantal, and Rational. By the Rev. Wm. Marshall. Third Edition, 1853. London: J. Brown. Dublin: J. Duffy." That this book has some circulation among Roman Catholics, sufficiently appears from its having reached a third edition; and that it is not intended for the eyes of Protestants (or, at least, of educated Protestants), appears from the reluctance of "W. C. Search" to disclose the name of it, although Roman Catholics evidently ought to be glad to make known to the many Protestant readers of this paper, any really valid defence of their religion.

But, certainly, on looking over the book, we saw good reasons why "W. C. Search" should not have been very forward to produce it. Mr. Marshall evidently knew very well that very good reasons are not wanted in order to convince people who are convinced already, and that he was addressing those who would not inquire very severely into the accuracy of his quotations, or the fairness of his arguments. Accordingly, he acts like one whose business it was to supply plenty of arguments to persons not likely to be too particular as to the quality of them, provided the number were complete. With marvellous dexterity he manufactures witnesses for Purgatory, out of the most refractory materials—Luther and Calvin, Archbishop Ussher and Bishop Bull, Bishop Andrewes, Bingham, the Saturday Magazine, and the [unonymous] Cambridge Professor of Divinity, are marshalled with Bishop Taylor (whose evidence we are told, is a host in itself), in defence of the doctrine of Purgatory. We have already pointed out (see vol. i., pp. 107, 125) how poor Jeremy Taylor came to be pressed into the service. There is a well-known chapter in the "Liberty of Prophesying," in which Bishop Taylor argues against the persecution of Roman Catholics, by pointing out that they were not wilfully in error, but were deceived by certain plausible arguments; and, we have shown, that Mr. Marshall is not the first Roman Catholic writer who has made a dishonest use of this chapter, by quoting, as Taylor's own sentiments, the language which he there puts into the mouth of Roman Catholics. Our readers will guess that the other Protestant writers whom we have mentioned, are not, in reality, more favourable than Jeremy

* "The Missal for the use of the Laity," &c., "with the approbation of the Cardinal Archbishop, and all the Bishops of England." London: Dolman, 1853. Part III., p. 135.

† The cardinal's translation is supported by Facciolati—"Venerer to adore, revere, honour, worship, respect, venerate, &c." The quotations also show that this word is constantly adopted by Cicero to express the worship due to the gods.

Taylor to the cause, into the service of which Mr. Marshall has so violently enlisted them.

Mr. Marshall devotes another chapter to the patristical testimony for Purgatory. Our readers will judge of the fairness with which his list is made out, when we tell them the first name on his list of uninspired witnesses. It is a great father, Mr. Marshall tells us, who flourished, A.D. 51, the disciple and convert of St. Paul—who do you suppose?—Dionysius the Areopagite!! The quotation, to be sure, is not much to the purpose; but just fancy any one at the present day, with the slightest pretensions to learning, seriously quoting, as the work of a Father of the first century, such an exploded forgery as the works of Dionysius the Areopagite. We can scarcely conceive it possible that Mr. Marshall was not aware of the character of the work he was citing; and we fear his conduct, in this respect, is only of a piece with his ingenious quotation from Jeremy Taylor.

It will be supposed that a writer either so ignorant or so dishonest as this, does not deserve any serious refutation, nor should we have devoted an article to him but for the very curious line of argument which he pursues in his first chapter, and which we think deserves to be made known to our readers. We should add, too, that it is not Mr. Marshall's own invention, but taken by him from popular French writers; and it is, therefore, not uninteresting to learn the views as to the character of their religion maintained by Roman Catholic writers in so influential a country as France, and which are thought worthy of being translated for the benefit of Roman Catholics of this country, and have been received by them with such favour as to pass to three editions.

In order to explain these views, we must begin by reminding our readers that many Protestant writers (see, for example, Middleton's letter from Rome) have been struck by the resemblance of some of the rites and practices of Romanism, to the old superstitions of heathenism. They have pointed out how Christians came to be placed under the temptation to pervert the simplicity of their religion, in order to accommodate it to the prejudices of their heathen friends, so as to enable those, for example, who were addicted to the use of images or to the worship of deified mortals, to combine these practices with the profession of Christianity. Protestant writers have pointed out the great similarity between the controversy which they have to conduct with Roman Catholics, and that which the early apologists for Christianity had to conduct with the heathen. The defenders of Paganism asserted that they did not pay direct worship to images, though they used them in their religious services—that they worshipped one supreme God, although they invoked the assistance of other inferior beings. The advocates of Christianity, on the other hand, rejected these apologies as insufficient, and condemned the use of images as absolutely unlawful. It would lengthen this article too much were we to attempt to enumerate the various points of resemblance that have been traced between modern Romanism and ancient Paganism. This is a subject, on which, until of late years, Roman Catholic writers have not been very fond of touching. In our times, however, they have found courage to grapple with it. We quoted in our number for October last, the defence of the Roman Catholic system, given by the French writer, M. Beugnot. He distinctly admits the fact, that great changes were made in the Christian religion in the fourth and fifth centuries, but defends them as part of a wise and necessary policy, employed in order to gain over the heathens into the Church; he endeavours to show, that the system which has grown into Romanism, originated in a compromise between Christianity and Paganism, essential, in his opinion, to the success of the former religion. We shall not now stop to inquire what is to be thought of those who represent the Founder of our religion as so ignorant of human nature as to leave it to the worldly policy of his followers, some hundreds of years after his departure from the world, to supply those deficiencies in his scheme, without which his doctrines could never have obtained universal diffusion. It is the less necessary to expose M. Beugnot's errors, as he has been far outdone by the French writers, whom Mr. Marshall has followed in the work before us. While other Roman Catholics have endeavoured to conceal, or to deny the resemblance between Romanism and Paganism—while M. Beugnot endeavours to account and apologize for it—Mr. Marshall triumphantly calls attention to the many points of similarity between the religion of the Roman Catholics and that of the Egyptians, the Greeks, the Chinese, the Tartars, the North American Indians, &c., and concludes, that these people were all evidently better Christians than Protestants.

It does not, at first sight, appear obvious why the similarity of Roman Catholic notions to those of the heathens, should be an argument in their favour. The following sentence, which contains Mr. Marshall's notions on the subject, will hardly be thought satisfactory by any one who is not convinced beforehand that the Roman Catholic doctrines are true:—

"Whether the Pagans received this doctrine by patriarchal tradition and from Noah's own lips, before the dispersion, which is most likely, or whether they learned it in after days, from the Jews, through the medium of their philosophers, or whether, in fine, it was a law engraved upon their hearts by God's own finger, is immaterial as to the subject under discussion."—p. 9.

We have already given the reader to understand, that the particular doctrine which Mr. Marshall endeavours to prove to be handed down from Noah, is that of Purgatory; but he does not confine his labours to this point, and endeavours, in passing, to clear his friends, the heathens, from the charge of polytheism, which has been rashly brought against them.

"The Pagans in giving the generic name of all spirits, did not, however, give equal honour to all. 'We say, once for all,' observes a celebrated writer,* 'to those of our readers who have not studied antiquity, that the ancients, not even excepting the Jewish people, gave the generic name of Gods to all the celestial and infernal spirits, and even to men whom they canonized. It is still very common in Asia, Africa, and America; but, notwithstanding this, they at all times know well how to distinguish amongst the celestial gods, the God supreme, uncreated and Creator. They, like the Catholics, adored one God; like them they honoured the angels, like them they paid a secondary respect to the saints, and that has always been the case; so that, on these points, they were more Christian than the Protestant sectaries.' [!!!] 'There is a marked analogy,' adds another writer,† 'between the gods of the Pagans and our angels; between their deified heroes and our saints. No one can deny the existence of the celestial spirits that God employs in the government of the world; it is, in like manner, certain that the angels are not of a nature so different from man, that the latter should not associate with them after death, when he merits it by his virtue. Such has always been the belief of mankind.' Celsus, as quoted by Origin [sic] speaks precisely in the same manner (lib. 7, v. 68). Therefore, the Pagans, though calling all the heavenly and infernal spirits, as well as their heroes and geniuses, gods, were not polytheists."—Marshall, p. 5.

We have to thank Mr. Marshall for the pains he has taken to establish a point we have often dwelt on (see, for example, volume ii., page 21)—namely, the similarity between the pleas now offered by the Roman Catholics in defence of their system, and those which the heathens put forward of old. If Roman Catholics are in the right, it is certainly quite true that the Pagans were much better Christians than Protestant sectaries, and it might be added, than the Christian writers of the first three centuries. But if the defenders of Christianity in early times were right in rejecting those pleas which the heathen put forward in defence of their image-worship and their polytheism, are Protestants wrong in refusing to admit them now?

We come now to notice some of Mr. Marshall's testimonies on the subject of Purgatory. We quote first his remarks, which are rather curious, on the fact that the heathens, some of them, believed in the transmigration of souls, as a sort of preparatory purification of souls—

"It is not surprising that such a popular error as the transmigration of souls should have made its way into a mere matter of opinion. I say a mere matter of opinion; for it never has been yet defined, even in the true Church, where Purgatory is, or in what its pains consist, &c., &c. So that we are at liberty, as much as the Pagans, to entertain our own views upon those subjects, without infringing upon an article of faith. All the Church requires of us to believe concerning Purgatory is, 'that there is such a place, and that the souls therein detained are relieved by our prayers and good works, but more especially by the holy sacrifice of the Mass.' Now, these essential points are found in the doctrines of the Pagans, notwithstanding the diversity of their opinions as to the manner, time, and place of the punishment; and if fault is to be found with them for their discrepancy on this head, Protestants should be the last in the world to reproach them with it."—Marshall, page 4.

We dare say that many of our Roman Catholic readers will be surprised to learn that their Church allows them so much latitude of opinion on the subject of Purgatory—that even if they hold the transmigration of souls they would retain all that is essential in their Church's doctrine. But we feel that if Mr. Marshall had been half as charitable to the Protestants as he is to the Pagans, he might have discovered that they, too, hold all that is essential in the doctrine of Purgatory. We, too, are willing to admit "that there is a Purgatory, and that the souls detained there are helped by the prayers of the faithful." The time and place of Purgatory are confessedly non-essential matters, and the only difference is, that we place our Purgatory in this world, and maintain that the only time when souls are purified must be on this side of the grave.

We must, in conclusion, give a few specimens of the manner in which Mr. Marshall collects the testimonies of all nations to "the essential parts" of the doctrine of Purgatory. We need not repeat what he says as to the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Babylonians, and others, who are said to have believed in the transmigration of souls. We pass on to the testimony of the Romans. We have already quoted (vol. ii., p. 58) the account given by Virgil of his Purgatory, thinking, in the simplicity of our hearts, that it was some presumption against the truth of the doctrine, that a statement, made by a heathen, of the doctrines of the heathen religion—of the religion of false gods—should serve so exactly to express the doctrine of the Church of Rome now. Mr. Marshall, however, takes a very different view of the case, and quotes Virgil with great relish, concluding thus (p. 14)—"The Romans believed in three distinct places for souls after this life; they practised piety, and offered prayers and sacrifices for those whose sins were expiable. They could not do more had they been orthodox Christians." He tells us, also (p. 12)—"The people of the Thibetans was founded by Magog, the grandson of Noah, by Japhet, and inherited the sacred traditions of the patriarchs, through which they not only believed and practised all that was enacted with regard to Purgatory, but even celebrated All Soul's Day, and perfectly coincided with our Saviour's idea of heaven, 'there are many mansions in my Father's house,' and of hell, where each shall suffer according to the number of his crimes."

We give next Mr. Marshall's account of "the savages" (p. 16)—"It can be asserted that nothing is better observed among the savages in general, than respect for the dead. The women burn offerings on the tombs, and consign to the flames all the substance of the deceased. [What savage waste—why not give them to the priests?] They believe that they can appease the souls with the effusion of blood. The inhabitants near the river Palmas celebrate the anniversaries of their dead, and the relatives of the deceased accompany the ceremonies of these anniversaries with many incisions on the body, from which blood abundantly flows. The savages, therefore—yes, the wild, naked, and ignorant red savages of North America—are more orthodox upon this and many other essential points of Christian faith than many of the sanctimonious and Bible-reading Protestants of this enlightened country."

From the North Americans Mr. Marshall passes to the Turks. He says (page 17)—"The veneration that the Mussulmen entertain for Mahomet, does not prevent their being more Christian than a multitude of other Protestants. They have preserved many dogmas, institutions, and practices which were rejected by Protestants. Besides the belief in a Purgatory, we shall mention the devotion to guardian angels, the intercession of saints, the veneration for their tombs and for their relics, pilgrimages, profound respect for the writings of the holy doctors, the monastic orders, the lent, &c., &c."

It would be tedious were we to go through the other nations which Mr. Marshall has adduced as witnesses for Purgatory; enough has been said to show in what respectable company he claims to hold the doctrine. We add, in conclusion, the peroration with which Mr. Marshall concludes this branch of his subject. Any of our readers who are familiar with the style of French eloquence, will recognise, with patriotic gratitude, that the nonsense we have been copying is not of home manufacture.

"Enough, Jews! enough, Gentiles! Natives of the earth, 'tis enough! The immense unanimity of your testimonies, in diffusing itself all over the wide world, has submersed all incertitude, elevated itself above the highest exigencies of logic—the unique, the perpetual, the universal existence of this dogma is established now and for ever. People of the tombs—venerable manes of those nations that have slept for ages—return in peace to the cities of the dead, to the realms of the departed; the dogma which ye have so much honoured and cherished is fully satisfied with this last homage that ye have given to it, and the mementoes of which shall long be present in the grateful memories of the living."

HISTORY OF THE POPES—No. III.

THE TENTH CENTURY CONTINUED.

In resuming the history of the Popes of the tenth century (the last part of which appeared in our number for November) we ask our readers to remember—first of all, that we are not selecting instances here and there, but giving the history of all the Popes of that century in their order; secondly, that we are not giving the history from any Protestant writers, but from the famous and learned Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart, in their great work on the Councils, in which they have given the history of the Popes also; thirdly, that wherever the Jesuits find it in their power to praise a Pope, we give that praise in full. So our readers may safely take the history, as the most favourable that can be given of the Popes.*

POPE LEO VI.

"Leo, the son of Christopher the chief secretary, the sixth of this name, was made Pope about the end of the year of Christ 928, in the time of Constantine the Emperor. In the following year, being cast into prison, he died, after six months and fifteen days."† But how he died, or for whose wickedness he was imprisoned—his own, or his successor's—the Jesuits do not tell. A Pope being cast into prison was, in that age, too common a thing (as our readers must have learned from our November number) to excite much attention.

POPE STEPHEN VII.

This is the same called Stephen VIII. in Bishop Milner's list, which we gave in our November number; but the Jesuits count him Stephen VII. Strange that Roman Catholics cannot agree about who were Popes, and who were not! "Stephen, a Roman by nation, the son of Theudemund, the seventh of this name, was appointed in the room of Leo VI., in the year of our Lord 929, in the time of Constantine and Romanus, Emperors of the East; who, when he had sat two years, one month, and fifteen days, departed this life."* And that is all they have to say of him. But let us have patience; the life of his successor will be more full.

POPE JOHN XI.

"John, the son of his father, the false Pope Sergius, by the strumpet Marozia, was intruded into the place of Stephen by the power of Wido, Marquis of Tuscany, and of his mother, Marozia, in the year of Christ 931, in the time of Constantine and Romanus, Emperors of the East—at which time he could not yet have been capable by age of so great a dignity, even though no other impediment stood in the way.† Artaldus, a most holy man, who, from being a monk, was elected Archbishop of Rheims after the boy of fifteen years of age was cast out, would never have sought the pall from a MONSTER of this kind, had he not thought so highly of the name of Roman Pope, that he thought that name was to be honored even in a man unworthily and unlawfully appointed, and had persuaded himself that the Apostolic See was to be judged by none but by God."‡

We trust that our readers will observe, that such reverence for the name of Pope, and such a doctrine that "the Apostolic See" cannot be judged by man, is a poor security for the Church, when it leads archbishops, "most holy men," to bow down before such a monster, acknowledging him as head of the Church, and Vicar of Christ. But to proceed with the history of Pope John XI.—"Alberic, his brother, together with his mother, Marozia, kept this Pope enthralled in prison to the day of his death. Marozia offered the dominion of the city to Hugo, brother of her deceased husband King Wido, if he would promise that he would make a confederacy by marrying her. Hugo accepted the condition, and, having entered the citadel of St. Angelo by stealth, after incest committed with the widow of his brother, he despised the Romans; he knocked down his stepson Alberic, whilst, by the command of his mother, Marozia, he poured water on her hands, as if he poured out too much of it. Which injury that he (Alberic) might avenge, he stirred up the Romans to revolt; and after the citadel was stormed, as Luitprand says, he put to flight his incestuous father-in-law, Hugo; but he ordered his mother, Marozia, with his brother, the fallen Pope John, to be detained in prison, in which the violent invader, violently cast down, died, after he had not so much ruled as foully defiled the Apostolic See for five years and some months."§

A family quarrel worthy of such a family! But what an account of how a Pope was appointed, and how he died! Yet this "monster," as the Jesuits call him, is counted by Bishop Milner as a lawful Pope, as a Vicar of Christ, who performed his duty as such IRREPROACHABLY, and as a step in the apostolic succession, by which the title of the present Pope must be proved!

POPE LEO VII.

This Pope sat three years and six months. The Jesuits tell us nothing of him, except that he got Odo, Abbot of Clugni, to settle the above-mentioned family quarrel and boxing-match between Hugo and Alberic.

But they relate a fact which happened in his pontificate, and added not a little, they say, to the troubles of the Church. Manasses, Bishop of Arles, seized upon the dioceses of Verona, Trent, Mantua, and Milan, in addition to his own; and Manasses said he was only following the example of St. Peter, who was Bishop of Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria at the same time! But if St. Peter must answer for all that has been done in his name, he will have a heavy account.‖

POPE STEPHEN VIII.

This Pope is called Stephen IX. by Bishop Milner. We cannot expect much in the history of this Pope, on account of an ugly accident which happened to him. Labbe and Cossart say "he was elected by the Romans, the votes of the cardinals having been set aside.* His accident is thus related—"This Pope was deformed in the face by many sacrilegious blows, by the tyrants, whose hatred he had excited against himself on account of his election."† It is commonly thought that his nose and ears were cut off. The effect of these injuries on him is thus related—"And although these brands, inflicted for righteousness' sake, by the ministers of Satan, were not a disgrace, but an ornament, yet, from this cause, he abstained as much as possible from the public assemblies of men."‡ Nothing is harder to bear than personal shame; and the Pope could not think the loss of his nose an ornament. Father Paul says he never after appeared in public.§ So he shut himself up for three years and four months, and then died, leaving no further materials for history.

POPE MARINUS II.

Marinus was made Pope in the year 943. The Jesuits say, that twenty-three years before, when Udalric was coming to Rome, this Marinus foretold to him the death of his predecessor, Adelbero, and that Udalric should be his successor. The character and conduct of Marinus is thus described—"He applied himself wholly to composing the Church, by the reformation of the clergy as well as of the monks, and by the restoration of churches and the care of the poor; by his letters he accomplished that peace should be established between Christian princes contending with each other."‖

Such a Pope was, indeed, wanted; and a heavy task he had to perform. But he only sat three years and six months. "In his time," the Jesuits say, "the image of Christ, the Redeemer, miraculously impressed, and sent to King Abgarus, was removed to Constantinople, when Edessa was besieged by the Romans, in the year 946." This "miraculous image" was one of the many lying stories which the Church of Rome has helped to impose upon the world. Perhaps no Roman Catholic would now be found who would undertake to say that this miracle really happened; yet it is related as a true miracle by these most learned Jesuits, and the story did its work for the Church of Rome in its day. Well, at least, when one lying story is proved false, the Church of Rome can always get up another—witness the winking picture of Rimini, and the apparition of La Salette.

POPE AGAPETUS II.

No facts are related of him, but that he decided a contested election to the Archbishopric of Rheims; gave a pall to Bruno, Archbishop of Cologne; and confirmed the privileges of the Church of Hamburg, on occasion of the conversion of the Danes. His history thus concludes—"when he had well discharged his pastoral office, during nine years, seven months, and ten days, he departed this life."¶

POPE JOHN XII.

John, the son of that Alberic who ruled over the city (of Rome), invaded the Apostolic See, in the year of our Lord 955, in the time of the Emperor Constantine VIII.; and although the lawful age, and ALL OTHER THINGS which are required in a lawful Pope, were wanting in him, yet (the consent of the whole clergy afterwards accruing to him) it seemed that he was rather to be tolerated, than that the Church should be divided by any schism, which otherwise would have arisen; and since the universal Catholic Church knew that it was a less evil to bear a head, however monstrous, than that one body should be cut in two and deformed with two heads, she venerated him as a true and lawful Pope throughout the whole world."

This is so important in relation to that doctrine of the Church of Rome, which teaches that the Pope is the head of the Church, and that it is necessary to salvation to be subject to this head, that we shall keep it to be considered in a separate article; so we proceed now with the history of John XII.

"He truly is the first Pope that is met with who changed his name, which, on account of his tyranny, changed but not forsaken, he wished to be called John, instead of Octavianus. His father, Alberic, called his son Octavianus with a view to the temporal dominion of the city: but he, on the contrary, having obtained the pontificate and the spiritual dominion of the whole world, wished to be called by this name of John."*

This name, JOHN, signifies "the grace or mercy of God." But the Popes of this name have been the most graceless of all—as if God would thus show the falsehood of the pretences of Popes. In this century alone, so far as we have gone, in the space of 40 years—Pope John X. was appointed solely through his infamous connection with a vile woman; Pope John XI. was the son of another Pope, by a strumpet, and was chosen Pope for that very reason; and, now, a Pope, who was "wanting in everything required in a lawful Pope," must call himself John XII.! And in this Pope we find the origin of the custom, since become universal, of Popes changing their names at their appointment. Another mark of the succession of modern Popes being derived through these monsters of iniquity. The Jesuits go on to relate the wars in which Pope John XII. engaged; the oath of allegiance which he took to the Emperor; how he broke his oath, and fled to avoid punishment; how the Romans swore never again to appoint any one Pope without the Emperor's consent; how the Emperor held a synod, in which John was degraded from the Papacy, and Leo VIII. appointed a "false Pope;" and how Pope John, on the departure of the Emperor, returned and deposed Leo VIII. as an adulterer and invader of the See. But the death of Pope John must be related in their own words—"Concerning the unhappy end of Pope John, the author, who is said to be Luitprand,† writes these things—'On a certain night, as he was delighting himself with the wife of a certain man, he was so struck by the devil on the head, that within the space of eight days he died of that wound,' not because, as he says, being justly condemned, he was unjustly received (into the Papacy), but because being admonished by God so often, and with so great troubles, he did not abstain FROM HIS ACCUSTOMED SINS."‡

One would suppose that a Pope would be justified from the charge of habitual adultery, and of being killed in the act of adultery, if it were possible; but the Jesuits do not undertake to deny the story, nor do they think it of any consequence to do so; they say expressly that they "do not dispute the truth of this story, in as much as these things bring no damage to the Catholic faith, concerning which we confess, with unanimous consent, that Peter, and the successors of Peter, after the promise of Christ received, could fail in morals indeed, but not in faith!"§

When our readers shall hear that distinction put forward again by Roman Catholic writers, we trust they will remember what great necessity the Roman Church had to invent that distinction. For be it remembered that this Pope John XII. is in Bishop Milner's list of the succession, through which the title of the present Pope must be proved; and it was, of course, necessary to maintain, that a Pope, "in whom all things were wanting that are required in a lawful Pope," who lived in "habitual adultery," might yet perform "his public duties," as Vicar of Christ, IRREPROACHABLY!

How did our Blessed Saviour prove that the Jews were the children of the devil? we find it in the 8th chapter of St. John's Gospel—"whosever committeth sin is the servant of sin" (verse 34); "ye do the deeds of your father" (verse 41); ye are of your father, the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do."—verse 44. We think Roman Catholics cannot deny that a man who professes to live in holy virginity, and yet lives and dies in habitual adultery, does the lusts of the devil, and is a child of the devil; yet, according to the doctrine we are now considering—viz., "that a Pope may err in morals, but not in faith"—such a child of the devil may "perform his public duty, in preserving the faith and unity of the Church irreproachably;" as Bishop Milner says, all these monsters of iniquity in the 10th century actually did!—End of Controversy, letter 28, cent. x.

But if no degree of moral iniquity, or profligacy, or depravity can hinder a man from performing the office of Pope irreproachably, so long as he cannot err in faith, why might not the evil one himself prove an irreproachable head for the Church of Rome? St. James says—"the devils BELIEVE and tremble." The devil knows, with the greatest certainty of conviction, that Christ is the son of the living God; that Christ was born of a virgin, and was made man; that He died for our sins, and rose again; and that He will come to judge the world. The devil believes with the highest degree of conviction, and he trembles! Could Pope John XII. do more?

We ask our readers to consider what objection there

We shall conclude the history of the Popes of the tenth century in our next number.

THE USE OF FORMS OF PRAYER.

We have, in another article, given our readers one specimen of a Roman Catholic controversialist; but as it is our principle always to deal with the best arguments, and the most formidable opponents we can find arrayed against us, we consider it right to introduce them, also, to a higher class of Roman Catholic writers. We are, indeed, ready to acknowledge the marked increase that has taken place of late years in the ability of their controversial publications. Much of this improvement, no doubt, is owing to the accession which their ranks have gained in some recent converts from Protestantism; men (our Maynooth friends will forgive us for saying) of a higher education than has usually adorned the Romish priesthood, and who besides, as deserters, possess the advantage of knowing the exact points against which to direct their fire; or, to speak without any metaphor, of knowing the difficulties most likely to be felt by Protestants, and the arguments most likely to tell with them.

We have before us now a little bundle of controversial tracts, in which we think we do not mistake in saying we observe traces of Protestant education. We select for review that on the "Rosary of the Blessed Virgin Mary," partly because we have no doubt its statements as to Roman Catholic opinions and practices will convey real information to many Protestant readers on points of which they were ignorant; partly because its line of argument has been reproduced—whether by the same or a different writer—in a late (the November) number of the "Rambler."

We take from the "Rambler"—which is the most concise—the following statement of the difficulty which the writer professes to encounter:—

"In the Rosary, we must first remind our Protestant readers, the 'Hail Mary' is repeated one hundred and fifty times; the 'Our Father,' ten times; and the 'Glory be to the Father,' ten times. Frequently only one-third of the whole is said at once; but the proportion of the three prayers remains the same. This is, at least, the case with that which is commonly called 'the Rosary,' or 'The Rosary of the Blessed Virgin,' for there are others constructed on different plans. This Rosary is, also, the most universally in use of all Catholic popular devotions. It is said repeatedly by every Catholic, from the Pope downwards. Indeed, on an average, it is scarcely too much to state that one-third of the whole is said almost daily by every devout Catholic above the age of childhood.

"Now, all that non-Catholics know of this devotion is, that for every Pater Noster and Gloria Patri we say ten Ave Marias. Is not the deduction inevitable that we think ten (or, rather, five) times as much of the Blessed Virgin as of Almighty God? Or, to be extremely charitable, that we pray five times as often to Mary as to our God and Saviour? So, at least, the world has decided against us.

"But what is the fact? The fact is, that this is not the Rosary which we say, and that no such Rosary exists at all, or was ever heard of in the Catholic Church. The doctrine of the Rosary consists in meditations with the understanding and the heart on the chief events of the life and passion of Jesus Christ, and the great blessings of the Gospel, while, with the lips, we recite all these Hail Marys, Lord's Prayers, and Doxologies."

As we think it possible some of our Protestant readers may be so stupid as not to perceive, on the first reading, the exact point of this defence, we hope to make the matter more clear to them by laying before them the explanation of the use of forms of prayer, which we have learned from Roman Catholic writers. Our readers are aware that differences of opinion prevail among different denominations of Protestants on the question whether extemporc prayer is preferable to the use of forms in public worship. They know, also, that the Church of Rome not only agrees with the Church of England in the use of public forms of prayer, but that she carries the use of forms in private devotions to a much greater extent than is common among the members of the reformed Churches. The following extract (from the tract on the Rosary), however, will prove that members of the Church of Rome are not insensible to the force of some objections that may be urged against the use of forms:—

"The defect of this method of devotion is, that in saying words composed by others, we must ask exactly for what they express, and sometimes they will not quite express our own feelings. Sometimes, perhaps, we are ashamed to utter words of absorbing self-abasement, when we are conscious that our own sense of contrition is less deep; or it may be the words before us are all full of joyful love, and we would only be lying at the foot of the cross, crushed and humbled under the intolerable sense of sin. Then, again, our wants are so various, one could not find prayers to meet them all. Sometimes they are very distinct, growing out of the cares of to-day—the little things which belong to our own life, but which may seem unimportant to other people—difficulties and temptations which may not occur to other minds, but are very grave and real to us. Sometimes, again, they are not so clear and definite. There are feelings which others cannot understand, and which, perhaps, we do not well understand ourselves. Nothing it may be, but a weariness, and the sense of a great need. It is not that we have this or that to ask for in particular, but we feel weak, and fretful, and unhappy; we desire only to kneel down in God's presence and let him see all our hearts, and then the best-chosen phrases of other men seem stiff and empty. We do not seek for words; or, if any are needed, let them be such as will mould themselves to the fashion of our own unutterable thoughts.

"Surely all must know what I mean, that there is often a consciousness of sin impossible to confess, and a sense of prayer impossible to put into any set form of words. We may try to use our own, chosen at the moment; if so, how difficult it is to select those that are right and good! Sometimes we say the same thing over and over again; sometimes, try as hard as we may, what we say does not express our meaning—it vexes us that our words should be so vague and indistinct, and we puzzle ourselves to find better; and so, in thinking for right expressions, we lose time, and our thoughts get distracted."

Here, then, are some objections, forcibly stated, to the use of forms of prayer—at least in private devotion. How are they to be got over? How are the confessed advantages of forms to be reconciled with the elasticity of extemporaneous prayer? The secret consists in knowing how to use forms in the right manner. We have already given our readers the key to the enigma, and, therefore, without further mystery, announce to them, that the proper way of employing forms of prayer is to use the forms with the lips while the thoughts are occupied with something else.

Some of our Protestant readers will think this strange, and will, perhaps, find it hard to believe that such advice has been given by Roman Catholics; but if they will reflect for a moment, they will remember, that in the Roman Catholic Church the public service is conducted in Latin—a language not understood by the people—that it is absolutely impossible for them to follow, with their thoughts, the words of the service, and that all that can be expected of them is, that they should occupy their minds, during the time of worship, with some kind of holy and prayerful thoughts, by no means, however, necessarily corresponding to the words uttered by the officiating minister. Nor is this confined to persons ignorant of Latin. A Protestant clergyman, a few years ago, paid a visit to Rome, directing his particular attention to the religious ceremonial, and has published an account of what most struck him. One of the points he noticed, which appeared to him most remarkable was, that the non-officiating clergymen, at the different churches, were almost invariably engaged, during the time of divine worship, with their private books of devotion, that no two of them were occupied in the same study, and that scarcely any one dreamed of following the service actually being performed. Mr. Seymour merely records faithfully what he saw, without giving any theory to account for it, as we are now in a position to do. Our readers, then, must learn, that there are three kinds of attention which may be given to prayer. The first kind is, when you follow the words of the prayer, and attend to their meaning. This is the lowest kind of attention, and almost any one is capable of it. The second kind is, when your heart is filled with the spirit of prayer, without particular attention to the words employed. The third kind is, when you attend to the words, and have the spirit of prayer too. This last kind of attention is, undoubtedly, the best, but is of such a kind that only a few exalted souls are capable of it.

We take the above statement of doctrine from Father Baker's work, "Sancta Sophia," quoted as a standard authority by Mr. Faber, in his book, "All for Jesus," from which we have already made several quotations. We think it better to give our readers Father Baker's own statement of his doctrine—"Now, whereas, in all manner of prayer, there is necessarily required an attention of the mind, without which it is not prayer, we must know that there are several kinds and degrees of attention, all of them good, but yet one more perfect and profitable than another; for—1st, there is an attention, or express reflection on the words and sense of the sentence pronounced by the tongue, or revolved in the mind. Now, this attention being, in the vocal prayer, necessarily to vary and change, according as sentences in the Psalms, &c., do succeed one another, cannot so powerfully and efficaciously fix the mind or affections on God, because they are presently to be recalled to new considerations or succeeding affections. This is the lowest and most imperfect degree of attention, of which all souls are, in some measure, capable; and the more imperfect they are, the less difficulty there is in yielding it; for souls that have good and established affections to God, can hardly quit a good affection by which they are united to God, and which they find gustful and profitable for them, to exchange it for a new one succeeding in the office; and, if they should, it would be to their prejudice.

"The second degree is that of souls indifferently well practised in internal prayer, who, coming to the reciting of the office, and either bringing with them, or by occasion of such reciting, raising in themselves an efficacious affection to God, do desire, without variation, to continue it with as profound a recollectedness as they may, not at all heeding whether it be suitable to the sense of the present passage which they pronounce. This is an attention to God, though not to the words, and is far more beneficial than the former; and, therefore, to oblige any souls to quit such an attention for the former, would be both prejudicial and unreasonable; for, since all vocal prayers, in Scripture and otherwise, were ordained only to this end, to supply and furnish the soul that needs with good matter of affection, by which it may be united to God, a soul that hath already attained to that end, which is union, as long as it lasts ought not to be separated therefrom, and be obliged to seek a new means, till the virtue of the former be spent.

"A third, and most sublime degree of attention to the divine office is, that whereby vocal prayers do become mental—that is, whereby souls, most profoundly, and with a perfect simplicity, united to God, can yet, without any prejudice to such union, attend, also, to the sense and spirit of each passage that they pronounce—yea, thereby find their affection, adhesion, and union increased, and more simplified. This attention comes not till a soul be arrived at perfect contemplation, by means of which the spirit is so habitually united to God, and, besides, the imagination so subdued to the spirit, that it cannot rest upon anything that will distract it. Happy are those souls—of which, God knows, the number is very small—that have attained to this third degree; the which must be ascended to by a careful practice of the two former in order, especially of the second degree."

Those of our readers who have mastered the theory of attention here laid down, are now in a position to understand the great advantages of the Rosary, and the wise simplicity of what they may have deemed its vain repetitions. If your thoughts are not to be particularly occupied with the meaning of what you are saying, what possible advantage can there be in giving utterance to long and varied forms of prayer? Is it not far more simple to take some short form—such as the Pater Noster or the Ave Maria—and repeat it over fifty or a hundred times, or as often as may be necessary, filling your thoughts the while with meditations as holy and as profitable as you are able?

But some of our Protestant friends may here object, and cry out, to what purpose is the use of any words at all. "We have no doubt," says the "Rambler," "that to those who are not Catholics this appears a most extraordinary and preposterous device. They will ask, what can be the possible use of saying one thing, and meaning another? and, in all probability, will flatly deny that we ever do what we pretend, reiterating their conviction that the whole thing is a nonsensical piece of gabbling and muttering—at once unscriptural and irrational. Now, we do not deny, that were a person who is not a Catholic to attempt to say the Rosary in the way we have described, he would be completely baffled in his efforts. When a man has little or none of that inward power by which we realize the objects of our faith, and when he has never been habituated to the peculiar ways of Catholic devotion, he would find the Rosary the most unspiritual and the most tiresome of prayers."

The "Rambler" proceeds to explain the utility of an apparatus or device by which bodily or outward motions may be made subservient to the operations of the mind. We have all heard of children who could not repeat the verses they had learned by heart, unless they were constantly buttoning and unbuttoning their sleeve buttons; of orators who, if not allowed a string to fiddle with, were sure to lose the thread of their discourse; of sailors who cannot go to sleep unless the wind is blowing, while landsmen will be awake all night because there is a gust every quarter of an hour.

"Just such is the use of the 'Hail Marys' and other prayers of the Rosary. From childhood a Catholic is accustomed to associate the great mysteries of faith with the low, monotonous murmur from his own lips and those of others of those forms of prayer, and with the mechanical movement of the hands in passing the beads along with the fingers. Even when the custom is not begun in childhood, a short practice confers the necessary unconscious mechanical facility of both lip and finger; and those who, as Protestants, regarded the whole thing as incomprehensible, or laborious, or childish trifling, acquiesce, with delight and gratitude, in the unerring wisdom of the Church that has sanctioned so admirable and so simple a means for drawing the thoughts away from the glare and gloom of this life and its agitations."

"The string of beads he holds in his hand is simply to assist his memory, and prevent him from losing his place and getting confused in the repetition of the same words so many times. His great object is to keep his mind constantly fixed upon the subject before him; therefore, he is very glad of anything that prevents distraction, and tells him the proper number of prayers has been said without his having to count them, and think whether there is not one more yet to say, which would in a moment take his thoughts off from the presence of God. The touch of the beads, without disturbing him, reminds him of the proper time to change the form of prayer, and when he is to pass from one point of meditation to another. In all this it is the object of the Church to assign some fixed limits to our meditations, though she allows us ample freedom within them. We need discipline in prayer quite as much as in everything else."

It must be confessed, that supposing there is a "proper number" of prayers which it is necessary to say, that the invention of beads for the purpose of counting them with facility is one the advantages of which cannot be denied.

To complete, however, the defence of the Rosary against the charge of vain repetition, it is necessary to add, that the words employed may receive a new colouring each time—thus, each time that the words "Mary pray for us" are uttered, we may mentally subjoin that we may receive so and so, according to the blessings of which we may at the time feel our need. So that the Rosary, as actually performed, resembles one of those elaborate pieces of music in which the composer, having for his theme some simple strain, ornaments and enriches it with a hundred different variations.

We have thus laid before our readers the best defence that has been given of a practice which Protestants are in the habit of thinking not only absurd but unscriptural. For, certainly, the Church of Rome is right in forbidding her subjects to use their private judgment in the interpretation of the Bible, since she is so unlucky as to be perpetually in, at least apparent, opposition to the Bible, understood as a plain man would interpret it. When, for instance, our Lord directs his followers—"When ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do, for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking"—it does, at first sight, appear that she could not well have gone in more direct opposition to our Lord's commands than by recommending a method of devotion which consists in saying the same words, over and over again, one hundred and fifty times. Even the wiser heathen condemned such repetitions as these. Do you think (says the old heathen in Terence, for example), that the gods are as stupid as yourself, and that they cannot understand a thing unless they are told it a hundred times.*

But let us examine the defence that is offered us. It is the same as the apology that the old lady made for the silence of her parrot—"Poor creature, if he does not speak, he thinks the more." As far as the words of the Rosary are concerned, it is acknowledged, that they could not be cleared from the charge of vain repetitions. But, then, it is said, you are not to judge of us by the words; there is enough of variety and of devotion in our thoughts. Let us endeavour, then, without prejudice, to consider the advantages of this kind of mental reservation in our address to God—this method of thinking one thing and saying another.

We by no means deny that some persons of cultivated minds may be able, during the repetition of the Rosary, to carry on in their thoughts such a series of prayers and meditations as the writers we are reviewing describe. But these are just the persons who could, without difficulty (and we should think with far greater profit to themselves), carry on their private devotions in words of their own. But the question is, whether this is the ordinary way in which the Rosary is employed—whether every old woman we see telling her beads does occupy her mind meanwhile in a series of meditations on the principal events of the Gospel history, or whether she rests satisfied that she has offered sufficiently acceptable service to God in the mere repetition of the prayers. In spite of the "Rambler's" insinuations that Roman Catholics have different faculties and powers from Protestants, we shall take the liberty to believe that human nature is pretty much the same in the Church of Rome and our own; and that we are tolerably well able to form a guess as to the degree of devotion which is likely to accompany the use of the Rosary. But we are not left to our own conjecture. The author of the tract we are reviewing tells us "that it is by no means an easy thing to say the Rosary well," and, "that any one who can do so has little more to learn in the science of devotion." This precisely agrees with our own opinion; and, as the "Rambler" tells us, that the Rosary is said daily by millions of Catholics, we may guess in what manner it is said by all, except those few "who have little to learn in the science of devotion."

And now the question arises, what are we to think of the nature of the service performed by those who say the Rosary, but do not say it "well;" who gabble over the prayers, but who do not accompany them with the meditations which are so eloquently described in the tract before us. In the silence of the "Rambler" we must appeal to the authority of the standard Roman Catholic divines, and we shall find that, according to their principles, any person who repeats the words of these prayers, intending thereby to perform an act of divine worship, does, without further condition, perform all that is essential to prayer, and all that is necessary to entitle him to the benefits of it. The account which we are about to give of the attention necessary to prayer, is taken from Cardinal Tolet,† and agrees with that laid down by St. Thomas, and by his commentator, Suarez. And if any of our Protestant readers are so prejudiced as to imagine that Roman Catholic doctors teach that attention is not necessary in prayer, let them learn their mistake. There are three kinds of attention, and one of these is absolutely necessary, and that is—attention to the right pronunciation of the words. If any one repeating prayers does not attend so far as to pronounce the right words, or if he hurries so as to pronounce them ill, or if, in reciting with others, a priest gets on so fast as to repeat one verse of a psalm before those with whom he is reciting have finished the verse preceding—or if any one, in repeating the Rosary, is so inattentive as to skip some of the words, or to say a Gloria when he ought to say an Ave, we do not undertake his defence; no casuist warrants us in saying that by such careless service he can acquire any merit for himself or for others.

The second kind of attention is to understand the meaning of the words, and all are agreed that this is not necessary. "If this were required," says Tolet, "there would be very few, indeed, who could comply with this requirement. All that is necessary is to know that what is repeated is intended for divine praise and worship, and to repeat it with that intention."

The third kind of attention is, to remember during our repeating that we are in the presence of God, and are addressing him. "This kind of attention is of great use," says Tolet, "but is not necessary."

There is another distinction, too, of great importance—that between actual and virtual attention; since it is by no means necessary that we should actually attend to our prayers, provided we pay virtual attention. Virtual attention is when we commence with the intention of being attentive, and though our thoughts wander afterwards, yet we do not let them designedly wander; for instance, if any one, in repeating a Rosary, or if the priest, in reciting his "hours," should write a letter at the same time, or engage in any other work requiring attention, then this would not be considered "virtual attention," since the distraction is deliberate and designed; but if there be no such settled purpose of inattention, no fault is to be found, however little attention he may actually pay. A priest, however, may repeat his "hours" and hear Mass at the same time (thus killing two birds with one stone), since the command to hear Mass does not include any command to attend to the words. Suarez, too, lays it down that, though attention is necessary, yet that the very smallest degree of attention is sufficient in order to constitute real prayer. The tendency, in short, of all this teaching is to represent prayers as producing their effect like charms, ex opere operato—"just," says St. Antoninus, "as a precious stone is of as much value in the hands of an unskilful man as of a jeweller." We think, then, we are safe in drawing, from the general principles here laid down, the conclusion, that a person repeating the Rosary without any meditation, but merely with the general notion that he is performing a duty and offering God worship, does all that is necessary to acquire merit by his service. And now we are in a position to see how very unfair is the defence of the Rosary offered by the "Rambler" and his fellow labourer. When Protestants object to the Rosary as consisting of a set of vain repetitions, they are told that they are not to look to the words—that these are meant only as means to excite certain profitable meditations; but, on looking further, we find that these meditations, however useful they may be regarded, are not essential, and that the mere saying of the words without understanding them is enough to satisfy the requirements of Roman Catholic divines. Now, any one can see the failure of a defence which turns on an unessential point, which ascribes to a class attributes in reality belonging only to a few individuals of it.

We have heard nothing urged in defence of the Rosary which might not, with equal justice, be urged in behalf of the praying mills of Thibet. There the worshipper is taught to write his prayer on a piece of paper, put it in a mill, and turn it round and round the proper number of times. What is to prevent the Thibetian grinding his mill with, at least, a virtual attention that he is offering some kind of divine worship; and may he not say, perhaps, that he has learned to associate with this mechanical operation, all manner of holy and religious thoughts?

We have, in conclusion, to offer a few remarks upon another point touched on by the "Rambler"—namely, the disproportion between the number of prayers offered to the Virgin and to the Most High—there being ten Aves for one Pater and one Gloria. We shall show that the apologist gains nothing by transferring the question from the words to the thoughts; and that in the subjects selected for meditation there is just as much pre-eminence given to the Virgin as in the words of the prayers. These subjects include, in fact, every incident in the life of the Virgin (some of them, indeed, not found in Scripture at all); and though our Lord is mentioned, it seems to be only because Scripture is obstinately silent as to any part of the history of the Virgin apart from her Son. We give briefly the heads of the subjects, and allow the reader to form his own judgment on them—

"The Fifteen Mysteries of the Holy Rosary.

"The Five Joyful Mysteries.

"1. The Annunication of the Blessed Virgin.

"2. The Visitation of the Blessed Virgin to her cousin Elizabeth.

"3. The birth of our Blessed Lord, at midnight, in the stable at Bethlehem.

"4. The presentation of our Blessed Lord in the Temple by his Virgin Mother.

"5. The finding Jesus among the doctors in the Temple by the Blessed Virgin."

It is easy to see that, in every one of these meditations, the Virgin is made the central figure.

"The Five Sorrowful Mysteries.

"1. The agony of our Lord in the garden.

"2. The scourging of our Lord by the soldiers, who gave Him over 5,000 stripes.

"3. The crowning of our Lord with thorns.

"4. The carrying of the cross, in which our Lord bears, with most amazing patience, the cross which is laid on him for his greater torment and ignominy, meeting His blessed Mother on the way.

"5. The crucifixion of our Lord in the presence of His afflicted mother."

It is to be acknowledged that the Virgin is not mentioned in three of these mysteries.

"The Five Glorious Mysteries.

"1. The Resurrection of our Lord.

"2. His Ascension in the sight of His Blessed Mother and the Apostles.

"3. The descent of the Holy Ghost on the Apostles as they continued in prayer and supplication with the Blessed Virgin.

"4. The Assumption of the Blessed Virgin.

"5. The coronation of the Blessed Virgin; in which, amid the great jubilee and exultation of the whole Court of Heaven, and to the particular glory of all the saints, she is crowned by her Son with the brightest diadem of glory."

With reference to the first of these glorious mysteries, it is to be borne in mind that Roman Catholic writers, although without any Scripture authority, represent the first appearance of our Lord after His resurrection as being made to the Virgin. It will be seen, then, that in every one of this last set of meditations, too, the Virgin is the figure on which the imagination of the repeater of the Rosary is most likely to dwell.

In the middle ages the Church of Rome, having no other Church to contend with, gave her own interpretation to the Old and New Scriptures, and to obey the Church was then of primary obligation on the peer as well as on the peasant; nor was it contemplated that a reformation would take place in the Church; and, consequently, it was thought that Transubstantiation, the Mass, Purgatory, and all her other antiscriptural doctrines, would be safe from detection behind the impenetrable darkness of ecclesiastical authority.

To aggrandize the Church and increase her revenue has been, at all times, the policy of Rome, to which nothing could contribute more than the Mass, Purgatory, and Indulgences.

It was Gregory the Great who decorated the Mass with deacons, sub-deacons, acolytes, with incense and lights, in order to affect the senses, like any theatrical performance. For the altar above the throne has always been the ardent desire of Rome; and by conferring on the priesthood the superhuman power of creating God and forgiving sins, the Pope was, at the same time, placing himself above the monarchs of the earth; for he who assumed all the power of heaven and of earth could not be less in his own estimation than that of universal monarch. To be the Pontifex Maximus only of the suburban sees would have been nothing—he must also be the head of all the churches that were to be established in both hemispheres.

The next question to which I turned my serious attention was that of Purgatory—a doctrine so much relied on by the Church of Rome—and which I could not find either in the sacred volume or in the records of the early Church; and the conclusion was irresistible that it was introduced into that Church from interested motives, in order to make the Mass of more value, and to increase its demand by its application to souls in that place of punishment. The Mass was introduced as an effective abstergent for the sins of the living and the dead, contrary to the doctrine of the Apostle, who says, "that the blood of Christ his Son cleanseth from all sin." The Church of Rome adduces as a proof of Purgatory the First Epistle of St. Peter iii. 19, 20—"By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison." This prison, it is said, could not be either hell or heaven; therefore, there must be a middle place. But this argument is easily answered by looking at the rest of the passage—

"He preached unto the spirits in prison which sometime were disobedient [incredulous, Douay Bible], when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah." The spirits who were disobedient, or incredulous, in the days of Noah were so wicked, that, we are told in the Book of Genesis, ch. vi., "it repented God that he had made man on the earth." "The wickedness of men was great on the earth, and the thought of their heart was bent upon evil at all times." Now, Purgatory is defined by the Church of Rome as a place where venial sins are purged by fire; whereas those spirits who were disobedient in the days of Noah were clearly guilty of mortal sins.

Again, the Church of Rome insists that there are some sins that are forgiven in the next world, according to the doctrine of St. Matthew xii. 32, where he says, "that sin against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven, either in this world or in the world to come." This doctrine, it is said, necessarily implies that there are some sins that can be forgiven in the next world; and, consequently, there must be a middle place, called Purgatory. But what a slight and uncertain ground for such an inference! The more obvious meaning of this text would be, to any man of ordinary understanding, that the sin in question was so enormous, that it could not escape punishment either in this life or in the world to come.

† Instruct Sacerd., lib. ii., c. 13. n. 5, 6.

Now, if the doctrine of the purification of souls was true, would the Apostles pass it over in silence? or would the early Church omit such salutary doctrine in her primitive teaching?

No argument can prove more effectually the great advantages which the Church of Rome derived from the doctrine of Purgatory than that all the ecclesiastical lands which Henry VIII. confiscated at the Reformation were formerly given by profligate and ferocious barons, and other eminent sinners, to the Church of Rome for the relief of their souls—"pro remedio animarum suarum." This historical fact is supported by Hume and Gibbon, and is too well established to be capable of contradiction.

The doctrine of purgation by fire is taken from the works of Virgil and Plato; "Month's Mind" and "Anniversaries" are taken from the heathen religion of ancient Greece, as may be seen by the "Travels of Anacharsis." Without this doctrine of purgation there would not be an adequate staple for the lucrative merchandise of Masses and Indulgences.

The next step I had to examine in the ecclesiastical ladder of the Church of Rome was Confession, and to see upon what foundation it was established. I found in the Maynooth Class Book, in the 21st canon of the Council of Lateran, under the Pontificate of Innocent III., in the year 1215—"Let every one, both man and woman, truly make confession of all their sins, at least once a year, to their own priest." The Council of Trent, in the 5th chapter of the 14th session, says, "that the universal Church has always understood that a confession of sins was ordained by Christ." The decrees of both these councils are founded upon that observation, which Christ addressed to St. Peter—"to thee I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven, whose sins you forgive they are forgiven, and whose sins you bind they are bound." In the old law the Jews could not be persuaded that their priests could forgive sin; nor did the priests themselves pretend to have such divine power. This is manifest, from what David says in the 32nd psalm—"Oh, I acknowledge my sins unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid;" and, again—"I said I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sins." Daniel says—"To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgiveness, though we have rebelled against him."—Daniel ix. 9. In this doctrine of the Old Scripture there is no mention of auricular confession or sacerdotal absolution. Let us now descend to the New Scripture, and inquire what authority can we find there for confession to a priest, or for the validity of his personal absolution. It will be said that when Christ gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven to Peter, and the power of forgiving sins, that confession to him and to his successors was necessarily implied. In ancient times, keys were the emblems of authority; and "the key of the house of David," says God, "will I lay upon his shoulders." Thus did God invest his son with the keys, which were emblematic of his authority. The house of David represents the Church of Christ; and when Christ says, "I am he who hath the key of David," he proclaims himself to be the sole spiritual ruler of his kingdom, to whom it was given by his Father. It is quite clear when Christ gave the keys to Peter, and to the other Apostles, that he gave them a commission to preach and teach the Gospel to all nations, and, in connection with it, the power of loosing and binding. All those who forsook heathenism and were baptized, had their sins forgiven them; but all those who disbelieved the Gospel truths, and adhered to the old leaven of Paganism, had their sins retained; and all this irrespective of auricular confession or priestly absolution.

SS. Peter, Paul, and John are good authorities on this subject. Peter told his countrymen, the Jews, that God raised up Christ to be a prince and a Saviour, to give repentance to Israel, and remission of sins. He says again to Simon Magus—"Repent and pray God, if, perhaps, the thought of thy heart be forgiven thee.—Acts viii. 22. Peter did not say, come and confess your sins to ME, I AM THE VICAR OF CHRIST, to whom he gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and I WILL PARDON you. St. Paul says—"Through this man, Christ, is preached unto you the forgiveness of sin."—Acts xiii. 38. St. John says—"If we confess our sins, HE is faithful and just to forgive us our sins."—1 John i. 9. In all these passages it will be seen that forgiveness of sin is not connected with the ceremonial act or absolution of the priest, but depends exclusively upon the faith and repentance of the person. The Apostles heard no confessions, had no scruple-boxes, imposed no penances, but exhorted sinners to fly to God for forgiveness, which he was willing to afford "without money and without price." Beside these proofs, have we not Christ himself forgiving sin without confession, in the case of the man who was sick of the palsy. "Son, thy sins are forgiven thee."—Mark ii. 5.

If further proof is wanted to show that auricular confession is not warranted by Scripture, read the pathetic history of the weeping penitent of Bethany.

Moreover, Cardinal Cajetan, who was so famous in controversy at the time of the Reformation, said that auricular confession could not be proved directly, but only inferentially, or by way of implication from the Scripture.

Now, can that be properly said to be of divine institution, and necessary to salvation, which depends only on an inference, and is proved only by an inuendo? When our Lord issues his commands, they are ordinarily plain and express. "Go ye and teach all nations, baptising them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."—Matt. xxviii. 19. "Except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."—John iii. 5. Would he not, also, have said somewhere—"Except a man confess his sins to the priest, he shall in nowise enter the kingdom of heaven," if he had intended to convey that as a divine command?

The early and greatest Fathers of the Church seem to have read Scripture, and never to have thought of the duty of confessing to a priest. ST. AUGUSTINE says—"To what purpose do I confess my sins to men who cannot heal my wounds? To a set of men inquisitive in inquiring into the lives of others, but indolent in amending their own! And how shall they (who know nothing of my heart but by my own confession) know whether I say true or no? For no one knows what is in man but the spirit of man that is in him."*

ST. CHRYSOSTOM speaks lightly of confessions to men, and urges continual confession to God only. "It is not necessary," says he, "that thou shouldest confess in the presence of witnesses; let the inquiry of thy offences be made in thy thoughts; let God only see thee confessing. . . . . I do not say to thee, bring thyself on the stage, nor accuse thyself to others; but I command thee to obey the prophet, saying, reveal thy ways unto the Lord, confess them before God, praying, if not with the tongue, at least with thy memory, and so hope to obtain mercy. Thou art ashamed to say that thou hast sinned—confess thy faults, then, daily in thy prayers. Nor do I say confess them to thy fellow-servant, who may reproach thee therewith—confess them to God who healeth them."†

Is it possible to read these passages, and believe that either St. Augustine, or St. Chrysostom, conceived that secret or auricular confession of every sin to a priest was an indispensable condition of salvation? An open declaration of sin, and further, atonement was, no doubt, urged and required when the crimes of notorious offenders had given open scandal. "Open confession is good for the soul," is an observation of daily familiarity all over Europe at the present day, and dates its origin from the infancy of Christianity. In the Eastern Churches an open acknowledgment of sin was made by the Catechumens after their conversion from Paganism, and before they were baptized; and when they were sufficiently instructed in the principles of their newly-adopted religion, a declaratory absolution was pronounced by the priest before they received the Lord's Supper—"May the Lord God forgive you your sins"—indicating thereby that God alone could forgive sins. It was in the same manner the Jews believed, when they accused Christ of blasphemy for having told the man sick of palsy, "thy sins are forgiven thee."

An officer, called the Public Penitentiary, for some time existed, at least in the Eastern Church, until it was abolished by Nectarius, Bishop of Constantinople, in the latter end of the fourth century, on the occasion of the confession of a noble matron, admitting her guilt with a deacon of the Church there, which, coming to the ears of the people, created such a popular commotion, on account of the dishonour and scandal that it reflected on the whole Church, that Bishop Nectarius, to extinguish the flame, and prevent like occasions in future, abolished the office of penitentiary altogether; "by which means," says the ecclesiastical historian, Sozomen, "every man is left to the conduct of his own conscience, and permitted to partake of the holy mystery at his own peril."

In the Western Church, it was that despotic tyrant, Innocent III., who trampled on the necks of kings, and absolved their subjects from allegiance—who subverted the natural law by the ultramontane doctrine of Transubstantiation—who introduced a pharisaical hypocrisy, in the southern states of Europe, by that infernal machine the Inquisition—it was he who enslaved the human mind by the introduction of auricular confession, with all its disgusting disclosures and loathsome revelations; and the same year, 1215, that beheld the human mind reduced to the most abject slavery, on the banks of the classic Tiber, by a tyrant Pope, witnessed, also, the freedom of every British subject, by the powerful influence of the Barons at Runnymede, on the banks of the Thames.

DUBLIN, JANUARY, 1855.

THE promulgation of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin is the great event of the 19th century. The joy which it appears to have inspired in that large class who are led more by their feelings than reasoning and evidence, and the consternation which it has created among those who, though sincerely attached to the Church of Rome, have loved it chiefly because they believed it to be an unchangeable Church, which never innovates or decides without reason, are equally remarkable and startling to those who look on as impartial spectators of a proclamation so novel in modern times.

It is not merely giving a new honour to the Virgin Mary, it is authoritatively announcing a new fact, and a fact too, which, if true, gives a new character and aspect to the Christian religion. It is, in truth, little less than the promulgation of a new religion—a religion of which the mortal being, thus raised above the pale of humanity, is to be the goddess. It is adding a cardinal fact to those which have been handed down to us as the truths of the Gospel history; and that not upon the authority of tradition—for the belief in it can, in no way, be traced to ancient times; not upon the authority of Scripture—for the New Testament is wholly silent as to any of the circumstances of the birth of the Mother of our Lord; but solely upon the authority of the Pope, and those bishops whom he assembled in the Vatican, in December, 1854, to join him in taking advantage of an apparent agreement among his adherents, to make himself remarkable by doing what none of his predecessors, for the last 700 years at least, has been able to accomplish.

What is the reason of this present agreement? Has any new light broken in—any new evidence—any new revelation burst upon the world? or is the only reason for the present agreement, that it has become more agreeable to the feelings of the worshippers of the Virgin to believe her free from the taint of original sin, and immaculate from the first moment of her conception in the womb of her mother?

We may, perhaps, assume, that neither Pope Pius, nor Archbishop Cullen, nor Cardinal Wiseman, pretend to any particular personal knowledge upon the subject upon which they undertake to pronounce. They are not, like the Apostles, witnesses of facts which they themselves have seen or known, or even which they have heard from credible witnesses. They declare upon the state of a matter which happened nearly nineteen hundred years ago—a matter for which no contemporary narrative vouches—nay, which plainly was not believed in at the time of the alleged occurrence. They can refer to no written testimony, either in the New Testament, or any other book. They cannot say that the story has been handed down, in the Church, from generation to generation. But what is done is this—a certain number of ecclesiastics, assembled at Rome, in the year 1854, without any evidence whatever—upon their own speculation, and nothing more—choose to affirm, that a particular miracle happened some years before the Christian era; and, having so affirmed it—because they think if it did not take place it ought to have taken place—they demand that, upon pain of damnation, all Christian people shall believe that it actually did take place.

Now, is this anything more or less than the assumption of a power to manufacture the facts of Christianity? It is the only word by which we can express the process by which this new fact is concocted. We could perfectly understand the assertion that some new evidence had been discovered which established a fact hitherto unknown, even after the lapse of nineteen hundred years—nay, we could understand men to say that a more careful collection of existing evidences had led them to the belief in any particular state of things; but it is quite another thing to say that that which was not a fact yesterday is a fact to-day, because some bishops in Rome think that it ought to be so. The founder of the Mormonites was, at least, rational and consistent; his story was, that he found certain histories, long lost to mankind, and recorded certain facts hitherto unknown. If the Mormonite invented the facts, he thought it necessary, also, to manufacture the evidence. The conclave at Rome has a shorter and readier way—that of manufacturing the facts without any evidence at all.

Into the discussion of all the consequences that naturally follow from the belief in this new dogma, it is not our purpose now to enter. Those who accept it will hold a religion to which Christianity will scarcely be the most appropriate title. That religion will be much more the religion of Mary than the religion of Christ. If men really believe in this miraculous birth of the Virgin, she was, long before the angel visited her to announce the coming birth of the Saviour, a being above humanity. Had she never been the mother of the Saviour, she was divine; she was, in fact, the author of Christianity—the first divine being that was born in human nature.

The idolatry that must directly follow from such a belief is alarming indeed. We cannot think that intelligent Roman Catholics will be ready to revolutionize their faith at the bidding of the conclave assembled at Rome. There is, however, in the promulgation of this fiction, an humbling lesson to the arrogance which is wont to boast, that in keeping to the See of Rome as the centre of unity, they escaped, at least, all danger of the novelties by which Protestants are sometimes distracted. The faith of Roman Catholics, we are often triumphantly told, was rested on the unalterable foundation of ancient tradition. "Quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus." This was the safe test of "Catholic" belief, according to the dreams of the Puseys, the Newmans, and the Wilberforces. Behold the realization of your dream in the monstrous novelty of "the Immaculate Conception." Mokanna, raising his veil, did not more horrify and surprise his victim than this novelty must those who went to the Church of Rome to listen to the certain voice of ancient teaching, and found the conclave of modern bishops issuing forth the new doctrine of "the Immaculate Conception."

We cannot pause to point out how apt an illustration this supplies of the mode in which many other doctrines, equally novel, may have been thrust upon the Church. We know, beyond all question, that this very doctrine of the Immaculate Conception has not been, up to this time, generally received. Now, we presume, it is an indisputable article of faith. Why? not because it has been received by all Christians from ancient times; but because a conclave of bishops, selected by the Pope, have chosen to impose it upon the Church. Five centuries hence, if contemporary evidence should perish, who could tell the origin of the belief, then, no doubt, both ancient and universal. Just in the same way were foisted upon Christianity all those peculiar tenets which distinguish Roman Catholics, to the receipt of which by their Church, Roman Catholics now point, as evidence that the belief in them is ancient and universal.

Unquestionably, it never again can be urged that the reception of a doctrine by the Roman Catholic Church is any evidence that it has come down from ancient times. We now know of a certainty that there is a mint at the Vatican where new coins of doctrine can be constantly struck off; and even if they affect the impress of antiquity upon the die, or the date of ancient times upon the legend, they no longer conceal the truth that the coins they issue may be of modern manufacture, as much as that of the medal of Australian gold, which has been struck in honour of the event—"Deiparæ Virgini sine labe conceptæ"—to commemorate the new fact which Pope Pius has added to the narrative of the New Testament.

IT is with deep interest that we watch for indications of the feelings and opinions of Roman Catholics concerning this late decree of the Pope, establishing the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception as an article of the Roman faith.

Our readers are, perhaps, equally anxious to know what view is taken of it by those who profess to express the opinions of Roman Catholics, and how they get over the difficulties which, as we showed in our last number, do arise from that decree.

Our attention has been engaged by two leading articles in the Tablet, of December 23, which throw much light on this subject. Whether we consider the assertions, the confessions, or the contradictions contained in them, those two articles appear to us most instructive.

The previous number of the Tablet (Dec. 16), in its leading article, had said, in reference to this decree of the Pope—"The Immaculate Conception is NOW a solemn article of Catholic faith;" where the word "now" evidently admits that it had not been so the week before.

The first leading article of December 23, thus proceeds:—

"In all its circumstances, whether we look without the Church or within it, we should say that the time for giving the authoritative decision on this great question, has been most happily chosen. . . . . Looking to the dogma in question, the circumstances of the time are not less happy."

And here are the facts which make the choice of the time so happy—

"For twelve centuries the fact of Mary's Immaculate Conception remained unquestioned."

St. Bernard, in his 174th epistle, explains how it happened not to be questioned; when writing to the Church of Lyons, on the feast of the Immaculate Conception, then lately invented, he says—"We can never enough wonder that some of you could have the boldness to introduce a feast which the Church has not the least knowledge of, which is neither supported by reason, nor backed by any tradition." Of course, men do not question that of which they have never heard.

The writer in the Tablet proceeds—

"Then a controversy arose; and the Church permitted controversy; for she is the mother and the nurse of rational intellectual freedom. . . . . Ours was the earnest controversy of men deeply interested for the faith that establishes the transmission of original sin on the one side; and, on the other, for the honour and privileges of her who, in the minds of both parties, ranked as the most highly-gifted of God's creatures. And so the Church, seeing only a burning zeal for faith on all sides, graciously stood by and listened. Toward her faithful children, as long as charity presides over disputation, she has always put in practice this noble system of enlightened tolerance and fond forbearance."

The principle here laid down has our entire concurrence. We are delighted to have the testimony of the Tablet, that the Church encourages controversy when carried on in an earnest and charitable manner. We trust that the readers of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN will approve of this as much as we do.

But we greatly doubt whether the controversy on the Immaculate Conception was really carried on in so charitable a spirit. And even if it were, we are puzzled to see how it could be the duty of an infallible judge to "stand by and listen," because those disputing were willing to be taught. The Tablet itself says, that it was an article of the Catholic faith that was in dispute. Some said that article was true; others confidently affirmed that it was false. St Bernard, "the last of the Fathers," maintained that it "eithers honours sin, or authorizes a false holiness." Pope Sixtus IV., in his decree, dated 1483, says that—

"Some preachers of various orders, as we hear, in their sermons to the people, publicly, through various states and countries, have not blushed hitherto to affirm, and do not cease daily to preach, that all those who hold or maintain that the glorious and immaculate Mother of God was conceived without stain of original sin, do sin mortally, or are heretics. That those who celebrate the office of her Immaculate Conception, or who listen to the sermons of those who affirm that she was conceived without stain of this kind, do sin grievously. From which preaching, heavy scandals have arisen in the minds of the faithful, and greater scandals are, with reason, feared to arise from day to day."

This is the testimony of a Pope, in a solemn decree. We ask our readers seriously to consider, was this a case in which a divinely-appointed and infallible judge of faith, should "graciously stand by and listen!" What! one party in the Catholic Church contends for "a solemn article of the Catholic faith," and another party in that same Church denies that article, and cries out that those who hold it are heretics, and that it is a mortal sin to listen to them! Truly, the controversy appears to us more earnest than charitable. Yet this was the case in which that so-called infallible judge of controversies, himself bitterly lamenting these "heavy scandals," and fearing still greater, "graciously stood by and listened" for SEVEN HUNDRED YEARS!

Who is not ready to exclaim, "away with such an infallible judge. Let him do his business if he can. If he cannot, let him cease to mock the world by telling them that he has power and authority from God to settle all controversies of faith as they arise."

But let us return to the article in the Tablet—

"But, unlike what happens among heretics, whose gloomy destiny it is to be always seeking, and never finding, the friendly controversy between domestics of the Catholic household are sure to come ONE DAY to the desired end."

Well, SEVEN HUNDRED YEARS is a long day to wait! In that time TWENTY GENERATIONS of men lived and died! Was not their destiny as gloomy as the heretics? and more bitter, too—mocked as they were by the pretensions of an infallible judge of controversy, who, "when debates arise among Catholics concerning points of faith, . . . fails not to examine them by the received rule of faith, and to pronounce an authoritative sentence upon them. The dispute is thus quashed, and peace is restored."—Milner's End of Controversy, Letter xi.

But let us hear the circumstances under which the controversy was decided—

"It was, therefore, at a moment of complete internal freedom and repose, when dispute was long dead, and disputation silent. . . . . when already the myriad children of Christ were clinging, and had long been clinging, with fond embrace, to the sweet and beautiful doctrine of Mary's sinlessness, it was at such a moment . . . . that a Pope, the last and best of a long galaxy of Pontiffs, who, from the time of Sixtus IV., had been shedding down their lights on the path of this sacred tenet, chose to gratify the long-cherished wishes of the children of the Church, by the issue of a solemn, judicial, and definitive sentence, proclaiming that Mary had never contracted the stain of original sin—that this truth has been revealed by God to man, and is, therefore, from henceforth and for ever, an article of Catholic belief, which no one can HEREAFTER deny impugn, or doubt, without losing his faith and becoming a heretic."

Mark that word, "hereafter." They might have denied it before, as St. Bernard did, without being heretics. And why, if it was indeed "revealed by God to man?" Mark that, Roman Catholics! It is no heresy to deny what God has revealed to man; but to deny what the Pope says, that is rank heresy!

But see how happily the time was chosen! "When dissent was long dead, and disputation silent!"

Do our readers remember a story in the first page of our number for October? "The wise old man;" who told the secret of his success in settling disputes—"never to interfere till the battle was over." We took that story from the Tablet. We said that the Pope must be the old man intended; and, lo! the Tablet now declares that the wisdom of the Pope consists in choosing his time thus happily, when "dissent was dead, and disputation silent!"

Roman Catholics are fond of proving the necessity of the Pope's judicial powers, by the necessity of judges in courts of law. But if such a judge should say to all parties who brought a case into court, "go and settle it among yourselves; when you have no longer any dispute between you, that will be the time to come to me, and I will then settle it in a trice;" would not all men cry out that such a judge was the greatest humbug the world had ever seen?

But hear now the conclusion which the writer in the Tablet draws from all this—

"Whenever necessity arises for a downright unmistakeable pronouncement, be sure the Church—the living, speaking, acting, judging authority of the Church—will make itself heard."

Our readers are plain men, and have plain common sense. We ask them, when does the necessity arise for a "downright unmistakeable pronouncement?" Is it necessary when parties are disputing, or when they have ceased to dispute?

But we come now to the second article in the Tablet, of December 23, which immediately follows the one we have been considering; and we confess it does surprise us, as, perhaps, it will our readers too.

Observe, that "dissent is long dead, and disputation silent."

What is the subject of the article which follows?

Why, simply, this fact, that it is at this moment under discussion by the government in France, whether the Pope's decree in favour of the Immaculate Conception will be allowed to be published at all in France!

Now, the greatest canonists are agreed, that no one is bound by the Pope's Bull or decree until it has been published in his own country. And it has been sworn before committees of parliament, by the most eminent of the Irish Roman Catholic bishops, that no decree of the Pope is of any force in any country, until it has been published in that country. So this dispute about publishing the Pope's Bull in France involves the question whether the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception is to be a binding article of faith in France or not—whether the Roman Catholic faith is to be the same in France as in other countries! But let this article in the Tablet tell its own story—

"Now, while all Christians throughout the world are exulting with joy at this great event, long desired, which has taken place in Rome, there are men in Paris, the natural and ancient enemy of the eternal city (Rome), who throw themselves into a fever of rage, and, under pretence of guarding their liberties and defending their rights, are prepared to renew the ancient contentions of the university and parliament of Paris, to stir up the embers of an extinct sedition, and to scandalize the faithful throughout the world."

This does seem rather strange if "dissent be dead, and disputation silent." But let us hear further—

"A Papal Bull is by this time in France, in the hands of the Apostolic Nuncio, but the publication of which, we are told, cannot be made before it is discussed in the council of state. Certain Gallican lawyers are still to be consulted, it seems, before the French nation may safely believe, with divine faith, that our Blessed Lady was conceived without sin. The general belief of the faithful, the concurrence of bishops and priests, and the infallible decree of the Sovereign Pontiff are, as yet, all worthless, until these wise men shall have given the final stamp of their approbation. . . . One of these dishonest additions to the concordat, requires all decrees and letters emanating from the Holy See, to be submitted to the council of state for examination, and, we suppose, approval, before they can bind the consciences of of Frenchmen. This is the state doctrine. . . . . The Gallican spirit is essentially seditious." . . .

Let our readers mark that this is the law of the greatest Roman Catholic country in Europe about the decrees and Bulls of the Pope, by which he undertakes to make new articles of faith. Those Bulls cannot even be published in France until the council of state has examined and sanctioned them. And this law is now put in force about the Pope's infallible decree on the Immaculate Conception, by a Roman Catholic government founded on universal suffrage! No wonder that the Tablet should be very angry at seeing an infallible decree so dealt with.

We shall have more to say, as this question proceeds, about this "Gallican spirit," which the Tablet considers so seditious. It is, in fact, a very ancient denial, by the French Church, of the infallibility and almost the supremacy of the Pope. It was thought that this had died out in France; yet we see that now, when it was thought that "dissent was dead," and that all was safe for infallibility to show itself, this great attempt of the Pope has brought the old Gallican spirit to life again.

And we must say, that the Pope's attempt was well calculated to produce such an effect; for it is the first instance, in the history of the Church of Rome itself, in which the Pope has ever attempted to settle articles of faith, without the concurrence and consent of the princes of Christendom. The ancient general councils were called by the Roman emperors. The emperors presided and spoke in them. The great officers of state, and the Roman senate, were present, and took part in them, and directed the proceedings.

In the ninth century, no less a Pope than Nicholas I. himself, wrote thus to the Emperor Michael—"Where have you read that the emperors, your predecessors, were present in councils, except it were in those in which the faith was treated of, which is an universal and common concern of all, pertaining, not only to the clergy, but to the laity, and to all Christians."*

The learned work of Cardinal Jacobatius, "De Concilio," written not very long before the Council of Trent, speaking of the presence of emperors and kings in a general council, says—"But they need not of necessity be present, except when the faith is treated of."†

At the Council of Trent itself, the emperor sent his ambassadors, with a commission to act in his name, and to vote in all the deliberations of the council; and it appears, by the published lists of those who were present at the Council of Trent, that the princes of Europe were represented in that council by sixteen ambassadors, ten of whom were laymen.

And now, for the first time in the history of the Church of Rome itself, the Pope has attempted to establish an article of faith, in an assembly of bishops only, excluding the princes of Europe. To this novel attempt at excluding the laity altogether from what even Pope Nicholas I. admitted to concern them as much as priests, the Emperor of the French has most appropriately replied, by appealing to the old Gallican spirit of "sedition," as the Tablet calls it, and requiring that the Bull shall be submitted to the council of state; a measure which, as CATHOLIC LAYMEN, we heartily approve.

There are already other indications of open resistance to the Pope's decree. A leading newspaper, published in Rome, reports that the heads of the Franciscan order publicly returned thanks to the Pope for establishing the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, which their order always supported. We were anxious to see if the Dominican monks, who always denied that doctrine, had done the same; but we found no mention of them. We have since heard, that the Dominican monks at Florence, in Italy, have spoken openly against the Pope's late decree, and refuse to submit to it. It would be strange, indeed, if the Dominican monks, one of the most famous orders in the Church of Rome, should now acknowledge that their order have always been supporting heresy, and denying an article of the Catholic faith. Yet they must now acknowledge this, or reject the Pope's decree. We shall wait to see further what the monks of St. Dominic will do.

In the meantime, enough has been confessed by the Tablet to show that the question cannot yet be considered at an end. There is still time to speak. Let our readers remember what the Tablet says in the article first quoted. "The Church permitted controversy; for she is the mother of rational, intellectual freedom." Only let "charity preside over disputation," and even yet the Church of Rome may "graciously stand by and listen."

Do not shrink from the simple issue to which the matter is now brought. I am proposing to try your claim by the test your Church has supplied. She has based the validity of all her peculiar doctrines upon a statement which cannot be proved for any one of them—upon the assertion, that her doctrines, as now held, have been the doctrines of the primitive Church. This is a simple matter of fact, to be determined by an appeal to history.

Here your difficulties thicken and overwhelm you. How is it, if the unanimous consent of the Fathers be the notorious fact you have asserted it to be—but which you have asserted, not because your Church proves it to be a fact, but because such assertion was the only expedient left her—that none of your writers can produce the only legitimate establishment of its truth? Why can you not at once come forward with that proof, which is just what your case requires, and which must silence us, so far as history goes? You allege that your infallibility was ever believed. You base it on certain passages of the Bible. Now, the Fathers wrote—many of them—especially on those passages. Let us select your leading one—"Thou art Peter," &c. Bring forward extracts from their writings to show that they did interpret those words as conveying infallibility and jurisdiction over the whole Church to Peter and the Roman Pontiffs. Show that they expressly said this. How is it your writers never do this? Your whole case rests on their ability to do so; yet, instead of it, passages are produced which speak of the grandeur of the See of Rome—which speak of a certain primacy allowed (the reason being in some cases specifically given, it is because of the political greatness of the city of Rome) to the Roman Pontiff; of the need of maintaining union with the Church of Rome. (Who would have denied it of her more than of the Eastern Church, as long as they continued pure Churches?) But you never produce a single honest extract, plainly stating that these writers held your modern doctrines, or derived them from the passages of Scripture which you now adduce in support of them.

Here, again, you are involved in a difficulty, from which there is no escape for you. When you are challenged, and put to the proof of your peculiar doctrines from antiquity, what is it you do? You give us certain passages which assuredly do not assert your doctrines—which do not even seem to contain them. Now, you cannot say these doctrines are not specifically enunciated, because they were not denied. For if you say this, you destroy your alleged proof from antiquity. And, in the second place, not only were there, in the heresies and schisms which distracted the early Church, just the proper and necessary occasions for asserting the authority of the Pontiff and infallibility—either of him or of the Roman Church—but there is distinct evidence that his decisions were rejected, and his encroachments disallowed. The extracts which you adduce from the Fathers are of that character, that—to take a very safe position, yet quite sufficient for my purpose—do not plainly or satisfactorily, for any reasonable man, prove your doctrines. Hence, you interpret these extracts. You say the Fathers meant so and so. You catch at every ambiguous word; you strain any sentence of doubtful import; you give, instead of dogmatic averments of these writers, instead of explicit decisions of councils, your own reasons or assertions that they must have meant what you want to make them mean. Instead of their own declarations, which you cannot produce, you offer arguments, and mostly very weak ones, to prove they must have intended what, at least, they have never said; you give interpretations of their interpretations, and, after all your clamour against the right and dangers of private judgment, base your whole case, in the last resort, upon it—upon your interpretations of the Fathers' interpretations—and, therefore, by your own account of human judgment, upon a double fallibility.

[The reader will perceive that this argument is an extension of one used in the early part of the discussion against the Roman Catholic use of Scripture. That was shown either to involve a petitio principii, or to be an inference of private judgment. The same is here applied to the argument from the Fathers. The sophism is the same, only it is better hid by being put farther off. It appears so important to show it clearly, that I shall take leave to state it as explicitly as I can. It is plain that the whole body of the peculiar doctrines of the Church of Rome rests on the admission of her infallibility. If this be fairly proved, they are proved; if not, they fall. Accordingly, when Scriptural proof of this cardinal doctrine is attempted, her advocates are stopped by being reminded they cannot assume the doctrine when proving it. The difficulty is so clear that the Church of Rome rests the proof upon the assertion that there is an unanimous consent of the Fathers on this subject. Thus the burden of proof for the doctrine is transferred to the proof of this fact, and the whole case rests upon it. The next step is, therefore, to produce the passages from the Fathers which establish such unanimous consent. They are adduced; but they do not contain any clear, or, indeed, any statements at all of any such doctrine. We have no instances where they speak thus—The Church interprets, or I interpret, these words, "Thou art Peter" (or any other passage), as declaring the Bishop or Church of Rome to be infallible. Hence, the burden of proof is again shifted to the ascertainment of what the Fathers meant. Upon this there is all imaginable litigation. The Protestant side having the clear victory so far, that their opponents have never yet produced passages which convey anything like an explicit statement of this doctrine of infallibility, not only not from all the Fathers, but not even from one of them. Thus the proof of the doctrine comes to this issue—"What did the Fathers mean." But here, of course, the infallibility of the Church, as an interpreter of such meaning, cannot be alleged or allowed. Thus the decision comes to the issue of private judgment, and must come to it.

I do not see how it is possible to deny the fairness of this argument, or to refute it. The sophism, however, works in this way. It seems fair enough for Roman Catholics to exercise their judgment upon the writings of men, though they prohibit it upon the revelation of God. It looks as if there was no contradiction in doing so. But it is concealed, all the while, that the proof from Scripture, in reality, comes to the proof from the Fathers, and that it cannot be infallibly certain the doctrine itself is true, unless the proof for it be so likewise But this proof, resting ultimately upon the sense to be attached to the meaning of the Fathers, is subject to all the dangers which the Roman Church ascribes to human judgment by which alone such patristic proof is made out. Thus the proof of infallibility is completely shattered. The Church of Rome commits suicide by prohibiting private judgment on passages of the Scriptures which contain articles of faith. She slays her own pretensions in order to escape death to them from the hands of her opponents.

I can best elucidate the sophism which I have been endeavouring to expose, by the use of an admirable illustration—"Nothing is stronger than its weakest part." The strength of a chain depends on its weakest link. The number of strong links do not add to the strength of the chain, but they increase the difficulty of detecting the faulty one.—See Elements of Logic, by the Archbishop of Dublin.]

As to the consent of the Fathers, which you allege as united in witnessing to the antiquity of your doctrines—your recent convert, Dr. Newman, disposes of this, and surrenders it as impossible of proof. His theory is, that the present doctrines of the Church of Rome did not exist in primitive times, as they now exist. Their germs only can be traced. These were developed in after ages, and expanded into your modern tenets. How do you answer this? It is manifest destruction to your argument from antiquity.

You say, as your Church avers, that there does exist an unanimous consent of the Fathers, interpreting, as you now interpret, those passages of Scripture upon which you profess to ground your peculiar doctrines. Let us test the fact. I shall take one of the most eminent among them. I select St. Augustine, not only for positive disproof of the truth of such assertion, but because he is, also, a witness against your prohibition of private judgment.

Augustine wrote upon the passage "Thou art Peter," &c. He not only interprets the rock to mean Christ, but gives an admirable reason for thinking so. "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid—Christ Jesus." It is true, indeed, that he also says, I have elsewhere interpreted the rock to mean Peter, but more frequently to be Christ. But which of these two interpretations be the best, let the reader choose.

Now, if, as you say, the Church always interpreted the rock to be St. Peter, how could Augustine have been ignorant of the fact, or as, an orthodox writer, venture to oppose her. It is clear, from his manner of treating the passage, that he was quite unconscious of any such authoritative, or according counter-interpretation. This, if it existed, he could not but know. Hence, he is evidence, not merely that there was no unanimous consent (for he is one exception), but that there was no ecclesiastical or dogmatical interpretation at all. Moreover, how do you answer his concluding words—"let the reader judge?" Can you find in them your doctrine which prohibits men from exercising their judgment upon passages which contain articles of faith?

[The following is the reply given in the "Resumè" to this argument:—"The Doctor quoted a passage from St. Augustine on the interpretation of the words, 'Thou art Peter,' from which it would appear that the Father held two opinions about this text—viz., that the rock was Peter or Christ; but supposing even this to be the case, can the doubt of St. Augustine on the meaning of one among the many texts proving the supremacy of St. Peter, outweigh his own testimony in other parts of his writings, and those of all the early Fathers in favour of this supremacy?"

Here it is conceded that so far as St. Augustine's testimony goes, the doctrine of Pontifical infallibility and jurisdiction was not settled as being derived from the main passage on which they are now based, while no answer is given to the inference from his concluding words, against the existence of any interpretative authority precluding the exercise of human judgment.]

Dr. M.—You have made certain extracts from early writers, and made some assertions thereon. Some of these last are notoriously unfounded. Of these extracts, none, so far as I know them, prove your doctrines.

Thus you say, that upon the occasion of a schism in the Corinthian Church, an appeal was made to Clement of Rome for interference and advice. Suppose the fact to be so; what does it prove? "Interference and advice" are not infallibility and supremacy. The Corinthians acted wisely in asking such advice, and would have acted more wisely in following it. If the faith of the Church of Rome was as pure now as it was then, similar appeals would, in all likelihood, be made. Nothing was more natural than the appeal of the Corinthian to the Roman Church; for St. Paul (not St. Peter) was the bond of connection between them. He was a founder of one, and the founder of the other Church. This Epistle is written in the name of the Church—i.e., the people of Rome, to that of Corinth. It is, as Irenæus describes it, a very pathetical letter. It exhorts the unruly to obedience towards their own pastors, but never once enforces their allegiance to himself as Bishop of Rome; nor is there anything in the whole letter, bearing on the present discussion, which does not tell against you.

ON THE INFALLIBLE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Having been favoured with a copy of your December LAYMAN, I cannot avoid briefly alluding to your remarks on the "Infallible Church." Being exceedingly sensible of the almost worse than inutility of controversy in swaying the judgments of those to whom it is addressed, and of the angry and unpleasant feelings which it invariably excites between the most temperate of contenders, it is with the utmost reluctance that I approach anything which could possibly be regarded as such; some of your arguments, however, seem so easily refuted by those of a contrary character that spontaneously suggest themselves, that I cannot refrain from repeating them. The desire which you seem to feel for the promotion of fair discussion will, I am sure, prove a sufficient guarantee for their insertion.

From the following considerations and texts, it will be evident that Christ instituted in his Church an exterior coercive authority, by which controverted points and subjects pertaining to religion are decided by an infallible judgment:—Cor. i. 11—"There are contentions among you." Cor. i. 13—"Is Christ divided?" Cor. i. 17—"For Christ sent me, &c., &c." Cor. i. 9—"God is faithful, &c., &c. Who does not but tremble and wonder at the express words of the Apostle of nations in teaching the Corinthians the necessity of unity; and, at the same time, he assures us that, necessarily to fulfil the ordinance of God, there exist schisms and heresies to prove and confirm the faith of Christ's followers; but, at the same time, God does not permit his faithful to be tempted more than their belief permits them to withstand such temptations. Then it follows, that Christ has taken precautions sufficient to deter the faithful from falling into heresy or being led astray from the way of salvation by false preachers. The nature of such precaution will be our immediate inquiry.

That there should exist an infallible judge to decide controverted religious questions, the wisdom of God necessarily requires; for Christ, instituting his Church, compares it to a kingdom. Now, how can we conceive the establishment of a kingdom, or any other political society, if we do not suppose, existing therein, a judge, invested with sufficient authority to decide controverted matters, with power, coercive and supreme. Again, Matt. xviii. 17—"He who does not hear the Church let him be to thee as the heathen and the publican." From this solitary text of Scripture it is lawful to conclude, that Christ appointed in his Church a judge to decide disputes in matters pertaining to religion and the salvation of mankind.

I am, yours truly,
A REAL L. CORRAN MAN.

We gladly insert the letter of our correspondent, and trust that controversy conducted in such a calm and temperate spirit as his communication exhibits, and as we hope to preserve in our reply, is not likely to excite any angry or unpleasant feelings.

His first argument, so far as we understand it, is as follows:—The Apostle condemns schisms and heresies—therefore, "Christ must have taken precautions sufficient to deter the faithful from falling into heresies;" the only sufficient precaution is the gift of infallibility to the Church—therefore, the Church must possess this gift of infallibility. In reply to this, we beg to ask our correspondent, what persons he means by "the faithful" in the above argument? If he means those who do not fall into heresies, no precautions are necessary; for it would be a contradiction in terms that the faithful should abandon the faith. But if he means Christians generally, it is quite certain (whatever we might have thought beforehand) that Christ has not thought fit to take such precautions as will prevent them from falling into heresy. The texts which our correspondent has cited, prove that heresies and schisms existed even in the Apostles' days; and they have continued to exist even in our own time. However strange this may appear to us, it is not more so than the fearful prevalence of sin in God's world. In both cases the fault is wholly man's and not God's. God does deter men from heresy by the warnings of his Apostles, and by giving them the Scriptures, in which he has clearly made known all things necessary to their salvation; but he has not seen fit to institute an "exterior coercive authority" to exclude heresies.

Our correspondent's next argument is drawn from the analogy of a kingdom or political society, in which it is necessary that there should be a judge invested with sufficient authority to decide controverted matters. We reply—In a kingdom is it not also absolutely necessary that not only there should be judges appointed, but that it should be known and unquestioned who they are?

Thus all the judges of our land are known men—known to be judges—and no person can doubt or question that these are the men; but if it were a doubtful point who were these judges, and if they had no commission to show, and no certain warrant for their authority, would not such judges rather multiply controversies than end them? So, likewise, if our Saviour, the King of the Church, had intended that all controversies of religion should be finally determined by some visible judge, who can doubt but that he would have expressed himself in plain terms about the matter? He would have said plainly, "I have appointed the Bishop of Rome to decide all controversies."

We wonder how any one can believe that our Saviour designed the Bishop of Rome to this office, and yet that he would not say so, nor cause it to be written by any of the Apostles or Evangelists, so much as once, but left it to be drawn out of uncertain principles by consequences still more uncertain.

As for the third argument, derived from the text, "Hear the Church," our correspondent is probably not aware that the meaning of this text has already been frequently discussed in this paper.*

The context clearly shows that our Lord is speaking, not of controversies of faith, but of matters of private dispute between Christians, which they were directed to bring, not before heathen tribunals, but before the local church to which they belonged; and any person who refused to submit to its arbitration would no longer be treated as a member of that body. We will merely cite the entire passage, which speaks for itself—"Moreover, if thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone; if he shall hear thee, then thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican."

THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In a letter, which within this month has been taking the round of the Protestant papers, from the pen of the well-known Protestant writer, Dr. Croly, I find the following passage:—

"The Popish hierarchy having been summoned by the Pope from various countries of Europe and, amongst others, from our own, and the meeting having commenced its sittings in Rome, on the 22nd of last month, I must make some remarks on the subject. The declared purpose is the promulgation of the doctrine, that the mother of our Lord was born exempt from original sin, as the doctrine of the Christian world. That other purposes are concealed under this summons, we can scarcely have a doubt; for the doctrine, under the name of the 'Immaculate Conception,' was established by the formulary of the Council of Trent three centuries ago, in these words—'The blessed Mary, Mother of God, is exempt from all sin, actual and original.'—Session 6."

Now, sir, I would be glad to know how does that statement, from so high a Protestant authority, comport with your oft-repeated assertion, that the doctrine has been heretofore an open question in the Catholic Church, never decided or settled by Pope or council—and the more especially with the statement in your last number, that "the Council of Trent expressly declared, that they did not decide on this doctrine?" An answer in your next, to this humble inquiry, will much oblige your most humble servant,

St. Stephens's Day, 1854. A CATHOLIC.

We think it not likely that Dr. Croly should have made such a statement, and we decline to search "the round of the papers" for it, for this reason—we have made it our rule never to produce the assertions of Protestants as proofs of the doctrines of the Church of Rome; we charge nothing on the Church of Rome but what we find in her own standard authorities, or in the writings of her Popes, cardinals, bishops, &c. We feel sure that Roman Catholics approve of our never bringing Protestant writers as evidence of what is believed in the Church of Rome. What the Council of Trent did must be decided by the records of that Council, and not by what Dr. Croly or any other Protestant may have said.

In the sixth session of the Council of Trent, there is nothing at all on the subject of the conception of the Blessed Virgin, nor of original sin in respect of her; but in the fifth session, which declares all men born under original sin, we do find this—"This holy synod, however, declares that it is not its intention to comprehend in this decree, where original sin is treated of, the Blessed and Immaculate Virgin Mary, Mother of God; but that the constitutions of Pope Sixtus IV., of blessed memory, which it renews, are to be observed, under the penalties contained in those constitutions."* And this is all that the Council of Trent has said upon the subject.

That Dr. Croly should represent this as a decree that "the Blessed Mary, Mother of God, is exempt from all sin, actual and original," is certainly most unlikely, although, if he did, it would be nothing to us.

But since the Tablet newspaper has actually endeavoured to put this construction on that decree, we ought, perhaps, to show the absurdity of such an attempt.

In the leading article in the Tablet, of December 23 (the same article we have quoted in another paper), we find this passage—"After propounding its definition, affirming against the heretics the dogma of the universal transmission of original sin, the Council took care to add, with great delicacy and tenderness for her own children; but in such a way as to leave no doubt about its own sentiments and the strong bias of its mind, 'that it is not its intention to comprehend in its decree the immaculate Virgin Mary, Mother of God,' &c. Our Catholic readers will, no doubt, be struck, as we have been, with the evidence of this concordance of the Church with herself." Now, this confesses that the Council of Trent, out of delicacy and tenderness to those who denied the immaculate conception, carefully refrained from saying that it was true; but it also tries to insinuate that the terms of the decree prove that the Council really believed the doctrine, though they shrunk from saying so, because so many denied it. And the Tablet prints the word in italics, thus, "Immaculate Virgin," as if that word applied to her, implies her immaculate conception. We notice this, because it is, perhaps, the course intended to be adopted in this controversy. Such writers will, perhaps, produce passages in which the Virgin is called "Immaculate," and try and impose that as proof that those who called her so, must have believed in the immaculate conception; but truth compels us to say, that such a use of the words is a deliberate deception. In fact, the term "immaculate Virgin," only implies that she always continued a virgin; and is so used by Pope Sixtus IV., in his decree of 1476—"Et immaculata Virgo nihilominus post partum remanerot." And very many who applied the word Immaculate to her in a larger sense, intended thereby only that she was preserved from actual sin, and not at all from original sin.

Thus the Dominican monks, who held that the doctrine of the Immaculate conception was downright heresy, still called the Virgin "Immaculate," because they conceived that she had been kept from actual sin. So the word Immaculate, applied to the Virgin, does not at all prove that they who called the Virgin so, did believe in the Immaculate conception, unless the Tablet is prepared to say that the order of St. Dominick held the Immaculate conception—which even the Tablet will not attempt to say.

And with respect to that decree of the Council of Trent, it is to be remembered, that Cardinal Pacheco and other cardinals and bishops in the Council of Trent wanted to introduce words to the effect, that it might be "piously believed that the Virgin was conceived without sin;" and the Council positively refused to let those words be put into the decree—Du Pin, Eccl. Hist., Vol. iii., p. 426. Dublin, 1724. Did that show the strong bias of the Council in favour of the doctrine of the Immaculate conception?

And the Council did actually in that very decree renew and confirm the constitutions of Pope Sixtus IV., which actually condemned to excommunication, from which the Pope alone could absolve, "those who should dare to assert that persons who held the contrary doctrine—viz., that the glorious Virgin Mary was conceived in original sin—do incur the crime of heresy or mortal sin; since it is not yet decided by the Roman Church and the Apostolic See."* If the Council had really meant to imply that the immaculate conception was an article of the Catholic faith, would they have renewed this sentence of excommunication upon those who should venture to say that it was heresy to deny it?

The plain and evident meaning of the decree of the Council of Trent was this—that in deciding that all mankind were born under original sin, they would not undertake to decide whether the Blessed Virgin was or was not. And until now, Roman Catholics themselves admitted this; for which we appeal to no less a controversialist than Bishop Milner—"The Church does not decide the controversy concerning the conception of the Blessed Virgin, and several other disputed points, because she sees nothing absolutely clear and certain concerning them, either in the written or unwritten word; and, therefore, leaves her children to form their own opinions concerning them."—End of Controversy, Letter 12.

* Declarat tamen hæc ipsa sancta synodus, non esse suæ intentionis comprehendere in hoc decreto, ubi de peccato originali agitur, Beatam et Immaculatam Virginem Mariam, Dei Genitricem; sed observandas esse constitutiones felicis recordationis Sixti Papæ IV., sub pœnis in eis constitutionibus contentis, quas renovat.—Sess. v., sect. 5.

* Simili pœnæ ac censuræ subjicientes eos, qui aliud fuerint asserere, contrariam opinionem tenendo, videlicet gloriosam Virginem Mariam, cum originali peccato fuisse conceptam, hæresis crimen, vel peccatum incurrere mortale; cum nondum ad a Romana Pontifex et apostolica sede decisum.—Bull of Pope Sixtus IV., A.D. 1483.

CHRISTIAN MINISTERS NOT SACRIFICING PRIESTS.

WE have received a letter, signed "Imus," in reference to the article in our last number, of which the above is the title. As we do not think the writer's objections proceed from a real difference of opinion with us, but from a misapprehension of our meaning, in the crowded state of our columns we hope he will be satisfied if, instead of inserting his letter, we add to our article such explanations as it would seem to require. Its object was to prove that the Christian minister is not a SACRIFICING priest, as were the Pagan ispeus or Sacerdos and the Jewish Cohen, and as the Romish priest claims to be. It was never said or meant that the English language and the English Church do not attach a definite meaning to the term priest; nor was such an absurdity ever thought of, as that the formularies of the Church of England do not clearly recognise a distinction between the ecclesiastical orders of priest and deacon, and assign corresponding offices to each in her ritual. The very title of the article in question expressly limited the sense in which it treated of a priest—viz., a "sacrificing priest." In this sense we repeat most emphatically our assertion, that the New Testament knows nothing of the word as applied to Christian ministers—nay, more, that such a sense of the word is utterly irreconcilable with the whole spirit and genius of the Christian religion. Our objection was not to the use of the English word "priest," which has in its etymology and original no connection whatsoever with the iepeus of the Greeks, or the sacerdos of the Latins, but is the true representative of the Greek πρεσβυτερος, Latin presbyter, from which word it is contracted—the intermediate step being supplied by the Saxon preostre, which, of itself, is sufficient to show that the Romish and Romanising sense of the term is not its genuine sense.

We beg, also, to repeat, that the "proper functions" of the Jewish cohen (or priest) as such, were to offer sacrifice and to intercede for the people; and that the business of teaching, admonishing, governing, and administering discipline, was not peculiar to him in his sacerdotal character, but was shared by the Levites and the Elders of the congregation—even by those who did not belong to the sacred tribe. The very passages referred to in our correspondent's letter prove this position most completely. Thus, from 2 Chron. xvii. 7-9, sect. 21, 22, xxxv 3; Ezra vii. 10, 11; Neh. viii 9, viii. 7. It appears that it was not in their character of sacrificing priests that the priests taught the people, because the Levites are associated with them in that office; whilst from the first of the passages just quoted it further appears that even civilians (princes) might be commissioned to take part in the same work. Again, with respect to Deut. xxxi. 9-12, our correspondent has omitted to notice the important word "thou"—v. 11. The following extract from the note of Bishop Patrick (who has never been charged with low views respecting the Christian priesthood) will explain our meaning:—"This order being directed, not to all Israel, but to a particular person, plainly imports that the supreme governor, whosoever he was, had the charge laid upon him to take care these laws should be read at the solemn time, that all the people might hear them; and, therefore, I think, the Jews rightly say that their kings, when they had them, were bound not only to look after this matter, but to read the law themselves to as many as could hear them—appointing the priests and Levites to read it in as many other assemblies of the people as were necessary for the fulfilling of the precept." Indeed the best commentary upon the passage is furnished by the sacred history itself, from which we learn that Joshua "read all the words of the law, before all the congregation of Israel"—Joshua viii. 34, 35; and that King Josiah "read in the ears of all the men of Judah, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, all the words of the book of the covenant"—2 Kings xxiii. 2. The matter is equally clear in the case of another passage insisted on by "Imus."—Deut. xvii. 8-13. On this passage Bishop Patrick observes—"the Jews all agree that the supreme court, or sanhedrin, here spoken of, did not consist only of priests and Levites, but of any persons of the other tribes, who were fit to be promoted to the dignity. Nay, they say if there was not one priest or Levite in the court, it was a lawful judicature; for the high priest himself, no more than any one else, had a place here, merely for his birth, unless his learning in the Law was answerable."

It is needless to go through the other passages adduced by "Imus"—e.g. Lev. x. 8-11—in which the Jewish priests are spoken of as teaching, &c. The same remark applies to them all—viz., that while the priests were, of course, competent to discharge these duties, and were commanded to do so, still it was not quoad priests that this was enjoined on them, seeing that others, not invested with the sacerdotal office, might and did discharge them, and were commanded by God to do so. So much for our assertion, at which "Imus" has taken offence, that "under a sacerdotal system, the teacher necessarily occupies, as compared with the priest, a subordinate place; and that under the Jewish Law, teaching was no part of the proper priestly functions, as we may conclude from the fact that no [specific] directions on that head are found in the portions of the Pentateuch which treat of the peculiar duties of the priests [as such]." Again, as to the objection urged against our assertion that "the peculiar business of the Scribes was to expound the law, and that these Scribes belonged indiscriminately to all the tribes, and not exclusively to that of Levi," we are sure that if "Imus" carefully reads over the New Testament, to say nothing of the works of Lightfoot, Vitringa, and others who have treated of the Jewish ecclesiastical polity in the Gospel age, he will no longer call in question so incontrovertible a statement; and we are also sure, that as soon as he makes himself fully acquainted with the respective positions occupied by the Temple and the Synagogue in the time of our Lord, he will cease to doubt the perfect correctness of the assertion, that "to offer sacrifice and intercede were the proper functions of the priest (the minister of the Temple); to teach, to admonish, to govern, to administer discipline, were the special and characteristic duties of the presbyters or elders (the ministers of the Synagogue)."

In conclusion, we beg once more to remind our correspondent that he has mistaken the sense in which we used the word priest. We did not use it, as he seems to think, in its ordinary modern sense of "one who officiates in sacred offices." In this sense, we cordially agree with him, the Christian minister is a priest. We used the term in the sense of a sacrificing priest, and our whole argument was based upon this definition. The difference is enormous, and on it depends essentially much of the controversy between Romanists and Protestants. Neither do we maintain—very far, indeed, are we from it—that the office of teaching, admonishing, correcting, &c., is not a proper part of the Christian minister's functions. The very opposite follows from our argument, and was one of its intended consequences. We denied, and we still deny, that the Christian minister is the successor of the Jewish priest, regarded in his proper character as a sacrificer. We never denied, nor do we now, that the Christian minister may be regarded as the successor of the Jewish priest when divested of his sacrificial and purely legal functions, and viewed merely as "one who officiates in sacred things," as the authorised minister in the Church of the true God. But, under this limitation we hold, and do still hold, that the Christian minister corresponds more nearly to the Presbyter of the Jewish Synagogue than to the priest of the Jewish Temple.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD: Showing how Irish people talk about Irish doings, when they get a quiet place, at the back of a ditch, or under a hedge.

"A most interesting little volume, from the pen of one who seems to be well acquainted with the Irish character, and the doings of the priests in our sister island. We felt highly entertained by its perusal, and can cordially recommend it to our readers. That it will prove serviceable to the cause of truth, we doubt not. Missionaries to the Irish Roman Catholics will find in it a valuable assistant."—Edinburgh Witness.

IS THE CLOISTER A RETREAT FROM SIN?

THE other day, as we sauntered along a quiet, country road, in the pursuit of health, we were struck with an odd expression from an elderly, decent-looking woman to another, who seemed to be listening to a narrative of provocation, so exceedingly aggravated, that she said, "It was enough to make a nun or an angel commit sin!" As we passed along, and thought over the expression, we remembered that there certainly were angels who did lose their first estate, and did commit sin; but we very much doubt if the good old woman, who put the case to her listening friend, ever harboured a thought that a priest or a nun could have committed sin. The angels did not commit sin until they had fallen from their first estate; all mankind, including priests, popes, and nuns, have, in Adam, already fallen from their first estate of innocency, and have been born in sin; yet, from an extensive intercourse with our Roman Catholic brethren, in the humbler ranks of life, we know that it is a prevalent notion among them, that a priest or a nun (unless reprobate and cast away) cannot, and does not commit sin.

Now, we have not the slightest intention to impugn the lives and conduct of those whom our Roman Catholic friends are disposed to revere. Far from it. We are ready to give the utmost credit that can be claimed to the sincerity and good motives of those who desire to devote themselves to a holy and religious life, and to fly from the world and its seductions and temptations, and seek spiritual rest and peace in the retreat of their cells and cloisters. But though we concede the utmost sincerity and purity of motives and life to the devotees, we venture to question the idea that is so deeply rooted in the Roman Catholic mind, that sin can be shut out by stone walls—that Satan and his powers of darkness can be escaped or eluded by flying to the retreat of a convent or a monastery. The grosser acts of sin, the vices of fashion and frivolity, may no longer be open to the recluse, and so far there is a certain degree of immunity secured; but what avails this in the sight of a pure and holy God, who estimates sin not according to the measure of man, and reckons its magnitude not by its danger to society—who holds the impure imagination of the heart to be adultery, the vengeful thought of the mind to be murder—who denounces the proud and haughty spirit with the most fearful condemnation. If you place a man on the loftiest summit of the Alps, far away from everything of human kind, can you thereby free his mind from devouring thoughts of ambition, jealousy, impatience, or discontent? If you shut him up in the deepest abyss of the earth, can you take him beyond the reach of the wildest imaginations, and the most wicked thoughts? May not his mind be like a wilderness through which every unclean beast of the forest may roam at large? How vain and foolish then the idea of our young Roman Catholic friends, who fly from the world without, and its snares and temptations, its deceitfulness and sin, not knowing that they are abandoning themselves more entirely to a still worse and more depraved world within, to a heart that is by nature "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked?" We, of course, admit the potency of the dangers with which the associations of the world are fraught, and confess, that the experience of its insincerity has quenched many a generous aspiration and stunted many a noble impulse of youth, and that its evil example has led many into vice and degradation, yet, with all its temptations, it seems to us that he who mingles in the daily throng has far ampler scope for the exercise of the humanizing and ennobling charities of life, and is quite as likely to be usefully employed, whether as regards himself or others, as the pale recluse who, absorbed in complacent reveries on his self-dedication, says mentally to all beside, "Stand off, for I am holier than thou."

Again we say, we do not impeach the sincerity or purity of the lives of those who devote themselves to a monastic or conventual life; but we boldly assert, that it is one of the greatest delusions that ever possessed the mind of a young person to suppose, that a life of seclusion, or of the most rigorous observance of discipline or formularies, can so preoccupy the mind as to debar all entrance to sin—or that the great enemy of souls cannot as effectually practice his wiles and temptations upon the frail child of Adam in the solitude of a cell as in the giddiest maze of fashion or folly. Depend upon it, we are safest when in the way of God's own ordinance, when we are in the path of duty, fulfilling in humble dependance upon divine strength, the allotted duties of our station and calling; and we may rest assured, that as the devil is not less active or powerful in the most solitary retirement of the cloister, so neither is the protecting arm of God less strong in the busiest scenes of life.

We have something further to say on this subject in another column.

BREVIARIUM ROMANUM—NO. II.

IN our last December number we gave several specimens of the instructive "lessons" which every Roman Catholic priest is bound to read daily, under pain of mortal sin, in the Breviary or Clerical Prayer Book of his Church; and, notwithstanding the immense circulation of our paper through every part of the kingdom, we have not received a single complaint that we misrepresented or mistranslated a single passage, nor a single protest against the question we asked our readers—viz., whether they believed that any intelligent or educated priest, in the nineteenth century, can sincerely give credit to such old wives' fables?

We shall proceed with our extracts, as before, without much regard to classification or order, but giving, as usual, the original Latin, with the exact reference to the volume and page where each story is to be found. The first which occurs to us is the story of Paul the Hermit, whose feast is held on the 15th of January, and which will be found in the Breviarium Romanum, published by R. Coyne, printer and bookseller to the Royal College of Maynooth. —(Pars Hiemalis, p. 450-1, 4th, 5th, and 6th lessons.)

Paul the Hermit, we are there told, retired to a cave in the desert parts of the Thebais, on account of the persecution of Decius and Valerius, where he lived to the age of 113. Being near his death, Anthony, another Egyptian anchorite, paid him a visit by a supernatural command from heaven. They at once saluted one another by their proper names, though previously strangers to each other, and began to talk about spiritual matters, when a raven, who had been in the habit of bringing Paul half a loaf of bread daily, brought a whole loaf for him and his visitor! After the raven had departed, "Ah," said Paul, "the Lord has sent us our dinner. It is now sixty years since I have received daily half a loaf; to-day my allowance has been doubled." They then proceeded to eat their dinner at the fountain, and spent the night in divine praises. In the morning, Paul admonishing Anthony about his death which was then approaching, exhorted him to bring him a cloak which he had got from St. Athanasius, and which he wished to have as his winding-sheet. Anthony was coming back with the cloak, when he saw the soul of Paul ascending into heaven, surrounded by the holy company of the prophets, and apostles, and choirs of angels. In the cave he found the corpse of Paul, with crossed knees, erected head, and hands stretched out on high, which he wrapped in the cloak as desired. He was, however, at a loss how to dig a grave, being himself an old man of ninety, and having no spade or other instrument to do it with. When, lo! two lions ran swiftly from the interior of the desert to the body of the blessed old man, and gave Anthony to understand, very intelligibly, as well, at least, as they could, that they greatly deplored Paul, and then set to work with their claws, and, striving to outdo one another, eagerly dug a hole in the earth, big enough conveniently to contain the body, and then departed! When they were gone, Anthony buried the body in the grave prepared by these singular grave-diggers, and formed a tomb over it after the manner of Christians. He then took possession of Paul's coat, which was made of palm-leaves, in the manner of basket-work, and wore it regularly as long as he lived as a holiday-dress on Easter and Whitsunday.*

We may here briefly refer a few other specimens of pious lions, recorded in the same book; and, we doubt not, there are others, if we had time to search further.

St. Venantius (18 May. Pars Verna, p. 544) was ordered to be cast to the lions, but they, forgetting their natural ferocity, cast themselves at his feet!†

St. Prisca also, after suffering many other cruelties, was brought into the amphitheatre, and cast to a lion; but he, forgetting his savage nature, humbly cast himself at her feet!‡ —(Pars Hiemalis, p. 461.) This and other miracles were, however, said to say, wrought in vain; for poor Prisca's persecutors, after unsuccessfully trying to starve, burn, and tear her to pieces with iron nails, at last succeeded by bethinking themselves of the more summary process of cutting off her head!

A still more striking instance, however, is to be found (under date, 10th June, Pars Æstiva, p. 361), where SS. Primus and Felicianus having been cast into the theatre, and two lions let loose on them, the noble animals, not only prostrated themselves at their knees, but fawned upon them with their heads and tails. The poor saints, however, were, as usual, despatched with the axe.§

A very similar story is told (same vol., p. 375, 15th June) of SS. Vitus, Modestus, and Crescentia, who were also cast to a lion, who prostrated himself, and licked their feet.‖

In the same volume (30th July. Pars Æstiva, p. 496) we have a slight variation in the spectacle, in the case of SS. Abdon and Sennen, who having been cast to the bears and lions, for spitting on the images, in the time of the Emperor Decius, the wild beasts were afraid to touch them, whereupon the never-failing sword was successfully resorted to, in spite of the miracle.¶

When on the subject of wild beasts, we ought, however, not to omit mentioning the case of the celebrated St. Januarius and his companions (19 Sept. Pars Autumnalis, p. 343), who, after having escaped, unhurt, from a burning furnace, and various other trials, were also thrown to the wild beasts in the amphitheatre, who (as before), forgetful of their natural ferocity, prostrated themselves at the feet of Januarius, which, however, did them but little good, for the prodigy having been attributed to magical incantation, they, like St. Prisca and the rest, were despatched with the sword.

We give the Latin, of course, only in the passages where otherwise we might be suspected of exaggeration or distorting the original.

 In ardentem fornacem conjectus ita flamma cessit, ut ne vestimentum aut capillum quidem flamma violaverit. . . . Postero die omnes in amphitheatro feris objecti sunt, quæ naturalis oblita feritatis, ad Januarii pedes se prostrarunt

The story then goes on to tell the exploded fable of St. Januarius's blood, which, kept in a glass phial, in a coagulated state, liquifies and bubbles up, just as if it were recently shed, as often as it is placed in sight of the martyr's head!*

This favourite standing miracle is annually enacted at Naples, before thousands of admiring spectators; but it has been well asked—would it not be more charitable to allow one of our chemists to view the blood, and observe its change, not surrounded by priests, candles, and the smoke of frankincense, and thus convert us all at one stroke?

The Rev. Blanco White, once Chaplain to the King of Spain, and Rector of the College of St. Mary at Seville, tells us, in his "Practical Evidence against Catholicism," p. 171, that he had often performed High Mass, before the shrine of St. Ferdinand, in the Royal Chapel at Seville; but though a member of the Chapter to whose charge the Spanish kings have entrusted their holy ancestor, he never could obtain a distinct view of the body, which the Church of Rome declares to be incorrupt.†

"On certain days," says he, "the front of a massive silver sarcophagus is removed, when a gold and glass chest is seen, containing something like a man covered with splendid robes; but the multitude of candles on the altar, and the want of light from behind, prevent a distinct view of the objects within. Once, when the multitude was thronging the chapel, a lady of high rank, who had applied to me for a closer view than was allowed to the crowd, was furnished with a stool to stand upon a level with the body. To gratify, at once, her and my own curiosity, I took a candle from the altar, and endeavoured to counteract the reflection of the glass, by throwing the light obliquely. One of our inferior clergy, the sacristan, whose duty it was to stand near the saint in his surplice, seeing what I was about, snatched the candle from my hand, with a rudeness which nothing but his half-roguish, half-holy zeal could have prompted. He pretended to be alarmed for the pane of glass; but I more than suspect that he knew the incorruptibility of the saint could not bear inspection. The head, which I distinctly saw, was a mere skull, with something like painted parchment holding up the lower jaw. A similar covering seems to have been laid on the right foot, which projects out of the royal robes. When the greatest miracle of Christianity, the resurrection of Christ, was performed for the conversion of men to the Gospel, the Saviour himself offered the marks of his wounds to the close inspection of a doubting disciple. The Church of Rome follows a different plan in the use of the multiplied miracles of which she boasts. She has no compassion for men who will credit only their sight and touch."

But to return to our extracts from the Breviary—When alluding to Paul the Hermit's raven, we ought not to forget St Ægidius's wild doe, who, when he had retired into the wilderness, used to come to him every day, at stated hours, to give him milk, on which he lived for a long time with the roots of herbs‡ (2 Sept. Pars Autumnalis, p. 281), though we, perhaps, might account for a deer becoming tame and coming to be milked rather more easily, than we could explain how a raven could bake bread, and know when a whole loaf was necessary, and when half a loaf would do!

St. Raymond Nonnatus (31 Aug. Pars Autumnalis, p. 280) was also indebted to the kind offices of a blind mule, which, when after his death a contention arose about where he should be buried, decided the matter by spontaneously carrying the body, shut up in its coffin, to the Chapel of St. Nicholas, that he might be buried in that place where he had first learned the rudiments of a more holy life.§

A few pages farther on in same volume (Pars Autum., p. 286) we have another specimen of posthumous honours in the case of St. Lawrence Justin, who used, among other modes of mortifying his body, to sleep on bare tiles, and even when sick and dying ordered his domestics to place him on his usual bed, in reward for which, his body, after it had been more than two months buried, was found whole and uncorrupt, fragrant with a sweet odour, and with a ruddy countenance! On which account, with other novel miracles wrought by him after his death, Pope Alexander VIII. added him to the number of the saints.‖

St. Lawrence's bed of tiles is, however, far outdone by that of St. Rose of Lima, whose life we reviewed in our third vol., p. 104, but who figures also in the Breviary (30 Aug. Pars Autum., p. 277). Her bed was made of knotted trunks of trees, of which she filled up the interstices with broken tiles.* According to her life, in Mr. Duffy's volume, it was a still more dreadful instrument of torture. "She made herself a bed, in the form of a chest, and filled it with rough stones of different sizes. This bed, still seeming too soft, she added three pieces of twisted and knotted wood, and filled up the space with three hundred pieces of broken tiles, placed so as to wound and tear the body. Upon this terrible cross she never placed herself without trembling and shuddering, while her blood seemed to freeze in her veins." For the other almost, if not altogether, incredible austerities of St. Rose, we must refer our readers to Mr. Duffy's volume, in what he calls "The Young Christian's Library," or to the CATHOLIC LAYMAN already referred to, vol. iii., p. 105, adding this single sad reflection, which we believe to be actually the truth. Roman Catholic nunneries rob society of many of the most amiable and virtuous female minds—those who, in the practice of social duties, if brought up in the more genial atmosphere of home, would be a blessing to their relations and friends, and patterns of virtue to the community—to make their lives, at best, a perpetual succession of torture and useless, if not of actually suicidal, practices. The quiet and soberminded are made the slaves of outward ceremonies; the ardent and sensitive are doomed, like St. Rose, to fanaticism and madness. Is not such the natural result of the Church holding up such models for daily imitation? The power of persecuting others on a grand scale is given to very few, but every individual might be made his own tormentor, if he would only adopt the practices which the Church of Rome represents as the means of arriving at Christian perfection.

We must postpone further extracts from the Breviary till another number.

HISTORY OF THE POPES.—NO. IV.

THE TENTH CENTURY CONCLUDED.

WE now proceed to complete the history of the Popes of the tenth century, from the Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart.

POPE LEO VIII.

This Pope, of whom we have found mention in the life of Pope John XII., given in our last number, is not reckoned in the list of Popes, either by Labbe and Cossart or by Bishop Milner. But here we meet with a curious fact—the Leo who was Pope in 936 is called in both lists Leo VII., and the Leo who was Pope in 1049 is called Leo IX; and neither list has any Leo VIII. at all! The reason is, because this Leo VIII. was counted in the list by all the older writers; and all the historians called the next Pope of that name Leo IX. It was impossible in later times to alter the title of this Leo IX. without confounding all history; so all that could be done to get over the difficulty of having two Popes at one and the same time, was to have no Leo VIII. at all! But Leo VIII. will turn up again for all that, for such a Pope there was, and a stirring fellow, too.

POPE BENEDICT V.

The Jesuits say—"Benedict, from being a deacon of the Church of Rome, was elected by the unanimous consent of the clergy and people of Rome, in place of the deceased Pope John XII., in the year of our Lord 964, in the time of the emperors, Otho and Nicephorus. Which thing being done, since the Roman chiefs had done it contrary to their faith given and confirmed by an oath, "the Emperor Otho," says Luitprand, "went to Rome with a multitude of his faithful followers, collected from all sides, and surrounded it on all sides with a strict siege, lest any way out should lie open. But the citizens, greatly animated by the exhortation of Pope Benedict, for a long time sustained the siege, until, stricken with hunger, they were compelled to surrender the city. After the city was taken, Benedict being banished to Humburg, the false Pope Leo, the eighth of that name, was raised to the See, a false synod was called, and empty constitutions were made.†

The Jesuits proceed—"Benedict died in exile in the year of our Lord 965, adorned with the title and honour of martyrdom, equally with Popes Pontianus and Martinus, who, on account of their glorious confession of Christ, for his name's sake suffered banishment and other injuries and insults."‡ We, however, greatly doubt whether Benedict V. had any valid claim to the honour of a martyr; for we have in Labbe and Cossart the proceedings of the above-mentioned synod held by Leo VIII., and it appears there that Benedict V., when brought before that synod, begged hard for mercy; and "shouted out that he himself was the invader of the holy Roman See!" And he handed up his Pall and Papal staff to Leo VIII. as true Pope!§ And by thus acknowledging himself a false Pope, he obtained banishment instead of the death which he feared. Great allowance, no doubt, is to be made for such weakness in an unsuccessful aspirant to the Papacy in that age. But the Jesuits have a strange idea of the spirit of a martyr, when they put forward this man as an instance of the spirit of martyrdom in Roman Popes! When St. Paul was persecuted for being an Apostle he did not beg for mercy, and "shout out" that he was a false Apostle, in order to obtain it! So the attempt to show one martyr-Pope in the tenth century is a sad failure.

The Jesuits thus conclude his history—"Some writers omit him altogether, as being unjustly intruded; others place him before Leo, the schismatic and false Pope; but they are deceived in maintaining either of these opinions. For, from those things which I have said above, it manifestly appears that Leo was never anything else but a false Pope, and an antipope, unworthy to be counted in their number, decorated with the name of Pope."*

But it is truly wonderful how impossible it appears to be for Roman Catholics to agree even about those things which they say themselves are manifest and evident. For if we turn to the Canon Law, the Decretum of Gratian, dist. 63, c. 23, there we find the decrees of Pope Leo VIII. in his synod, inserted as the law of the Church of Rome!

POPE JOHN XIII.

"John, Bishop of Narnia, after the death of the false Pope Leo (whether Benedict V. was alive or dead is uncertain), was made Pope in the year of our Lord 965, in the time of the Emperors Otho and Nicephorus Phocas."† Now, it seems to us rather important to know whether Benedict V. was then alive or dead; for if he were a lawful Pope, and living at the time when John XIII. was appointed, it is hard to see how Roman Catholics can consider John XIII. a lawful Pope. But on that we can get no satisfaction, so we go on—"Who, in the beginning of his Pontificate, attacked the chief men of the Romans perhaps more sharply than he should have done; by their advice, being seized by the prefect of the city, he was banished to Campania." In this banishment he seems to have acted with more spirit certainly than his predecessor, Benedict V.; but it was not exactly the spirit of a martyr either; for, having got the emperor on his side, he got him to punish the prefect thus—"He took care that the prefect of the city, while living, should be stripped naked, placed on an ass, and being crowned with a bladder, be led about in derision, beaten with rods, and, at length, cast into prison; he commanded that the corpse of the dead prefect, by whom Pope John had been ejected from the city, dragged from its sepulchre, should be rent asunder, and scattered in diverse places."‡ A very complete revenge, certainly; and another illustration of the name of John—"The mercy of God"—as borne by the Popes. But if the present Emperor Napoleon had ordered the same thing to be done to all by whom the present Pope, Pius IX., was driven from Rome in 1848, what a procession there would have been!

The rest of the history of Pope John XIII. consists of a list of those nations who were converted about that time; and it was well if the Popes of that age did not make their converts as much the children of hell as themselves. It is also recorded at the end of this Pope's life, that "he expelled a devil, by the chain of St. Peter, placed round the neck of the possessed."§ But we think if any man could have expelled the devil out of the hearts of so many of the Popes of that age, that man would have been a greater miracle-worker than any Pope that ever lived. What a pity the Popes did not begin at home!

POPE DONUS II.

"Donus, who by others is called Domnus, and Domnins, a Roman by nation, was made Pope (the second of this name) in the year 972; who died when he had sat only three months."‖ We can hrdly expect a longer account of one who only held the Papacy three months; but it does look very suspicious that so many Popes died so soon after their appointment, in that age. It looks as if others were very anxious to succeed them.

POPE BENEDICT VI.

This Pope, as far as we can judge from his life, seems to have been more sinned against than sinning; and some light is thrown, too, on the short lives of Popes. "Benedict being taken and thrust into prison by Boniface Franco, a Roman, the son of Fernitius, A CARDINAL DEACON, a most wicked man, was strangled in the same prison, in the year of Christ 974, when he had sat one year, three months, and some days."*

POPE BONIFACE VII.

There is no Boniface VII. in the lists of either Labbe and Cossart or Bishop Milner; and, more curious still, there is no Boniface VI. either! Both lists give Boniface V. in the year 617, and Boniface VIII. at the year 1294, without any Boniface between—a curious instance how the list of the Popes has to be "cooked" to make it square with modern ideas of what the list of the Popes ought to be. But in the life of Benedict VI., above mentioned, we find the following:—"The sacrilegious murderer, Boniface,† who is met with elsewhere called the seventh of that name, violently invaded the Apostolic See, vacant by the sacrilegious slaughter of a most excellent Pontiff, and held it one year and one month. I, following more ancient writers, have judged that this man is not to be reckoned among true and lawful Popes, because having basely entered into the Apostolic See, he more basely deserted it. For, when after many other crimes and flagitious actions, this nefarious man had plundered the Vatican Church of all its ornaments, Benedict, relying on the wealth and aid of the Alberici, of whose family he was, so far disquieted him, that he was compelled to fly to Constantinople, abandoning Rome. When and upon what occasion he returned to Rome I will tell below, in the life of John XIV."‡ So we must wait for the rest of his history; but, in the meantime, let it be remembered, that more than 300 years after (in 1294), when another Pope, named Boniface, arose, all the world called him Boniface VIII., showing that they all acknowledged that there had been a Pope Boniface VII.; and all the Jesuits now can do is to try to leave A BLANK in place of Boniface VII.

POPE BENEDICT VII.

This was the Benedict who put Boniface to flight, as above related; so the Papacy was fairly his by right of conquest.

The Jesuit here states, that he and Cardinal Baronius, between them, had "expunged" Pope Boniface VII. from between the two Benedicts.§ It was natural to boast of such a fact; but the boast confesses that Leo VII. had been commonly reckoned in the list for 600 years! No more is told us of Pope Benedict VII., but that he kindly received Sergius Damascenus, who had been driven out of his bishopric by the Saracens. When no more than this can be told of a pontificate of nine years duration, we may, at least, hope that the Church found Pope Log more tolerable than Pope Stork.

POPE JOHN XIV.

This Pope succeeded Benedict VII., in 984. When Pope Boniface VII. heard this, and that the Emperor Otho was also dead "he returned to Rome to invade the See a second time; he seized upon the chair of St. Peter; and he not only thrust out John, whom he found sitting in it, but with great tyranny he thrust him, bound with chains, into the castle of St. Angelo, which was held by a faction of his friends; and the violent and sacrilegious robber compelled him, shut up there for four months, at length to perish with hunger;"‖ and he publicly exhibited his dead body to the people. The history goes on—"This invader of the See, this cruel slayer of two Popes, this cursed parricide, and truculent robber, the antipope Boniface, oh, horrible! through tyranny occupied the chair of Peter!"¶ However, he died after he had held it for four months, in addition to the thirteen months which he had held it before, and the Church and the world were rid of another "monster Pope." But so used were the people of that age to see "monsters" in the chair of St. Peter, that for 600 years he seems to have retained his place in the list, until the Jesuits and Baronius "expunged" him! But why he should not have remained in the list as well as Sergius III., Pope Lando, Pope John X., John XI., John XII., and others, it is not easy to see; was he really so much worse than they? That he was commonly counted in the list till comparatively late times, the Jesuits themselves confess, when they say at the end of his life—"These things, Baronius, at the year 984, &c., has taken from ancient Vatican documents. Let the more recent chronographers see what a robber and tyrant they reckon in the number of MOST EXCELLENT PONTIFFS (oh! oh!), who should rather be reckoned among the most notorious robbers, and the most powerful traitors to their country, the Syllas and the Catilines."

POPE JOHN XV.

This Pope was appointed in the year 985. Through fear of what his predecessor had suffered, he retired into Tuscany. The Romans, through fear of what they had suffered from the emperors, invited him back. Nothing appears in his life to throw light on his character for good or evil. This Pope sat nine years.†

POPE GREGORY V.

"Gregory V. was made Pope in the year 996, before Otho (the emperor) had come to Rome. John, a Calabrian by nation, Bishop of Placentia (whom they call John XVI., and badly placed in the number of the Popes), was set up in the apostolic throne against him in schism, by the exertions and aid of Crescentius."‡

So here is another Pope expunged who was once in the list. But let us see what became of this Pope who, like so many others, was "one too many." "But when Otho, the emperor, had come to Italy to avenge the injury offered to the Pope by Crescentius, and had conquered Rome, he ordered for the invader of the Apostolic See, that his sacrilegious hands should be amputated, his ears cut off, and his eyes plucked out! And when the Romans had been freed from the tyranny of Crescentius (on whom Otho inflicted capital punishment by beheading) AFTER that amputation of his members, they placed him on an ass, and compelled him, HOLDING IN HIS HANDS the tail of another ass going before him as leader, to sing this through the public street of the whole city—'Such punishment let him suffer, who endeavours to drive the Roman Pope from his See.'"§

We give this history as we find it; though, we confess, it puzzles us to understand how a man, after both his hands have been amputated, could be compelled to hold the tail of an ass in his hands! But those who can believe that the Popes of that age were "Vicars of Christ," may, perhaps, be able to believe this too.

POPE SYLVESTER II.

"This was he who, after he had obtained the friendship of Hugo, King of France, procured Arnulphus, Bishop of Rheims, to be driven from his See, and himself to be put in his place, by the decree of the false synod of Rheims; and who, when at length ejected from it by Leo, the Legate of the Apostolic See, and the decree of the Council of Rheims, fled to the Emperor Otho." A very suitable beginning for one who rose to be Pope in those days. However, from the fact that he was afterwards Archbishop of Ravenna, the Jesuits suppose that he must have done penance "for all the calumnies which he put upon the Roman See by fraud, deceit, and lies."‖ This Pope is reported to have been a great philosopher and astrologer; and he must have been a clever artist, too, from the way that he got to be Pope. "He was raised to the Pontificate by the assistance and patronage of Otho, the third emperor of that name, although Aimonus writes that he was asked for by the people, who, without doubt, did so out of flattery to the emperor. I believe that the emperor favoured him, as well because he was a German as because, as Ditmar says, having lived a long time at Magdeburg, he made there a most admirable clock, and thus, by means of an instrument composed with skilful art, had drawn all into love and favour to himself."¶

It is true that a story was got up by Cardinal Benno, and long currently believed, "that Sylvester was raised to the height of the Apostolic See by magical incantations, and by selling his soul to the devil for a price." But in thus concluding our history of the POPES OF THE TENTH CENTURY with Sylvester II., appointed in the year 999, we are content to take the account of the Jesuits, and look on him as a man who (however he might have misbehaved himself as an archbishop) was still good for something, since he got the Papacy by making A CLOCK!

Let us now give a brief summary of "the Popes of the tenth century," as exhibited in our numbers for November, January, and the present month—

Romanus, intruded by force.
Theodore II., sat only twenty days.
John IX., another Jeremiah, by destroying what his predecessor did.
Benedict IV., highly praised.
Leo V., cast into prison by an usurper.
Christopher, an usurper.
Sergius III., "the most wicked of all men;" "a robber;" "an apostate."
Anastasius III., no materials.
Lando, kept a harlot, who made her lovers archbishops.
John X., his harlot made him Pope.
Leo VI., six months, cast into prison and died there.
Stephen VII., no materials.
John XI., his father a Pope; his mother a harlot; himself "a monster."
Leo VII., no materials.
Stephen VIII., nose and ears cut off.
Marinus II., highly praised.
Agapetus II., also praised.
John XII., killed in adultery.
Benedict V., "abouted out" that he was a false Pope.
John XIII., got the prefect of the city tortured to death.
Donus II., only three months.
Benedict VI., strangled by a cardinal.
Boniface VII., a murderer, cut out and a blank left.
Benedict VII., Pope by right of conquest.
John XIV., four months, starved in prison by Boniface VII.
John XV., no materials.
Gregory V., no materials, except the use JOHN XVI. made of his hands after they were cut off.
Sylvester II., made Pope for making a clock.

So we find thirty in all (including John XVI.), who held the Papacy in the tenth century, and were reckoned as Popes afterwards, with more or less general consent. And if, some centuries afterwards, two were cut out, and their titles left blanks to this day, and one clean disappeared, and some others pronounced false Popes, but still left in the list, all these clumsy corrections in later times do not prove that the Papacy was a sure and certain guide to those who believed in those Popes while living. It rather proves that the Papacy was a delusion and a snare to those who died believing in false Popes: and if delusive to them how can it be certain to us? Information as to who is the true Pope, and the Vicar of Christ, comes too late when men are dead.

Of the thirty who actually held the Papacy in that century, we find nine or ten pronounced by the Jesuits themselves to have been monsters, adulterers, whoremongers, murderers, apostates, or whatever other crime can be thought of.

Of all the thirty, the Jesuits themselves can praise but THREE, a fact more remarkable, because they pass by so many without praise or blame. If the Jesuits could have found any ground to praise some more of the Popes of that age, would they not have done it, when praise was so cheap, and Popes to be praised so few?

We are not the first who have considered these histories, and drawn the natural conclusions from them. Roman Catholics have done so before now; and their judgment is entitled to weight. We take the following from the learned and pious Father Paul Sarpi, himself a Roman Catholic:—

"From this time (883) until the year 963, during the space of 80 years, wherein Italy laboured under the extremest confusion, as well in the civil government as ecclesiastical, especially in the Papacy, we must not expect to find any traces or form of good government in the Church, but a mere chaos of impieties, and a general preparative and forerunner of the miserable revolutions and disorders which followed. Popes were then excommunicated by their successors, and their acts ceased and annulled; not excepting the very administration of the sacraments. Six Popes were driven out and dethroned by those who aspired to their places. Two Popes put to death, and Pope Stephen VIII. wounded in the face with so much deformity, that he never after appeared in public. Theodora, a famous courtezan, by the interest and faction she then had in Rome, got her professed lover chosen Pope, who was called John X.; and John XI. was chosen Pope at the age of twenty years, the bastard of another Pope, dead eighteen years before; and, in short, such a series of wild disorders, gave occasion to historians to say, that those times produced not Popes but monsters! Cardinal Baronius, being under some difficulty how to treat their corruptions, saith—'That in those days the Church indeed was, for the most part, without a Pope, but not without a head; its spiritual head, Christ, being in heaven, who never abandons it.' In effect, it is certain that Christ hath never yet forsook his Church, neither can his divine promise which he hath made us, fail—that he will be with it even to the end of the world; and on this occasion it is the duty of every Christian to believe, with Baronius, that the same calamities which happened in the world at that time, have happened also at another; and that as the assistance of Christ alone preserved the Church in those times, so hath he afforded that shield of defence to his Church, and will continne it to her in all the like events and accidents of this world. So that a Pope was not necessary to the existence of the Church, even though there should NEVER MORE HAVE BEEN A POPE."*

These are the words of a Roman Catholic who had deeply studied the history of his own Church. No true Protestant will object to his confidence in the promises of God to his Church. If Roman Catholics would study the history of their Church with the same accuracy, and think of it with the same candour, the whole Church of Christ might even now be reunited again.

The moral of the whole history is this—the promises of God to his Church are the same in all ages; whatever promises the Popes have now, the same promises belonged to the Popes of the tenth century. If the performance of God's promises to the Church in the tenth century was not through the Popes, neither is it through the Popes now. The Popes of the nineteenth century may be better in some things, and may be worse in others, than the Popes of the tenth century; but if there are no more promises to the Popes in one age than to the Popes in another, then we must try the Popes in each age by their conformity to "the faith once delivered to the saints." We must try to do it while we live ourselves, and not leave it to be found out by others, some centuries hence, whether the Popes, whom all the world acknowledged while they were living, were false Popes or not. It will not do to discover the validity of their claims, or the truth of their teaching, in purgatory or in hell.

If we close our history with the century we undertook, it is not for want of materials to proceed with. Benedict VIII., who died in 1024, is said, by Labbe and Cossart,† to have appeared to his successor to beg to be got out of Purgatory. But, for our parts, we think, if there be such a place, a Pope of that age who got admission there might be thought a lucky fellow.

Benedict IX. was appointed in the year 1033, being then eleven years of age! and although, even at that age, an example of unchastity, "the universal Catholic world, which is wonderful, worshipped him as the successor of Peter, and recognised him as the Pope of Rome!"‡ This Pope devoted his whole life to his lusts, and at last resigned the Papacy, that he might have nothing but his lusts to think of! But he held it for eleven years, and during that time there were at one period three Popes together—Benedict IX., Sylvester III., and John the Dean of Rome. On which the Jesuits say—"Thus a three-headed beast, rising from the gates of hell, most miserably infested the most holy chair of Peter!"§

It is with disgust and shame that we have soiled our pages with such histories as these; but while Roman Catholics make the claims they do for the Papacy—while they affirm, that except through the Papacy, the promises of God cannot be fulfilled to his Church—we must point to the HISTORY OF THE PAPACY, and ask "IS THAT THE FULFILMENT?" And as often henceforth as the claims of the Papacy are discussed in our pages, that history will be pointed to, and that question asked.

PIOUS FRAUDS—NO. III.

RELICS—NO. II.

IN our last December number we gave our readers an account of some of the spurious relics which the cupidity of the ecclesiastics of the middle ages palmed upon the superstition and ignorance of those who were credulous enough to abandon the use of their reason and the evidence of their senses out of deference to authority, and many of which, though long since exposed, continue to deceive multitudes of people throughout every Roman Catholic country in Christendom.

The last article we mentioned was the miraculously multiplied towel with which our blessed Lord wiped the feet of the apostles, one of which is shown at the Lateran, in Rome; a second, at Aix-la-Chapelle, in Prussia; and a third, at St. Corneille de Compiègne, in France.

This brings us naturally to treat of the linen cloths (called in Latin by Roman Catholic writers, sudaria, which we may, perhaps, with Webster and others, translate "sudaries") in which we read in the Gospel narratives that our Lord's dead body was wrapped when laid in the tomb by Joseph of Arimathea.

It may be proper here to recal to the memory of our readers what the Holy Scriptures have recorded about them. The Gospel narrative is simply as follows:—

St. Matt. xxvii. 57—"And when it was evening there came a certain rich man of Arimathea, named Joseph, who also himself was a disciple of Jesus. He went to Pilate and asked the body of Jesus. Then Pilate commanded that the body should be delivered. And Joseph taking the body wrapt it in a clean linen cloth, and laid it in his own new monument, which he had hewed out in a rock. And he rolled in a great stone to the door of the monument, and went his way."

St. Luke xxiii. 50 gives a similar account of the transtion.

St. John xix. 40 says—"They (Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus) took therefore the body of Jesus, and bound it in linen clothes with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury. Now, there was in the place where he was crucified a garden, and in the garden a new sepulchre, where no man yet had been laid. There, therefore, because of the parasceve ("preparation day"—Authorized Version") of the Jews, they laid Jesus, because the sepulchre was nigh at hand. And on the first day of the week Mary Magdalene cometh early, when it was yet dark, unto the sepulchre; and she saw the stone taken away from the sepulchre. She ran, therefore, and cometh to Simon Peter and to the other disciple whom Jesus loved, and saith to them, they have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid him. Peter, therefore, went out and that other disciple, and they came to the sepulchre. And they ran both together, and that other disciple did outrun Peter, and came first to the sepulchre. And when he had stooped down, he saw the linen clothes lying; but yet he went not in. Then cometh Simon Peter following him, and went into the sepulchre, and saw the linen clothes lying, and the napkin that had been about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but apart, wrapt up into one place. Then that other disciple also went in, who came first to the sepulchre, and he saw and believed. For as yet they knew not the Scripture, that he must rise again from the dead. The disciples, therefore, departed again to their home."

We read nothing here of the likeness of our Lord's body being miraculously impressed on its wrapping sheet—though, if it was true, it would have been a most remarkable and marvellous event, worthy of being recorded; and, indeed, much more important to mention than the mere fact that certain women followed Jesus to the place of crucifixion without meeting with any miracle, or that when the disciples visited his tomb they found the linen clothes lying, and the napkin which wrapped his head lying in a place by itself—matters one would conceive of very trivial importance to be recorded, if anything connected with such a solemn event were not interesting to his believing followers. Can any one doubt, too, if they who went to seek the Lord's body had really found such a full length likeness of it as is now exhibited in the places we shall presently mention, that either the disciples or the faithful women would have at once removed them, and proclaimed and showed to their companions and friends so remarkable a corroboration of their story? and if they did not remove them at once, is it probable that they would afterwards have returned to the sepulchre, where they knew he was not, when they had positive proof that he was actually risen from the dead, and had no longer any object in going there? Be this, however, as it may, it is the boast of a number of modern towns—for instance, Turin, Carcassone, Nice, Aix-la-Chapelle, Treves, Besançon, and six or seven other places—that each of them possesses the whole original linen cloth or sheet mentioned in the Holy Scriptures, to say nothing of a variety of fragments of it to be seen elsewhere; and thousands of persons, for centuries, have undertaken, and possibly still undertake, long pilgrimages, at much expense and fatigue, in order to see these sheets or sudaries, of which, if we were to grant that any one of them was the real sheet in which Christ's body was wrapped 1800 years ago, it is manifest that all the rest must be wicked impostures to deceive the public for the sake of gain. That none of them, however, is really what is pretended is plain from the following considerations, if, indeed, any negative proof were required, where no affirmative proof exists to counterbalance the antecedent improbability of the whole story. Whenever the "holy sudary" is exhibited they show a large sheet with the full-length likeness of a human body on it. The most celebrated of them—the holy sudarium of Turin—is a long linen sheet, upon which is painted, in a reddish colour, a double likeness of a human body—i.e., as seen from before and behind, quite naked, with the exception of a broad scarf encircling the loins. Now, we have seen that St. John's Gospel says that Christ's body was "bound in linen clothes, as the manner of the Jews is to bury"—and what was that custom? This may be known by their present custom, and their books which describe the ancient ceremony of interment among them, which was to wrap the body in a sheet to the shoulders, and to cover the head with a separate cloth. This is precisely as the evangelist, St. John, described it, saying "then cometh Simon Peter, and went into the sepulchre, and saw the linen clothes lying, and the napkin that had been about his head, not lying with the linen clothes, but apart, wrapt up into one place."* Can any proof be more convincing that these "holy sudaries" are not the genuine linen clothes which wrapped the Saviour's body, or the napkin which was about his head, but a clumsy fabrication by men who were, perhaps, as ignorant of Jewish customs and of the Scripture narrative, as they were of the rival relics of the same kind in other places.

The history of the sudary of Turin is curious, as it shows that the efforts of enlightened and pious prelates, even in the Church of Rome, to prevent idolatrous practices invading their churches, proved unavailing against that general tendency to worship visible objects, so strongly implanted in corrupt human nature, that, even in this enlightened age, we are continually witnessing such manifestations of its revival as may be compared only to that of the dark period of the middle ages.* It is pretended that this relic was saved by a Christian at the taking of Jerusalem by Titus; that it was brought back to Palestine in 640, from whence it was transferred to Europe by the Crusaders. It was taken by a French knight, named Geoffroi de Charny, who presented it to the collegiate church of a place called Liré, situate about three leagues from Troyes, in Champagne; the donor declaring that this holy sheet was taken by him from the infidels (why the infidels should have thought it worth preserving does not appear), and that it had delivered him in a miraculous manner from a prison dungeon into which he had been cast by the English. The canons of the church at Liré (which place, by the way, belonged to the knightly narrator of the miracle, and who, consequently, had a personal interest in drawing pilgrims thereto) seeing at once the great profits to be derived from such a relic, lost no time in exhibiting it, and the church forthwith was crowded with devotees. The Bishop of Troyes, Henri de Poitiers, however (not being, we suppose, personally interested, and finding no proofs of the authenticity of the pretended relic), prohibited it to be shown as an object of worship, and it remained unheeded for twenty-four years. After the death, however, of Bishop Henri, the sons of Geoffroi de Charny, about the year 1388, obtained permission from the papal legate to restore this relic of their father's to the Church of Liré, and the canons exposed it in front of the pulpit, surrounding it with lighted tapers. The Bishop of Troyes (Peter D'Arcy), however, was as incredulous as his predecessor, Henri de Poitiers, and, in spite of the legate, he prohibited the exhibition under pain of excommunication. Geoffroi's sons afterwards obtained from the king, Charles VI., an authorization to worship the holy sudarium in the said Church of Liré. The bishop was, however, as persevering as they were, and himself repaired to court, and represented to the king that the worship of the pretended sheet of Jesus Christ was nothing less than downright idolatry, and argued so effectually, that Charles revoked the permission by an edict, dated August 21, 1389. Geoffroi de Charny's sons had, however, too deep an interest in the matter even to let it drop there, and they appealed to Pope Clement VII., who was residing at Avignon; and he granted permission for the holy sudarium to be exhibited. The Bishop of Troyes then sent a memorial to the Pope, explaining the importance attached to this so-called holy relic, and so far prevailed, that though Clement did not prohibit the sudarium from being shown, he forbade it to be exhibited as the real sudary of Jesus Christ. The canons of Liré, being thus checkmated, put aside their sudary, which they were only permitted to show on the terms of not asserting it to be genuine; but it, not long after, re-appeared in other places, and, after being shown about in various churches and convents, it seems to have remained in Chamberry, about 1482, where nobody dared to impugn its reality. From that time its fame increased, and Francis I., King of France, went a pilgrimage, on foot, the whole way from Lyons to Chambery, in order to worship this linen cloth. In 1578, St. Carlo Borromeo, having announced his intention of going from Milan, on foot, to Chambery, to adore the holy sudary, the Duke of Savoy, wishing to spare this high-born saint the trouble of so long a pilgrimage, had the relic brought to Turin, where it has since remained, and where the alleged miracles performed by it, and the solemn worship paid to it, may be considered as a proof that its authenticity is no longer doubted.

We should be glad to know whether Pope Clement was right when he prohibited its being worshipped as the real sudary, or whether St. Carlo Borromeo was an idolator when he worshipped it as genuine?

Akin to these holy sudaries, is the smaller sudary, or handkerchief of Veronica, which is shown in the Church of St. Peter at Rome, with the face of Jesus Christ miraculously imprinted on it. It is recorded that a kerchief with the likeness of our Lord's face upon it, and covered with blood and sweat, was kept in a church at Rome in the 11th century. It is noted in a brief of Pope Sergius IV., dated 1011. We do not know what tales respecting this relic were related at that time; but it appears that copies of it, called Veronicas (a corruption of "vera icon," "the true image") were sold; and, no doubt, this appellation gave rise to the legend of Sancta Veronica, who wiped the face of our Lord with her kerchief as he was going to Calvary. The evangelists, we need scarcely remark, when naming the women who followed our Lord to the place of crucifixion, make not the least mention of this Veronica being among them—though, if true, it was so marvellous and remarkable an event, that the face of Jesus Christ should have been miraculously imprinted on a handkerchief with which a woman named Veronica wiped away the blood and sweat from it, that it was much more worthy of being recorded by the evangelists than many other things which they have minutely recorded connected with the occasion.

There are many versions of this legend (with other

* St. John xx. 6, 7.

* Let those who think this an exaggeration remember the pilgrimage to the Holy Coat of Treves, and the recent translation of the bones of St. Theudosia at Amiens, described in our last August number—CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. iii., p. 92; or the life of St. Philomena, same volume, p. 56.

legends of the same date), some stating that it was this woman whom Jesus cured of the bloody issue; whilst others maintain that she was no less a woman than Berenice, niece to King Herod. It is also said that after the dispersion of the Apostles, St. Veronica went in company with Mary Magdalene, Martha, and Lazarus, to Marseilles, where she wrought many miracles with her kerchief. The Emperor Tiberius (the legend proceeds) heard of these miracles, and, having fallen ill, summoned Veronica to Rome, where she cured him in an instant, and was rewarded with great honours and rich presents, though, ungratefully enough, he lived and died a pagan. The remainder of her life is said to have been spent at Rome, in company with St. Peter and St. Paul, and she bequeathed the miraculous handkerchief to Pope St. Clement. Notwithstanding all this, and though she is said to have suffered martyrdom in France, and, we believe, is acknowledged as a saint and allotted a place in the calendar, this legend has never yet, we believe, received the official approbation of the Roman Catholic Church, and may, therefore, we presume, be disbelieved without pain of mortal sin. Perhaps, however, as Pope Pius IX., has lately stated, for the first time, another miracle, as old as Christianity itself, in his recent Bull, he may also, ere long, put the seal of his approbation on the legend of St. Veronica's handkerchief also.

We have not yet done with this instructive subject, and, shall probably give our readers a few additional specimens of spurious relics in an early number.

THE LIFE OF A PRIEST.

In the prosecution of any favourite object, what perseverering industry is employed by man in the examination of all its bearings upon the destiny of his future life; and what energy he exercises, in examining all its collateral consequences? But, alas, what little exertion is employed in examining the doctrine of man's salvation, the most important subject that could engage the mind of man. The salvation of our souls is their deliverance from the guilt of sin, and the verdict of God is, that all have sinned —"There is none righteous, no, not one." But is there no hope for the guilty, no pardon for the condemned? Yes, there is: To the Lord our God, belong mercies and forgiveness, though we have rebelled against him.—Dan. ix. 9. When the guilty repent sincerely, a full and free pardon of their sins is imparted to them. God says, "I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and iniquities will I remember no more."—Heb. viii. 12. The moment the sinner repents, he is free from the condemnation of punishment. David says (Psalms xxxii. 1, 2), "Blessed is the man to whom the Lord imputes no sin. And, again, blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered." A full and entire remission of all their sins is granted them, through the all-sufficient merits of Christ's atonement, and the black catalogue of their crimes, which have been written down in the book of God's remembrance, by the recording angel, shall, by one penitential tear, be blotted out for ever.

A great portion of my time and attention has been hitherto devoted to the examination of the doctrine of salvation, as it is taught in the catechisms and in the Maynooth Class-book; and I found, in those books, no proofs taken from the Scripture, from the Fathers, or from the records of the early Churches, in support of the doctrine of salvation, as it is inculcated in the Church of Rome. But I found salvation more difficult to be attained in that Church than in the reformed Catholic Church, for the following reasons:—There were twelve new articles added to the original belief by Pius IV., six commandments, and five sacraments, by the Council of Trent—making altogether 23 new articles to be believed, more than are to be found in the belief of the early Churches, and not found at present in the Church of England; and to increase the difficulty, the members of the Church of Rome must believe them to be of divine institution, without proof and contrary to evidence, or an anathema will be hurled against them from the castle of St. Angelo: and it is thus the Church of Rome puts an extinguisher upon free inquiry, contrary to the doctrine of St. Paul, "prove all things."

As indulgences are hinged upon confession, I shall take them in order, and examine upon what authority they are founded. Pius IV. says—"I, also, affirm, that the power of indulgences was left by Christ to the Church, and that the use of them is most wholesome to Christian people." The Council of Trent says (Sess. 25)—"Since the power of granting indulgences has been bestowed by Christ to his Church, and she has exercised this power from the earliest antiquity, the holy Council teaches and enjoins, that the use of indulgences is, in the highest degree, salutary to Christian people; and it condemns with anathema those who assert, that they are useless, or deny that the power of granting them is in the Church." Here are the "ipsissima verba" of the Pope, and the decree of the Fathers of Trent, without any Scriptural authority, or definition of indulgences. But the catechism says, "that an indulgence is a release from the temporal punishment due to those sins that have been forgiven us by penance and confession, by means of the superabundant merits of Christ and his saints, which are applied to our souls, by the special favour of the Church." From this doctrine I can conclude, that the merits of Christ alone are not sufficient without the addition of the merits of the saints; which must be considered as nothing less than awful impiety; and that our Blessed Lord did not speak the truth, when he said to his disciples, that they could have no merit of themselves—"When ye have done all things commanded, say, we are unprofitable servants" (Luke xvii. 10); which borders very closely on blasphemy. The Church of Rome holds, that the punishment incurred by sin is both temporal and eternal. That the eternal punishment is removed by the absolution of the priest, but that the temporal punishment must be paid in this life by penance, or in the next by the flames of Purgatory.

There is a well-known axiom in all schools, "qui potest majus, potest et minus eodem sub respectu." According to this principle, the priest who can absolve from the eternal guilt, can a fortiori absolve from the temporal punishment. The difference between the Church of Rome and Scripture doctrine is very perceptible in this instance. An Apostle tells you that if you confess your sins to God, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from ALL unrighteousness.—John i. 1, 9.

When God pardons a sinner, it is not by half measures, but he pardons him fully as well as freely, and eternally, by his own gracious agency, without money and without price; without sacerdotal interference, or Papal indulgences. Of this you have a striking instance in the case of the man who was sick of the palsy; and also in the instance of the weeping penitent of Bethany. My reading does not enable me to go, nor do I believe can any one, farther back than the first crusade, to establish the origin of indulgences. At that time of fanatical enthusiasm, the prison-doors of all Europe were thrown open to all prisoners, however enormous their crimes, and an indulgence was granted to all those who would join the standard of the cross, and a plenary indulgence was to be applied to the souls of all those who fell by the hand of the Saracen, or who plunged their consecrated swords into the heart of an infidel. The next place I find indulgences issued from the treasury of the Vatican, was at the commencement of the pontificate of Leo X., to finish the magnificent Church of St. Peter in Rome. For this ostensible purpose, indulgences were sold, and the traffic was carried to a shameful excess in the beginning of the sixteenth century, till this coin became so base by its too frequent currency, that it led to the Reformation, the happiest event that could happen to promote the civil, political, and religious liberty of Europe. The jubilee or plenary indulgence is of pagan origin, and was introduced into the Church of Rome by Martin V., in order to fill his exhausted treasury, and to facilitate his entry into Rome, after the great schism of the west. The word jubilee signifies a time of rejoicing. In the Old Testament it occurred every fiftieth year after the completion of the seven Sabbatical years, during each of which all labour ceased for man and beast; and even the land itself was allowed a seasonable repose. But we do not find the word jubilee in the New Scripture. It is a well-authenticated historical fact, that the Popes, after being forced to leave the Eternal City in consequence of their tyranny and political oppressions, resided at Avignon in France, during the period of 75 years; and that Otho Colonna was the first Pope who was induced to return to the City of the Hills, by Petrarch, to dry up the tears of the disconsolate widow who was mourning, in sackcloth and ashes, the absence of the spiritual father of the people. The deserted city, during her melancholy widowhood, has been pathetically, yet beautifully described by the elegant muse of Petrarch, at the revival of literature, in the commencement of the 15th century. Otho Colonna was the son of a Roman citizen of great ancestral claims upon the gratitude of the Roman people; when a period of great scarcity occurred, and the people were dying by hundreds of hunger, this benevolent Roman threw open his purse and his granaries, and saved the remnant of an expiring people. In gratitude, the people raised a column to his memory; and, in subsequent times, the family name was changed to Colonna. After the deposition of the Popes of Avignon, Martin V. was elected, and took every precaution to insure himself a favourable reception in his native city. Amongst the ancient customs of the Romans was, that of celebrating secular games on the first day of January of every century, in honour of the age of the Eternal City. The new Pope was well acquainted with the Carmen Seculare, which he read in his more youthful days, in the Odes of Horace, and was sung by a choir of youths dressed in the most gorgeous attire, amidst the shouts of an admiring people, who rolled along in one unbroken wave, from the steps of the Pantheon to the majestic dome of the Capitol. After which a donative was given to the people. Pope Martin deferred his entry into the city of Rome, until the first day of January, after his elevation to that See, and had, in the meantime, hymns of jubilee composed, to be sung on the occasion, by youths beautifully dressed, in imitation of the custom of heathen Rome. On the first of January he made his public entry into the city of the Cæsars, surrounded with all that was not only respectable, but magnificent, and preceded by a multitude of people who joined the youths in singing jubilate to Martin V., the representative of Colonna, the saviour of the Roman people. After the procession—a civic ovation—the Roman people were ordered to make an offering at the shrine of the apostles, and a plenary indulgence was pronounced by Martin V. from the balcony of the Vatican. By means of this happy device, the Papal treasury was once more filled to overflowing, and the Pope was in a position to give a donation to the inhabitants of the city in imitation of the Roman emperors. Thus, the citizens of Rome, and all those who thronged into the city, were enabled to return to their respective homes, with erect heads and light hearts, after being relieved from an oppressive weight of sin by this timely yet imaginary indulgence.

The sale of indulgences, under the pontificate of Leo X., by Tetzel, a low, unprincipled man, who was selected by the Archbishop of Magdeburg, together with the great immorality of the clergy of the 16th century, were the proximate causes that led to the Reformation. From that period the human mind was emancipated from all the superstitious ignorance of the barbarous ages, and recovered its natural elasticity, while it shook off that oppressive weight which debased its powers and cramped its energies.

As it is with the doctrine of the Church of Rome I have to do, the immorality of the clergy before and at the time of the Reformation is foreign to my purpose, and I shall abstain from any inquiry into that disagreeable subject, and leave that task to others who may feel it their duty to expose it.

In proportion as we ascend to the days of the apostles the nearer we approach the noble simplicity of the Christian religion, like the radii of a circle that converge to its centre. The great advantage to be derived from falling back upon primary principles, is to be learned from Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws, in which he says, that as soon as he found out first principles, the laws by which nations are governed became very easy to him. Let us go back in imitation of that great man to the primary principles that are to be found in the Holy Scriptures, and we cannot fail in detecting the errors that have by degrees crept into the Church since the period of the apostolic age.

The next question I had to examine in the category was, "Is the Latin language which is used in the Roman Liturgy in accordance with Gospel principles?" I answer, certainly not; as we read in the Acts ii. 4, "And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost, and began to speak with other tongues, as the spirit gave them utterance. And they were all amazed, and marvelled, saying one to another, 'Behold, are not all these that speak Galileans. And how hear we, every man in his own tongue, wherein we were born, the wonderful works of God?'" The apostles received on this occasion from the Holy Spirit the power of speaking different languages, in order that their preaching might be understood in every part of the world—In Mesopotamia and Judea, Cappadocia, Pontus, and Asia. Yet the Church of Rome continues to have her prayers read in a dead language, which is not understood by the people. St. Paul devotes an entire chapter—the fourteenth of the first Corinthians—to this subject, to show the necessity of speaking in a language which the people can understand—"If I pray in an unknown tongue my understanding is unfruitful." The clergymen of the reformed Churches pray with their faces to their respective flocks, and, at the same time, in their vernacular language; whereas the priests pray with their backs to the people, and in a language which they do not understand—no, not even the clerk who makes the responses. In this instance the Church of Rome acts in direct opposition to her own decree, as the fourth Council of Lateran established it as a rule that the service should be in the vulgar tongue of every nation; and we find it so in every nation independent of Rome.

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XXVII.

PAT and Jem did not get together for a good while to have a talk; but at last they fell in on the road, and were walking together; but Pat did little at the talking, but kept looking mighty hard at his old coat, first at one sleeve and then at the other, and then on the big patches on the breast of it.

And, indeed, poor Pat's coat was very bad. It was once made all of blue frieze, and then it must have looked very smart; but, when times got hard, Pat had to get a piece on the coat betimes, because he never had the price of a new one; so there were black patches, and gray patches, and patches the colour of mud; and there were the legs of two old stockings, sewed over the arms, from the wrists to the elbows, to keep the patches together; and all the patches looked as if the best wife in the country could not keep them together much longer.

So Pat kept looking mighty hard at his coat, and talking little.

"What's the matter with the coat at all?" said Jem.

"Well, I'm studying the old coat," said Pat.

"Is it how to get a new one, you mean?" said Jem.

"Time enough to study that when the meal gets cheaper," said Pat; "it's this old coat I'm studying."

"Well, and what do you make out of the old one?" said Jem.

"Well, I had a discussion on it last night," said Pat, "and I didn't think there was as much to be got out of an old coat."

"And what's to be got out of it?" said Jem; "tell me that, Pat."

"Well," said Pat, "I was in last night at old Ned Flanagan's, and there was a deal of people in it, and there was Tim Reilly, the priest's schoolmaster; and they were all talking about the old religion and the new religion; and Tim Reilly was holding out that the Church of Rome had the old religion; and others was asking wasn't there things changed in it, and then how could it be the old religion? and at first Tim Reilly wouldn't give in that that there was anything changed; but there was old Ned Flanagan, that gets a newspaper, called the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, and he had a deal of learning out of it; and, indeed, he promised me the reading when he had done it. So, says he to Tim, 'Is the Immaculate Conception an article of the Catholic faith?' says he. 'It is,' said Tim; 'didn't you hear the priest read the Pope's decree in the chapel.' 'And how could St. Bernard be a saint when he denied it?' said Ned. 'It wasn't an article of the faith then,' said Tim, 'for the Pope hadn't settled it.' 'Well,' says I, 'sure that's a new piece put on it anyway; and how can it be the old religion after that?'

"Well, with that he turns round to me, for he's a mighty cute little fellow that would bother anybody, and says he, 'how long have you the old coat?' says he. 'It's turning the talk, you are,' says I. 'It's not,' says he; 'it's coming to it I am: how long have you the old coat?' says he again. Well, they all allowed me to answer him: so, says I, 'it's eight years any way, and may be a bit more. 'And mighty well mended it is,' says he, 'for the time. Now, do you mean to tell me,' says he, 'that you bought that coat eight years ago?' says he. 'Deed and I do,' says I. 'That very coat?' says he. 'This very coat,' says I. So he put's his hand on my shoulder, and says he, 'was this patch on when you got it?' says he. 'No,' says I. 'Nor none of the patches?' says he. 'Not one of them,' says I. 'And it's the same coat for all that,' says he.

"Well, I seen then what he was at; and when I came to think of it, it wasn't easy to think it was the same coat, when there was hardly a bit of the first coat left in it. 'Well, I think it's hardly the same, after all,' says I. 'Well, boys,' says he, 'did you ever hear the like of that? didn't he say this minute it was the very coat?'

"Well, they were all down on me then; and I tried to make the best hand I could of it; 'for sure,' says I, 'it isn't like it, for it was a blue coat when I got it, and I leave it to yourselves, boys, if you can find one bit of the blue cloth in it now.' Well, with that, the boys all began discussing if it was the same coat or not; and some allowed that as long as I took it off at night, and put it on in the morning, it was surely the same coat; and more of them allowed it was the cloth made the coat; and when the same cloth wasn't in it, how could it be the the same coat. Well, when they were all done talking, says Tim to me—'Is it the same coat,' says he, 'or is it not?' 'Well, I think it's not,' says I. 'And when did it turn into another coat?' says he; 'was it when the first patch was put on it?' says he. 'No,' says I, 'it wasn't, sure enough.' 'And was it the second patch, or the third patch, or the fourth patch, or what patch,' says he, 'that turned it into another coat?' says he. Well, with that they all began again, and now they were all for allowing that it was the same coat. Well, Ned Flanagan's byre is down, and so he had the cow in the corner. So I turns to Ned, and says I, 'that's a pretty little calf,' says I. 'It's no calf,' says Ned, 'it's a cow giving milk, with a calf of her own.' 'Don't be joking,' says I, 'it's a calf.' 'It's joking you are,' says he. 'Was it ever a calf?' says I. 'It was.' says he. 'What day did it turn into a cow?' says I; 'was it a Sunday or a week-day? Here's a learned man,' says I, pointing to Tim, 'that will prove to you, that it's a calf still, if you can't tell the day it changed.' Well, with that they all allowed the day couldn't be told, and still the calf had turned into a cow.

"'And, says I, 'isn't it the same with the corn that grows—who can tell the day the ear is formed? and isn't it the way with spring and summer? and with child and man? and isn't it the way with day and night? and where's the good,' says I, 'of the priest telling us our religion must be the same now that it was at first, just because no one can tell what day it changed from one religion to another; and wouldn't just the same argument prove,' says I, 'that night was day, or day night? But who would be the fool to believe it against his own eyesight,' says I, 'and where's the good of argument that's as fit to prove that black is white, as to prove anything else?' says I.

"Well, with that they all fell to talking, and they allowed that things does change, in a way that no one can tell when they changed, and that there is no use denying it.

"Well, I was considering with myself that when a thing is said sharp and clever about one thing being like another, people, maybe, is apt to take it up mighty quick, and think it very learned, without stopping to consider how far one thing is like another; so, thinks I to myself, would the religion of Jesus Christ be like an old coat at all?

"So I turns to Tim Reilly, and, says I, 'after all there's a differ between the coat getting old, and the calf turning into the cow, and I give in to you entirely that it's the very same coat I bought eight years ago.'

"'To be sure there's a differ,' says he, 'between a thing getting old, and one thing turning into another, and that's what I was going to say when you would be done talking,' says he; so, then, he went on to talk a deal about the old coat being the same, with all its patches; and just the same way, he allowed, when the Pope made new decrees and new articles of faith, his religion was still the same religion, and the old religion, for all that.

"So I waited till he was done; and then says I, 'And do you mean to tell me,' says I, 'that the religion of Jesus Christ is made up of patches and mendings, like an old coat? You're right so far, any way,' says I, 'that your religion is old enough, like the old coat,' says I; 'it's as old as being patched and mended, and threadbare and darned, and in rags and holes, and tossed and turned, can make it; but you'll never get the holes out of an old coat by turning it,' says I; 'and isn't it enough for me to have my old coat made of rags and patches without having my religion made of them too,' says I; 'and isn't that the way with all them that tries to patch up a religion of their own merits instead of the merits of Christ; for doesn't the the Bible say that "all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags?"* And why do I get patches on the old coat?' says I. 'Isn't it because it is wearing out and going to the bad? And can that be the way with the religion that God made? Doesn't the Bible say that the heavens and earth will wear out like an old coat, but that God keeps still the self-same ever more?† And won't his religion keep the same? "for the Word of the Lord endureth for ever";‡ so I leave you the old coat for your religion,' says I; 'but it won't fit the religion of Christ; for there never was a coat,' says I, 'but the one, that could be fitting for the religion of Christ.'

"Well, with that they all began tearing at me to tell what coat that was; and I made them guess for it, and of all the guesses ever you heard they were the quarest; one allowed it was what the priest says mass in; another said it was what the nuns wear on their heads; another said it was the red strip that some of the priests wear over their shoulder; one old woman said it be to be the scapular; another said it was the blue cloak that's on the picture of the Virgin Mary in the chapel; and another allowed that it be to be something that was on the Pope: but they could make no hand of it, till old Ned Flanagan, that reads his Bible, says, 'Why, then, wasn't it the coat of Christ himself, that was "without seam, woven from the top throughout."'§ 'That's the hit,' says I; 'would there be seams and patches in the religion of Christ, any more than on his coat?' So with that, for it was getting late, says I to Tim Reilly, 'I'll just take myself off with my old coat,' says I; 'and may you get the religion without seams or patches, afore I get a new coat.' So they all bid me the good night kindly, and maybe they will think of the coat."

"Well Pat," said Jem, "you done it well: and deed I didn't know there was much good to be got in an old coat, and when times mend, and you get a new one, I hope it will serve you as well."

We hope so, too, and we hope the state of poor Pat's coat will remind some rich people how much the poor want some warm clothing in this cold weather, when the most a poor man's wages can do, is to get a little meal at a dear price, and maybe little enough of that. May God stir up the hearts of us all to remember how "the religion without seam," teaches us to feed the hungry and to clothe the naked.

§ Gospel of St. John, xix. 23.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY, 1855.

WE have now before us the Letter Apostolic of the Pope on the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. This decree was pronounced on the 8th of December, and is published in the Univers of the 20th January, and in the Tablet of January 27. The decree is, of course, in Latin; but the Tablet also gives a translation, which we shall make use of in preference to any of our own.

Such a document, of course, demands our consideration, and we desire to call the attention of our readers to it.

The first sentence that requires our notice is one near the end of the first clause or paragraph of the decree, in which our Lord is spoken of as "by nature one and the same common son of God the Father, and of the Virgin."*

This savours very strongly of the ancient Eutychian† heresy, which admitted only one nature in Christ. We hold, with the Catholic Church of all ages, that He who was born of Mary was truly God. We hold, also, that He was truly man. We hold with the Catholic creed of St. Athanasius, that he was "God, of the substance of the Father, begotten before the worlds; and man, of the substance of his mother, born in the world." We hold that these two natures remained distinct and unmixed in Him. "Perfect God, and perfect man." That He was "equal to the Father, as touching his Godhead; and inferior to the Father, as touching his Manhood." And yet that he was "one Christ," "not by confusion of substance, but by unity of person." All this our readers may see in the Athanasian Creed.

As respects his divine nature, he is the Son of God. As respects his human nature, he is the Son of Mary. And, by the unity of His person, he is the common son of both. To say that He is the common son of both by nature, whereas he is, in fact, the son of each in respect of separate natures, is the heresy of the Eutychians.

How the Pope fell into this error is plain enough. His object is to magnify Mary. If Mary was the mother of Jesus only by reason of his human nature, the Pope's object fails. But if Jesus was the common Son of God and of Mary, in respect of the same nature, then is she raised to the throne of God.

We ask our readers to consider how the new doctrine has led the Pope himself to confound the two natures of Christ, which the Catholic Church has always kept so distinct in her creed.

The Pope goes on to affirm, with the confidence that becomes a Pope, that the Church "HAS NEVER CEASED to lay down, to cherish, and to illustrate continually, by numerous proofs," the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception.

But, unfortunately for his assertion, the Pope tries to support it by proofs; and here is the earliest proof which he is able to produce—"For this doctrine . . . . the Church herself has most clearly pointed out, when she did not hesitate to propose the Conception of the same Virgin for the public devotion and veneration of the faithful. By which illustrious act she pointed out the Conception of the Virgin as singular, wonderful, and very far removed from the origins of the rest of mankind; and to be venerated as entirely holy, since the Church celebrates festival days only of the saints." So the earliest act of his Church, which the Pope can point to

* "Ut naturaliter esset unus idemque communis Dei Patris, et Virginis filius."

† The followers of Eutyches denied that the two natures of God and man remained distinct and separate in Christ. The Fourth General Council of Chalchedon was called to condemn this error, and pronounced that both natures remained in Christ, each perfect and distinct from the other.

as laying down the Immaculate Conception, is the institution of the feast and office of the Conception of the Blessed Virgin.

Now, when was this feast instituted? St. Bernard, "the last of the Fathers," will tell us. Writing, in the TWELFTH century, to the clergy of Lyons, who had then begun to introduce such a feast, he says—"We can never enough wonder that some of you could have the boldness to introduce a feast which the Church has not the least knowledge of, which neither is supported by reason, nor backed by any tradition."* This is conclusive proof that the Church of Rome had no such feast in the twelfth century. The Church of Rome adopted it in the thirteenth century at the earliest; and this is the most ancient act of the Church of Rome which the Pope can find to support his confident assertion, that the Church of Rome "has never ceased to lay down" this doctrine! Never ceased! But when did she begin? Why the Pope's own proof makes it plain that she BEGAN then to lay it down in the thirteenth century, at the earliest.

The Pope proceeds to confess a fact, which will probably prejudice many Christians against the doctrine he tries to support—"And, therefore, the very words in which the sacred Scriptures speak of uncreated Wisdom, and represent His eternal origin, she (the Church of Rome) has been accustomed to use, not only in the offices of the Church, but also in the holy Liturgy, and TO TRANSFER to the origin of that Virgin." That "uncreated Wisdom" is Christ, who is "the wisdom of God;" and what the Scripture says of His origin, the Church of Rome TRANSFERS to the origin of Mary! But why has the Church to do so? Is it not because the Scriptures does not attribute an immaculate origin to the Virgin? So the Church has to borrow from Christ, to lend to Mary; and when did the Church begin to do this? Was it before the thirteenth century?

The Pope then goes on to lay down a very important principle respecting the prayers which are appointed to be read in the Church of Rome. Whatever is prayed for in those offices, becomes thereby an article of faith! Thus, speaking of the Litany of Loretto, and other such prayers to the Virgin, he says—"Thus the rule of faith would be established by the rule of supplication itself." We must not forget this, when we have to speak of the Litany of Loretto in future.

Having thus spoken of the public acts of the Church, which the Pope cannot trace farther back than the thirteenth century at the farthest, he goes on to speak of the public acts of former Popes in favour of the Immaculate Conception.

And here the "object" of this devotion, as defined by the Popes, does seem to us strange. "Our predecessors, the Roman Pontiffs, increasing with all their care the devotion of the Conception, studied most especially to declare and inculcate its OBJECT and doctrine: for they taught clearly and openly that the festival was celebrated for the Conception of the Virgin; and they proscribed as false and most foreign to the intention of the Church, the opinion of those who considered and affirmed that it was not the conception itself, but the sanctification, to which devotion was paid by the Church. . . . . Our predecessors themselves thought it their duty to protect and defend, with all zeal, both the Feast of the Conception of the most Blessed Virgin, and the Conception from the first instant AS THE TRUE OBJECT OF DEVOTION." We ask, now, DO Roman Catholics really pay THEIR DEVOTION to that act, by which the Virgin Mary was conceived in the womb of her mother!! What else is the meaning of saying that "the Conception" is "the true object of devotion?"

Well may we say now, with Saint Bernard—"How can it be maintained that a conception which proceeds not from the Holy Ghost, but rather from sin, can be holy?"

But when did POPES first begin to set up the Conception as the "true object of devotion?"

The present decree gives the names of the Popes who did so, and we have only to ascertain their dates.

The first whom the present Pope can mention as having done so is Pope Sixtus IV., and the next Pope, Alexander VII. Pope Sixtus IV. obtained the Papacy in 1471, and Pope Alexander VII. in 1655! and these are the earliest Popes who can be shown to have set up the Conception as an object of devotion.

The Pope in his decree does mention Sixtus IV., but wisely refrains from quoting him. This was prudently done, as becomes an infallible Pope. For the object was to get men to believe that a Pope sanctioning a service for the feast of the Conception was, in fact, a decision of the Church of Rome in favour of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception; and to have quoted Sixtus IV. would have spoiled this idea entirely. For that very decree* of Pope Sixtus IV. which speaks of the service for the Conception—"When the Holy Roman Church publicly and solemnly celebrates the feast of the Conception of the undefiled and ever Virgin Mary, and has ordained a special and proper office for it,† that very decree does also prohibit any one from condemning those who deny the Immaculate Conception, on this very ground, "because the question has not yet been decided by the Roman Church and the Apostolic See."‡ So the very Pope who instituted the office of the Immaculate Conception, did proclaim that the question was not settled by that office; and yet the present Pope, in his decree, appeals to that office as a decision on the question by the Pope who authorized that office!

Of course, the Pope can do no better, in his decree, when he has no better proofs to produce. But it was wisely done only to refer to Pope Sixtus IV., and NOT to quote his decree!

The first of his predecessors whom the present Pope ventures to quote on the subject in his decree, is Pope Alexander VII. Pope Pius IX. does not in his decree tell us in what age Alexander lived.§ So the readers of the decree, in English, may imagine, if they like, that Pope Alexander lived "long, long ago." But, on turning to the list of the Popes in Labbe and Cossart, we find that Alexander VII. succeeded to the Papacy in 1655, just two hundred years ago. And this is the first Pope who can be quoted in support of the assertion, that the Church of Rome "has never ceased to lay down" the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception!

The passage quoted in the decree from Pope Alexander VII. is, indeed, most worthy of attention, for it throws light on an important subject—viz., the precise period at which the Church of Rome began to celebrate, by authority, the festival of the Immaculate Conception. This is Pope Alexander's evidence—"Considering that the Holy Roman Church solemnly celebrates the festival of the Conception of the Immaculate and ever Blessed Virgin, and has appointed for this a special and proper office, according to the pious, devout, and laudable institution WHICH EMANATED from our predecessor, Sixtus IV. . . . . ." So the "Office of the Conception" is an institution of Pope Sixtus IV. It emanated from him. Now, Pope Sixtus IV. succeeded to the Papacy in the year 1471. So it was not until the fifteenth century that the prayers on which the present Pope now lays such stress in his decree were authorized at all by a Pope in the Church of Rome.

We have spoken above as if that office might have commenced in the thirteenth century. We did so in compliance with a common opinion, founded, we believe, on an expression in the 36th Session of the Council of Basil.* But that Council is condemned and rejected by the Church of Rome. And here, in the present Pope's decree, we have the first genuine authority for the institution of the office of the Conception, near the end of the fifteenth century.

Pope Alexander VII. goes on to say, that the reverence shown to this "piety, devotion, and festival," has "never changed in the Roman Church since the institution of the worship itself." Now we know what Pope Pius meant when he said, in the beginning of his decree, that the Church "has never ceased to lay down" this doctrine. He means, never since 1471!

Pope Alexander VII. then goes on to denounce anathemas against those "who try TO RECALL INTO DISPUTE the same belief, festival, or worship." So it had been in dispute. This comes in very awkwardly in a decree which affirms that this belief had been always laid down, always held in the Church.

It was a hard case for poor Pope Pius IX. to find none of his predecessors that he could venture to quote in favour of the Immaculate Conception, until the year 1661!—only 193 years ago! —and then to have to quote what damages his case so much!

But what is wanting in proof in this decree, is well made up, for those who will swallow it, in confident and blustering assertions.

The decree then goes on to claim the Council of Trent as establishing the Immaculate Conception. We exposed this in our last number, p. 11, col 1, and we refer to it now; only observing here, that the very sentence of the Council of Trent which the Pope refers to, expressly confirms the decree of Pope Sixtus IV., which declares that the question "has not yet been decided by the Roman Church and the Apostolic See," "which constitution (says the Council of Trent) WE RENEW;"† and the Pope now appeals to the very sentence in which they say this, as their decision in favour of the Immaculate Conception!!

We have now examined all the authorities and proofs which are contained in the Pope's decree. The remainder of it is nothing but assertions.

He says, it is proved, by "illustrious monuments of a venerable antiquity," that this doctrine "always existed in the Church." But not one such document does he mention; and we venture to say, that no Roman Catholic will ever tell us the title of one of these documents, for the best of all reasons, that none such exist.

He says, it is the "clear, unanimous opinion" of the Fathers. But not one Father does he name; and it is enough for us to name St Bernard in reply.

He speaks of the religious orders, without making any limitation or exception; and it is enough for us to name the Dominicans, though Pope Sixtus IV. would help us to many more.

He speaks of "the most eminent doctors of divinity;" and it is enough for us to name St. Thomas Aquinas and Cardinal Cajetan, out of a host that we could name.‡

He names no Father; but he says the Fathers beheld the Immaculate Conception "in the ark of Noah," in "Jacob's ladder," "in the Burning Bush," and many other like things: and if these things are, indeed, Scripture proofs of the Immaculate Conception, why did not the Church of Rome put Noah's ark and Jacob's ladder into her prayers to the Immaculate Conception, instead of TRANSFERRING to the Conception of Mary what the Holy Spirit spake of the origin of the "Wisdom uncreated," the everlasting Son of God?

And, after all, the Pope goes on to say—"Wherefore, from the ancient times, the princes of the Church, ecclesiastics, and even emperors and kings themselves, have earnestly entreated of this apostolic see that the Immaculate Conception of the most holy mother of God should be defined as a dogma of Catholic faith;" and again—"We resolved that we should no longer delay to sanction and define, by our supreme authority, the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin." And, in the name of goodness, if, as the Pope says, it was "revealed by God," and always held and believed in the Church, how comes it that it never till now was "a dogma of Catholic faith?"

One word more to show the practical object of this Papal decree. The Pope thus issues his command—"Let all the children of the Catholic Church, most dear to us, hear these our words; and, with a more ardent zeal of piety, religion, and love, proceed TO WORSHIP, invoke, AND PRAY to the most blessed Virgin Mary, mother of God, conceived without original sin."*

It has been usual, when Protestants have said that the Church of Rome teaches men "to worship" and "pray to" the Virgin, to hear this indignantly denied. But now it is absolutely COMMANDED, by what professes to be the infallible authority of the Church of Rome.

Let those look to it who have hitherto denied that their Church teaches this idolatry; and let them hear the warning voice that comes from heaven—"Go out from her, my people, that you be not partakers of her sins."—Apocalypse xviii. 4, Douay Bible.

The Pope concludes his decree with a threat, which becomes the less terrible the more it is considered. "Let no man interfere with this our declaration, pronunciation, and definition, or oppose and contradict it with presumptuous rashness. If any should presume to assail it, let him know that he will incur the indignation of the omnipotent God, and of his blessed Apostles Peter and Paul." As if the Pope had in his hand the indignation of Almighty God and the apostles to bestow it upon whom he would!

How would Popes John X., John XI., John XII., Pope Lando, and many others, have bestowed that indignation? Not surely upon adulterers or robbers.†

We trust that God Almighty still keeps his indignation in his own power, to be exercised on those alone "who love not the Gospel, and obey not the Lord Jesus Christ."

But where did Popes get this power, or from whom did they learn these mighty threats? That shall be told. Pope Nicholns I., the man who imposed the forged decretal epistles of the Popes upon the Church, in the ninth century, that was the man who first took into his own hands "the indignation of Almighty God and the chief of the Apostles."‡ And if our readers will look back to our number for February, 1854, p. 16, col. 3, under the heading, "Popes' Power of Condemning to Hell," they will find Pope Nicholas's authority for assuming a power until that time unknown in the Church. And from that time forward Popes have enforced their decrees by such threats as Pope Pius now uses—on the authority of forgery alone!

We commend it to our readers to consider whether this present decree of the Pope is to be received as the decision of an infallible authority instituted by God in His Church—whether the act by which the Virgin Mary was conceived in the womb of her mother is to be henceforward "the true object of devotion" to the Catholic Church—whether the Virgin herself is to be "worshipped" and "prayed to" by Catholics.

* The Latin is, "Colere, invocare, exorare beatissimam Dei genetricem, &c." The translation is the Tablet's, not ours.

You cite the case of the Asiatic Churches as celebrating Easter contrary to the Roman custom, and say that Victor, Bishop of Rome, excommunicated them. This proves him to have been, as he was then held to be, a hot, imperious, and meddling man. But why did you not assert the only thing pertinent to your case—namely, that these Churches of Asia recognised his authority and yielded? Simply, because instead of submitting, they disclaimed it, and continued to observe their own day of celebrating Easter, notwithstanding his attempted interference.

This case will show how carelessly assertions are made in support of Roman Catholic claims. It is perfectly notorious that the Eastern Churches refused to adopt the custom of the west, and followed their own mode of Paschal observance for more than a century and a quarter after Victor's unauthorized interference. The Council of Nice decided the time of celebration. On this Pontiff's attempt he was admonished by several bishops, amongst the rest by Irenæus. Eusebius states that Victor's attempt was displeasing to many who spoke strongly to him. Irenæus uses very decided language. He says, the Apostles commanded not to judge others in matters of meat or drink, and, very pertinently to the point, ἐν μερει ἑορτῆς (in the matter of a festival). The fragment of this letter which is preserved, as well as the history of this whole controversy, is decisive testimony against the authority of the Roman See. It is perfectly certain that the attempt of the Pontiff to interfere with the liberties of the Asiatic Churches was, in this, as in other cases, summarily disallowed. The eastern mode of celebrating Easter was persevered in until the Council of Nice, notwithstanding Victor's disapproval.*

You next adduce the instance of Cyprian, and assert that when a council of sixty-six African bishops decided that the children of heretics should be rebaptized, the Roman Pontiff Stephen threatened them with excommunication, and that Cyprian, "great man as he was," was obliged to bend.

Now, the facts of the case are directly the reverse. The African bishops, with Cyprian at their head, were so far from bending before Stephen, that they re-affirmed, in most emphatic terms, their former decision, notwithstanding his condemnation of it. Two Carthaginian Councils had already pronounced a doctrine differing from that of Rome. The second of these, by a synodical letter, informed the Pontiff of its decision. Stephen haughtily disapproved. Strong letters passed between him and Cyprian. The Roman bishop broke off all communication with these opposing Africans. But so far were they from being intimidated thereat, and yielding, that in a third Council of Carthage (256) they repeated their former judgment. Peace ensued on Stephen's death. But the Africans maintained their own doctrine; and, so far down as the fourth century, the opinion of the Greek Fathers was in accordance with that of those Carthaginian Councils.†

[Repetition of assertion naturally tends to secure its acceptance. The Church of Rome makes powerful use of the fact to the furtherance (and to the discredit) of its cause. The amount to which historic truth has been perverted by its advocates is most lamentable and wicked. A good cause rejects such defences, but the exigencies of inveterate error force it to expedients which are its refutation and its shame. We speak of those who, knowing the fraud, or having reason to suspect it, persevere in using or in countenancing it. The present instance is one to the point. Father Lacordaire (whose works, according to my opponents, have received the sanction of the Catholic Church), with others, asserts that Cyprian yielded in this matter to Pope Stephen. The simple account of the transaction, the continuance of the Eastern view until long after Stephen, sufficiently refute the statement. Nothing can be clearer than that the jurisdiction of the Roman Pontiff was not for a moment admitted—nay, that it was peremptorily rejected. And, as to his infallibility, let Cyprian testify to his view of it. He says—"In tantum Stephani fratris nostri obstinatio dura prorupit, ut etiam de Marcionis baptismo, item Valentini, et Apelletis, et cæterorum blasphemantium in Deum patrem contendat filios deo nasci." Here the African Father speaks of the "unbending obstinacy" of the Pontiff; charges him with holding those to be regenerate who speak evil (blasphemy) against God the Father; he describes the same Pontiff as having written rashly, and without forethought, things haughty, irrelevant, and contradictory. And when Stephen urges Roman tradition, the steadfast African rejects it in terms, which (notwithstanding Cyprian's hierarchical notions) are especially adverse to the Romish cause. His words are—"How great is that obstinacy, how great that presumption, which prefers human tradition to divine injunction, and perceives not that God is indignant as often as human tradition sets at nought and neglects the divine commands. Custom which has crept in among some unawares (a home thrust) ought not to hinder truth from prevailing and triumphing; for (the aphorism is well worth recording) custom without truth is only error inveterate." He then finely adds—"It is no more beneath the dignity of a Roman bishop than of any other man to suffer himself to be corrected when he is in the wrong; for the bishop ought not only to teach but to learn; for he becomes even the better teacher, who is daily adding to his knowledge and making progress by the correction of his errors."

Such is the witness of Cyprian to pontifical infallibility and jurisdiction over the whole Church of Christ. But in order to show how utterly untrue it is to affirm of Cyprian and the African Church that they yielded to Stephen (whom they so resolutely and successfully opposed) in this matter of baptism, we shall mention some contemporary events.

Firmilian, Bishop of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, upon learning the opposition made to the Roman Pontiff by Cyprian and the African Church, wrote, assuring them of the full approbation of the Churches of his province. Dionysius, of Alexandria, likewise condemned the conduct of the Pontiff. The letter of the former, extant in 26 Cod., is so strikingly adverse to Romish pretensions, that it was purposely omitted in the Ed. of Cyp., Rom. ap. Paul Manutinm, 1563.

Firmilian speaks of Stephen's "boldness and insolence," of his "open and manifest folly," of the strifes and dissensions which he had caused in the Churches. And, then, in reference to his attempted excommunication of the African Church, apostrophising the Pope, uses the following language:—"Thou hast cut off thyself. Be not deceived. He is truly the schismatic who has made himself an apostate from the communion of ecclesiastical unity." Pretty strong terms these in which to speak of the Pope, and fully sufficient to show how entirely unknown in those days had been the modern claims of Papal infallibility and jurisdiction.

In order to leave no doubt that the assertion of Cyprian's deference to the Roman Pontiff in this matter is wholly at variance with truth, let us take the testimony of the celebrated Roman Catholic historian, Dupin. Having given the same account of the controversy between Stephen and Cyprian which I have given, and spoken strongly of the unchristian conduct of the Pontiff, he says—"It is certain that St. Cyprian never altered his opinion; that the Greek Churches were, for a long time after him, divided upon this question; that the Council of Arles first decided it in the west, &c."]

The next argument from Cyprian is founded upon the words—"Primacy was given to Peter to show that there is but one Church, and one Chair—does he who abandons the Chair of Peter, upon which the Church is founded, flatter himself that he is in the Church?"

Whatever meaning we may give to these words, supposing them to be genuine, it is certain you cannot deduce from them that Cyprian believed in the infallibility or supremacy of the Roman Pontiff, because he had, as we have seen, in conjunction with the Council of Carthage, determinedly and successfully opposed him. Cyprian held high views of the Church order and unity. He supposed bishops to be successors of the Apostles. Of the last he says—"They were all, in common with Peter, possessed of like power and authority." His words here are express. Bishops, their successors, were, in like manner, all equal. "Christ," he says, "to mark the unity of his Church, mentions one among these equals by name, Peter." It was to mark or indicate unity, but not to localize it at Rome, that, in Cyprian's view, Christ made mention of one—i.e., Peter. Unity did not consist in the subordination of all Churches to one visible head, resident at Rome, but in the communion of each Church with all the others. He was as truly a schismatic who separated from the See of Carthage as he who broke communion with Rome. Cyprian's idea of unity was what Firmilian expressed when, in writing to him, he describes—in reference to Pope Stephen—the true schismatic to be the one who, by breaking the general union among Churches, separated himself from "the communion of ecclesiastical (not pontifical) unity."

[So far as this passage is concerned, we need not dwell upon it further than to notice it as another instance of the imposition practised on the too confiding members of the Church of Rome. The former statement contradicted history, and was untrue in point of fact. This statement is a fraud, for it is an interpolation on the works of Cyprian. The genuine passage is as follows (I mark, by brackets, the Romish interpolations):—"Et quamvis apostolis omnibus post resurrectionem suam parem potestatem tribuat, et dicat, 'Sicut misit me pater,' &c., tamen ut unitatem manifestaret [unam cathedram constituit et] unitatis ejusdem originem ab uno incipientem sua auctoritate dis-

* The Paschal controversy contains ample evidence against the usurpations of the Romish See, and is a most unfortunate case for its advocates to adduce. They bring it forward solely because it shows some cases of interference on the part of the Pontiff; but they suppress the fact, that such interference was rejected. It is well-known matter of history that the ancient British and Irish Churches, observing their own mode of celebrating Easter, refused conformance to the Roman method, and persevered in their opposition, and proved their independence, notwithstanding the attempts of the See of Rome upon their liberties. Baronius confesses that the early Irish Church was treated by the Church of Rome as schismatical up to the sixth century.

† And (as it is highly pertinent to observe) an intermediate opinion, which afterwards became the prevailing one, arose in the Western Church itself.

posuit. Hoc erant utique et cæteri apostoli, quod fuit Petrus, pari consortio præditi et honoris et potestatis; sed exordium ab unitate proficiscitur [et primatus Petro datur ut una Christi ecclesia et cathedra una monstratur. Et pastores sunt omnes, et grex unus ostenditur, qui ab apostolis omnibus unanimi consensione pascatur] ut ecclesia Christi una monstratur. Hanc ecclesiæ unitatem qui non tenet, tenere se fidum credit? Qui ecclesiæ renititur et resistit [qui cathedram Petri, super quem fundata est ecclesia deserit], in ecclesia se esse confidit."

It will hence appear that the passage quoted by my opponents consists of interpolations. Gieseler asserts they are not to be found in the oldest MSS. Now, these insertions are the parts on which the Romish claim is based, so far as this passage is concerned. The genuine words show Cyprian's view "of unity" to be as I have represented it. To these sad expedients is the Church of Rome driven in support of her claims. They are the sure but distressing evidences of their conscious untenableness.]

The 3rd passage which you have quoted from Cyprian, ends with the words—"to whom faithlessness cannot have access." The inference which you made hence is this—that, according to the testimony of this writer, the Church of Rome was infallible.

[This is, perhaps, a suitable place for observing, that I had, during this discussion, repeatedly asked for, but could not obtain, references to the extracts and editions of the writers quoted by my opponents. I subsequently both wrote and sent to obtain them, but to no purpose. The reason was, perhaps, this, that the quotations were, I believe, almost wholly made second hand. With respect to the present passage, I had at first understood Mr. Gretton to quote it in reference to Pope Stephen; and, knowing what Cyprian's view of this prelate's conduct was, I requested him to read on, believing that something important was suppressed. I had no books of reference with me during this discussion, and could only rely on my memory. But, having previously noticed an attempt of Cardinal Wiseman's, in his Lectures on the Church, to mislead the public with regard to the opinions of Cyprian, by affirming a doctrine to be his, which he certainly did not hold, and which neither he nor his times had even heard of, I quoted a passage from Cyprian's letter, directly asserting that Pope Stephen was deceived, and, therefore, not infallible. It turned out, however, that Mr. Gretton had quoted from a letter of Cyprian's to Pope Cornelius. The passage is, so far as I know, quite genuine; but the inference made from it completely contradicts Cyprian's own explicit assertion. He never held the Roman See to be preserved by divine Providence from the possibility of being deceived, because he expressly asserts the reverse, in the case of Pope Stephen; and as for his jurisdiction, Cyprian and the North African Church resisted it without hesitation.

Now, with respect to the epistle to Cornelius, if any one will take the trouble of looking at it, he will see that Cyprian as little held the infallibility and jurisdiction of this Pontiff as of the other. The letter is, in part, an expostulation with Cornelius for receiving as ambassador of the Carthaginian Bishop, Fortunatus, a person (Felicissimus) who had been excommunicated. He exhorts the Pope to be firm, and not to fear the threats of wicked men; he very clearly intimates that the Pontiff had no right to interfere in the matter. "The cause had been already decided, and judgment already passed where the crime had been committed. The opinions of bishops should not be different. Christ says, let your discourse be yea, yea." The Roman Pontiff was not to alter the judgment already passed by another Church. Hence, it is very certain that Cyprian held not the infallibility, or admitted the supreme jurisdiction of Pope Cornelius. The passage, "to whom perfidy cannot have access," plainly means this—that the Church, whose faith was praised by Paul, should be so mindful of its high character, as, by its foresight and wisdom, to preclude the hope of evil men to deceive by perfidy. That Cyprian did not mean to say more, or, that in point of fact, the Roman See was so secured, is plain; for he expressly says, that perfidy did get access, and did prevail.]

The last argument you allege from Cyprian is, that "he calls the Church of Rome the root and matrix of the Catholic Church." In any literal sense this is plainly untrue, since other apostolic Churches were founded, so far as we know, before the Church of Rome. The term on which you base your argument was commonly applied to apostolic Churches. And the second Council of Constantinople justly styles the Church of Jerusalem as "the mother of all the Churches in the World."

ON THE INFALLIBLE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I am able to adduce many more passages from the Holy and Divine Book in support of the infallibility of the Church, but, as you are so fond of brevity, I will only give a few of them in this letter.

On the eve of our Lord's passion, in order to wean His afflicted Apostles from the sensible delights of His presence, of which they were, in a short time, to be deprived, He places before their view the speedy arrival of another Comforter, and the glorious prerogatives of that pillar of truth, of which they were to be the first supporters. "I will ask the Father," said He, "and he will give you another Comforter, that He may abide with you for ever, the Spirit of Truth, whom the world cannot receive."—John xiv. 16, and a portion of verse 17. He then subjoins (v. 26) the nature and end of this divine mission—"The Comforter, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things, and bring all things to your mind, whatsoever I shall have said to you." In the continuation of His address (xvi. 13) the same promise is repeated—"But when He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will teach you all truth."

It is almost trifling with common sense to set about reasoning on these evident testimonies. Christ promises the descent of a Comforter; the promise was fulfilled on Whit-Sunday. He further promises that this Divine Spirit of Truth should abide with them for ever, should teach them all things, and lead them into all truth. Who shall dare to doubt but that this second part of the promise has also been fulfilled in every age since the days of the Apostles? What was the end or nature for which the promise was delivered? To guide the Apostles and their successors for ever into all truth. For has not the Church, in every age, required the perpetual assistance of the Director of Truth, as well as in the Apostolic times? And if it were necessary for them who had imbibed the true faith from the mouth, and in the school of Jesus himself, how much more so must it not be for the faithful in every succeeding age? Therefore, it is clear that the unlimited and unconditional promise of Christ could never become void, whilst the only cause for which it was made still existed in all its force; and hence He has promised that the Spirit of Truth should for ever remain with the Church, conducting her into all truth. That this was His meaning will be further proved from the next Scriptural argument in support of her infallibility, which you shall have next month.

I remain, sir, your humble servant,

WILLIAM ROURKE.

Before any argument can be founded, for the infallibility of the present Church, on the passage from St. John quoted by Mr. Rourke, it is necessary to prove that it is addressed, not to the Apostles merely, but to the Church of every age. Now, let us look at the context. We find our Lord saying—"These things I have spoken unto you, being present with you."—xiv. 25. "The Comforter shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have told you."—xiv. 26. "I go away, and come again to you."—xiv. 29. "I have told you before it came to pass."—xiv. 28. "You have been with me from the beginning."—xv. 27. "These things I have told you, that when the time shall come you may remember that I told you of them. And these things I said not unto you at the beginning, because I was with you."—xvi. 4. "I have many things to say unto you, but you cannot bear them now."—xvi. 12. Is it not evident from all these passages that our Lord was addressing the Apostles themselves, and, in order to comfort them for his approaching departure, promising them the assistance of a Paraclete, whose stay with them should not be temporary, like the sojourn of our Lord on earth, but who should abide with them always? Through the whole passage there is not a syllable said about the successors of the Apostles. If our Lord had meant them, would he not have said so, and, at the same time, told us who they were?

The passage cited by Mr. Rourke, when not cut away from the context, affords an argument against the claims of the Church of Rome. Let Mr. Rourke open the passage in his Bible, and he will read as follows:—"If ye love me, keep my commandments, and I will ask my Father, and he shall give ye another Paraclete, that he may abide with you for ever, even the Spirit of Truth, whom the world cannot receive." When the passage is read thus entire, it shows clearly that Roman Catholics can have no certainty of the decisions of their Church. They cannot conclude, in virtue of this promise, that the Pope is infallible when he declares the doctrines of their Church, unless they can be certain that he fulfils the condition of the promise—namely, to love God, and keep his commandments. Now, Mr. Rourke will not deny that many occupants of the Roman See were men of the world—worldly, wicked, carnal, diabolical men—men who, it is expressly stated here, "cannot receive the spirit of truth." From this very text, then, we conclude that the Church of Rome can have no certainty of the truth of the decrees of such Popes, or of the decisions of councils which have been confirmed by them, and, therefore, the infallibility of the Church which guides herself by such decrees, falls to the ground.

FOURTH COUNCIL OF LATERAN, AND PERSECUTION OF HERETICS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, for February, 1853, you stated that the Lateran Council decreed that temporal princes should be compelled by the Pope to exterminate heretics from their dominions. I would feel deeply indebted if you would kindly answer such objections to the above as you may have heard stated, such as the denial of Dr. Doyle that it was a decree of a general council (see examination before House of Lords, April 21, 1825), and the assertion, or rather insinuation, of Milner ("End of Controversy," page 124), that it was only directed against persons who, on account of their crimes, deserved such treatment.

There are several friends of mine who would, I imagine, be led to doubt the infallibility of the Roman Catholic Church if doctrines so contrary to those which Christianity teaches were clearly shown to have been decided upon by an Œcumenical Council.

I would also wish to direct your attention to the statements made by Dr. Dixon, relating to the Apocrypha; they appear to me to be exceedingly absurd; and I consider it would be well if you would devote some of the space in your journal to answering them, as they are put forward by a person of such a high station in the Roman Catholic Church.

Trusting that you will persevere in the good work in which you are engaged,

I remain, Sir,
Yours, sincerely,
A PROTESTANT.

3rd February, 1855.

We thank our correspondent for calling our attention to a very important subject, on which we will endeavour to satisfy him.

We admit that Roman Catholics are excusable, in some cases, for being puzzled to know what are, and what are not, general councils.

Roman Catholics are bound, indeed, by the creed of Pope Pius IV., to believe, as matters of faith, and necessary to salvation, all that the general councils have defined; but their Church has not given them any authorised list of general councils, nor any means of knowing how many general councils there are. On this subject we refer to an article in our number for October, 1853, vol. ii., p. 116.

At the same time, there are some councils which the Church of Rome has declared to be general councils, which no one may venture to deny. The Council of Trent is an instance of this, and so is the Fourth Council of Lateran, which decreed the extermination of heretics. And it has often struck us with astonishment to see the coolness with which some Roman controversialists will deny those very authorities which, by the creed of Pope Pius IV., they are bound to believe, whenever the arguments of Protestants become so strong as to make them ashamed of confessing those authorities before the world.

We will now proceed to show what claims the Fourth Council of Lateran has to be acknowledged as a general council of the Church of Rome; and if any should then say they are not bound to receive its decrees, we ask them to consider what greater obligation they have to believe in the infallibility of the Pope's late decree on the Immaculate Conception.

The Fourth Council of Lateran was summoned by a circular letter of Pope Innocent III. In Labbe and Cossart, vol. xi., 123, we have a copy of the letter sent to the archbishop and bishops of the Province of Vienna. In that letter the Pope says—"Because these things concern the common state of all the faithful, we consoke A GENERAL COUNCIL according to the ancient custom of the holy Fathers."* The letter goes on to state the purposes for which this general council is called—"For extirpating vices and planting virtues, correcting excesses and reforming manners, for rooting out heresies and confirming the faith," &c., &c.† And, for full preparation, two years notice is given, because "a universal council could not conveniently be gathered quicker."‡ And the Pope thus speaks of the source whence this council originates—"Believing that this salutary proposal descends from Him by whom every best and every perfect gift is given;"§ referring to the Epistle of St. James, ch. i., v. 17.

Then follows a list of those to whom copies of this letter were sent, by which, it appears, that SEVENTY-SIX copies of this letter were sent out, each one directed to the archbishop and bishops of a province.‖

Then follows a letter to the Greek Emperor, calling on him to send special ambassadors to the council (col. 126), and a list of twelve other kings of Europe to whom similar letters were sent. Then follow letters to the patriarchs of Alexandria and Jerusalem, also summoning them to a "general council" (col. 128, 130).

So this was clearly a summons for a general council of the Church of Rome.

And the attendance was answerable to the summons. No less than four hundred and twelve bishops, besides eight hundred abbots and priors attended. And Pope Innocent himself presided at the council.

Now, we ask any Roman Catholic to tell us what was wanting here to constitute a general council of the Church of Rome.

Can any one show us a list of general councils in any Roman Catholic author, in which this Fourth Lateran

* Ut quia hæc universorum fidelium communem statum respiciunt, generale concilium juxta priscum sanctorum patrum consuetudinem convocamus.—Labbe and Cossart, vol. xi., 124.

‡ Quia vero ante biennium, universale non possent concilium commode congregari.

§ Credentes igitur hoc salutare propositum ab Illo descendere, a quo est omne datum optimum, et omne donum perfectum.

‖ This whole list is given in Labbe and Cossart, vol. xi., 133, 136.

Council is not reckoned as one? Laurentius Sarius, a very learned man in Roman councils, says—"No one of sound mind can doubt that this Lateran Synod which follows was distinguished among the chief, and truly œcumenical. As being one in which the affairs of religion were treated of with the greatest concord of the Greek and Latin Church, at which were present the patriarchs of Constantinople and Jerusalem, and SEVENTY archbishops, as well Latin as Greek, four hundred and twelve bishops, more than eight hundred abbots and priors—all the prelates, together, TWELVE HUNDRED AND FIFTEEN, or more."* And the canon law itself pronounces this a general council, as we shall see presently.

If this were not a general Roman council, what was?

Now let us see what this council did. They passed 70 canons. The first is—"de fide Catholica"—a confession of faith. The second is the condemnation of the doctrine of the Abbot Joachim. The third, about heretics, &c., &c. All passed by the same authority.

Now, let any Protestant only say, in our pages, that the doctrine of Transubstantiation was never decreed by any general council of the Roman Church before the Council of Trent, and then we should have a host of correspondents exclaiming against such ignorance, and pointing to the first canon of this very Council of Lateran, as the solemn decision of a general council in favour of Transubstantiation. We should admit that Roman Catholics are correct in giving such an answer. But when we then quote the 3rd canon of this very same council, as containing the decision of a Roman general council about heretics, what right have Roman Catholics, then, to turn round on us and say, that it is not a decree of a general council?

We can, however, prove, against them, that it is. We prove it from their own canon law. The Roman canonists of the present century lay it down that, whatever is in the decretals of Pope Gregory IX., is the law of the Church of Rome.†

Now, we turn to those decretals—Lib. v., Tit. vii., c. 13—and there we find this 3rd canon of the fourth Council of Lateran, and we find this heading to it—

"IDEM—viz., Innocent III.—IN CONCILIO GENERALI."

Thus the canon law itself declares this very canon to have been passed by a Pope in a general council.

Our readers will now like to see some extracts from this canon—"We excommunicate and anathematize EVERY HERESY which exalts itself against this holy, orthodox, and Catholic faith which we have expounded above; condemning all heretics, by whatever names they may be censured. . . . . Let the secular powers be admonished, and induced, and, if necessary, let them be compelled by ecclesiastical censures, whatever offices they fill, that as they desire to be reputed and counted faithful, they publicly take an oath for the defence of the faith; that in sincerity, to the utmost of their strength, they will apply themselves to exterminate all heretics denounced by the Church. . . . But if the temporal lord, having been required and warned by the Church, shall have neglected to purge his land from this heretical foulness, let him be bound with the chain of excommunication, by the metropolitan and the other comprovincial bishops; and if he shall have despised to make satisfaction within a year, let this be signified to the supreme Pontiff, that he (the Pope) may pronounce the vassals (or subjects) thenceforward absolved from their allegiance, and may expose his land to be seized by the Catholics, who shall possess it without any contradiction, the heretics being exterminated, and shall preserve it in purity of faith."‡

There is not one word in the whole canon about civil crimes. It is directed against "every heresy," and "all heretics." It is for "purity of faith," not for civil welfare. It is THE CHURCH compelling the civil power, by ecclesiastical censures, to persecute heretics.

Now let us see what Bishop Milner has to say in answer to this.

First, he speaks of the authority by which this decree was passed. "It must first be observed," he says, "who, were present at this council, and by whose authority these decrees of a temporal nature were passed. There were then present, besides the Pope and the bishops, either in person or by their ambassadors, the Greek and the Latin Emperors, the Kings of England, France, Hungary, the Sicilies, Arragon, Cyprus, and Jerusalem; and the representatives of a vast many other principalities and states; so that, in fact, this council was a congress of Christendom, temporal as well as spiritual."—End of Controversy, letter 49.

Who, on reading this, does not think that this Council of Lateran was quite different in its constitution from the general councils of the Church of Rome—that it was, in fact, more of the nature of a Congress of the princes of Europe to settle the temporal affairs of Europe; and that for infallible decrees of the Church we must rather look to the purely spiritual councils of the Church?

Bishop Milner, it is true, does not say all this; but it was obviously what people would think on reading what he said, and that was just what the crafty bishop wished. The bishop knew as well as we do, that there never was a general council of the Church of Rome to which the princes of Europe were not summoned precisely as they were to this Council of Lateran. He knew that all the princes of Europe (Roman Catholic) were represented in the Council of Trent itself, precisely as they were in this Council of Lateran. But then he hoped that his readers would not know all this, and so wrote in a way that would lead them to think that this Lateran Council was an assembly of a quite different nature from the general councils, which are supposed to speak the sense of the Church. It is an instance of the disingenuous artifice by which this writer is always ready to take advantage of the ignorance of his readers. But such artifices are never used by clever men, except when they are conscious that their cause is bad, and that truth is against them.

And did Bishop Milner really suppose that in the Church of Rome ecclesiastical censures emanate from the princes and not from the bishops?

Second, Bishop Milner says—"The decree of the council regarded only the prevailing heretics of that time." But we have given the very words of the decree above—"Every heresy," "all heretics, by whatever names they may be censured," "all heretics denounced by the Church."

Is there one word here to confine the canon to heretics guilty of crimes? Does it not expressly speak of "ALL heretics?" Is there one word to confine it to the heretics of that time? If that were its meaning, why did Pope Gregory IX., twenty years after, embody it into a code of laws intended for all future ages—a code still held at Rome as being the law of the Church?

The fact is clear. A general council of the Church of Rome, with a Pope at its head, has made a decree in a point of morals, which all Roman Catholics now see was wrong; but they think it still necessary to maintain that a general council, with a Pope at its head, cannot go wrong, either in faith or morals. And so they are driven to every shift and evasion to try and get rid of this decree, against the plainest evidence of its authority and meaning. Let them not be content with such wretched shifts where God's truth and the salvation of their own souls are the things to be sought for. Let them confess that a Pope and a general council have erred against morals in this decree, and then they will be in a position to inquire, like honest men, whether a Pope and a general council have ever erred in a question of faith.

If our correspondent will tell us what work of Dr. Dixon's he refers to, we will attend to it.

ON BRUCIOLI'S BIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Permit me to notice, for the benefit of your inquiring Roman Catholic readers, a letter, signed William Murphy, in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, of Jan., 1854, p. 11, wherein the Bible translated by A. Brucioli is offered as evidence that "in every Catholic (Roman) country the circulation of the Scriptures is encouraged." You, sir, have had frequent occasion to complain that Roman Catholics too much rely on second-hand evidence, and on arguments long since refuted; but, perhaps, the enlistment of A. Brucioli's Bible as creditable to the Church of Rome, affords the most notable example. Cardinal Wiseman, twenty years ago, referred to the same Bible, with similar purpose, in his Moorfield lectures, which called forth the admirable "letters" to Dr. Wiseman," by the late Vicar of Blackburn, Dr. Whittaker, wherein he says—"In the account you give of Brucioli's Bible there is not one particle of truth, with the exception of the date of the editio princeps. I am convinced that you never saw the book, and must have taken your account of this distinguished individual on very bad second-hand authority."—p. 175. Dr. Whittaker in proof states that Antonio Brucioli was compelled to fly from Florence, and, with some risk, saved his life, having fallen under the suspicion of heresy. That (according to Dr. M'Crie, in his "Hist. of the Suppression of the Reformation in Italy," pp. 55, 56) Brucioli's Bible was ranked among prohibited books of the first class in the index of the Council of Trent. The Spanish index, then, before Dr. Whittaker, also holds it in the same class. That Brucioli's Bible was published "con privilegio de lo inclito Senata Veneto," and without any Roman authority whatever. Lastly, that the pictorial illustrations heading the 13th and 17th chapters of the Apocalypse, exhibit respectively a ferocious "beast" and the well-known impure female, described in the text as "madre de la fornicatione," each wearing the triple crown! the papal tiara!

I have myself seen Antonio Brucioli's Bible in Dr. Whittaker's library, and specially examined those boldly executed and instructive wood-cuts. Should Mr. William Murphy and his informant, the Editor of the Weekly Telegraph, only view the same, an indulgence which the Dublin libraries could no doubt afford, they will gladly withdraw their statement that "there was another (Italian version) by A. Buccioli (sic) in 1523 (1532), and that is promoted by all means within the command of the Church, of Popes, of cardinals, &c., &c."

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,
EDWARD M. HEARN.

WHAT DOES ST. PETER SAY ABOUT THE POPES?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I have read with great interest the correspondence of Mr. Rourke in the columns of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, and am happy to congratulate the members of the Roman and Protestant Churches on the auspicious circumstance of the truth being argumentatively contended for by the laity of both communities.

Priestcraft is but the working of ambition in the breasts and minds of unregenerate clergymen, who, excluded from its pursuits in the secular affairs of life, aim at the most fearful despotism that can be exercised over their fellow men, by means of that dark influence which is brought to bear upon spiritual hopes and fears in time and for eternity, and this craft succeeds only in proportion to the people's ignorance of the word of God, and their acceptance of other standards for their faith and practice; the true minister of the Gopel (Mark ix. 33 to 40. Hebrews viii. 1 to 6) does not seek to be a lord over God's heritage; he knows that he has authority in the Church only as it is committed to him, according to the revelations contained in Holy Scripture, and he makes no claim upon belief or submission of the judgment, for which he cannot appeal to the law and to the testimony of his God.

This world is the field in which wheat and tares are growing together till the harvest shall come, and wherever there is a priesthood or a ministry, there lurks in the hearts of the unconverted members of either body that proud spirit that would reign over men upon the earth and attain the glory of its kingdoms. The common safeguard against the most cruel of all tyrannies, lies in our capability of judging the pretensions that are put forth, and examining every ground of authority upon which they are asserted; looking no further than to secondary causes, we can see that it was the exercise of this right of judgment in a limited degree, that led to the comparative independence of the Gallican portion of the Church of Rome, and to the differences that have existed, not only between Jansenists and Jesuits, but between other more nearly accordant brotherhoods in the Papal system; it is the exercise of this right, ever under strictly-imposed limitations, that marks the distinction between the ultramontane and the more reasonable part of the subjects of the Roman see, and keeps alive whatever semblance of spiritual liberty they are either of them permitted to enjoy; it is the exercise of this right which, so far as it is properly carried out in every Church, operates as a check upon the ambition which is in man's fallen nature, whether that nature be clothed in priestly vestments or a layman's garb.

Now, sir, the Church of Rome makes high claims for its priesthood, and asserts that from them, and them only, the laity are to receive the dogmatic teaching of religion. Will Mr. Rourke kindly undertake to prove, for the benefit of every inquiring mind, from the inspired Epistles of St. Peter as his text, and the rest of Scripture for his corroborations—first, that the claims of the Pope and priesthood are right and true; and, secondly, that the dogmas which are exclusively Papal or Roman are in accordance with the sacred writings of the Apostle from whom the hierarchy of his Church claims descent? I ask this favour in all courtesy, and think that if he will accede to my request, he may, under God's blessing, either convince others of what is the truth, or elicit such arguments from you as may lead many to the knowledge of it as it is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

THE ADVANTAGE OF HAVING AN INFALLIBLE GUIDE: IN WHAT DOES IT CONSIST?

SIR—There is nothing the importance of which the Church of Rome dwells more upon than divine faith—by divine faith she means, not what we call a practical living, or sanctifying faith, but a faith which is unwavering, because built upon the testimony of a witness known to be infallible; all else she calls human faith, reasonings, and guesses, and she utterly despises it. Now, there are two questions, to decide which, she maintains the necessity of such an infallible authority. First, is the Bible the Word of God? And, secondly, what is the meaning of its written message? She would enforce upon men this dogma, that their faith, as to these two points, must be built on infallible authority; or else, it is no true faith, nor of any value at all. I will take these two questions separately.

• J. Hatchard and Son, London.

We, Protestants, she says, believe the Bible to be the Word of God merely on the authority of human reasonings. She herself, she says, on the contrary, places faith in it, because she accounts as infallible the testimony on which it rests. But who tells a Romanist that the Bible is the Word of God? His own branch of the Church, supposed by him to be infallible. A Romanist, then, boasts that he is as sure that the Bible is inspired, as he is that the witness to that fact is infallible. His argument is fair here. His certainty as to the authority of the Bible, may equal his certainty as to the infallibility of the Church which places it in his hands; but, receiving the Bible merely on the word of his Church, it is impossible that his confidence as to the inspiration of the Bible should be stronger than his assurance of the infallibility of the witness from whose hands and on whose sole credit he accepts it. We may well ask, then, what foundation a Romanist has for believing his Church to be infallible? If the Bible is to be received only on the testimony of one known to be infallible, this witness's infallibility must be received on the authority of some one else, previously ascertained to be infallible. If a Romanist were to believe his Church infallible on mere human reasonings and deductions, then his faith in the Bible, received on that Church's authority, would as much rest on human reasonings, as our own. On what grounds does a Romanist regard his Church as the one true Church? On what grounds does he believe that one Church is infallible? Will each individual Romanist pretend to a direct revelation from God announcing this fact to himself? No, doubtless! If not, will he pretend that the infallible one who maintains to him the infallibility of the Church is his confessor or parish priest, speaking officially and by the Church's authority? If so, the chain of evidence runs thus: every priest being so far infallible, supports the infallibility of the Church; and the infallible Church maintains the inspiration of Holy Scripture. But on what authority does an individual Romanist believe that each Romish priest is infallible? Nay, on what ground does he build his assurance, that any man calling himself a Romish priest, is really one at all? Does he receive these things on human testimony? If so, then on that, in the first place, rests his belief in the inerrancy of his priest; and the priest's word, in the second place, supports the Church's infallibility; and the Church's word, in the third place, upholds the inspiration of the book called the Bible. So that, in the end, the whole belief of a Romanist depends as much on human evidence, as our own does. If any link in a chain be too weak to support a weight, it is of very little consequence whether that infirm link be the one next to the weight, as in our case, or with a few interposed between, as in that of a Romanist. But Romanists, not seeing this, will wish, perhaps, to move the weak link a little further off still. Another infallible is called in, to speak to the infallibility of the man's spiritual instructor. Then we have Father B to prove the infallibility of Father A. But, then, who shall go security for Father B? Father C. must do this; and so on ad infinitum; or else the individual must believe his priest infallible solely on an immediate inspiration conveyed by God to himself personally. In that case, he is to credit it, not on human testimony, but because he has a conviction, that cannot deceive him, that God has revealed that fact to him. But, on the same authority, a Mormonite, or Irvingite, or follower of Joanna Southcote, may just as reasonably place faith in one of those unfounded systems. It will not satisfy Rome that God, having introduced Christianity into the world, established its claims by miraculous proofs; a superhumanly endowed witness must place the New Testament in each man's hand. Unless an infallible witness is thus brought into immediate contact with each man's mind, the Romish theory is incomplete. It is there, next to the man himself, that infallibility is required. Further off, a series of infallible authorities, each depending upon the other, are of no more use than the infallible Bible itself. Such an assurance as Rome demands can be had only by God sending an inspired messenger to speak to each of us, and, in that case, there would be little need either of the Inspired Volume or of the infallible Church to vouch for its authenticity. The meaning of the writings, when once their inspiration is acknowledged, is, of course, a different question—but of that hereafter.

Bishop Stillingfleet thus quotes and answers the Romish argument which I have been considering. The Papist argues—"As long as the infallibility of a revelation stands remote from me, for want of an undoubted application, made by an infallible proponent, it can no more transfuse certainty into faith, than fire, at a great distance, warmth" Stillingfleet replies—"If men cannot be infallible in believing the Apostles, unless there be other infallible proponents in every age, to assure them that the Apostles were inspired, why must not the infallibility of these present proponents be likewise so attested, as well as (that) of the Apostles; and what undoubted application can be made of the Church's infallibility, unless there be some other infallible proponent still to transfuse certainty into my belief of that by virtue of which I must believe all other matters of faith, which is the Church's infallibility. So that the last proponent must either be believed for himself, without any further evidence, and then the shorter way would be to believe the first so; or else there will be an endless infallibility; or, at last all must be resolved into the enthusiasm of every particular person."—Stillingfleet's answer, &c., p.p. 78, 83.

I have now considered the first purpose on account of which the Church of Rome asserts the necessity, and, therefore, the existence, of an infallible living authority. I have, I trust, shown that, for the end proposed, such an arrangement would be altogether worthless; I am next to consider the other use of an infallible, speaking, authority—namely, as an expounder of the meaning of Scripture: this, with your permission, I will reserve for a future occasion.

Your obedient servant,

A KILDARE CHURCHMAN.

MASS IN THE CRIMEA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—We, in St. Giles, in London, sometimes get a look at your paper, and as I think you will give a straightforward answer to a plain question, I take the liberty of asking your honour about something we have heard lately from the Crimea, which mightily puzzles us all, and perplexes me out and out. We have always been taught to tell Protestants that the Mass is in the Protestant Bible, and that the last book in the Old Testament, Malachi I believe it is, says, that "From the rising of the sun to the going down of the same, my name shall be great among the Gentiles; and in every place incense shall be offered unto my name and a pure offering."

Now, I see by the "Life of a Priest," in your last number (page 6), that "it was Gregory the Great who decorated the Mass with incense and light," &c.; and we are told that Gregory the Great was the man that sent Augustine into England, and that was about the year 600. And, your honour, was it 600 years before incense was offered in any place? I suppose the priest that says so is a good judge, and wouldn't say so if it wasn't so. But what puzzles me entirely is, that it is to be offered in every place, and yet one of the Roman Catholic chaplains at the war tells us the contrary, in a letter which your honour will see in the Tablet of January 6, 1855, page 5. There one of our own priests says, "Last Sunday I read the service in the open field—to offer the Holy Sacrifice there is impossible. In a day or two I hope I shall be able to get a tent of sufficient height for an altar, so as to offer Mass in my tent."

Now, what in the world is the meaning of all this? I am sure I can never again quote that text against Protestants anyhow. Sure, Mr. Editor, wouldn't they turn round on me and say, that one of our own priests admits that the Mass cannot be offered in every place? and what am I to say then? Sure two or three days at the least he can't get a tent at all—he only hopes to get one; and only think, Mr. Editor, of all the poor soldiers that must die in that time, and yet there is no Mass for them, because it can't be "offered in every place." But more than that, we hear that the clothes, food, and tents sent out from England have been delayed or lost, and, perhaps, this reverend gentleman's tent was among them; or if he got it, it was a chance whether it would be the proper height; and if it was too low for an altar, Mr. Editor, what was to be done then? The people in England, I'm sure, don't know what height an altar should be, nor, indeed, do I myself; but that's, perhaps, my own fault; and I hardly think they would, in the hurry and bustle, think of making the tent exactly to the liking of his reverence.

As I know you publish letters asking information, perhaps you will print this for me, and ask what height an altar should be? and why it is impossible to have the Mass in the open air? Certainly I have heard of great storms out there, and 'tis true they might blow out the candles, if the altar was exposed; but if the Mass is to save souls, couldn't they do without the lights in the day time, and thus save the candles too—and, by the same token, we hear they are wanting badly out there during the cold and dark nights.

Mr. Editor, if any body can give me the desired information, I'm sure you can. It's too bad to hear that Protestants can preach and pray in the open field, and, indeed, in every place, and that we can't. Excuse the inquisitive letter of

POOR PADDY.

St. Giles, London.

We readily insert Poor Paddy's letter, and hope some of our Roman Catholic correspondents will enable us to give an answer to it; which, of course, would be much more satisfactory, than any reply proceeding from ourselves. Our opinions on such matters are already well known. True religion is an affair of the heart, and neither consists in Masses or candles, tents or altars. Let those who think otherwise answer our correspondent, and we will readily insert it.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

WHEAT should be sown, with as little delay as possible, after the weather clears up, and the land becomes dry enough; the best varieties to sow will be the white ones, of which the red-chaffed white and the white-chaffed white are the most generally esteemed; if possible the sowing should be concluded within the month; but the true spring or April wheat (Triticum æstivum) may be sown as late as the middle of April.

Beans should be got in, as early as possible, this month. They require deep and clean cultivation, and a liberal supply of manure; good crops are obtained by broadcast sowing, and harrowing them in—this mode requires a clean tilth; but if the land be foul, drilling them in at 24 to 28 feet apart, will be the best mode; the most approved varieties are the tick, Heligoland, and Russian. A heavy, clay soil, but dry, is best suited for beans, and they make the best preparation for wheat, while the lighter and more calcareous ones are best suited for peas.

Peas should also be sown some time during the month; select the finer and lighter soils for their cultivation, which should be thoroughly clean, and moderately manured, taking the condition of the land into consideration, as too much would run the crop to too much straw; they may be sown either broadcast, or in drills 19 inches apart. If one-fourth beans are mixed with the peas they will serve to support and keep the latter off the ground; after thrashing they may be easily separated from the peas by a suitable riddle, though, if required for home consumption, it is not needful to do so, as both may be ground together for meal.

Spring Vetches should be sown early in the month, of a suitable breadth, to succeed the winter-sown, and be followed by successional sowings during the season, as will be directed in subsequent operations; the land will require a liberal dressing of manure; a little oats and rapeseed should be mixed with the vetches, which will improve the quality, and increase the bulk of the fodder.

Potatoes—Planting should be proceeded with when the weather is mild and open; since the appearance of the blight, planting potatoes have, with good results, preceded the sowing of oats and barley. Care should be taken not to plant in wet weather, or while the land is wet; in damp, backward soils, planting in beds is to be preferred; in light, dry soils they may be planted in the usual way in drills; but when an early crop is desirable the beds will, in most localities, be found the better mode, so as to obtain that object.

Rye and Bere may still be sown either for a soiling or seed crop.

Oats.—In favourable weather, and dry, early situations, oats may be sown this month, but in the majority of cases it will be better deferred till next month, particularly the white varieties; the black Tartary being hardy, may be sown by the middle of this month.

Parsnips may be sown any time during the month, providing the land be thoroughly pulverised, rich, and deep, and the weather mild and dry. Sow in drills 20 inches apart. Though parsnips may be sown with great advantage this month, we would only recommend sowing a small breadth—next month will be best for the general crop; heavy, deep soils, tolerably dry, are the best for parsnips, and they make an excellent preparatory crop for wheat; but light, sandy loams are best for carrots, though the latter, when rich and deep, produce excellent parsnips.

Grass Land, intended for meadowing, should be no longer trespassed upon, but shut up at once; if to be top-dressed with compost, no further delay should take place; when dry enough, the top-dressing should be bush-harrowed, all large stones and brushwood gathered and raked off, ant hills cut and scattered, and then well rolled.

Watered Meadows require particular attention during the month; see that the water be given in full and sufficient quantity, and that it flows evenly, regulating the outlets so that the discharge may be equal to the supply, allowing no stagnation on any part. When the land in one quarter is sufficiently saturated, which is indicated by a scum rising to the surface, turn the water off to irrigate another quarter, and when the first is sufficiently dry, lay on the water again; but in severe frosts, the water must not be turned off till the frost is gone; water should not be turned over land during frost.

Fatting Stock will now be approaching maturity, when sales should be effected, so as to economise provender for the stores which have the most pinching time of the year before them.

Ewes in Lamb will now require much care, turnips should not be given too profusely, and they should have free access to good hay, with oil-cake and rock-salt in their troughs; but sudden changes in their food should be avoided.

Fatting Sheep, and stores of all ages, should have a regular increase of artificial food, such as rape, turnips, mangels, oil-cake, &c., with salt. Those in sheds should be regularly littered, and have their feet examined and pared.

Fatting Calves and Lambs require great care and attention, with abundance of cow's milk, dry, warm lodging, and clean beds; salt and chalk should be laid in their troughs to lick at pleasure.

Fatting Pigs should have plenty of cooked turnips, mangels, or other roots, mixed liberally with pea, bean, or barley meal; clean out their troughs when done feeding, and give the refuse to the stores. All pigs should have free access to pure water.

Farm Horses.—As the days advance in length, and the hours of work increase, the teams will require full and liberal rations, and particularly an increase in the quantity of corn.

MATRIMONY.

Some time since we happened to be present at a wedding which was celebrated under rather peculiar circumstances, in the fine old parish Church of St. Roch, at Paris. Most of our readers who know any thing of the gay and lively character of the French, will be apt to imagine that a Parisian wedding must present a scene of no ordinary joy and festivity. They will picture to themselves the Church decorated with flowers; the aisles thronged with a numerous assemblage of friends and neighbours; a gaily-dressed bridal-party standing before the altar—in short, fancy and imagination will lead them to group together every circumstance calculated to excite and enhance the social feelings of mirth and enjoyment.

The scene which we actually witnessed was the very reverse of all this. The walls of the church were hung in black; a coffin, covered with its funeral pall, stood on a bier in the centre of the aisle, surrounded by a crowd of mourners; the solemn words were uttered, which consigned the corpse to its kindred clay; and the last notes of the touching requiem for the dead were still re-echoing along the vaulted roof, when the bride and bridegroom, accompanied by one or two friends, glided out of a side door, and advanced with noiseless step to the altar, where an aged priest was waiting to bestow upon them the nuptial benediction.

The circumstance which caused this strange and ominous juxta-position of the two most opposite solemnities of the Church, is easily explained. A very wealthy old lady had recently died in the neighbourhood, who, during her lifetime, had been remarkable for her numerous acts of charity to the poor; and the clergy of the parish wished to mark their sense of her liberality and beneficence by giving to her remains the honour of a public funeral. If the wedding party, as is most probable, were ignorant of this arrangement, they must have been startled at the gloomy aspect which the church presented on their arrival. In Ireland we fear that a marriage, celebrated under such melancholy auspices, would give rise to the most gloomy forebodings respecting the future happiness of the wedded pair. Perhaps the lively character of the French enables them to shake off such impressions with greater ease than we can. Minds that are susceptible of deep emotion are often more readily influenced by superstitious feelings.

The wedding above alluded to was the first solemnity of the kind that we had ever witnessed in a Roman Catholic Church; and we were incidentally led by it to study, at some length, the sentiments of the chief divines of that Church on the Romish doctrine regarding matrimony—a subject on which we beg now to offer a few brief remarks. Some of the articles which have appeared, from time to time, in our pages, must, we fear, have proved rather dry and uninteresting, especially to the fairer portion of our readers. Discussions on controverted theological questions, however really important their subject-matter may be, cannot always be made as amusing as a newspaper; and the hard names of old Greek and Latin writers, such as Vincentius Lirinensis, or Gregory Thaumaturgus, will not run off female lips as smoothly as the words of an Italian song. But marriage, fortunately, is a topic in which all ladies are generally supposed to take a lively interest, present or prospective; and we may hope, therefore, for some portion of their attention, while we endeavour to state the doctrine of the Church of Rome, on a ceremony which forms such an important epoch in the life of almost every individual.

It is needless for us, we suppose, to remind the great majority of our readers that, while the Church of England holds that there are only two sacraments—Baptism and the Lord's Supper—the Church of Rome believes that there are seven, of which Marriage is one. Perhaps, however, it may be new to many persons to learn, that this doctrine of seven sacraments is of comparatively recent origin, and that it cannot be traced farther back than the middle of the twelfth century. This fact is acknowledged by Cassander, one of the most eminent ritualists of the Romish Church. "Until the days of Peter Lombard," saith he, "you shall scarce find any author who set down any certain and definite number of sacraments."* Peter Lombard, we may observe, lived about A.D. 1150; so that it is proved, on the clearest evidence, that the modern doctrine of the Church of Rome on the number of sacraments was not known for more than a thousand years after Christ. We need not be surprised, therefore, to find Cardinal Bellarmine losing his temper a little, and getting testy and cross, when he was pressed to prove, out of the Fathers, the exact necessity of this number seven. "Our opponents," he exclaims, "have no business to ask us to point out to them, either in Scripture or the Fathers, the exact number of seven sacraments; for Scripture and the Fathers did not write catechisms!"† They certainly did not; and if Bellarmine, or any other cardinal or Pope, thought fit to publish to the world his or their private opinion, that there were seven, or seven hundred sacraments, we would not quarrel with them upon a mere speculative question, nor would we trouble them for reasons on one side or the other; but the matter becomes very different when the belief of this particular number is made a necessary condition of salvation. In this case, with all deference to the learned cardinal, the demand for proof seems not only reasonable, but a point of positive obligation.

The Council of Trent (as we have had occasion, more than once, to remind our readers) published the following canon in its seventh session:—"If any man shall say that all the sacraments of the new law were not instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, or that they are more or fewer than seven, let him be accursed."‡ One would think, that before the venerable fathers of the Council had arrived at this conclusion, respecting the exact number of the sacraments, they must have had before them evidence the most clear and unmistakeable for the doctrine which they have expressed in such strong and seemingly uncharitable language. We turned, therefore, with a good deal of curiosity, to the history of the Council, in order to learn the precise nature of the arguments which the learned fathers found so clear and convincing; and we must frankly confess that, if we were not satisfied with the result of our researches, we were, at least, considerably amused. But we must adduce one or two specimens, in order that our readers may judge for themselves.

The first place is due to the eminent divine, Tyraboscus, who, at that time, filled the dignified office of Patriarch of Venice. On Quadragesima Sunday, 1563, he delivered a sermon before the Council, part of which runs as follows:—"The world," saith he, "was created in seven days." This was certainly beginning at the beginning; although what relation exists between the number of the sacraments and that of the days of the creation it is not very easy to see. We always believed, moreover, that the world was created in six days, and not seven; Tyraboscus, however, seems to have thought this difference immaterial. But he then proceeds with a fresh argument—"The people in the wilderness were fed by five loaves and two fishes. Now, five and two make seven. The Apostle Philip said, two hundred penny-worth of bread was not sufficient for them. The meaning of this is, that the mysteries of the Old and New Testaments were not sufficient for enlightening the people. But how shall the Council find bread for satisfying the people? By establishing seven sacraments!"* If any of our readers find this argument conclusive, they must be much subtler logicians than we can pretend to be. We were always aware that the Church of Rome, in all ages, took pretty good care of the loaves and fishes; but we certainly never could have guessed that such a deep mystery as the number of the seven sacraments, lay hid in the Evangelist's simple account of our Lord's miracle, until it was drawn forth to light by the sagacity of the profound Tyraboscus.

We have not space to dwell at any length upon the other reasons (if they can be called such) alleged in the Council of Trent, on behalf of the particular number seven, which was then declared by the Church of Rome to be the proper infallible number of the sacraments. Scripture and tradition, as we have seen, were disregarded altogether; and instead of arguments drawn from these sources, we find a puerile enumeration of the various properties and qualities of the number seven. The fathers of the Council, we are informed by the historian,† dwelt, with tiresome prolixity, on the seven cardinal virtues, the seven deadly sins, the seven plagues of Egypt, the seven planets, the seven candlesticks of the Apocalypse. It was not thought fit, however, to insert any of these fine reasons in the decree of the Council; and as there were no others for holding to the number seven, no reasons were inserted at all. When the Roman Catholics of our day tell us that there are seven sacraments, they do so with so much confidence that one could hardly think it possible that this number was unknown for twelve centuries, and that it was finally fixed and determined in the manner we have described. They themselves, for the most part, suspect this less than any one. They have not the most distant idea that the doctrine of seven sacraments has not been recognised and taught in their Church since its foundation; and it is with the most perfect good faith that they ask, how any man can be bold enough to attack that venerated number? And yet, we trust, we have now shown what little reason the Council of Trent could allege for its sweeping and uncharitable anathemas.

In this long digression, however, we have almost lost sight of the question of marriage with which we started, and to which we must now return. Perhaps some of our more inquisitive readers may ask, how matrimony ever came to be included in the list of sacraments? We believe that the true reason is as follows:—In the dark ages, somewhere about the eleventh or twelfth century, a few writers, arguing on the fanciful analogies, of which a specimen has been given above, came to the conclusion, that the Church ought to have seven sacraments; and, having done so, they began to look about them, in order to find what these seven sacraments should be.‡ Now, St. Paul, when speaking of the primary institution of marriage in his Epistle to the Ephesians, had used the words, "This is a great mystery;"§ which were thus translated by the Latin Vulgate, Hoc est sacramentum magnum—"this is a great sacrament." Here, then, the Roman Catholic divines found one of their seven sacraments ready made to their hand; and it was no wonder that, at a time when the clergy knew but little Latin and less Greek, the argument derived from this passage of the Vulgate should have been deemed conclusive. "St. Paul," saith the Jesuit writer, Mumford, "applieth here the very name of sacrament to matrimony, which name is not once in all the Scripture applied to any of the other sacraments."

§ τὸ μυστήριον τοῦτο μέγα ἐστίν—Ephes. v. 32.

So far, then, the right of matrimony to be considered a good and proper sacrament would seem to be plausibly made out. But there are two sides to every question, and many Roman Catholic theologians were either too acute, or too honest, not to perceive and acknowledge the difficulties with which the doctrine of the sacramental character of matrimony was embarrassed. Let us briefly advert to one or two of these difficulties.

The Council of Trent, as we have already seen, had laid down, as the first quality which a sacrament ought to possess, that it must have been instituted by Christ. In this point we and they are cordially agreed; for the Church of England, in her catechism, makes the very same asssertion. But when did Christ institute the sacrament of marriage? We search in vain for an answer. Let us hear the well-known Roman Catholic writer, Dens, on this subject. "The Council of Trent," saith he, "has defined that the sacrament of marriage was instituted by Christ; but when this was done is by no means clear. Some say that it was instituted when Christ was present at the marriage at Cana of Galilee, which he honoured with his presence, and is said to have blessed.—John ii. According to others, it was instituted when Christ, bringing back matrimony to its primeval unity, and rejecting the bill of divorce, said, 'What God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.'—Matt. xix. But others refer its institution to the time of the forty days between the resurrection and ascension, during which Christ often taught his apostles concerning the kingdom of God, or his Church. Others say the time is uncertain."* Thus the institution of marriage, as a sacrament, cannot be discovered by the ablest Romish divines. The Council of Trent is unable to find, in Scripture, the place where Christ established it. The Roman catechism adroitly evades this point, and leaves the matter in the same uncertainty as it found it. May we not well ask, what is the good of a central infallible authority if it will not give positive information on such points? Is this a specimen of the boasted harmony and unity of opinion prevalent in the Church of Rome, touching an important sacrament?

But it is said we have no need to settle this point, because St. Paul, in the above quoted passage from the Epistle to the Ephesians, distinctly calls marriage a sacrament. The reply, however, is obvious. The "mystery" spoken of by the apostle, lies not in marriage, but in the union of Christ with his people. "This is a great mystery; but I speak concerning Christ and the Church." The Latin word sacramentum is, indeed, used by the Vulgate to translate the Greek word μυστήριον; but this word, in Scripture usage, never refers to any rite or ceremony whatsoever, but is generally used to denote the hidden meaning of some type, allegory, dream, vision, or figurative description. Thus we read in the Vulgate of "the sacrament of God's will" (Eph. i. 9); "the sacrament of godliness" (1 Tim. iii. 16); "the sacrament of a dream" (Dan. ii. 18, 30, 47); "the sacrament of the seven stars" (Rev. i. 20); "the sacrament of the woman" (Rev. xvii. 7). Are we to hold all these to be sacraments, in the modern sense of the word, because the Vulgate translators have thought fit to use the word sacramentum in each of them? This principle of interpretation would quickly lead us to into strange absurdities.†

As yet, however, we are only on the threshold of our difficulties, with regard to the sacrament of marriage. The Catechism of the Council of Trent tells us that the proper idea of a sacrament is, that it is "an efficacious channel of divine grace."‡ But what grace does matrimony effectually confer? This is a question on which we feel sure that all our readers, married or unmarried, will be anxious to know the truth. The charge has often been brought against us by political economists of the school of Malthus, that the Irish young people were always in too great a hurry to get married. We will not now discuss the prudential view of the question; but, certainly, if the doctrine of the Church of Rome be true, that marriage is a sacrament, and that all the sacraments are efficacious channels of divine grace, we think the argument for early marriages would be very strong indeed.

The Council of Trent, which seemed to take a malicious pleasure in letting fly an anathema against all who differed in opinion from itself, pronounces every person to be accursed who denies that grace is conferred by the sacraments always and upon all persons, as far as God is concerned.§ Hence, if matrimony be really a sacrament, it must efficaciously confer grace always and upon all persons who do not place an obstacle in the way. But are the Romish doctors agreed upon the nature of the efficacious grace which matrimony confers? Alas! we are bound, in all honesty, to declare that there are the bitterest contentions among them upon this very question.

One of the most provoking embarrassments of theological controversy is, to have to deal with antagonists who profess to be united in opinion, and then to find, on closer examination, that scarce any two are of the same mind. An ancient Greek author has left us an account of an amusing scene which once took place in a theatre. Some ingenious artist had trained a number of monkeys to stand together in line, and to go through various military manœuvres with much order and regularity. This novel exhibition attracted crowded audiences, and everything went on very harmoniously, until at length, on one occasion, some mischievous wag threw a handful of nuts on the stage. Instantly the spell was broken, and all the monkeys began forthwith to fight and scramble together; to the dismay and disappointment of their owner.

It is far from our intention to cast any disrespect upon the learned divines of the Church of Rome; but we really feel that the anecdote just cited gives no very unfair representation of the want of harmony which too often prevails among them. In words they profess to belong to a Church whose great boast is unity of faith; but when some particular fact or doctrine is thrown amongst them for discussion, where is this unity to be found?

Let us begin with Peter Lombard, the great Master of the Sentences. He distinctly denied that grace was conferred by matrimony.* Again, the same opinion is often stated, with equal clearness, by the schoolmen. The author of the Gloss upon Gratian, in the canon law, affirms it several times. "Marriage," saith he, "is not one of those sacraments which confer the consolation of divine grace."† And, again, "in this sacrament, the grace of the Holy Spirit is not conferred, as it is in the others." The Roman correctors could not bear this; they say, in the margin, "Immo confert"—yea, matrimony doth confer grace; but, instead of proving the point, they refer back again to the decree of the Council of Trent, before cited. That is as much as to say, the thing is true because it is true.

Again, Durandus, one of the most learned of the Romish divines, not only asserts the same opinion as Peter Lombard, but gives his proof. "Matrimony," saith he, "does not confer the first grace, which is that of justification; nor does it increase grace; for if it did, the married person would have more grace than the unmarried; and, therefore, there would be no virtue in celibacy. Hence, if matrimony neither confers the first grace, nor increases grace, it can confer no grace at all."‡ Durandus adds an amusing argument on the same side, which he says is supplied by the lawyers—"A treaty of marriage," say they, "is good in law, if one of the conditions be that a certain sum of money shall be paid down—e.g., for the lady's fortune; but this would be altogether unlawful, if matrimony conferred grace; because the essence of the crime of simony consists in this, that it is an attempt to purchase the grace of God for money!"§

What conclusion are we to come to, therefore, on this knotty question? We are anathematized by the Council of Trent if we venture to deny that divine grace is effectually bestowed in and by the sacrament of matrimony; but if, according to Durandus and the Master of the Sentences, matrimony neither confers the first grace, nor increases grace, we may well ask what grace does it confer? And, moreover, if every marriage, where the lady has any fortune, involves a simoniacal contract, in what a melancholy condition does this doctrine of the lawyers place the great majority of married people in the world!

But it is needless to press the argument farther. A clear proof that the Church of Rome does not believe her own doctrine (as Durandus very plainly hints), is afforded by the law which she has laid down regarding the celibacy of the clergy. Can anything be more absurd than to assert, that matrimony effectually confers grace, and yet to debar a large body of men and women from all access to the source from which this grace is supposed to flow? What should we think of a man who told his friend that a good dinner would add to his bodily strength, and yet that he would be stronger if he ate no dinner at all?

This, however, is not the only absurdity into which the Church of Rome has fallen relative to this supposed sacrament. She asserts that the intention of the minister is necessary to the validity of the sacraments; and, therefore, if this intention be wanting in the sacrament of matrimony (which can never be certainly known), the two parties are not really married at all!

We must defer the consideration of this branch of the subject, however, to some future opportunity.

THE ABBE LABORDE ON THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

IN our last number we examined at some length the statements and assertions of the Letter Apostolic of Pope Pius IX. on the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. The subject is of such immense importance, and so intimately bound up with the faith and worship of the whole Roman Catholic Church in the present day, that we make no apology for again returning to it. Every day brings to light some fresh fact tending to show how dangerous and impolitic was the step which the Pope has just taken of propounding a new article of faith. We learn from an Italian newspaper (the Cattolico, of Genoa) that four priests of Pavia—MM. Teuca, Parona, Grigiani, and another, whose name is not given—have recently been suspended by their bishop for declaring that the Pope had no authority to impose this new doctrine on the Church without the consent of a General Council. . . . . .

We doubt not but that many more priests, in Italy and elsewhere, are of the same opinion as the four confessors of Pavia.

Those of our readers who have read the Pope's Letter Apostolic, will find, that among the reasons he assigns for his late decree, two are put prominently forward. The first is, that the Roman Catholic bishops and people unanimously called upon him to declare the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. "Communi veluti voto a Nobis expostularunt" are the Pope's own words—"They demanded it as if with common consent." The second reason is, that "it was proved, by illustrious monuments of a venerable antiquity, that this doctrine always existed in the Church, and that it was the clear, unanimous opinion of the Fathers."

Now, the document which we publish below will, if we mistake not, demonstrate the weakness and insufficiency of the Pope's attempted justification of his conduct. The letter, of which we now give a translation, was addressed to Pius IX., in August last, by an eminent French priest, the ABBE LABORDE; and in it he remonstrates, in a most affectionate manner, with the Pope, on the danger of the step he was about to take; and he proves conclusively that the new doctrine was utterly unsupported by Scripture, and that it was contrary to the well-known sentiments of the Fathers, from the earliest times.

We attach considerable importance to this letter, which appears to us to deserve the attention of our readers, both from the position of the writer and the learning and ability which he displays. No one can read the letter without observing that the ABBE LABORDE is still warmly attached to the Papal system; and, therefore, the views which he expresses will, probably, have the more weight with many Roman Catholics, as they are the sentiments, not of an adversary, but of a friend.

We rejoice to find that there are still divines within the bosom of the Church of Rome who see the false and unscriptural nature of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, and who have the courage to speak their opinions openly and without reserve. The Abbe Laborde states, in the last paragraph of his letter, that "many priests and faithful of both sexes" concur with him in the same sentiments. These are not very encouraging facts for the Pope and his advisers, who have joined in imposing this "new dogma of faith" on the Roman Catholic Church.

We will only add, that we have carefully verified the references to ancient authorities which are cited by the Abbe Laborde; and we have occasionally given the originals in full, which do not appear in the letter as published in the Glaneur Savoyard.

MOST HOLY FATHER—Our Lord Jesus Christ, when he was about to leave this world, commanded his apostles that "they should go and teach all nations, baptizing them, and teaching them to observe all things, whatsoever he had commanded them."—Matt. xxviii. 19. In order to put them in a condition to discharge this mission perfectly and unconquerably, he added the promise, that the Holy Spirit should assist them, that "this spirit of truth should dwell in them, should guide them into all truth, should teach them all things, and bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever he had said unto them."—St. John xvi. 13, xiv. 26.

Jesus Christ fulfilled his promise. And when the blessed apostles had been filled with the Holy Ghost (Acts ii. 4) they preached everywhere, on the house-top, that which they had heard in the ear (Matt. x. 27); the Lord working with them, and confirming his words with signs following.—Mark xvi. 20.

We have, then, for the authors of our faith the apostles of the Lord, who did not select that which they should introduce into it, according to their own fancy, but who transmitted, faithfully, to the nations that which they had received from Christ.* Now, this summary of the doctrine

* Dens Theol., Tom. vii., de Matrim. No. 26.

† It may, with some of our Roman Catholic readers, strengthen our argument to state that, in the recent and improved translation of the New Testament, by F. P. Kenrick, Roman Catholic Bishop of Philadelphia, published at New York in 1841, that learned and candid writer, instead of following the Douay version, translates the passage—"This mystery is great," adding the following in a note, p. 395—"The Greek term, μυστηριον, is used of mysteries, properly so called, and of sacraments, as divine instruments of grace." The Latin term; sacramentum, admits of still greater latitude. I have preferred the literal reading of the Greek, lest I should seem to seek support for the sacramental character of marriage in an ambiguous word. The mysterious nature of conjugal union is declared by the apostle, in consequence of its typical relation to the union of Christ with the Church. From its first institution it was so referred, although this was not then declared, nor was grace attached to it. "He calls it a great mystery," says St. Chrysostom, "because blessed Moses, or rather God, intimated something great and wonderful."

of Jesus Christ, which was communicated by the apostles to all the churches as they were founded, to be kept by them, and to be transmitted successively from hand to hand, to distant times—even to the end of the world—this is the Catholic faith, this is that deposit of our faith, of which the apostle writes to Timothy—"O, Timothy, keep the deposit which has been committed to thee, avoiding profane novelties of speech, and oppositions of science, falsely so called, which some professing, have erred from the faith."—1 Tim. vi. 20, 21.

This deposit, then, of the faith has been transmitted by the apostles of Jesus Christ to all Timothies—that is to say, to all Christians who fear God, to be in such wise kept, that they should add nothing to it, that they should take away nothing from it, that they should change nothing in it, that they should mingle no strange doctrine with it, and that they should not tolerate any addition, diminution, change, or admixture by others. Further, they have ordered us, if perchance any persons should teach any other doctrine than that which has been transmitted from the beginning, to say to such persons, anathema!—"Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you, let him be anathema. As we said before, so say I now again, if any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be anathema."—Gal. i. 8, 9. It was on this account that a great man, or rather, all the fathers of the Church, and successors of the apostles, speaking by the mouth of one of themselves, have laid down this law—"To teach, therefore, anything to Catholic Christians, besides that which they have received, never is lawful, never has been lawful, never will be lawful; and to anathematize those who do teach anything besides that which has been once for all received, was always a duty, is always a duty, and always will be a duty." After this (adds the same writer) can there be any person either so bold as to wish to proclaim a new doctrine to the Church or so rash as to receive any other doctrine than that which he has already received from the Church? The Apostle Paul, that chosen vessel, that teacher of nations, that trumpet of the apostles, that herald of the whole earth, that witness of what passed in heaven, he, speaking by means of his epistle, directs his speech to all the faithful, at all times, and in all places; he, I say, once, yea twice, exclaims—"If any one preach to you a new doctrine, let him be anathema!"*

This being the case, most Holy Father, who will not wonder that a new dogma is announced to Catholic Christians; that a new dogma is at this moment forged at Rome? Is there not a widely-spread report that your Holiness threatens the world with a decree, by which we are commanded to believe that the conception of the Blessed Virgin was immaculate? But, Holy Father, this is precisely that thing which the apostle called "a profane novelty of words and contradiction of science, falsely so called;" this is precisely to preach to us another gospel than that which has been preached to us by St. Paul—the teacher of nations, the trumpet of the apostles, the herald of the whole earth.

For, in truth, that apostle, who was a witness of what passed in heaven, never preached to us that the Blessed Virgin was free from original sin. He made not one single exception, and, therefore, he included the Blessed Virgin as well as all others, when he said—"For when we were yet without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly; for scarcely for a righteous man would one die, yet, perchance, for a good man some would even dare to die."—Rom. v. 6, 7. She was not, therefore, just, she was not, therefore, holy and spotless—the Blessed Virgin for whom Christ died. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."—Rom. v. 12. ALL, therefore, also the Blessed Virgin. "The love of Christ constraineth us, because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead; and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again."—2 Cor. v. 14, 15. The use made of this text by St. Augustine will be seen below.

The ancient Fathers of the Church, successors of the chair of the apostles, legitimate interpreters of Scripture, themselves, in their own time, the witnesses, guardians, and oracles of the traditions and faith of the Church, have taught us that our Lord Jesus Christ alone was without original sin, because he alone was conceived without the union of man and woman; but that Mary, his Holy Mother, was "sinful flesh"—that is to say, conceived in sin, like all others. What saith Origen? "No one, therefore, can ever avoid the snare of sinful concupiscence; for all have sinned, as it is written—'By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin.' And again, 'Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Not one.'—Job xiv. 4. Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is, therefore, the only one who has not sinned; but the Father hath made him to be sin for us, in order that, being in the likeness of sinful flesh, and sprung from sin, he might condemn sin. He, therefore, came into those snares, but he was the only one who could not be entangled in them."†

So, also, St. Augustine writes:—Christ alone was born without sin, who was conceived by a Virgin, not in the desire of the flesh, but in the obedience of the spirit. She only could prepare the medicine for our disease, who produced an offspring without the wound of sin."‡

Here is the privilege of the son; here is the privilege of the mother. The son alone was conceived without sin. The mother alone conceived a son exempt from sin.

"He alone who was made man without ceasing to be God, never had any sin, and never took the body of sin, although born from a mother of sinful flesh."†

And, again—"Therefore, all are dead, and Christ died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him who died for them, and rose again."—2 Cor. v. 14, 15. All, therefore, without one single exception, are dead in sins, either original or voluntary, whether by ignorance, or by knowing, and not doing that which was righteous. He alone who liveth—that is, the only person who never committed any sin whatsoever—died for all the rest, who were dead, in order that they who live by the remission of their sins, should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who died for our sins, and who rose again for our justification."‡

All the other Fathers unanimously teach the same doctrine.

This, then, Most Holy Father, is the faith which we have received from the beginning. As yet, to-day, 1854 years after the preaching of the apostles, it is not an article of faith that the Blessed Virgin was born free from sin. If, therefore, this becomes an article of faith to-morrow, it will plainly be a new article.

Together with the present letter, we send to your Holiness a volume, entitled "The Belief in the Immaculate Conception can never become an Article of Faith;" in which we have demonstrated at length the points which we now briefly assert. We have there pointed out the exact period up to which it was yet unheard of in the Church, that the Blessed Virgin was without original sin. The doctor who first openly professed this opinion is there named; and from the progress of this opinion it is historically proved, that this doctrine is a new invention in the Church. We beseech you, Holy Father, seriously to meditate on the value of these arguments. Your Holiness ought to be aware of the sad consequences that must necessarily follow from an attempt to force a new dogma of faith on Christendom. "We have no curiosity, beyond Jesus Christ; we need no inquiries beyond the Gospel. When we believe, we have no desire to increase our belief; for the first point of our belief is this, that there is nothing beyond (the Gospel) which we are bound to believe."§

We cannot disobey the precepts of the apostles. We are bound to oppose the introduction of new articles of faith.

Most willingly we believe and confess, Holy Father, that the Bishop of the first See has the primacy in the Church. We are ready to maintain, and to assert energetically, that Peter, to whom the flock of Jesus Christ was entrusted, was the chief in the band of the apostles; that he had the chief authority in religious matters, as being that person to whose care all were entrusted. We assert that the Bishop of Rome is the legitimate successor of St. Peter; and we believe that the authority of the former is no less great than that of the latter. We cannot, however, forget that, from time to time, cases may arise in which it is necessary that "Paul should withstand Peter to the face, because he is to be blamed, and because he walketh not uprightly, according to the truth of the Gospel."—Gal. ii. 11, 14. You, most Holy Father, are Peter; and we—that is, the body of Christian people—are Paul. If, then, you imitate Peter, and "walk not uprightly according to the truth of the Gospel," it must be our part to imitate Paul, and "resist you to the face." But can there be a plainer proof of "not walking uprightly according to the truth of the Gospel," than the attempt to make new articles of faith?

We, indeed, in company with all those who hold no other head than Jesus Christ, are united in communion with your Holiness, as with the chair of Peter. We know that the Church is built on this rock, and we believe every person to be profane who eats the Lamb out of this house (Hier. ad Dam. Pap.); but we cannot forget the boldness of the reply which our own St. Hilary, of Poictiers, once addressed to a certain sacrilegious bishop of the See of Rome—"Know, Liberius, that I say anathema to thee and to thy companions. I say anathema to thee for the second and the third time, thou prevaricating Liberius!"*

Listen, Holy Father, to the genuine and lawful decrees of the sixth General Council against a Bishop of Rome in former days—"We have thought fit to put out of the Holy Catholic Church of God, and, at the same time, to anathematize Honorius, formerly Bishop of Rome, because we have found in the writings which he addressed to Sergius, that he agreed in his sentiments, and conformed to his impious dogmas."†

Listen, Holy Father, to the genuine and lawful decrees of the seventh General Council against the same Pope—"We profess the two wills and operations according to the two natures in Christ Jesus, as the sixth Council, held in Constantinople, formerly did, with applause, when it drove out Sergius, Honorius, Cyrus, Pyrrhus, Macarius, and all those who are enemies of true religion, and think as they do."‡

Listen again, most Holy Father, to the genuine letter of another Bishop of the chief See, who, in like manner, pronounced an anathema upon that unworthy Bishop of Rome (Honorius), and confirmed the anathema of the sixth General Council. The letter of Leo II. is as follows:—

"We anathematize the inventors of new errors—that is to say, Theodorus, Bishop of Faran; Cyrus, Bishop of Alexandria; Sergius, Pyrrhus, Paulus, Peter, successors rather than bishops of the Church of Constantinople; and, besides these, Honorius, who, instead of enlightening this apostolic chair by the doctrines of apostolic tradition, has endeavoured, by guilty treachery, to corrupt and ruin the holy faith."§

It is not in our power to be ignorant of these, or many other similar facts which have taken place from the times of the apostles to our own days, but which it would be too long to enumerate. Woe to these perfidious shepherds who, instead of "strengthening their brethren in the faith" (Luke xxii. 32), as it is their duty to do, attempt to ruin the faith itself! Woe to those shepherds, "ravening wolves in sheep's clothing" (Matt. vii. 15), who, after having received from Christ that holy commandment, "Feed my lambs, feed my sheep" (John xxi. 15, 18), have torn with their teeth and claws both the lambs and the sheep.

May God preserve you, beloved Father, from entering into their ways. May the Lord "enlighten the eyes of your mind" (Ephes. i. 17, 18), that you may see the wiles of the serpent, prepared, by the mouth of flatterers, against your own soul and against the peace of the Church! We know it, we know it. Flattery does not cease to allure you. It tells you that you will render your name glorious in the sight of men; that you will confirm the domination of the Bishop of Rome over the universal Church, if, by a decree of faith, binding on all Christians—laity, clergy, priests, and bishops—you are able to define a question which none of your predecessors nor any council has dared thus to define. These are the wiles of the serpent; for if your Holiness should order the belief of the new dogma that you meditate, you will gather for yourself, not glory, but ignominy; and for the Bishop of Rome, not domination, but derision. It will be a new proof, in addition to so many other proofs from history, that the Bishop of Rome is, like all other men, a weak man, prone to sin, subject to error; and that it may happen to him to be a prevaricator in his holy office, to be deceived himself, and to endeavour to deceive others!

Listen, then, rather to us, beloved Father—us, who seek the true glory of your Holiness, not by flattery, but by the love of truth, of charity, and of peace.

May God long preserve you in good health, and keep you holy, through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Most Holy Father,

For myself, and for many priests, and faithful persons of both sexes,

"Likewise must the deacons be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre."—Chap. iii., v. 8. Any law that has been framed contrary to the above authorities I cannot hesitate to pronounce an infernal one, whether it proceeds from the Vatican of Rome, or from the Cathedral of Canterbury. We find in Genesis the following precept—"Increase and multiply, and fill the land." The influence of this command is omnipotent, and is felt by all living things—by man and beast, by the insects of the air, as well as by the fishes of the sea. How do, then, thousands of men escape the all-powerful influence of this primary law under the warm sun of Spain or France? The answer is very obvious—they cannot; as it is equally powerful on the banks of the Seine as on those of the sunny Tagus. If his Satanic Majesty could summon together an assembly of the most atrocious sinners in his wide dominion, to form an ordinance by which he could people his infernal empire with the souls of the damned, they could not frame a more effectual one than that which establishes the celibacy of the priesthood. I am fully justified in making this strong observation from my own personal observation and experience, as well as from the extent of my reading. Paul IV. was obliged to issue a Bull to the Inquisition in the sixteenth century to inquire into the immorality of the priests of Spain. The Bull commences in these words—"Whereas, certain ecclesiastics in the kingdom of Spain, in the cities and dioceses, having the care of souls, have broken out into such heinous acts of iniquity as to abuse the sacrament of penance, in the very act of hearing confessions, by enticing and provoking females to lewd actions at the very time they are making their confessions." The inquisition commenced to discover the sacerdotal delinquents; but the abuse was so general the scandal would be in proportion, and it was agreed to consign the prosecution to the Greek Kalends. I would not cite this instance of Papal interference to prevent this fearful iniquity, if it was confined to a few individuals who would only form the exceptions; but as the entire kingdom of Spain is included in the Pope's Bull, it forms an insuperable argument why that penal statute should be obliterated from the records of mankind. Now, if the priests of Spain were so profligate, what charter of exemption can those of Portugal, Italy, England, and Ireland claim from this the worst of all penal ordinances?

Were not the prophets and patriarchs married, and several of the apostles, with some of the evangelists? Is it not more criminal to see ecclesiastics living in the most abandoned debauchery than to see them enter into the holy state of matrimony?—matrimony which, the Apostle Paul says, is honourable in all men."

I could point out the names of some of the most eminent bishops who were married, and the ages they lived in up to the time of the apostles, but as this historical fact will not be denied, I will only mention that "Bishop Spiridion was Father of St. Basil, and father-in-law to Gregory Nazianzen, and that the See of Ephesus was in the family of Polycrates during the period of seven hundred years. But what will devout Roman Catholics say when they are told that some of the Popes themselves are the sons of bishops. Felix III., Adrian II., Agapetus I., and Agapetus II.: nor was the sanctity of St. Patrick retarded by being the son of a deacon, and the grandson of a priest. If it should, however, irritate Roman Catholics to tell them such a simple fact, that the bishops and priests of their Church were married, will it please them more if I tell them, that in the very year that the Pope was framing the Bull to prevent the marriage of the clergy, he was himself laying the foundation of one of the most illustrious houses in Italy, with the help of the Countess Matilda, who had a beautiful chateau on one of those picturesque slopes that look down upon the classic shores of Etruria. Will anyone believe that the pure air of the Apennine and the desire Hildebrand had of assisting the countess at her devotions, were the only motives that induced his Holiness to visit these lovely solitudes? How prophetic were the words of St. Paul, and how applicable to the Church of Rome, is the language of the apostle where he says, "that in the latter days some shall depart from the faith, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God had created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth."—Tim. iv. 3.

The infallibility of the Church is the next question which I proposed to discuss—a doctrine which was first propounded by the Jesuits for their own private ends, and to flatter the vanity of the Popes, and was afterwards sanctioned by the second Council of Nice in the year 786. If the Church of Rome was infallible, the infallibility must be found in the aggregate of the individuals forming that Church, or in her general councils, or in the Popes. But it is not found in either; every individual is fallible, and the aggregate of fallible individuals must be fallible. It could not exist in her general councils, as it is admitted even by Roman Catholics that the Council of Rimini was an Œcumenical council, and erred, having deliberately signed the Arian heresy; and to which Pope Liberius himself annexed his name. Nor can it be found in the Popes. Was Leo X., an atheist, infallible? Was Alexander VI., an incestuous Pontiff, infallible? Or, may I ask, was John XXII. infallible, the most profligate of mankind? Although the Council of Trent has cautiously abstained from publishing any decree on this subject, yet the Pope, bishops, and priests still cling with unshaken tenacity to infallibility as the culminating point upon which all the dogmas of their Church depend. The promises made by our Lord in the following texts of Scripture, are the foundation upon which they build their doctrine of infallibility:—"The gates of hell shall not prevail against it."—Matt. xvi. 18. "Lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."—Matt. xxviii. 20. There are two things that can be obviously deduced from these texts of Scripture—the first is, the existence of the Church to the end of time; and the second is, that God will never withdraw his protecting hand from his Church. Nothing can be more clear that the Church of Christ is to last to the end of time, than that she is increasing since the death of Christ under the protection of heaven, and by the labours of the missionaries all over the world. It is no less certain that God has exercised a vigilant care over his Church since her foundation, as she never disappeared, even in the most abandoned times. It is quite true that errors have crept into the Church in the middle ages, both from the avarice and ambition of the Popes, and from the gross ignorance of the times, yet she never disappeared. She always retained the Holy Scriptures, believed the fundamental doctrine of the Gospel dispensation, and was the treasury of God's Holy Word, although some base coin was issued, from time to time, from the mint of the Vatican. The time arrived when the Reformation became absolutely necessary, when there was no morality, no discipline, no literature, no reverence for divine things, and religion was almost extinct. Did not all this justify the reformers in commencing the great and arduous task of reforming a Church then immersed in vice and abominable wickedness, when Leo X., an infidel, was Pope and Vicar of Christ.

The great Burke said, that all corporate bodies stand in need of reformation from time to time, and that they who undertook this arduous task deserved the best thanks of the commonwealth.

The reformers, instead of receiving every possible praise for their intrepid conduct in stemming the torrent of vice and immorality that then threatened to deluge the world, there is no epithet, however vituperative, in the English language, that is not, even now, poured out against the memory of those men of learning and morals, and which, I regret to add, is the besetting sin of modern Roman Catholics. If the Church was infallible, in the Roman Catholic sense of the expression, she could not err, and, up to the present day, she would want no reformation, as she would be "without spot or wrinkle." To prove that the Church was overwhelmed with every vice to which human nature is subject, and required a dyke of powerful strength to resist the flood of unsound doctrine and scandalous conduct which threatened to deluge a trembling world, hear what Catholic authorities, of great eminence, say upon this subject.

The Cardinal of Cambray says—"Although there are great evils which we see, yet unless the Church be speedily reformed, we shall, in a short time, see unspeakably greater."

Nicholas de Clemangis writes as follows—"That wicked persons did so much abound, in all professions of men, that scarce one in a thousand was to be found who lived answerably to his profession."

The Cardinal of Lorraine, at the Council of Trent said—"That all the calamities which had befallen France were to be attributed to the general corruption of manners that prevailed in that country."

Cardinal Julian tells Eugene IV.—"That the people were above measure incensed against the ecclesiastical state by the dissolute lives of the clergy, for which it is greatly to be feared, unless they mend their manners, lest the laymen, after the example of the Hussites, fall foul upon the whole clergy."

The Suffragan Bishop of Saltzburg speaks of the clergy in the following words, at the commencement of the Reformation—"The modern and unhappy clergy neglect the love of God and of their neighbour; they are addicted to infamous practices, and neglect the salvation of the souls of God's people."

I could quote authorities without end to show the necessity of a reformation in the Church at the time it happened; but the above are quite sufficient for the purpose. Roman Catholics assert, contrary to fact, that it was no reformation, but the creation of a new religion; whereas, the reformers only fell back upon primary principles, and expunged all unsound, extraneous, and antiscriptural doctrine, which was introduced into the Church during the dark ages. This universal depravity of morals, and the heathen doctrine then taught in the Church, prove its fallibility, and the impurity of the water that flowed from the Cistern of the Hills.

ROMAN CATHOLIC ANTINOMIANISM.

It has often been a subject of complaint in countries ruled over by monarchs with absolute power, that those who did the king faithful service have been neglected, and their interest sacrificed to that of the flatterers who thronged his court. Many a soldier who has grown gray in fighting his sovereign's battles, without reward, has murmured at seeing gay courtiers put over his head, whose only merit was, that they had humoured the weakness or ministered to the pleasures of their prince; and often, too, have complaints been excited at the easy pardon which the cruelty or oppression of courtiers has received, provided they have taken care to make themselves personally agreeable to their master. "More than one well-disposed ruler," says a distinguished writer, "has given up whole provinces to rapine and oppression, merely from a wish to see none but happy faces round his own board, and in his own walks. No man is fit to govern great societies who hesitates about disobliging the few who have access to him, for the sake of the many whom he will never see." Some authors have been so ungallant as to say, that the weakness which we are here describing is one to which female sovereigns have been particularly liable. A few flattering compliments, with some profession of personal attachment, have, in their case, often been considered as atonement for serious crimes, and have outweighed the solid services of less showy competitors.

One of the most odious features in the idolatry of the heathen is, that they have not only framed for themselves gods in the likeness of men, but that they have taken some of the vilest and worst of men as the models of their divinities. While they rightly judged that the relation of a king to his subjects was one which, in some degree, was a representation of the relation of God to his creatures, they have degraded the majesty of heaven by comparing it to some of those weak and worthless earthly monarchs, whose faults we have attempted to describe. It was a common error in the heathen systems to imagine that their gods could be bribed by a few prayers or a few sacrifices to overlook the vices of their worshippers and that they would not make any severe examination into the conduct of those who were careful to give them due praise and honour.

In the true religion, on the other hand, all possibility of an error of this kind has been carefully guarded against. No wicked man is allowed for a moment to think that, unless he forsake his sins, his prayers or his devotions can gain him any favour from God. "Why call ye me Lord, Lord," says our Saviour to those who offered him this homage of the lips, "and do not the things which I say."—Luke vi. 46. David expresses the conviction of every Christian when he tells us—"If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me."—Psalm lxvi. 18. So far is it from being the case that one continuing in wickedness can, by prayers offered in such a state of mind, mitigate the displeasure of God, that, doubtless, the hypocrisy of such worship only makes him more hateful to a God of purity; and we are expressly told that the sacrifice of the wicked is abomination in the sight of God.—Prov. xv. 8.

It may be imagined that doctrine like this would not be very acceptable to men who were unwilling to forsake their sins, and yet who longed for some reason to hope that continuance in sin would not be attended with ultimate danger; who wished to find some expedient for keeping up some claim on the favour of God, even when they were transgressing his commands, so that they might be able to reckon on obtaining from him, at the last hour, the grace of repentance and pardon. And if God would not be mocked with the prayers of impenitent sinners—if He declared their sacrifice abomination—could no one else be found more indulgent, or who would undertake the patronage of sinners on easier terms? These are the cravings of men's corrupt hearts, which we are ashamed to say that priests of our religion have been found to satisfy; and that at the expense of the honour of one whom all Christians ought to be ready to hold in reverence. There is one whose earthly life we may lawfully believe to have been graced with such holiness as a child of fallen Adam may attain unto, and yet who is represented as the patron and the protector of wilful sinners. Protestants have been often accused of hating the Blessed Virgin Mary, and of being jealous of her honour; but we know of no representations so degrading to her character as those given by some of those Roman Catholic divines who have professed the greatest devotion to her. While zealous for her material dignity—while claiming for her the title of Queen of Heaven—they represent her as exercising her sovereignty in a manner which would disgrace the weakest and vainest of earthly queens. They represent her as intensely jealous of personal compliments; angry if they are withheld; but ready to give anything, and forgive anything, to those who make a profession of personal attachment to her. We know not how any Roman Catholic, zealous for the real honour of the Virgin, can read, without disgust, such books as St. Liguori's "Glories of Mary," and others of the same character, which, while intended to do honour to the Mother of our Lord, would, if they were true, be highly degrading to her character. We give a few specimens, principally from the "Glories of Mary," of the stories to which we refer; and we ask our readers to say, whether an earthly queen, who should allow herself to be so influenced by a few compliments, would be considered fit to govern a great country.

We are obliged by the pressure of other matter to omit several of the stories which we had marked for quotation, and which were intended to illustrate the great value which the Blessed Virgin is represented as setting on the honours paid to her; and how completely (if we are to believe Roman Catholic writers) her character must have changed since she was on earth, where we never hear of her being greedy of praise and adoration. Thus we cannot afford space to quote Mr. Faber's story, how she appeared to "our own St. Thomas of Canterbury," to thank him for the "Hail Marys" he was in the habit of repeating, and to request him to add a few more to his daily list. Nor, again, how when "the Blessed Joseph Herman, the Premonstratensian," being employed to act as sentinel, to guard a church from robbers, had omitted some of his usual "Hail Marys," the Virgin appeared to him, not as usual, in youth and beauty, but old and wrinkled; and how, when he asked the reason, she explained to him how much hurt she felt at his neglect of her, and how she begged him another time to say his full number of "Hail Marys," and leave the guardianship of the church to her. These and some other stories of the same kind we must leave out, and hasten on to those which have more immediate reference to the subject of our preceding remarks. What should we think of an earthly sovereign who, when asked to execute judgment on a notorious offender, should answer, that the criminal was in the habit of frequently paying compliments to her, and that she made it a rule never to execute justice on a friend of hers. Well, let our readers peruse the following story, which we take from the "Glories of Mary" (vol. i., p. 360. Dublin, J. Duffy, 1851), and let them say whether they think those who invented, or who repeat such a tale, have added to the honour of "the Queen of Heaven":—

"In Domans, in France, there was a married man who, though his wife was living, kept up a criminal intimacy with another woman. The wife, being unable to bear such maltreatment, continually besought the Lord to punish the crimes of her husband. She went one day before an altar of the Blessed Virgin, in a certain church, to implore just vengeance against the woman who lived with him. The other woman went every day before the same image to recite a 'Hail Mary.' The Divine Mother appeared one night, in a dream, to the person who had been maltreated by her husband; the woman instantly began to exclaim, as usual—'Justice, O Mother of God, justice.' The Blessed Virgin replied—'Do you ask justice from me? Go and find some one else to execute justice. For my part, I will not do it. Know that the sinner against whom you demand justice, recites a salutation every day in my honour; and I will endeavour to save from the vengeance due to their sins those who recite that salutation.'"

Thus our readers will see that, though the prayers of the wicked may be abomination to God, it is not so with the Virgin; and the wickedness of her votaries does not prevent her from being flattered by their attention, and duly rewarding their devotion. St. Liguori tells us distinctly, and endeavours to prove by citations from grave authors, as well as by historical examples, that "a client of Mary, who honours her faithfully, and recommends himself to her, CANNOT BE LOST."—p. 313. The edition of the "Glories of Mary" from which we quote, is what may be called a controversial edition, and is furnished with notes to defend Liguori from the objections of Protestants, and, when the saint's words appear objectionable, to tell us what he meant—or, at least, what he ought to have meant. In the present instance there is a note to explain that the saint only means to speak of those clients of Mary who sincerely wish to repent of their past sins, and to lead a holy life. Now, we assert, and shall presently prove by abundance of examples, that this is a most unfair distortion of the saint's meaning, and that all his stories show that he wished to teach that all who honour the Virgin—sinners or saints, penitent or impenitent—should receive from her a certainty of salvation as their reward. But, to avoid being misunderstood, we must explain that we do not believe St. Liguori teaches that the Virgin brings any to heaven without their repenting beforehand. No sinner, however, is so unreasonable as to expect to get to heaven without first performing some ceremony of this kind. But what makes them uncomfortable in their sins is, the fear that, if they continue in them, death may overtake them without their ever having repented. This is a point which Protestant preachers often urge on their hearers—that every hour they continue in sin strengthens its power over them, and increases the unlikelihood of their repentance, while the uncertainty of life makes their continuance in unrepented sin fearfully dangerous. Now, from all uneasiness of this kind, St. Liguori delivers his disciples. The tendency of his instructions is as follows:—"Repent and forsake your sins by all means; this is what I recommend as the best and safest course. What, you find this too great an effort? Well, then, at least, do not forget to say, every day, a 'Hail Mary,' and, no doubt, the good Mother will procure for you, at some time or other, the grace of contrition."

Schoolboys, sometimes, when the master is away, are afraid to play their mad pranks, lest the unexpected appearance of their teacher should bring punishment on them; but, sometimes, by leaving one of their number outside, to give them timely notice of the master's coming, they are able to carry on their mischievous tricks in comfort and security. Just such a service as this does St Liguori represent the Blessed Virgin as affording to sinners who honour her, allowing them to continue comfortably in their sins for a sufficient space of time, but taking care to warn them before it is too late, and by obtaining repentance for them, to secure them from all unpleasant consequences.

We shall now enable our readers to judge whether we are justified in bringing this charge against Liguori. The first story which we shall quote is the "Example" which St. Liguori appends to the chapter in which he asserts that it is morally impossible that a servant of Mary can be lost. And we must say that we feel much indebted to the saint for his habit of affixing examples to all his chapters; for nothing tends to make a writer's meaning so clear as when he illustrates, by particular examples, the sense in which he uses his general propositions—

"In the year 1601, there were, in the City of Flanders, two young students, who, instead of attending to the acquisition of learning, sought only the indulgence of the appetite, and the gratification of their unchaste passions. One night they went to a house of ill-fame; after some time, one of them, called Richard, returned home, the other remained. After having reached his house, Richard, while undressing, in order to go to bed, remembered that he had not said the 'Hail Mary' which he was accustomed to recite every day in honour of the Virgin. Being oppressed with sleep, he felt a great repugnance to say them; however, he did violence to himself, and recited the usual 'Hail Marys,' without devotion, and half asleep. He went to bed, and, during his first sleep, he heard a loud knock at the door, and instantly saw before him his companion, presenting a deformed and hideous appearance. 'Who are you?' said Richard. 'Do you not know me?' replied the other. 'How,' rejoined Richard, 'have you undergone such a change? you look like a demon.' 'Ah, unhappy me,' exclaimed the other, 'I am damned. In leaving that infamous house, a devil came and strangled me. My body lies in the middle of the street, and my soul is in hell. Know that the same chastisement also awaited you, but the Blessed Virgin, on account of the little devotion of reciting the "Hail Marys" has saved you from it. Happy if you know how to avail yourself of this warning, which the Mother of God sends you through me!' After these words he opened his cloak, and showed Richard the flames and serpents by which he was tormented, and then disappeared. Richard, shedding a torrent of tears, fell prostrate on the ground to thank Mary, his deliverer; and while he was reflecting on a change of life he heard the bell of the Franciscans calling them to matins. He then said—'Here God calls me to do penance.' He went instantly to the convent, and entreated the fathers to receive him. Being aware of the wicked life he had led, they at first refused; but he related, with tears, all that had happened; two of the fathers went into the street and found the strangled body of his companion, which was as black as a cinder; they then received him into the convent. Richard began to lead an exemplary life; he afterwards went to the Indies to preach the faith; he thence passed into Japan, and, in the end, had the happiness of being burned alive, and of dying a martyr for Jesus Christ."—Glories of Mary, vol. i., p. 322.

Here, then, our readers can see whether this client of Mary sincerely intended to repent of his past sins, and to lead a holy life. There were, in fact, two men, equally guilty, equally impenitent; but the one, because he repeated his Ave Maria, "without devotion and half asleep," was rescued from the doom that overtook the other, obtained the grace of contrition, and eventually the crown of martyrdom. We give another story, taken from Father Muzzarelli's "Mouth of Mary," which will serve to show how little the Blessed Virgin requires of her clients, and how mere mechanical devotion to her is represented as sufficient to procure the grace of contrition and to obtain forgiveness—

"A blood-stained man, full of enormous crimes, was earnestly entreated by his wife to fast on Saturday in honour of Mary, and to recite an Ave Maria to her when he fell in with an image of her, since he was not disposed to bring himself down to penance. He did so, perhaps more to please his wife than anything else; nevertheless, from this devotion his felicity took its beginning. One day, in a journey, he entered into a church to refresh himself from the heat; he saw an image of Mary, and, without much devotion, he said an Ave Maria. As he drew back he perceived the infant Jesus, who was in the arms of his most holy mother, was wounded all over and bathed in blood; he shuddered at such a sight, and, turning to the Virgin, he said—'Who has ill-treated your son this day?' 'You,' replied she, 'with your sins, have wounded the Son of God and my son.' At these words this man began to weep exceedingly, and prayed the Virgin, with many sobs, to obtain his pardon. But the holy Infant showed no wish to hear his mother's prayers. Then the Virgin redoubled her entreaty,* and said—'but what can be denied to Mary?' She received the grace, and said to him, kiss the wounds of my Son. He did so, and seemed to see that upon this act the infant's wounds were healed by his contrition. This done, he left the church, and the world also, since, by common consent, he and his wife retired to take a religious life."†

Here is another tale with the same moral. We have to apologize to our Protestant subscribers for citing so many; but one or two examples would give the reader no idea of the urgency with which the same doctrine is enforced—viz., that the most abandoned sinners may be certain of ultimate salvation if they will only not neglect to make Mary their friend.

"A young man who had lost his father, was sent by his mother to be the page of a certain prince. But before they parted, his mother, who had a great devotion for the Holy Virgin, made her Son promise that he would repeat every day the Angelic Salutation, and with it this short supplication—'Blessed Virgin, assist me at the hour of my death!' The young man was no sooner arrived at the court than he plunged into every kind of vice; and his bad conduct lost him entirely the favour of his master, who, at last, dismissed him from his service. In despair, and without any means of subsistence, he became a highwayman; but, even whilst he was robbing and murdering on the king's highway, he remained faithful to the practice of piety, which his mother had enjoined him. At length his crimes met with their reward; he fell into the hands of justice, and was condemned to death. He was thrown into prison, there to remain till he should be summoned to undergo the penalty of the law. On the evening before the day that was fixed for his execution, his disgrace, his approaching death, and the grief of his poor mother, presented themselves so vividly to his mind, that he was buried in sad thoughts, and his tears flowed abundantly; when, all at once, he beheld before him a young man, who, addressing him, offered to deliver him from prison and death, if he would bind himself to obey him. The prisoner gave the promise, when the young man disclosed to him that he was the devil, and commanded him, in the first place, to renounce Jesus Christ and the sacraments, to which the prisoner consented. 'That is not enough,' added the evil spirit, 'you must also deny the Holy Virgin, and renounce her protection.' 'That I will never do,' replied the criminal; and, addressing the Mother of God, he repeated the prayer which he was in the habit of making to her—'Blessed Virgin, succour me in the hour of death.' These words put the devil to flight; but the poor young man remained inconsolable for having denied his Saviour; in his affliction, he had recourse to Mary, and prayed to her with such fervour that she obtained for him a sincere contrition for his sins, under the influence of which he confessed with a deep feeling of penitence. On the next day, as the officers were leading him to the place of execution, he had to pass by an image of the Mother of God; he saluted it, and said—'Blessed Virgin, succour me in the hour of death.' The Image, in the sight of all who were present, inclined its head, and returned the salutation. Penetrated by this mark of favour, he asked permission to kiss the feet of the image. The soldiers who were conducting him, did not at all like this; but, as the people murmured, they did not venture to refuse his request. The young man stooped down, and the Image, extending its arms, took him by the hand, and held him so tight, that it was impossible to get him away again. At this miracle but one cry was heard—'pardon!-pardon!' and the pardon was granted. He returned to his country, and ever after led an exemplary life, retaining the most tender gratitude to Mary who had saved him from two deaths, a temporal and an eternal one."†

The stories we have given sufficiently show the readiness of the Virgin Mary to obtain the forgiveness of God for the most abandoned sinners, who have put themselves under her protection; but man is sometimes less merciful than God, and will not so easily forget the past history of those who have led a life of crime. But even this has been provided for. We have been obliged, by want of space, to erase the story of Sister Beatrix from our extracts; but our readers will find, at p. 284 of "The Glories of Mary," how this nun, being urged by criminal passion, left her nunnery, but, on departing, placed her dress and the keys which she held as porteress, beneath a picture of the Virgin, asking Mary to take her place, and fill it more worthily than she had done; and how, after living a life of prostitution for fifteen years, she happened to hear that Sister Beatrix had a high character for holiness, and had been promoted to be mistress of the novices: and how, on inquiry, she found that the Virgin had taken her at her word, had assumed her form during the whole time that she lived in vice; so that she was able to resume her office with the best of characters, and no one was the wiser, until Sister Beatrix, on her death-bed, thought fit to reveal the truth for the glory of Mary.

There are other stories which show the dangerous consequences of omitting an Ave Maria. We pass over the story of Esquilio, whom the Virgin herself ordered to be led to the fire, rejecting the intercessions of the saints on his behalf, on the grounds that he had been exceedingly wicked, and that he had never said so much as an Ave Maria, though the good mother did eventually allow herself to be prevailed on to relent. But the following story, to the same effect, is, perhaps, better worthy of extract:—

"In Venice there was a celebrated advocate who became rich by fraud and bad practices. Almost the only good

* St. Liguori tells us here that the Virgin (the image, we suppose) placed the infant in the niche and prostrated herself before it.

† This story is also to be found in the "Glories of Mary," vol. i., p. 297.

† The version here given we had copied some time since from a translation made from a French edition of the "Glories of Mary." On comparing it with Mr. Duffy's translation (vol. i., p. 372) we find that the latter makes no mention of the young man having been ready to deny Jesus, though he refused to deny Mary. There is another very similar story at p. 443, where a young man is represented as having refused to deny Mary, and no mention is made by Mr Duffy of his having renounced our Lord: and yet afterwards when the Virgin intercedes for him, Jesus at first replies—"This ungrateful manner has renounced my service." We are led, therefore, to believe that Mr. Duffy has designedly departed from the text of Liguori; and we are heartily glad to see that there is any of St. Liguori that is thought too strong for Ireland. We only wish there was more of it omitted. Mr. Duffy and his friends were ashamed of. If any of our friends could furnish us with a French or Italian edition of "The Glories of Mary," we should feel obliged.—(ED.)

action which he performed was to say certain prayers every day to the holy Virgin; and through the mercy of Mary this miserable devotion was the means of saving him from eternal death! Behold how! He had the good fortune of contracting a friendship with Father Matthew de Basso. He pressed this father so much to dine with him on a certain day, that the father, at length, consented; as soon as the father entered the house, the advocate said to him—'Father, I will show you a thing which you never have seen. I have a wonderful ape that does the work of a servant—he washes the glasses, lays the table, and opens the door for me.' 'Perhaps,' replied the father, 'it is not an ape, but something else; let me see it.' The ape is called repeatedly, but does not appear; at length, he is found concealed under a bed, but refuses to come out. 'Let us,' said the religious, 'go and see him.' As soon as he arrived at the place along with the advocate, he said—'Infernal beast, come forward; on the part of God I command you to tell me what you are.' Behold, the ape answered that he was the devil, that he was waiting till the advocate would omit, on some day, his accustomed prayer to the Mother of God; he added, that he had permission from God to strangle him on that day, and to carry him off to hell. At these words the poor advocate fell on his knees, and asked assistance from the servant of God, who encouraged him, and commanded the devil to depart from the house without doing him any harm. 'I only give you permission,' said the religious, 'to make a hole in one of the walls of the house as a sign of your departure.' After these words a loud noise was heard, and in the wall an aperture instantly appeared, which God wished to remain for a long period, though it had been closed several times with lime and stone."—Vol. i., p. 310.

We think we have now proved sufficiently that in order to the efficacy of this devotion to Mary, no repentance is required. This "practice of piety" may be followed by a highwayman or a harlot, by people in the constant exercise of the grossest sin, and yet, while it is persevered in, the devil has no power to hurt, and eventually the grace of contrition is bestowed. If we accept these stories as true, is not St. Liguori's assertion fully proved, that it is morally impossible that a servant of Mary's can be damned? Who would not be willing to take advantage of a means of salvation that does not require one to make, immediately, a painful effort to part with cherished sins, but only to spare a few minutes each day to say a "Hail, Mary." But, alas, the hardness of heart of some people is astonishing. There are some who grudge even this small trouble, and for whom St. Liguori and his coadjutors have been obliged to provide a still easier method of salvation. Without even requiring us to spend some minutes every day in prayer to the Virgin, they teach that it will be sufficient to find a couple of minutes some time or other in our lives, to put on the scapular of Mary in sorrow, and then we may bid defiance to the devil and all his works. Witness the story (vol. ii., p. 245), which we have not space to give entire, of the young man in Perugia, who sold his soul to the devil, by a writing under his hand, signed with his blood, and yet, notwithstanding, the poor devil was cheated; for when he came to obtain fulfilment of his bargain, he found that the young man had on his neck the scapular of Mary in sorrow, and the devil was neither able to persuade the young man to take it off, neither could he carry him to hell with it on; so he had to retire in confusion. And the following story is nearly as conclusive (vol. ii., p. 141):—

"A priest, hearing confession in a certain church, saw standing before him a young man, who appeared to wish and, at the same time, not to wish to go to confession. Looking at him several times, the father, at length, asked him if he wanted to go to confession. He answered in the affirmative; and finding that the confession would be a long one, the confessor brought him to a solitary apartment. The penitent began by saying that he was a foreigner and a nobleman, and that he did not know how God could pardon him after the life he had led. Besides innumerable sins of impurity and homicide, he said that he had entirely despaired of salvation, that he had begun to commit sins, not so much for the indulgence of his passions, as through contempt and hatred of God. He said, that, among other things, he always carried about him a crucifix, which he had maltreated through contempt. He said, that on that morning he made a sacrilegious communion; and for what purpose? In order to have an opportunity of afterwards trampling on the consecrated host. After having received the sacred host he wished to execute his wicked purpose, but was prevented through fear of the persons who were present. He then consigned to the confessor the consecrated particle which he had wrapped up in a paper. He stated, that in passing by the church he felt a strong impulse to enter; being unable to resist it, he went in, was instantly stung with remorse of conscience, and felt a certain confused and irresolute will to go to confession. Hence, he placed himself before the confessional; while he was standing there his confusion and diffidence were so great that he wished to leave the church, but it seemed to him that some one had kept him by force, until the father asked him if he wanted to go to confession. 'I now,' said he, 'see myself here; I find myself at confession, and I know not how.' The father then asked him if he had practised any devotion during this time, meaning devotion towards most holy Mary, for such miraculous conversions only come through the powerful hand of Mary. 'No, father,' replied the young man; 'I have practised no devotion; I regarded myself as already damned.' 'Reflect a little,' added the father, 'and endeavour to remember whether you were not in the habit of performing any act of devotion.' 'No, father,' he replied, 'I have practised none.' But putting his hand on his breast, he perceived that he wore the scapular of Mary in sorrow. 'Ah, sir,' said the confessor, 'do you not see that the Blessed Virgin has obtained this grace for you. Know,' added the father, 'that this is the church of the Virgin.'"

And thus the whole mystery was explained; and the foreign nobleman went away full of gratitude to Mary, and resolved on leading a new life.

We mentioned above that there are two reasons which, to Protestant minds, make the continuance in sin appear very unsafe; one is the power of sin in hardening the heart, so as to make repentance the more unlikely the longer the sinner has persisted in vice; the other reason is, the uncertainty of life, and the danger of our being hurried away from this world without having power to carry our good resolutions into effect. Now, we have seen that the first of these dangers does not exist for those who are persuaded of the truth of St. Liguori's tales. No lengthened continuance of sinful habits throws any impediment in the way of contrition and pardon, if the form, at least, of devotion to the Virgin has been kept up. It remains for us to show how the second of these dangers is also obviated; but our article has run to a considerable length already; and we cannot now afford the room necessary for the additional citations which must be made from St. Liguori, for the reflections which the quotations we have made suggest, and for the consideration of the apologies which have been put forward in defence of the saint. We must, therefore, stop here for the present, but hope to pursue the subject in the next number. And when we have given another article to St. Liguori's devotional writings, we shall then be able to proceed to another topic, on which more than one of our subscribers have expressed a wish for information—namely, the moral theology of the same saint.

THE ROMISH SYSTEM.

[THE following thoughts have been communicated to us by the ex-Abbé Miel, formerly a distinguished Roman Catholic priest in France, and are, we think, highly interesting, as throwing light on the process of mind by which he was led to abandon the Church in which he was brought up. We would have wished to have presented it to our readers also in the original French, being conscious that it loses much of its real force and eloquence in our translation; but we are unable to do so from want of room.—ED.]

It is not merely the monopoly of truth which the Romish Church arrogates to herself, but also that of virtue. Her adherents never admit that any one can sincerely and conscientiously think differently from themselves in religious matters; and to hold back or refuse submission to the authority of Rome is generally, in their eyes, only a sign of pride or perversity. This prejudice, injurious as it is to those against whom it is directed, is also most fatal to those who are its slaves. To seek to dissipate what I believe to be a fatal doctrine, and to show, with God's help, whether it be the partisans of the Romish system or its adversaries, who have reason and conscience for their guide, is the end I have in view in writing the following lines. And, first, let us consider the unheard-of fact, one which has not its parallel in the annals of mankind, and which, therefore, singularly provokes to reflection, that an institution exists among us, of which each member taken singly is only a sinful man like other men, but which institution, nevertheless, gives itself out to be divine, and arrogates to itself the highest attributes of divinity. Addressing itself to every human being who comes into the world, it demands from him homage, fidelity, obedience, love; it says to him, "Come to me, I am the way, out of which you will infallibly go astray. No one comes to the Son, and, consequently, to the Father, except by me. I am the truth, certain, immutable as God himself; out of me there is only uncertainty, darkness, and lies. I am life; I open and shut the springs of it at my will; he who drinks of my waters will live eternally; he who deprives himself of them can only perish. My empire resembles no other; it is the absolute empire of souls. I reign over the intelligence to which I give laws, and impose impassible barriers. I reign over the heart; its most secret movements ought to be revealed to me. I reign over the conscience; I have the power to bind or to absolve it; and this power does not end with the life that now is, it passes the tomb, and extends to another world!" What language is this? Who ever held such before? Yet these are only some of the pretensions of Rome!

Now, in considering these pretensions, we will suppose a wise man, a man sincerely anxious about his eternal destiny! a man to whom salvation is the greatest of all affairs! What should this man do? Should he accept such assertions immediately, without hesitation, without examining them? Such conduct would be the most culpable temerity on his part! If they related to matters of little moment it might pass; one could understand a determination being lightly taken. But the question placed before him is a capital question; it is a question of life or death; error would be fatal—would be damnation. Never was it more indispensable to proceed with caution and with prudence, and not to decide, except with perfect confidence; therefore, the man, who is a sincere friend to truth and duty, will consider himself as rigorously obliged to weigh carefully, to examine strictly, to reflect maturely on these pretensions, before he surrenders himself to them, as his guide through time and eternity.

Well! let him set to work, and he will scarcely have reflected a moment before what appeared only strange, will now appear suspicious. What! will he say to himself, men who give themselves out as having rights over the soul—the soul which is the peculiar province of God! Men who call themselves infallible, when experience has shown, everywhere and always, that human beings are subject to illusion and error, when the Holy Spirit has revealed to us that it is so without exception—"Omnis homo mendax." Men who claim for themselves the special attributes of God! who wish to make themselves equal to the Most High! Was it not a crime of this kind that created hell, and which has flooded the earth with a deluge of evils? Was it not for wishing to become like God that Adam was driven out of the Garden of Eden, and that Lucifer was cast out of Heaven? How much reason have I to fear that men of like passions with myself should act in this matter under the influence of the same spirit of pride, which seduced even the angels of God, and man in a state of innocence. How ought I to be on my guard, and how foolish and criminal should I be to yield up all power over my own soul into the hands of these men, unless they can really prove to me, and that in the most irresistible way, their divine authority! Let them give proofs, therefore, and manifest testimony, which shall exclude all doubt, and prevent any hesitation; without this my adherence to your system cannot be conscientious. These proofs, too, and this testimony, must be of a nature not only to satisfy a fully developed intelligence, but open to the comprehension of mankind in general, and of unlearned minds, otherwise your religion is, at once, convicted of not being the religion of Christ; for it was the poor and the humble, in the first place, that he came to evangelize. Now, does Rome produce such proofs and such testimony? can she furnish them? I do not say a great number of proofs, or even several, but even one—one which can legitimately command the submission of both wise and simple! No, there is not one—Rome produces no proof. She does not even seek to furnish one, but by a new pretension, stranger still than the rest, and truly worthy to crown the others, in assertions so prodigious, and of such importance, Rome expects to be believed on her word!

A man once appeared in the midst of time who did not fear to make this prodigious affirmation—"I am God." This man was JESUS CHRIST, the only Son of the Father, and equal to him in all things. Certainly, if ever any one had a right to be believed on his own assertion, it was the Incarnate Word. So far, also, was this divine assertion, when he made it, from appearing suspicious, that, coming from him, one would be predisposed to admit it. It was enough to contemplate once that august countenance to feel convinced that Jesus was more than man; it was enough to hear one word from his mouth to be able to say, "Never man spake like this man." Well, did the Son of God avail himself of these favourable dispositions to invoke in favour of his divinity, only his own testimony? Let us listen to him and learn!—"If I bear witness of myself my witness is nothing"—that is to say, you ought not to submit to it; but it is my Father who bears witness of me—it is the Scriptures and my works, also, bear witness to me. And, in truth, the Father was heard proclaiming several times from Heaven, "This is my well-beloved Son." Tested by the Scriptures, he showeth himself in all things to be the end of the law—the realization of its figures, as well as the object of its predictions; and his miraculous works attested his divinity in a still more satisfying manner. All infirmities and diseases fled before his face as before the master of health. The dead were raised to life at his voice, as at the voice of the author of life. The sea bowed beneath his feet, as if under the feet of its sovereign. All nature was moved at his approach, as at the approach of its King; and even the devils obey his voice, and are constrained to confess to his supreme power. This was the way in which Jesus Christ proved and confirmed his assertions, and such is the value which He sets upon human reason, the greatest of the gifts which we have received from the liberality of the Creator. Such are the proofs which the incarnate word condescended and thought it right to present to us, before He demanded our adoration, in order that it might be paid him with full faith and love.

And yet, you, poor mortals—as miserable as the rest of mortals—pretend to impose your authority on my soul, without informing me first, if you have any legitimate title to such power. Vainly does the voice of all ages cry out to you that none is permitted to pronounce in their own case. Vainly does eternal truth consecrate the principle, and herself set us the example of it. There exists in the world a society of men who, despising the voice of ages, exalting themselves above the Son of God, repeat loudly and continually, "We bear witness of ourselves and our witness is true. We judge in our own case and every soul ought to submit to our decisions. Woe to those who refuse! Mahomet appealed for the truth of his doctrine to the sword. We appeal for the truth of ours to hell! Mahomet said, 'believe or I kill thee.' Sometimes we say the same, but, generally, do better, and say, 'I believe or be damned!'"

What audacity!

But there is more than audacity in this; there is, also, profound cunning. Rome knows it well. There is nothing more likely to make an impression and lead men than such an assertion, uttered in a form so menacing and absolute. And those who are astonished that the adherents of the Romish system should be so numerous, prove they understand very little of the mystery of human nature.

But question these million subjects of Rome; ask them to give a reason for their belief, and I affirm, that out of a hundred you will find ninty-nine who can only answer, "I believe what the Church tells me, because she says so." And they boast of such credulity, and represent it to us as the perfection of faith, humility, and virtue. Such faith is condemned by common sense; such humility is reproved by conscience; such virtue, it is to be feared, will be treated as a crime by Him who will judge every one of us at the last day.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The great length of Mr. Power's letter has obliged us to postpone one from Mr. W. Rourke till our next. Several other valuable communications, already in type, are also postponed from want of room.

We beg to call the attention of our correspondents to the utility of adding their name and address to their communications.

To diminish the chance of disappointment, all letters should be forwarded to the office by the first day of the month.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

The publishers respectfully request their subscribers to remember that their subscriptions are payable in advance. It is hoped that those who are in arrear will be good enough to remit or pay the amount due, without the necessity of special applications. Where the annual sum is so small as 3s. 6d. per annum, it is impossible to make application in the usual manner without incurring a serious expense in proportion to the sum due. Mr. Curry will, therefore, feel greatly obliged by remittances, and begs to return his grateful thanks to those who were good enough to remit the amount of their subscriptions since the publication of the last number.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, MARCH, 1855.

ROMANISM IN AMERICA.

The subject of the temporal power of the Pope has lately begun to occupy a considerable share of public attention amongst our brethren in the United States. The Tablet newspaper of the 3rd inst., contained a speech delivered on this question by the Hon. J. R. Chandler, in the House of Representatives, on the 11th of January in the present year, which the editor truly describes as "a very able and important speech." As the subject is one of much practical interest, we propose to discuss a few of the arguments and statements which are brought forward by Mr. Chandler. Before doing so, however, we think it well to say a few words on the remarkable change in public opinion which has taken place in America within the last few years, with regard to the position and influence of the Roman Catholic Church in that country. The causes by which this change has been brought about are so singular and instructive, that a brief sketch of them may prove interesting to many of our readers.

During the first half of the present century—that is, up to about the year 1850—the prospects of the Church of Rome in the United States were peculiarly encouraging. There was no established church in that country from which she had any need to fear either rivalry or opposition. In the midst of various religious parties the Roman Catholic Church was almost the only body which possessed the advantages of compact organization and united action. Its numbers were yearly augmented by a steady and continuous stream of immigrants from other countries, especially Germany and Ireland. Even where the people were nominally Protestant, the Roman Catholic priests often met with a favourable reception. In the thinly-peopled districts of the Western States, the settlers in which were often obliged to locate themselves in the depths of untrodden forests, the arrival of any religious teacher was hailed with satisfaction. The Church of Rome, with provident forethought, availed herself of the opportunity thus offered. She planted her priests and missionaries in considerable numbers along the great valley of the Mississippi, which she plainly saw was destined in time to rise into immense importance, and to become, perhaps, the most powerful and influential portion of the great Confederacy of the West.

All these causes, combined with others which it would be needless to specify, daily augmented the influence of the Roman Catholic Church and priesthood in America. Their aid was eagerly sought after by politicians of all parties, who hoped, by their means, to rise to distinction. In a country where almost every place is given away by universal suffrage, it is no wonder that unscrupulous men, who desired to gain "the most sweet voices" of the multitude, should naturally have recourse to the Romish priests, who were supposed, rightly or wrongly, to have the votes and consciences of a large part of the electoral body in their keeping. No means of flattery or conciliation were left untried to win their favour and support. A Roman Catholic archbishop was asked to preach before Congress, although the overwhelming majority of that body were Protestants; and, in the state of New York, a judge laid down from the bench the rule, that a priest was not to be interrogated about the secrets of the confessional (a principle then quite new to American law), with the hope, as was generally supposed, of thereby gaining the vote of the Roman Catholic party at the next election for the governorship of that state.

At length the ambition of the Romanist party in America took a higher and a wider flight. The love of power and influence is deeply implanted in the heart of man; and the priests of the Church of Rome, cut off by the stern policy of their Church from all family ties, have generally devoted their untiring energies to projects of worldly aggrandisement. The Roman Catholic party, which had hitherto been content to turn the balance in some local contest, now sought to exercise a controlling influence in the presidential election itself. The nomination of Franklin Pierce, the existing President of the United States, is generally supposed to have been carried by their instrumentality; and the effect of it certainly was, to introduce a large number of Roman Catholics into the public offices which were in the gift of the President.

At last, however, the reaction came. The native Americans took alarm when they saw many of the chief offices of the state conferred upon persons of foreign birth, and members of a Church which owed allegiance to a foreign spiritual head. Suddenly it began to be whispered that a secret confederacy had been formed, under the singular title of the Know-Nothing party, the members of which had bound themselves by an oath never to vote for any Roman Catholic. With magical rapidity this new association diffused itself through the length and breadth of the United States, and by the latest accounts it was reputed to include two millions of adult members. History scarcely records an instance of an organization formed with such rapidity, and on such a gigantic scale.

The principal argument by which, so far as we can learn, the Know-Nothing party justify their proceedings is one which has often been urged in our country, both in Parliament and elsewhere—namely, that as a Roman Catholic is bound to obey the Pope, he can never give an undivided allegiance to the constitutional authorities of his native land. The speech of Mr. Chandler, to which we have already adverted, is an elaborate attempt to show that this argument does not rest on sufficient historical grounds. We now proceed to consider a few of his assertions in detail, and we begin by giving the general statement of the question in his own words:—

"The charge, then, against the Roman Catholics of this country is, that their views of the supremacy of the Pope render them unsafe citizens, because it renders them liable to be withdrawn from their allegiance to their own civil government by the decrees or ordinances of their spiritual superior."

Let us now see how Mr. Chandler proposes to meet this charge:—

"Mr. Chairman, I deny that the Bishop of Rome has, or that he claims for himself the right to interfere with the political relations of any other country than that of which he is himself the sovereign. I mean, that I deny to the Bishop of Rome the right resulting from his divine office to interfere in the relations between subjects and their sovereigns. I recognise all the rights of the venerable head of the Church to the spiritual deference of its children."

Now, with all respect to Mr. Chandler, we consider that Cardinals Bellarmine and Baronius are better authorities than he is on the power and privileges claimed by the See of Rome; and it is a remarkable fact that both Cardinals stigmatize as heretical the opinion advocated by the American orator. We quote, as usual, their express words:

"They are branded for heretics who take from the Church of Rome and the See of Saint Peter one of the two swords, and allow only the spiritual."*

So far Cardinal Baronius. Let us now hear Bellarmine:—

"The next opinion, or rather heresy, teaches that the Pope, as Pope, has by divine right no temporal power, and that he has no right to command temporal princes, much less any power of depriving them of their kingdoms."†

We commend the following passages, from the the same author, to Mr. Chandler's attentive consideration:—

"The third and intermediate opinion, and that which is generally received by Catholic theologians, is this—That the Pope, as Pope, has not directly and immediately any temporal, but only a spiritual power; that, nevertheless, by reason of this spiritual power, he has a certain authority, and that supreme, in temporals." "That the power of the Pontiff, properly, chiefly, and in itself, is spiritual; but that by it he can dispose of the temporal things of all Christians, when such a measure is necessary to the end of his spiritual power; to which the ends of all temporal powers are subordinate." "He has no power merely temporal; and yet, in order to a spiritual good, he has the supreme power of disposing of temporal things." "The spiritual power does not interfere in the temporal concerns; but suffers all things to proceed so long as they do not oppose the spiritual end, or be not necessary to obtain it. But if anything of this sort occurs, the spiritual can and ought to coerce the temporal, by any way or means which may appear necessary."‡

It is a remarkable circumstance, that the opinions of Bellarmine on the extent of the Papal power, extravagant as they may appear to us, failed to satify Pope Sixtus V. He thought, we are told, that Bellarmine had done a great prejudice to the dignity of the See of Rome, by insisting that the power of the Pope over the tem-poralities of kings was not direct, but only indirect; upon which account Bellarmine's treatise "de Romano Pontifice," was placed among the prohibited books.* If Sixtus V. thought the opinions of Bellarmine did not go far enough, what would he have thought of Mr. Chandler?

We must proceed, however, to the consideration of his next statement:—

"Dr. Kenrick, Archbishop of Baltimore, one of the most learned of the Roman Catholic Church, asserts positively, that the temporal power, of which we speak, was never claimed by the Church, and he challenges the production of a single decree or definition in which the power was propounded as an article of faith."

We fear that Mr. Chandler must have relied on the ignorance of his auditory, when he made this assertion. We will merely quote, in reply, a short extract from the famous Extravagant of Pope Boniface VIII., entitled "Unam Sanctam," which is inserted in the Canon Law:—

"It is necessary that one sword should be under another, and that the temporal authority should be subject to the spiritual power. And thus the prophecy of Jeremiah is fulfilled in the Church and the ecclesiastical power, 'Behold, I have set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, to build, and to plant!' Therefore, if the earthly power go astray, it must be judged by the spiritual power; but if the spiritual power go astray, it must be judged by God alone. Moreover, we declare, say, define, and pronounce it to be altogether necessary to salvation that every human creature should be subject to the Roman Pontiff."†

It is almost a waste of words to comment on a statement so plain and unambiguous as this. Boniface VIII. distinctly asserts that it is necessary to salvation for every human being to be subject to the Pope; and what the limits of this subjection are, is evident from the preceding clauses, where he claims a rightful authority over every temporal power, without any limitation or qualification whatever. The Pope founds his claim, moreover, on a passage of Scripture, which speaks of "pulling down, destroying, and overturning nations and kingdoms." Words have no meaning if the claim of the Pope to temporal power is not here propounded as an article of faith.

The definition of the Papal power, laid down by Boniface VIII., has the advantage (of a greater than which no Papal decree is capable) of being expressly confirmed by one of the general councils of the Roman Church. "We," says Pope Leo X., in his Bull, read and passed in the fifth Lateran Council, "do renew and approve that holy constitution, with approbation of the present holy council."‡ Accordingly, Melchior Canus writes: "The Lateran Council did renew and approve the Extravagant of Boniface."§ And Baronius referring to it, says, that "all do assent to it, so that none dissenteth who does not by discord fall from the Church."‖

The multiplied instances recorded in history, in which the Popes actually exerted the power of deposing princes, and releasing subjects from their allegiance, leave us in no doubt whatever regarding the real nature and extent of the authority which Boniface VIII., as we have seen, claimed as an article of faith. It was impossible for Mr. Chandler to avoid this glaring difficulty; and we were curious to see how he would dispose of it. His own statement is as follows:—

"But I shall, of course, be asked whence the boldness of the assertion against Roman Catholics, and whence the readiness to believe the charges, if they are altogether unfounded? Has not the Pope exercised the power of deposing monarchs, and thus of releasing subjects from their allegiance?"

Now for Mr. Chandler's reply, which has, at least, the merit of originality. We give it in his own words:—

"The Christian princes conferred upon the Pope a power which previously he had not attempted to exercise; never, indeed, claimed to possess. The temporal power was conceded—was conferred by the Emperor and Christian princes—not to aggrandize the Bishop of Rome, but to enable him to decide betwixt them in their various disputes."

With all deference to Mr. Chandler, we must protest against this gross perversion of the plain facts of history. "The temporal power (of deposing princes) was conferred by the Emperor and Christian princes upon the Pope!" We ask, when was this done? History is entirely silent. "The Pope never claimed to possess the temporal power!" Again we refer to the Extravagant of Boniface VIII. Positive assertions, such as those of Mr. Chandler, are of little avail, except with persons who are ready to believe without any proof or argument at all.

Where was the "consent of the Emperor and Christian princes" when Hildebrand deposed the Emperor Henry IV.? Or, if we want an example nearer our own times, let us read the preamble of the Bull of Excommunication which Pope Pius V. pronounced against Queen Elizabeth. It was as follows:—

"He that reigneth on high, to whom is given all power in heaven and in earth, committed one Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church (out of which there is no salvation) to one only upon earth—namely, St. Peter, the prince of the apostles, and to Peter's successor, the Bishop of Rome, to be governed in fulness of power. Him alone he made prince over all people and all kingdoms, to pluck up, consume, scatter, destroy, plant, and build up.

"We do, out of the fulness of our apostolic power, declare the aforesaid Elizabeth, being a heretic, and a favourer of heretics, and her adherents, to have incurred the sentence of anathema, and to be cut off from the unity of the body of Christ. And, moreover, we do declare her to be DEPRIVED of her pretended title to the KINGDOM aforesaid, and of ALL DOMINION, dignity, and privilege whatsoever."*

Here we see that the Pope claims to derive his power to depose a queen, not from any supposed consent of Christian princes, but directly from God himself. He relies, like Boniface VIII., on the passage from the Prophet Jeremiah, and he declares that his acts proceed "out of the fulness of our apostolic power." This Bull of Pius V. effectually disposes of Mr. Chandler's ingenious theory, that the Pope, poor man, had the burden of this weighty responsibility thrust on him by the Emperor and others, for their own convenience and advantage. Mr. Chandler must, certainly, bring forward much more cogent and subtle arguments, if he hopes effectually to subdue the deep-rooted hostility which his countrymen have conceived against the encroachments of a foreign power.

In fact, the dilemma to which a sincere and honest Roman Catholic is reduced is this—"I believe the Pope to be infallible. Pope Boniface VIII. and others have repeatedly claimed, as of apostolic and divine right, the power to depose princes, and they have repeatedly exercised this power. Either, therefore, I must believe that Pope Pius IX. now possesses this power, or I must believe that Popes have erred; and, consequently, that they are not infallible." We see no answer to this argument.

Moreover, Roman Catholics universally acknowledge that the Pope's commands in spiritual matters are to be obeyed. But who is to decide what are spiritual and what are temporal things? If Bellarmine's comparison be true, that the spiritual power is like the soul, and the temporal power like the body, it is plain that the influence of the latter is reduced to very narrow limits indeed.* If the mind decides upon going one way, and the body another, it is easy to foretell in what direction the man will go.

The spiritual power in the hands of the Church of Rome pretends to rest upon a divine appointment, which is subject to no accident, and can undergo no change nor diminution. It works by the most powerful considerations upon the consciences and affections of men; it calls upon its subjects to obey upon pain of damnation; it promises heaven and threatens hell; which upon some men have an infinite sway—upon all men a considerable influence. The State can only grant temporal rewards, or inflict temporal punishments; but the priest can evoke the hopes and fears connected with a never-ending eternity. He has continual opportunities of conversing with men; he can insinuate and suggest the obligation to obedience with the greatest advantage—in secresy, in the tenderest seasons, in the moments of greatest weakness, in the trying hour of dissolution. Can we wonder, therefore, if mankind, in all ages, have looked with distrust and aversion upon the inordinate powers which the Church of Rome claims to exercise over the minds and consciences of free-born, intelligent men?

RECENT CONTROVERSY AT BOULOGNE.

Dr. M.—Your next testimony is Irenæus, and your argument is, that as he says "to this Church, on account of its superior headship, all others must have recourse," therefore, the Church or Bishop of Rome must be infallible, and have supreme jurisdiction over all other Churches. The words of Irenæus, and the purpose for which he used them, not only do not bear out your inference, but, moreover, directly oppose it. Irenæus was, in the work from which you quote, writing against heretics. One argument which he uses against them is—the consent of Catholic and Apostolic Churches. All these, he says, agree in doctrine. But since it would be irksome to enumerate all, he selects one as the type of such consent—the Church of Rome. The reason for this selection was quite clear. That Church was the only Western Church of known apostolic origin. It was founded, as Irenæus declares, by Peter and Paul, and not, as your writers (contending for the pontifical inheritance of Peter's presumed privileges) say, by Peter alone. It was the Church whose faith, spoken of by the Apostle Paul, continued in its purity while Irenæus wrote, as notorious as it was pure. It was the greatest city of the world. Hence this writer selects it, and he plainly could select no other Western Church, as the type of catholic consent, and proof of catholic doctrine among the Churches of the West. Now if, as you assert, Irenæus held the infallibility and jurisdiction of the Roman Church, is it possible that he would have passed by such a means of proving his case against heretics? His argument must have been this—the Church of Rome is infallible; your doctrine opposes hers, therefore, you are clearly convicted of error; or, she has supreme jurisdiction; you resist her, therefore, you are an enemy to the truth. Manifestly, if this writer held the doctrine which you make him to have held, he must, unless he had neither reason nor memory, have urged it in that case where it was just the fact which, if it existed, must have decided the dispute. Not only does Irenæus not do this, but he does use an argument inconsistent with the supposition that he was acquainted with the doctrine you ascribe to him. Why does he give, as his reason for specializing one Church—the Roman—"that it would be irksome to enumerate all?" Why does he not say, as he must have said, if he held, as you assert, your modern doctrine—"It is allowed, and not to be denied, that the Church of Rome has an authority which can never err, and must never be resisted; submit to her," &c. His argument is not so. It is this—all Catholic and Apostolic Churches agree in doctrine; hence it is, as it would be impossible to enumerate them all, sufficient to select that one whose faith is as notorious as it is true. All agree with this Church, for there is a catholic consent of doctrine, and Rome is the type of this consent; therefore, you, heretics, oppose the truth in differing from her. Nay, more, the argument used by Irenæus enables us to determine what he did not mean—and this is all I want in order to refute your inference—by the words "superior headship." Whatever he meant by them, it is certain he did not mean to include, under the circumstances which justified that title, either infallibility or supreme jurisdiction, because, if he had, he never would have destroyed the strong argument which he might have founded, and must have founded upon them, if they existed, by giving, as a reason for selecting the Church of Rome, not this infallibility, not this jurisdiction over the whole Church, but the irksomeness of enumerating all Churches. The common accordancy of doctrine among all Churches is the fact upon which he bases his refutation of heretics. The fact upon which, if it existed, he must have based it, would, of necessity be the infallibility of the Roman Church. Particular qualifications, conveyed by the expression "superior headship,"* contain his reasons for selecting the Church of Rome as being, among Western Churches, the best, and the admitted exponent of that faith. But among those qualifications indicated by that phrase, it is impossible Irenæus can be understood to have included (what was, indeed, utterly unheard of in his age) either the infallibility or jurisdiction of that Church, because his argument then must have been—Rome is infallible, yield to her; and not what it is—since it is irksome to enumerate all Churches, I select Rome! You seem quite to have forgotten that Irenæus does, on another occasion, let us into his views upon the matter of pontifical jurisdiction. You forget his letter to Pope Victor, in which, though agreeing with him upon the matter in debate, he severely rebukes his unchristian arrogance in attempting to force his opinion on the Eastern bishops.

A clear witness to the meaning of Irenæus, and against the Church of Rome, is Tertullian, who uses exactly the same argument, and on the same occasion, with the Bishop of Lyons. He refutes heretics from the consent of the Catholic and Apostolic Church, which consists of the several Churches in union with each other. He takes the leading Church of each country as the type of such consent. Irenæus was a western bishop, and, therefore, selects Rome. The African's argument is wider, but just the same in principle. The Apostolic Churches echo the voice, and represent the dignity of their founders. "Is Achaia near you? You have Corinth. If you be not far from Macedonia, you have Philippi, you have Thessalonica. If you go into Asia, you have Ephesus; but if you be proximate to Italy, you have Rome."

Can anything be more clear than this argument? All churches agree in doctrine. It is tedious to enumerate them separately. Take, then, those founded by Apostles as types of others—Corinth, Philippi, Thessalonica, Ephesus, Rome. You can appeal, as you are nearer, to any of these; the faith of all is one; it came from their apostolic founders. Why does Tertullian mention Rome simply, as he mentions other apostolic Churches? Why does he not say—"Appeal to Rome—she is infallible—she has supreme jurisdiction—she has the right to decide, and to require implicit obedience?" Why does he use a weak argument?—for his, though intrinsically good, must be relatively weak, if he possessed a better, and one which, if true, he could not have overlooked? Why does he use the same argument as Irenæus?—the common consent of all churches, and not the infallibility and jurisdiction of one? Simply because he could not use what neither he, nor any one of his time had ever heard of. The doctrines were innovations of a subsequent period.]

Your next authority is from the fourth century. Optatus, of Milevis, who says—"You cannot deny that St. Peter, the chief of the apostles, established an episcopal chair at Rome. This chair was one that all might preserve unity by the union which they had with it; so that whosoever sets up a chair against it, should be a schismatic and an offender."

I think it may safely be said, even of the strongest passages which you bring, that they fall utterly short of establishing what you are required to prove. How is it that you can never, and do never, bring forward an extract from any accredited early writer which plainly states your doctrines. Take Optatus, though he is but a sorry witness. He wrote against the Donatists, whom he shows to be schismatics. Is it not striking, that he, too, should be silent upon the infallibility and the jurisdiction of the Roman Church? How can you account for the systematic silence of all the early writers on these doctrines, when writing upon the very subjects which must have necessitated their mention, if they were really allowed? Heretics and schismatics were just the offenders to be answered and condemned by them. Yet, in no one instance can you produce the proof that they were so refuted. It is wonderful that you, who so continuously assert that all the Fathers held your doctrines, cannot adduce a single clear statement from any one among them to justify the assertion. You always make inferences, but never give plain, unmistakeable quotations. You invent interpretations, instead of translating passages. You create a sense, but do not discover it, which sense no one, who had not a purpose to serve, could ever find in the extracts you bring. Why does not Optatus say at once, if he believed—and he must so have believed if your inference from his words be correct—"The Church of Rome is infallible; the Bishop of Rome has supreme authority over the whole Church of Christ." He does not say these things; and why? Because as, if he believed them, he must have said them, so his silence, with that of all other writers, proves that he did not believe what neither he nor they had ever heard of. His argument is this—"You, Donatists, claim to be the true Church. How can this be? There is union in the true Church. This you have broken therefore, you cannot be it. He particularizes Rome as evidence of such union. But what does he state to be the bond of union between it and other Churches? Was it infallibility? Was it a co-acted submission to an irresistible jurisdiction? No such thing. He speaks of "Damasus (Bishop of Rome), now our colleague, by whose means all the Churches of the world are united with us, keeping correspondence by circular letters." A very just idea of union. There was communion among other Christian Churches and that of Rome, through the Pontiff, by circular letters. Whoever broke such union was a schismatic. The Donatists set up their own bishops (and, as we know, made but little count of the Roman Pontiff), and, in so doing, proved themselves to be schismatics.

[Whatever opinion Optatus had, it cannot be worth much. The man who, among other strange sayings, founded a proof that Peter was head of the Apostles, upon the name Cephas, which, in his view, was derived from the Greek word κεφαλη (head), cannot be one whose judgment is entitled to much respect. Such good cause is there for distinguishing between the opinions of some among the Fathers, and their depositions to facts.

In Optatus, as earlier in Cyprian, may be discovered the germ of the error of which the Papacy, in after-years, became the full development. That great error, which lays undue stress upon the objective or visible aspect of union; first, to the disparagement and depression, then to the extinction of union, through communion of doctrine, heart, correspondence, &c. This evil culminated in the Papacy. Augustine stands out as the strong opponent of this sad declension from Christian purity. Not directly, as the evil was not then apparent; but indirectly, from his Christian view of the Christian Church. He deals, by anticipation, heavy blows against modern papacy. Take, for instance, his explanation of the reason why Simon was called Peter. Romanist writers, of course, now say it was by way of anticipation, referred to the Church subsequently to be founded upon him as "the rock;" but, according to this eminent man, because Peter was himself founded on Christ, "the rock"—and so, in other instances.]

Your last witness is Jerome, who thus writes—"I am following no other than Christ, united to the communion of your Holiness—that is, to the Chair of Peter; I know that the Church is founded upon that rock; whoever eateth the Lamb out of that house is a profane man; whoever is not in the ark shall perish by the flood."

Now, take this passage as it stands. What does it prove? Infallibility, or supreme jurisdiction over the whole Church? Nothing of the sort. It proves simply, in Jerome's view, strongly attached as he was to Rome, the indispensability of union with the Church of Rome, as then constituted, as then undefiled by its subsequent perversions and corruptions of that faith once held by this Church in its purity. Many early writers held very decided opinions on the necessity of union among all Christian Churches, which their contests with schism increased. Rome naturally stood out among western Churches as the symbol and centre of such union. But what you never attempt to prove is just what you are called on to prove, and that is, that these writers agree in asserting that the reason why the Church of Rome becomes thus specialised is, because she alone was infallible, or because her Pontiff alone had a supremacy of power over all other Churches. Other reasons are given, but these, which are what you undertook to show, never.

You take certain extracts, and force the meaning which you want upon them. Nothing can be more easy than to show, by extracts from the same writers, that they did not hold the opinions you ascribe to them.

In point of fact, it would be quite easy, by producing other extracts from the same writers, to neutralise completely any passages you produce, even allowing your own interpretation of them. If these writers meant anything like what you assert they did, because of the passages you produce, they must be men so unstable in judgment, and so uncertain in expression, as wholly to destroy their value as testimony; because in other passages, they make it very clear that they held no such views. But if these doctrines were of the notoriety and universality you claim for them, they would have been stated without ambiguity or exception.

You assert your peculiar doctrines to have been held by all writers. Nothing less than universal consent will, because you have asserted such, prove your case. Hence you leave us an easy task, to overthrow the claims by producing an opposing witness. Any one of credit will suffice, since you assert an universal consent in your favour, to upset your case.

I take, for instance, St. Ambrose, what are his words? "Peter exercised a primacy of confession, not of honour; a primacy of faith, not of order." You assert the direct reverse of this in your modern doctrine of pontifical supremacy.

Mr. Gretton subsequently replied. I prefer giving his answer in the words of the account published by my opponents. "On referring to the passage from St. Ambrose, quoted by the Dr., his real words were found to be, that, on being interrogated by Christ, Peter exercised (egit) a primacy of confession and of faith, not of honour and order, which he HAD NOT YET RECEIVED."

Dr. M.—From what edition of Ambrose are you quoting? The last words are an interpolation.

[The reader will perceive that St. Ambrose makes completely against the Roman Catholic claim, if the last words be not genuine. Now, in order to show how the writings of Ambrose have been dealt with, I shall first adduce the testimony of the Roman Catholic historian, Dupin. I shall then give the genuine passage as given by the celebrated Roman Catholic authorities, the Benedictine editors of the writings of the Fathers.

First, with respect to the liberties taken with Ambrose, Dupin thus speaks—"The works of St. Ambrose, above all the other Fathers, have been most corrupted in the ordinary editions. The Roman edition, from which those that followed after were made, instead of restoring the text of this Father, hath rendered it more faulty in many places, by the liberty which the supervisors of that edition took, of making alterations in it of their own authority. In this edition the works were in great confusion, without order and without distinction of what was genuine, and what was superstitious, &c."—Eccl. His. vi., art. St. Ambrose. Now—in order to show that the words—"which he had not yet received," upon which the Roman Catholic claim rests, and without which it is expressly denied by Ambrose, are one of "the corruptions," we have only to consult the Benedictine edition, where they are omitted as being spurious. The passage is as follows—"(Petrus) ubi audivit: vos autem quid me dicitis? Statim loci non immemor sui primatum egit: primatum confessionis utique non honoris, primatum fidei non culminis."—De Incarn., cap. iv.

Thus it appears that the words, "which he had not yet received," have been fraudulently added to the statement of Ambrose, which, without these words, directly oppose the Roman Catholic claims of primacy for Peter.]

Again, it is so notorious that the title or power of universal bishop was not allowed to the Roman Pontiff, that the first person who assumed it was a Bishop of Constantinople, not of Rome. The Roman Pontiff, Gregory, wrote to the Emperor, urging upon him to suppress this assumption, and declaring it, among other objections, to savour of the spirit of Antichrist.

Mr. Gretton gave the following answer. I quote from the "Resume":—"In the context of the letter, St. Gregory explains his meaning by these very words addressed to John, 'having despised thy brethren thou desirest to be the sole bishop in existence,' and in this sense he adds that such a title would be blasphemy, as it would subvert the whole divine right of episcopacy."

Dr. M.—Gregory objects against the assumption of the title, because it did convey such arrogant pretension, as to subvert the right of episcopacy. The claim, he says, did that. But it was not, as you say, that he only objected against the assumption of the title by a Bishop of Constantinople, for he adds, no Bishop of Rome had ever taken it, and ought not to do so. The title of universal bishop had been offered to Pope Leo, and he refused it, "lest by giving something peculiar to one bishop only, they should take away the rights which belong to all bishops."

* In order to show still more fully the weakness of the Roman Catholic argument, founded on the expression, "superior headship," it must be remembered that we do not know what Irenæus really said. The original is not extant. We have only what the Roman Catholic historian, Dupin, terms "a very barbarous version" of the work, from whence the passage under consideration has been taken. Until we know the original, the argument of our adversaries, such as it is, rests on the fidelity with which the words, "propter potentiorem principalitatem," of "a very barbarous version" represent the original; which may have been either ικανωτέραν πρωτιάν, or αρχαιοτητα, instead of πρωτιαν; neither expression would prove the Roman Catholic claim. But, whatever may have been the original, we have, as it fairly appears, the reasons given by Irenæus which induced him to apply the words "potentiorem principalitatem" to this Church. For he speaks of it as "maximæ et antiquissimæ et omnibus cognitæ, a gloriosissimis duobus apostolis, Petro et Paulo, Romæ fundatæ." Moreover, when it said, "to this Church every other must have recourse—that is, the faithful in all countries"—it is to be observed on this translation. The word must is the translation of "necesse," which is not the translation of the Greek δει—this would have required oportet. The original, if the Latin be correct, was, therefore, αναγκη. Hence, Irenæus did not mean to say there was a moral obligation on all other churches to conformity with Rome. He clearly means to state the circumstance which warranted him in making this Church the type of consent among churches. "With this Church, on account of its more important pre-eminence (the reasons for such pre-eminence having been assigned, without mention either of infallibility or jurisdiction), all believers must agree, of course." Still more strongly against Roman infallibility are the concluding words, wroogly translated thus—"in which Church is preserved the doctrine delivered by the Apostles," but truly, "has been preserved by believers from all places" (therefore, not by an infallible judge): or, perhaps, as Gieseler more truly, because of what follows, renders it, "has been always preserved in correspondence with believers in all places." Thus we see how far Irenæus is from supporting the modern claims of the Roman Church.

ON PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—1. I again assert that prayers and sacrifice are offered for the dead by the Catholic Church for another purpose, besides that of getting the soul out of Purgatory; but I deny that this admission contradicts, even by implication, the doctrine of Purgatory. 2. I, moreover, respectfully submit, that the word commemorate, as used in any passage by St. Cyril, with respect to prayers for the dead, instead of destroying, establishes, beyond dispute, the distinction between prayers for the saints, and those for the other dead. St. Cyril's words, which I shall transcribe where necessary, will test the accuracy of this assertion. He says—Δεομεθα σου παντες ημεις, και ταυτην προσφερομεν σοι την θυσιαν, ινα μνημονευωμεν και των προκεκοιμημενων, πρωτον Πατριαρχων, Προφητων, Αποστολων, Μαρτυρων, οπως ο Θεος ευχαις αυτων και πρεσβειαις προσδεξηται ημων την δεησιν. "We all beseech Thee, and we offer this sacrifice to Thee, that, in the first place, we may commemorate the patriarchs, the prophets, Apostles, and martyrs, who are dead, that God, through their prayers and intercessions, may receive our supplications." St. Cyril continues—ειτα και υπερ των προκεκοιμημενων αγιων Πατερων και Επισκοπων, και παντων απλως των εν ημιν προκεκοιμημενων, μεγιστην ονησιν πιστευοντες εσεσθαι ταις ψυχαις υπερ ων η δεησις αναφερεται, της αγιας και φρικοδεστατης προκειμενης θυσιας. "Next we beseech Thee, and we offer this sacrifice to Thee, for our deceased holy Fathers and bishops, and, in fine, for all our departed, believing that the souls receive great advantage, for whom supplication is offered up in the celebration of the holy and tremendous sacrifice." The idea of commemoration, suggested by the first passage, is perfectly limited and independent of that in the second passage. In the former, the word μνημονευωμεν, is applied exclusively to the patriarchs, &c., for the purpose of invoking God through their prayers and intercession; in fact, the natural structure of the discourse prohibits the application of it to the dead alluded to in the second passage; for these the commemoration is, Δεομεθα σου παντες ημεις και ταυτην προσφερομεν σοι την θυσιαν υπερ των προκεκοιμημενων, &c., &c., to the end of the second passage given above; and thus far, the distinction is self-evident and incontrovertible.

3. The holy Father next tells his neophytes he will explain for them, by an example, the advantage which arises to those for whom supplication is offered, υπερ ων η δεησις αναφερεται; "for many say, what benefit is it to a soul departed this life, either with sins or without them, to be commemorated in this sacrifice? But tell me, I say, if a king had driven into banishment some persons who had offended him, and their friends supplicating, should present a crown of great value, might not the king, by that means, grant a pardon to the guilty persons?" He continues to explain for them, that, "after the same manner that they supplicate the king to seek pardon for their friends, so do we offer our supplications to God for those that are dead, if they be sinners; we do not propose a crown, but we offer Christ slain, for our sins, propitinting, both for them (the dead) and for us, Him who is so beneficent." κατα αυτον τροπον και ημεις υπερ των κεκοιμημενων αυτω τας δεησεις προσφεροντες, καν αμαρτωλοι ωσιν, ου στεφανον πλεκομεν, αλλα Χριστον εσφαγιασμενον υπερ των ημετερων αμαρτηματων προσφερομεν, εξιλασουμενοι υπερ αυτων και ημων τον φιλανθρωπον.—Catech. Mystag. v., page 38. This last passage affords very important and decisive evidence of the practice of prayers and sacrifice, at that time offered by the Church, for the relief of the dead, to obtain pardons for them, &c.

"If they (the dead) be sinners," or "though they be sinners," applied antithetically with respect to the patriarchs, &c., &c., "we offer supplications for them"—τας δεησεις προσφεροντες; "we offer Christ slain"—Χριστον εσφαγιασμενον (thus, he names the sacrifice of the altar), to propitiate God for them, to make atonement, to obtain pardon, alike for the dead and the living, as members of the same body; thus confirming the distinction already noticed, and vindicating the practice of praying for the relief of the dead from the objections of those who questioned its efficacy, and who, contrary to what you assert, are ranked among heretics. For Aerius, on this account, is set down for a heretic by St. Augustine, Lib. de Hær liii., &c., where he says of him—"he taught private opinions of his own, saying, 'that we must not pray or offer sacrifice for the dead;'" and, in the same manner, he is numbered in the list of heretics by St. Epiphanius, Hær. lxxv., &c.

4. Thus, in the fourth century, we find the Church virtually inculcating, "that there is a Purgatory, and that the souls there detained are relieved by the prayers of the faithful, but, chiefly, by the acceptable sacrifice of the altar."—Conc. Trid., Sess. xxv., de Purgatorio. I showed in my last letter, that this doctrine is supported by the authority of all the ancient liturgies; and 5. I quoted a passage from the Liturgy of St. James, as old a form of offering for the dead as any to be found in the world, in which it is positively stated, that the sacrifice was offered to supplicate repose, relief, rest, from pain, torment, &c., "for the souls of the departed." I proved that this was the doctrine of the Church in the 2nd and 3rd centuries; and, hence, we find the essential doctrine of Purgatory supported by a respectable antiquity, and claiming the title of immemorial prescription; and, at a much later period, we find a strict corroboration of this doctrine in the first Liturgy of the Church of England, declared by an act of parliament to have been framed by inspiration of the Holy Ghost: here we have a prayer for the departed, that "God would grant them mercy and everlasting peace."—Collier's Ecc. Hist., vol. ii., page 257. 6. Your cavils with respect to the opinion of St. Augustine are an odd sort of argument; let him defend himself. He says—"when we offer the sacrifice of the altar, or give alms for all the faithful departed, they are acts of thanksgiving for the truly good—they are propitiations for those not very bad—and though they are no helps to those that are very bad, they are some consolation to the living." Cum ergo sacrificia, sive altaris, sive quarumcunque eleemosynarum pro baptizatis defunctis omnibus offeruntur; pro valde bonis gratiarum actiones sunt; pro non valde malis, propitiationes sunt; pro valde malis, etsi nulla sunt adjumenta mortuorum, qualescunque vivarum consolationes sunt.—Enchirid, cap. cx., page 238. Now, I challenge you, if you can, to repeat your question—"might we not as well pray for the devil?" I stated nothing but what is consonant to the opinion expressed in the above passage, and I maintain, it is an ample justification of the practices of Rome that they are not worse than this.

7. You say—"we find no fault with those who think it likely" that the saints in heaven pray for us; but you add—"it is a very different matter when we are told that we must pray to them," &c.; "and this is exactly what St. Cyril does not say in this passage;" and allow me to remark, for your information, that this, too, is exactly what the Catholic Church does not say or teach. Christianity obliges us no more to desire the prayers of the saints, than it obliged St. Paul to desire the prayers of the Christians.—Rom. xv. 30, 31; Eph. vi. 19; Heb. xiii. 18., &c.

And I now call upon you to show, upon the authority of any orthodox standard of Catholic doctrines, or of any approved exposition of Catholic principles, a positive law of the Catholic Church, by which it is expressly stated "that we must pray to them." This, as a journalist, you owe to the public, whom you may have misled, by asserting that we (Catholics) must pray to the saints; you owe it to me as an individual engaged in the defence of Catholic truth. And, if you cannot refer to any authentic source, as I am confident you cannot, you cannot refuse us to decline the honour of subscribing to a creed, such as you think proper to frame for us. Let our real principles be fairly admitted, not these fictitious forms of credenda, these caricatures of Catholic belief, and I feel confident you will be quite unable to refute them.

8. The Council of Trent will afford you no assistance, except in the emboweled and decapitated form that you cited it in CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. iii., p. 71, col. 1. You complain of the terms in which I treat your citation; you say—"you had no intention to misrepresent Roman Catholic doctrines," &c.; and "we cited, of course, merely as much as was necessary to elucidate our purpose." Now, I ask you, was not the subject discussed by you, "The Invocation of Saints?" and the garbled quotation was necessary to elucidate your purpose! Hence, it plainly follows, that though there was "no intention to misrepresent Roman Catholic doctrines or the Council of Trent," the very elucidation has degenerated into a flagrant misrepresentation. I do not consider I have used a word disrespectfully. The cause of truth requires plain, open dealing—no suppression of facts, no distortion of evidence. We are assured that the Church in the third and fourth centuries, believed that the saints in heaven prayed for their brethren on earth. 9. On the evidence of St. Cyril we learn, that the Church offered to God, through the saints, their supplications, both for the living and the dead; they held them to be mediators of prayers and intercessions; the liturgies and the Fathers afford joint evidence in this case.

10. This holy patriarch also says—"we offer Christ sacrificed to make atonement to God, to propitiate him, to beg mercy," &c., as expressed by the word εξιλεουμενοι, for the dead, if they be sinners;" καν αμαρτωλοι ωσιν, or, "even if they be sinners;" this sacrifice he, a little before, called η θυτια εκεινη τον ιλασμον—the very victim of atonement. You cite the words—"when we taste, we are bidden to taste not bread and wine, but the SIGN of the body and blood of Christ;" and you say—"this is a way of speaking, that no Roman Catholic ever uses," &c.; but in this, I venture to tell you, you are mistaken. The Catholic believes that the outward sacramental appearances of bread and wine, which still remain after consecration, are not only a sign and a memorial of Christ, but also of the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist. We are bidden to taste not bread and wine, but the antitypes, &c.; hence, it plainly follows, that the antitypes, or sacramental elements, were not believed to be bread and wine; but that "in the type of bread the body is given to thee, and in the type of wine the blood is given"—εν τυπῳ αρτου διδοται σοι το σωμα, και εν τυπῳ οινου, διδοται σοι το αιμα; and, that what appears to be bread, is not bread, though it be taken by the taste to be bread, but it is the body of Christ; and that which appears to be wine, is not wine, though the taste judges so, but it is the blood of Christ"—ο φαινομενος αρτος, ουκ αρτος εστιν, ει και τη γευσει αισθητος, αλλα σωμα Χριστου, και ο φαινομενος οινος, ουκ οινος εστιν, ει και η γευσις τουτο βουλεται, αλλα αιμα Χριστου.—St. Cyril. Catech., Mystagog. iv., cap. 320–2.

From these passages of St. Cyril it follows, that though he uses the word antitype, to express the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, neither he nor the Church in his time, understood it in your figurative sense. They believed and taught, that though to the senses bread and wine appeared in the sacrament, they were not bread and wine, but the body and blood of Christ; this they teach without any, the slightest ambiguity.

Their sacrifice was identically the same as the sacrifice offered by the Catholic Church of this present day; and we have seen that it was offered then, as well as now, to free souls from the punishments of sin, to render God merciful to them, to make atonement for them, to appease Him, and expiate their offences. And unless you can show that the Church offered sacrifice for this purpose, for the saints who were already in the possession of the beatific vision, or that the plain, but nervous words of St. Cyril cannot now be allowed to represent the same significant ideas, which in the natural and philosophical mechanism of the language they were first used to express, I must still hold that prayers and sacrifice for the relief of the dead, the invocation of saints, setting aside misrepresentation, the real presence in the Eucharist, are three Popish principles coeval with Christianity.

I remain, Sir, yours much obliged,

EDMOND POWER.

To save repetition, we have prefixed numbers to those passages of Mr. Power's letter which require an answer.

No. 1. Mr. Power continues to assert (what we ourselves have always asserted), that prayers for the dead may be offered for another purpose besides that of getting the soul out of Purgatory. So far we are agreed, to the confusion of all those Roman Catholic controversialists who, whenever they find any prayer for the dead, immediately ask us to believe that it must be for the purpose of getting the soul out of Purgatory. Again we say, that prayer for the dead does not prove Purgatory, unless it can be shown that the prayer was offered for the purpose of getting a soul out of Purgatory.

But did the early Church ever pray for the dead, for the purpose of getting a soul out of Purgatory? Mr. Power, will you produce us a prayer expressly for that purpose? You have all the ancient liturgies to search through; produce from them only one prayer, that a soul may be delivered from out of Purgatory—and we will submit. Why will you not produce the prayer, and end this discussion? Can there be any better reason for not producing it—than that no such prayer is to be found?

No. 2. The whole of this paragraph is intended to prove that the word "commemorate" is applied only to "patriarchs, prophets, Apostles, and martyrs," while, for all others who are prayed for, the word "supplicate" only is used.

Now, if Mr. Power had taken the trouble to turn to any one of the ancient liturgies, he would have seen that this distinction, on which he relies so much, has no shadow of foundation; for in all those liturgies the word "commemorate" is expressly applied to all others who are prayed for, as well as to patriarchs, prophets, &c. Let him only look at the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, in Goar's "Rituale Græcorum," and he will find this—Ενταυθα ζωντων και τεθνεωτων ὧν εθελει ὁ ιερευς μνημονευειν ονομασι—"here the Priest commemorates by name the living and the dead whom he wishes." It is quite useless to bring evidence to prove that this was not in the ancient liturgies, when we see it in the liturgies themselves; and, indeed, it is only by an evident misconstruction of the words of St. Cyril, that Mr. Power makes St. Cyril appear to contradict this. In the Oxford translation, made from the Benedictine and Oxford texts, Mr. Power will see that the first words which he has quoted, "we all beseech thee, and we offer this sacrifice to thee," belong to a previous sentence, relating to prayers for the living. Then he commences about prayers for the dead, at the words, "these we commemorate," &c.; and that word, "commemorate," must run through that whole sentence. So St. Cyril does not contradict the liturgy at all. And, in this sentence, respecting prayer for the dead, there is not one word said of "sacrifice for the dead;" but only that prayer was offered for the dead, at the time that that sacrifice was offered. And this disposes of a great deal of Mr. Power's letter.

No. 3. It is quite clear from the liturgies themselves, that commemorations and prayers were intended to be made only for those "who had gone to rest in hope of the resurrection of eternal life" (qui in spe resurrectionis æternæ vitæ obdormierunt); for these words follow on to the words which allow the commemoration to be made. How, then, are we to account for the fact of St. Cyril being driven to justify prayers for those who died in their sins—ἁμαρτωλοι? There is only one possible account of it; this corrupt practice had grown up of praying for such; and St. Cyril had the weakness to try and defend it by a very poor argument of his own, instead of openly saying that the Church and the liturgy gave no sanction to such a practice. So it is now. If we charge the Church of Rome with teaching that the Mass will save those who die in mortal sin, we should be met with assertions that the Council of Trent does not sanction such a practice. But if a priest is offered money to say Masses for one who notoriously died in mortal sin, he is well enough satisfied that it should be thought that the Mass is of use.

But St. Cyril admits that "many" thought these prayers were useless; and he does not say they were heretics, or contradicted the Church by so saying. He only offered a very poor argument of his own, and one, too, which many Roman Catholics say is contrary to the present doctrine of the Church of Rome herself.

No. 4. Is it not wonderful that these old Fathers never SPEAK of Purgatory in those places in which Roman Catholics think that they must MEAN it? Oh, they speak of it virtually! That means that they never NAME it once! Strange that they should write so much of it, as Roman Catholics think they do, and yet never once mention it. We affirm that St. Cyril, who never names it, does not speak even "virtually" of it, unless Purgatory be for ἁμαρτωλοί, which means hardened sinners.

No. 5. In the passage of Mr. Power's letter which we have numbered 5, he says—"I quoted a passage from the Liturgy of St. James, in which it is positively stated, that the sacrifice was offered to supplicate repose, relief, rest, from pain, torment, &c., for the souls of the departed." We can only meet this assertion by an explicit contradiction. Mr. Power marks the words, "pain, torment," in italics, as containing the force of the passage which he quoted. Now, the passage which he quoted from the "Liturgy of St. James," do not contain the words, "pain, torment," at all. The words which he quoted were these, ὑπὲς ἀναπαυσιν των προκεκοιμημενων ψυχων"—that is, "for the rest of the souls of those who have died before us." There is not one word in the quotation about pain or torment. It is true, Mr. Power affirms in the place referred to, "that ἀναπαυσιν means rest, relief, &c., from pain, torment, &c., is beyond contradiction.—Apoc. xiv. 11." But the words, "pain, torment," are Mr. Power's own words, and he has no right in his present letter to give those words of his own, as positively stated in the Liturgy of St. James. The argument by which Mr. Power, in that former letter (Nov., 1854), tries to prove that the word αναπαυαν (which simply means "rest") does mean "rest from pain and torment"—such as purgatory—does really prove exactly the reverse. In his present letter he refers to Apoc. xiv. 11, and they have no rest day or night—"και ουκ εχουαιν αναπαυαιν ἡμερας και νυκτος." Any one who looks to the verse will see that this is said of those who are in hell, not in purgatory; for, "the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever." And the only contrast to this which is spoken of, is in the 13th verse—"Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labours; (ινα αναπαυσωνται εκ των κοπων αὐτων): so the only rest spoken of is from "labours," and not from "pain or torment"; and those who have "no rest," are in hell, and those who have "rest," are in heaven, from the time of their death; and there is not one word in the passage about rest to prove the pain or torment of purgatory.

We ask Mr. Power to look at the prayer in the "Apostolical Constitutions" (Book viii., c. 41), which, although not really "apostolical," is, at least, as old, and probably older than the prayers in the Liturgy of St. James. That prayer is for those only "who have rested in Christ;" and the prayer is, "that God would place them in the bosom of Abraham—where pain, and sorrow, and mourning have fled away"—using, in the latter part of the sentence, the very words of the Greek version of Isaiah xxxv. 10. If any one can find Purgatory in that verse, he may find it in this prayer. And the 43rd chapter says—"But we say these things of the pious, for though you should bestow all your worldly goods for them, you cannot assist the wicked at all; for he who was an enemy to God while alive, without doubt he is so when dead."—Labbe and Coss., vol. i. 504, 505. This seems to us much sounder, as it probably is much older, doctrine, than St. Cyril's on the same point.

No. 6. We think our answer to the use which Mr. Power made of St. Augustine was a fair one. Mr. Power brought him forward as justifying prayers for the damned—for those whose salvation is past hope. We said then, and we say now again, why not for the devil, too, if for the damned? Will Mr. Power now say that it is lawful to pray for the damned? He will not. Why, then, did he bring forward St. Augustine to prove it? We say again it is a poor defence for the Church of Rome to say her practices are "not worse" than this.

No. 7. Mr. Power calls upon us to show "a positive law of the Catholic Church by which it is expressly stated" that we must pray to saints. We never said there was such a law. He himself quotes our words thus—"we are told that we must pray to them." Many Roman Catholics accuse Protestants of irreligion and impiety, for not praying to them. That is enough to justify our words. The Church of Rome inserts such prayers in her authorized services; that looks very like saying we must use them; especially as the late "infallible" decree of the Pope says, that the prayers of the Church are a rule of faith. But we admit there is no law of the Church of Rome to oblige us to pray to them. We thank Mr. Power for the hint. Roman Catholics, attend! There is nothing in God's Word to justify you in praying to saints, and your Church does not require you to pray to them! Mark that!

But when Mr. Power goes on to imply that prayers to saints stand in the same position as St. Paul's request for the prayers of Christians, we must dissent from him. We have the examples of an inspired Apostle to warrant us in asking the prayers of our fellow-Christians. We have not the example of any Apostle for praying to saints. Therefore, says Mr. Power, we are no more bound to pray to saints, than to ask the prayers of our fellow-Christians; and, we think, "not quite so much."

No. 8. With respect to the quotation from the Council of Trent, we have already stated that we quoted, for brevity's sake, only what seemed to us to bear upon the precise point we were speaking of. But, as all persons do not see the precise point of a quotation in the same light, we frankly confess it is better to quote more fully, and we shall be careful to do so in future.

No. 9. Mr. Power says—"On the evidence of St. Cyril we learn, that the Church offered to God, through the saints, their supplications." If this mean that they asked the saints to present their supplications to God, we expressly deny that St. Cyril said any such thing. He supposes that the saints do pray for us; and, therefore, he says we commemorate them, hoping that God will hear their prayers for us. Not one word of our praying to them.

No. 10. Mr. Power ventures to tell us we are mistaken in saying, that no Roman Catholic now speaks of the consecrated bread and wine as St. Cyril did, as "signs of the body and blood of Christ;" but will he venture to prove that we are mistaken? If so, let him produce some quotations from Roman Catholics, in which they call the consecrated bread and wine "signs." And let him explain to us, how a thing can be the sign of itself.

We trust we have said enough to show that there is much in Mr. Power's letter which, as a lover of truth, he ought to reconsider.

ON INFALLIBILITY IN THE CHURCH OF ROME.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I beg you to accept my thanks for having inserted in your paper my inquiry about Purgatory, and for the reply you have given to it. A candid disbeliever of the doctrine could not say less, and I am sure you will not blame me for still hoping, for sake of those who believe in it, that an answer may yet be given by some of their own teachers.

I wish I could think that the difficulty of adhering to the doctrines of the Church of Rome were lessened, instead of being aggravated, as they are, by the introduction of so startling a lesson as she now calls on her children to learn and to believe.

To question the divine authority of any doctrine the Church proposes, is the last thought of those who are born and educated in her bosom; but there is a class amongst her disciples who look for a little more deference to the Word of God, than her new article of faith discloses. To this class the writings of the Fathers are unattainable, even as books of reference, but they are not, consequently, destitute of reason and understanding, and cannot adopt many items of faith which they find prevailing amongst those who are left exclusively to the teachers of the Church, such, for instance, as was lately declared by a most pious and faithful Catholic woman to be her real and solemn belief—namely, that the Blessed Virgin "never was born," that she was spued out of the mouth of God.

I cannot believe that any Catholic priest ever taught this to any one, but I must confess, that what the Church now teaches, and requires to be believed, is open to as much objection as this portion of the poor woman's creed, and that it gives rise to very serious doubts as to whether she has not outstepped her authority, and forfeited her claim to infallibility.

In asserting her infallibility, she certainly violates a principle on which she acts in other matters. In the Douay Catechism, from which I was instructed in my childhood and youth, it is asserted, that no amount of venial sins can make or constitute a mortal sin. May we not fairly ask how many fallibilities can make an infallibility, and whether any number of fallible men can compose an infallible council, and decree an infallible doctrine?

I know that the Church adopts exclusively as hers the promise of our Blessed Saviour, that the Holy Ghost should abide with His Church for ever, and teach her all truth to the end of the world; and this maxim of the Church has induced me to examine my Bible (a Douay Bible, first published by the English College, at Rheims, anno 1582, corrected according to the Clementine edition of the Scriptures), to see if I could find any indication of what our Saviour considered to be the infallible truth, to the teaching of which he annexed this gracious promise, and I find the verse to stand thus—(John xiv., 26, Douay version) "But the Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, whom my Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things, and will bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I shall have said to you;" in the fifteenth chapter, still speaking of the Holy Spirit, he says, "He shall give testimony of me;" and in the sixteenth chapter are these words, "He shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you." Here is not one word about hearing any testimony to, or teaching anything of, the Blessed Virgin.

Will you, sir, deem me unreasonable and unobserving of an answer, when I ask from any Catholic, whether priest or layman, that may have studied the Scriptures, whether the words of our Saviour, "whatsoever I shall have said unto you," include the "all things" that the Holy Ghost should "teach, and put us in remembrance of;" because, if so, no Catholic need consider himself bound to believe the newly-proclaimed doctrine as essential to salvation. Such a doctrine of the Blessed Virgin is not spoken of, or alluded to by either our Saviour himself, or by those to whom the Holy Ghost was afterwards given at Pentecost (Acts ii. 4, Douay version); and who after that spoke as He, the "Holy Ghost, gave them to speak;" and I cannot help thinking that infallibility is only promised to those who speak only whatsoever things Jesus has spoken, and whatsoever things the "Holy Ghost gave to the Apostles to speak;" and that the Church of Rome cannot be infallible, unless when she teaches what Christ and his inspired Apostles taught; and that any church may be, and is, fallible in teaching "doctrines and commandments of men."—Matt. xv. 9.

Oh, sir, no one reared in Protestantism can estimate the misery a Catholic feels when he first begins to doubt the evidence on which he has believed all that he thinks sacred and true, and it is very cruel not to answer this inquiry explicitly and fully.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

IN EARNEST.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR MARCH.

[From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.]

SPRING WHEAT.

FROM the late very severe frost and snow-storm which continued during last month, the sowing of spring wheat was totally out of question. The snow having now disappeared, every exertion should be made in getting in this valuable crop, as soon as the land has been sufficiently dried to bear the plough and horses; but, in many instances, the spade and shovel must be substituted for the plough and horses, or the grain cannot be sown in proper time; when men can be had, their employment will amply repay the farmer for the extra cost, as the land must remain, in numberless instances, too wet and poachy to be able to get in the crop in time by horses.

Winter Wheats.—As soon as the land is sufficiently dry to bear it, it should be well harrowed, to break the hardened crust, destroy the annual weeds, which have so luxuriated under the comfortable cover of the snow as to render the whole surface perfectly green to the eye in many instances, to mould the young wheat plants, and promote their sending out additional coronal roots; after which the application of the roller will be of great service. The young wheat in drills should also be hand or horse hoed; but these works should only be performed when the land is sufficiently dry, otherwise more harm than good will be done, and it had better be put off till next month.

Potatoes planted before the storm should now be closely examined, and where found injured, the loss repaired by dibbling in fresh sets. Accounts which have come to hand report much damage amongst the early planted potatoes; but we would advise a very close examination to be instituted, as though the flesh of the set may present a blackened appearance, many of the eyes will be found still good, and a crop may be expected; but constant (at least weekly) examinations should be made, so as to ascertain the amount of damage in time to dibble in fresh sets where needful.

Potatoes should now be planted with as little delay as the state of the land will permit. In damp, low soils, beds or ridges are to be preferred; in dry soils, drills will be the most expeditious and economical mode; a liberal dressing of manure will be requisite to insure an early and abundant crop.

Spring Vetches mixed with a little oats should now be sown in breadth to suit requirements in July; successional sowings to be made once a fortnight or three weeks, till June or July next.

Barley may be sown from the middle to the end of the month; as this grain germinates very rapidly, the soil should be finely pulverised for its reception. When sown after green crops, to be laid down with clover and grass seeds, the best mode will be to drill or rib in the barley at 18 inches apart, which affords plenty of light and air for the perfect growth of the small seeds.

MODERN WORSHIP IN ROME.—No. IV.

PRAYERS IN AN UNKNOWN TONGUE.

THE war, which is now unhappily raging in the East, is supposed by some sanguine persons likely to promote the conversion of the Mahometans and other Eastern nations, by bringing them more directly into contact with those who profess the pure faith of the Gospel of Christ. We trust that this benevolent hope will not be altogether disappointed; but we are bound to confess, that some of the peculiar usages of the Church of Rome appear to us to interpose the greatest obstacle to such a desirable event. This assertion may appear strange to many of our readers; but we will endeavour briefly to state our reasons for it.

Let us suppose an intelligent Turk to meet, in Constantinople or elsewhere, with a Roman Catholic missionary clergyman, and to be told by him that Christianity was the only true, rational religion in the world, and that Rome was the place where this religion was professed and practised in its greatest purity. As Italian is very generally spoken throughout the East, it would be no very difficult matter for our friend the Turk to travel to Rome, in order to judge for himself whether the Christian religion be, in truth, such a reasonable religion as he had been told it was. He finds himself at St. Peter's, suppose on last Easter Sunday, on which day the Pope always proceeds in state to that Cathedral. The first thing that meets the eye of the Turk, is a countless number of statues and pictures, before which the assembled multitudes are kneeling, in an attitude of fervent devotion. The Mahometans, as is well known, have such a horror of idolatry, that they will not tolerate even a painting of the human form, lest it should lead, however remotely, to the commission of that sin; and it is needless to say what feelings of aversion would be excited in the mind of the Turk, by the image-worship which the Church of Rome not only tolerates, but openly defends.* He sees persons of all ranks and ages prostrating themselves before some inanimate piece of wood or marble, and offering up their prayers towards it. He knows nothing of the ingenious subtleties invented by the Romish doctors, to distinguish between the image and the object represented by it. He has never heard about latria, dulia, or hyperdulia; he only sees the practice of a mode of worship which he feels to be derogatory to the dignity and majesty of the one true God; and he asks himself, in amazement—Is this the pure and reasonable religion in which I am told I must believe, if I desire to attain eternal salvation?

We need not stop to describe the increased amazement of the Mahometan inquirer, when he hears the names of countless saints and angels mixed up in the prayers uttered by the crowd around him. His reason tells him that God alone is the proper object of religious worship, and he finds it hard to conceive how that can be a pure religion, in which the Almighty is robbed of the honour which rightfully belongs to Him alone. At last, however, the priest mounts the steps of the high altar, and the service is about to begin. A low murmur reaches the ears of the Turk; but he can scarcely distinguish the words of what is spoken. He sees the crowd kneeling and crossing themselves; and he is anxious to be informed respecting the meaning of the prayers which they are offering up to God. He addresses one of the congregation near him—"Good sir, you seem to be mightily concerned and affected with what yonder man in the gay garment is reading; for my part, although I know Italian pretty well, I do not understand one word that he says; but I suppose you can inform me?" And what reply does he receive? "No, truly, friend, the language which the priest speaks is quite unknown to us; we understand the prayers no more than you do." "Then, why," he would naturally ask, "do you raise your eyes, and lift up your hands, and beat your breasts, as if you did understand them?" "Why, as for that, we can give no other reason, but that we believe they are very devout words, in a language spoken by our ancestors about eighteen hundred years ago; and it is an old fashion among us thus to behave ourselves whilst they are reading." "But, what!" he would ask, "have you not met together to join with the priest in offering up your prayers in common to God?" "No, truly," the Italian would reply, "we need not mind the meaning of the prayers at all; the priest prays for us as well as for himself; if we attend to the sound of the words, our divines tell us that it is quite sufficient; and we need not trouble ourselves to understand their meaning, or, indeed, to have our thoughts fixed on God at all!" Now, what will the Turk think of these enlightened people, or of the religion which they profess? We need not go far to look for an answer; the case, just such as we have described it, has been long since disposed of, in a very few words, by St. Paul, when he wrote his first epistle to the Church at Corinth—"If, therefore, the Church be come together in one place, and all speak with tongues, and there come in those that are unlearned or unbelievers, will they not say that ye are mad?"—1 Cor. xiv. 23. If, instead of "all speak with tongues," we insert "the priests speak in an unknown tongue," have we not, in these words of the apostle, an exact description of such a scene as we have ventured to describe?

Indeed, among all the strange practices of the Church of Rome, the use of an unknown tongue in her public prayers has always seemed to us one of the strangest and most indefensible. It is, as we shall presently see, expressly contrary to Scripture; it is contrary to the unanimous opinion of the Fathers; it is opposed to the practice of antiquity; and it is contrary to reason and common sense.

For what is prayer? It is, surely, not the mere posture of the body. A man may kneel till he wears out the stones; he may put himself into every variety of attitude; he may throw himself on the earth, and lie in the dust; like the idolatrous king of Israel, he may put on sackcloth and ashes; or, like the monks of old, he may kneel till his knees become horny, and yet never pray at all.

It is not the mere expression of the mouth, or the utterance of a form of words with the lips. A man may repeat a hundred times in the day that beautiful and affecting prayer which our blessed Lord has taught us, and which we call the Lord's Prayer; but if the affection of the soul do not accompany the words uttered, it is no real prayer. Let us hear our Lord's own words, in which he condemned the worship of the Jewish Church—"This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoureth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me. But in vain do they worship me."—Matt xv. 8, 9.

Prayer, therefore, is the outpouring of the heart to God. It is a holy intercourse with the Father of our spirits; it is a sacred bond whereby the soul is united to that great Being, who alone can supply all our wants, and who is the author of all the blessings we enjoy. Man is sinful, weak, and unstable in himself; but prayer gives him the great and inestimable privilege of coming to God, as to a merciful Father, to make known to Him all his wants and infirmities, with the confident assurance, that if he asks in faith, his prayer will be heard. "All things," said our blessed Lord, "whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." Christians are commanded and invited to pray publicly in the Church, as well as privately in their closets; and our Lord Jesus Christ has been pleased to promise a special blessing to those who meet together, to offer up their prayers in common. "Where two or three," saith he, "are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."—Matt. xviii. 20.

But how can a man express the devotional acts of the mind in a form of words which he does not understand? How can he pray in faith, when he knows not what he is to pray for? How can he confess his sins with sorrow and remorse of soul, when he confesses he knows not what? How can he desire or hope for the particular blessings which the prayers of the Church contain, when he knows not what they are? How can he cordially praise or give thanks, when he knows not either what it is that he praises, or whether the prayer that the priest is reading be a confession, a petition, or a thanksgiving? In short, how is it possible for him to accompany with his heart a prayer which he does not understand? If attention to the sound of the words be all that is required, a parrot may be as attentive as a Christian. It scarcely needs the grave authority of St. Augustine to expose such an absurdity. "We ought," saith that learned Father, "to understand the meaning of our prayers, that we may sing with man's reason, not with mere voice, as birds do. For parrots, and ravens, and magpies, and such like birds are often taught by men to sound that which they do not understand."†

We have said that the use of an unknown tongue in prayer is expressly contrary to Scripture; and in proof of this, we need only cite one short passage from St. Paul's Epistles. In the 14th chapter of 1st Corinthians, the Apostle, throughout the whole chapter, purposely argues against preaching and praying in an unknown tongue; for in those days the miraculous gift of tongues being very common in the Church, many of those persons who were inspired with it were too apt to overvalue themselves upon it; and it became a practice among them to preach and pray, and sing psalms in a language which their hearers did not understand. This evil practice of theirs is distinctly condemned by the apostle, upon the ground that it did not tend to the instruction and edification of the Church, but rather the reverse. "Except," saith he, "ye utter by the tongue words easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken? for ye shall speak into the air."—v. 9. "When thou shalt bless with the spirit [or with thy unknown tongue], how shall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not what thou sayest. For thou verily givest thanks well, but the other is not edified. I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than ye all. Yet in the Church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue."—v. 16, 17, 18, 19.

We confidently ask our readers, whether the use of an unknown tongue, in the public services of the Church, is not condemned in this passage as plainly and unmistakeably as words can express? And what answer, it may be said, do the divines of the Church of Rome make to these arguments of the inspired apostle, in which, as it were by anticipation, he denounces the use of a Latin liturgy among persons who do not understand it? "Oh," say Bellarmine and others, "St. Paul only condemns preaching in an unknown tongue, but says nothing about praying. Now, our sermons are intended for the instruction of the people, and they are always preached in the vernacular language of the country; therefore, the censure of the apostle does not apply to us."‡

This reply, however, is manifestly insufficient. Let us open the Romish Missal. It contains not only prayers, but also sundry portions of Scripture and pious lessons, all of which, as well as the prayers, are read to the people in an unknown tongue. Now, either these Scriptures and lessons are read for no end at all, or they are read for the same end as preaching, which is to instruct the people; and, therefore, the reason which St. Paul urges for preaching in a known tongue—viz., the edification of the people—would equally oblige the Church of Rome, if she wished to be consistent, to read the Scriptures and lessons in the Missal in a known tongue.

But, secondly, Bellarmine's assumption that St. Paul only condemns preaching in an unknown tongue is unfounded. The apostle manifestly includes praying as well as preaching, for he speaks, as we have seen, of the people saying Amen at the end of the prayers; and, further, he applies the very same argument to the two cases. The reason why he forbad the Corinthian teachers to preach in an unknown tongue was, that it was a hindrance to the edification of the people; and this very reason he urges likewise against their praying in an unknown tongue. "For thou, verily, givest thanks well," saith he—i.e., thou mayest be very devout in thy own heart and affections, whilst thou art praising God in an unknown tongue—"but the other"—that is, he that doth not understand the tongue thou speakest—"is not edified."—1 Cor. xiv. 17. And so his words are interpreted by the ancient Fathers. "When the words of the prayer are unknown to those that are present," saith St. Basil, "the mind of him that prays is unfruitful, because it profits none; but when those who are present do understand the prayer, so that it is capable of profiting them, then he who prays hath the fruit—viz., the bettering of those that are profited by him."*

The case, therefore, stands thus:—If a Christian should ask, whether preaching in an unknown tongue be allowable in the Church? No, replies Bellarmine. And why? Because St. Paul condemns it as being useless and unedifying to those who hear it. Is praying in an unknown tongue allowable? Yes, very allowable, says Bellarmine. But does not St. Paul urge the same reason against this as he does against preaching in an unknown tongue? Yes, he does. And why is not the reason as good in the latter case as in the former? We seek in vain for a reply.

St. Paul had left the Christian Church this standing rule, that, in our religious assemblies, "all things should be done to edifying."—1 Cor. xiv. 26. But the Church of Rome steps in, and says, that the greater part of what is done in the Church—viz., the stated and ordinary prayers—must not be done to edifying; for they must be said in a language which the people do not understand. And Bellarmine, ever ready to defend all the parts of the Romish system which appear most contrary to common sense, boldly asserts, that "the instruction and consolation of the people is not the principal end of divine worship!"† And, as if this were not enough, he broadly lays down this general proposition:—"In order that the prayers should profit the people, there is no need that they should understand them!!"‡

We may well be startled at such strange assertions. Are not the people, we would ask, bound to pray to God, and worship Him, just as truly as the priest? If they do not understand the prayers offered up in the Church, why should they frequent the public worship wherein they have nothing to do? There is, clearly, no reason for the people meeting together to hear Mass, if the praying is to be done by the priest alone. If, therefore, the people are at all obliged to pray, and praise, and give thanks in the public worship—which, one would think, no Christian should deny—it is impossible for them to perform this duty with any decency or order, except in conjunction with the priest in the public prayers, or liturgy; and this they can never do, unless they understand the language of it.

Nay, the Church of Rome herself must be forced to own, that the people are obliged to join in her public prayers with the priest, or else she must confess herself guilty of the greatest absurdity; for, in the Missal, the priest is ordered to commence a great part of the prayers with the word "Oremus"—i.e., "Let us pray." Now, whom doth the priest mean by us? It is plain that he cannot mean himself only, for then he must split himself up into two men; but (as it is not imaginable that he should mean anything so extravagant in such a serious matter) he must clearly intend by us, himself and the people. Now, why should he call upon the people to pray, if they are not obliged to pray with him?

In the office for the fourth Sunday after Easter, as given in the Missal, there is a very beautiful prayer, the translation of which runs thus—"O God, who makest thy faithful people to be of one mind and of one will, grant unto us to love the thing that thou commandest, and to desire that which thou dost promise; that so, amidst the changes of this world, our hearts may there be fixed, where true joys are to be found, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen." The collect is to be found, nearly in these words, in the service of the Church of England for that day. Now, if this prayer were to be spoken in English a few Sundays hence, throughout the various chapels in Ireland, we doubt not that thousands of our Roman Catholic countrymen would cordially join in offering it up to God. Does not the Church of Rome, then, use this prayer in her service? She does; but how? The priest is directed to say—"Deus, qui fidelium mentes unius efficis voluntatis," &c. If one of the congregation should ask—"Pray, Father A., what language is that?" "Why, it is Latin." "Is it so? why, it might as well be Turkish, or Chinese; for we cannot understand a word of it." "Understand!" (the priest would reply, following his master, Bellarmine) "what is that to the purpose? I tell you, you must pray it, whether you understand it or no." Might not the congregation reasonably reply, that it was a very hard case for them to be required to join in a prayer, of the meaning of which they had no knowledge, and which, for aught they knew, might be an imprecation of mischief, instead of a supplication for mercy.

But was it always the case, that the public service of the Church was carried on in a language unknown to the people? Certainly not. This fact is acknowledged by the best Roman Catholic divines. Thus, Thomas Aquinas and Nicolas de Lyra say—"The common service in the primitive Church was in the common vulgar tongue."* And why, we may well ask, did the Church of Rome ever depart from an usage so accordant with reason and common sense? We searched the history of the Council of Trent for an answer to this question, but in vain. It would be hard, indeed, to find anywhere a greater example of inconsistency than the decree of the Council on this very point. It begins by telling us that—"the Mass contains very plentiful matter of instruction for all faithful people." Surely, if such were their opinion, one would expect to find the Council making careful provision, that all this valuable instruction should be communicated to the people in their own mother tongue. But what follows? "Nevertheless, it did not seem expedient to the fathers, that it should be celebrated everywhere in the vulgar tongue!†"

Was there ever so absurd a conclusion drawn from such a reasonable proposition? And then they wind up with their usual uncharitable anathema—"If any man shall say, that the Mass ought only to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue, let him be accursed."‡

In fact, the decree of the Council of Trent, when put into plain words, really means as follows:—"Good people, you must know, that in this mass-book of ours there is contained such excellent matter for edification, that, if you could come at it, it would do you a world of good, and make you much wiser and better Christians than you are. Nevertheless, for reasons best known to ourselves, we think it expedient to lock it up from you in an unknown tongue; and, therefore, pray satisfy your hunger with the belief, that here is great store of spiritual food for you, though you never be permitted to taste of it; but if you wish to feed and nourish your hungry souls with the sound of words, without any knowledge of the sense of them, then we freely grant you this boon with all our hearts; much good may it do you!" Should not all Roman Catholic people be most extremely obliged to these tender-hearted Fathers, that talk to their children of bread, but give them a stone?

But it is time that we should notice another defence which has been attempted to be set up for the use of an unknown tongue in the public prayers of the Church. Bellarmine, as we have seen, was forced to adopt the startling proposition, that the people need not understand the prayers. In this he was quite true to the principles of his Church; for, in point of fact, it is the only ground on which a Latin liturgy can be consistently defended. But the proposition, thus nakedly stated, appears, at the first blush, so plainly contrary to common sense, that it would be apt to repel, rather than persuade, enlightened sensible men; and, therefore, Bishop Milner, writing for English readers, with his usual adroitness endeavours to put the matter in a more favourable light. "The use of the Latin tongue," saith he, "in the public liturgy of the Church, ... is no detriment to the faithful, as they have translations of the liturgy and other books in their hands, by means of which, or of their own devotion, they can join with the priest in every part of the solemn worship."§

Milner's defence, even if well-founded, would prove a very inadequate justification of the practice of the Romish Church, in continuing the use of a Latin liturgy. If, as he seems to admit, the people ought to understand the prayers, why does she not at once adopt the vernacular language of each country, in the public prayers of the Church, instead of leaving the people to grope their way through the means of a translation, which could be of no manner of use to the poor, who could not afford to purchase one, or to the ignorant, who could not read the book, even if they possessed it?

But we have a graver charge to bring against Milner than the adoption of an inconclusive argument. While he speaks of translations of the Romish liturgy, as if they were in every body's hands, he suppresses the important fact, that the use of these translations has been authoritatively condemned by an infallible decree of the Pope himself. This was a matter of which a learned divine like Bishop Milner could hardly have been ignorant; and if he was aware of it, it is another proof of the intentional dishonesty of that writer, of which, as our readers are aware, we have been already obliged to give so many instances. The circumstances which drew forth this Papal condemnation are so curious, that we think it well to mention them.

In the year 1660, an eminent French writer, named Voisin, who, as a good Roman Catholic, had probably read the statement of the Council of Trent—"that the Mass contains very plentiful instruction for all faithful people"—and, as a pious and benevolent man, wished to benefit his fellow-countrymen, determined to translate the Missal into the French tongue, for their use. Pope Alexander VII. then occupied the Papal chair; and one would naturally expect, that he would have bestowed praise and commendation upon a writer who took such pains to diffuse among his countrymen the knowledge of that book which the Council of Trent had pronounced to be so useful and instructive. Far different, however, was the reception which Voisin's translation met with at Rome. The Pope was filled with rage and indignation at this profanation of the sacred mysteries of the Church; and he forthwith gave vent to his anger in the following Bull, which, as a curiosity, we translate for the information of our readers:—

"With great sorrow of heart it has come to our ears, that, in the kingdom of France, certain sons of perdition (quidam perditionis filii), anxious to destroy souls by their novelties, and despising ecclesiastical sanctions, have arrived at such a pitch of madness (ad eam nuper vesaniam pervenerint) that they have dared to translate into the vulgar French tongue, the Roman Missal, which was written in the Latin language, and used for so many ages in the Church, and have dared, moreover, to print and circulate it, for the use of persons of every rank and sex, thereby endeavouring to throw down and trample upon the majesty of the holy ritual, expressed in the Latin tongue, and by their rash attempt, seeking to expose the dignity of the sacred mysteries to the gaze of the vulgar.

"We, then, to whom the care of the Lord's vineyard has been entrusted, in order that we may root up, as far as in us lies, the thorns with which it is overgrown, do declare our abhorrence and detestation of that thirst for novelty which deforms the beauty of the Church, and is the fruitful parent of disobedience, rashness, sedition, schism, and many other evils.

"Therefore, of our certain knowledge, mere motion and mature deliberation, we perpetually condemn, denounce, and forbid the aforesaid Missal, translated by some person into the French tongue, or one hereafter to be written and published in any manner whatsoever (vel in posterum alias quomodolibet conscribendum et evulgandum); and we for ever forbid under the penalty of excommunication, the printing, reading, or possession of such a book, to all faithful persons of both sexes, of whatever rank, order, condition, or dignity they may be, even though special and individual mention be made of them.

"Given at Rome, at Sta. Maria Maggiore, under the Fisherman's ring, January 12, 1661."*

And, now, what do our readers think of Bishop Milner, and his excuse that the practice of Latin prayers may be palliated by the use of a translation? Alexander VII. had no fault to find with the accuracy of Voisin's book, and he raised no objection to it on that head. No! It was the mere fact of making a translation of the Missal that the Pope condemned. This was an acknowledgment, that the people were called upon to use their reason, and that it was their duty to endeavour to understand the services of the Church; and the Pope seems to have thought that such a terrible crime as this could not be denounced in sufficiently severe terms. Poor Voisin himself was called "a son of perdition;" he was mad, schismatical, seditious. And why? Because he dared "to expose the sacred mysteries to the gaze of the vulgar!" The printers and purchasers of his work were threatened with excommunication, and the same penalty was denounced against all similar attempts in future! And, yet, notwithstanding all this, Bishop Milner has the assurance to tell Roman Catholics that they may lawfully use translations of the Latin liturgy! Has the Pope ceased to be infallible? or, has the threat of excommunication lost its power?

We shall add but one fact more, to show the practical consequences of the teaching of the Church of Rome upon the all-important subject of prayer.

Towards the end of the sixteenth century, Cardinal Tolctus, a learned Jesuit, published a work for the instruction of the Romish clergy. In speaking of the manner in which they should repeat their prayers, he says that attention is of three kinds†—First, attention to the words of the prayer; secondly, to its meaning; thirdly, that the thoughts should be fixed in God. The first of these—namely, attention to the words—is necessary, but only at the beginning of the prayer. The second, namely, attention to the meaning of the prayer—is not necessary, and for a very curious reason; "because," saith he, "if, in singing the Psalms, it were necessary to understand the sense, there would be very few who could accomplish it!" This, be it remembered, is the rule given for the clergy; and if they are not called on to understand the meaning of the prayers they use, much less, we may suppose, need the laity trouble themselves on this score. The third act of attention—namely, to have the thoughts fixed on God—is not necessary!

This, then, is the melancholy consequence of using prayers in an unknown tongue. By the constant repetition of forms which they do not, or cannot understand, priests and people alike are, at length, taught to believe that the mere utterance of certain words is all that is required of them. They are told, by one of their own divines, that they need not remember they are in the presence of God; and the proper end and object of prayer—namely, the communion of our souls with our heavenly Father, and the making known our wants to Him, is utterly lost sight of and forgotten. Thus, the very life of devotion is destroyed; and nothing is left, save a dry, cold, inanimate formalism, which resembles the lifeless skeleton, rather than the living and breathing form of vital Christianity. Is this the religion which the Church of Rome offers to us, which is to be our guide in life, our comfort in affliction, our support in the hour of death?

THE BREVIARY AND THE ENGLISH PRAYER BOOK.

Our object in this article is—first, to notice some of the attempts which have been made, from time to time, by Roman Catholics themselves, to correct the gross errors and superstitions by which they have been compelled to admit the Breviary is disfigured; and, secondly, to call attention to the remarkable fact, that the very reforms which they have vainly attempted or desired to effect, have been realized and carried out in the Liturgy of the Reformed Church of these kingdoms.

I.—First, then, as to the attempts at reforming the Breviary made by members of the Church of Rome itself. As might be expected from the age in which these Breviaries were compiled, they were not merely an abridgment of the ancient Church offices, but abounded in corrupt and superstitious matter, novel in its origin, and utterly opposed to the purity and simplicity of the primitive worship. The following description of the Service Books of that period is taken verbatim from a work of high repute, by a zealous ultramontane writer—the Abbe Gueranger:—* "These copies," he says, "were not only corrupted by the ignorance and carelessness of their authors, but were filled with a multitude of gross and even superstitious additions. These additions consisted chiefly of apocryphal stories, unknown to the preceding ages, and sometimes even rejected by them; and which were introduced into the lessons, hymns, and anthems. Barbarous formularies (formules) were inserted with the view of gratifying a gross-minded populace; votive masses took the place of the ordinary masses, and were performed with superstitious rites; benedictions were pronounced, unknown to all antiquity. In a word, in place of being the living rule, the instruction, and the supreme law of a Christian people, the Liturgy was degraded to the office of ministering to the popular passions; and fictions, which were quite in their place in the middle-age mysteries, often invaded the books of the altar and the choir. To understand the full extent of these abuses it is only necessary to remember the sang froid with which the clergy gave up the Cathedrals to the strange farces of the Feast of the Ass, and of the Feast of Fools."† The author concludes this sad description with the remark—"In submitting to such degradation, during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the Liturgy only shared the same fate as the Church itself."‡

The first attempt at reforming the notorious corruptions of the Church ritual was made by Pope Leo X., about the time when the Reformation began. It is admitted that this Pontiff was not actuated by any regard for the Divine honour in this matter, but merely by the desire of getting rid of the barbarous Latinity and offensive grossness which revolted his fastidious taste and classical refinement. A reform, originating in such motives, came, as might be expected, to nothing. Still the evil was universally and deeply felt; especially as the Reformers failed not to direct their assaults against the undeniable corruption of public worship which existed in the Church of Rome. Accordingly, Pope Clement VII., duly impressed with the momentous nature of the subject, entrusted the task of revising and reforming the Roman Breviary to one of the most learned and pious members of the sacred college—Cardinal Quignon, General of the Franciscan Order. He completed his task in the year 1535, shortly after Clement's death, and dedicated his reformed Breviary to the new Pope, Paul III. The title of the work sufficiently indicates the main feature by which it was distinguished from the former Breviaries—"The Roman Breviary Compiled and arranged, chiefly from Sacred Scripture and approved Histories of the Saints."§ A brief of Pope Paul was prefixed to the book, permitting the use of it, under certain conditions, to the secular clergy, and releasing them from the use of any other Breviary whatsoever. The first edition was speedily exhausted, and a second appeared the next year, 1536. In the preface to this second edition the author informs us, that whilst the great majority of grave and learned men approved of his work, and saw nothing in it to be changed, there were some who, though they approved of it on the whole, yet thought it was incomplete in some points; and that, in deference to their opinion, he had made some alterations, still adhering to the same idea and plan. He also speaks of a third class to whom his work was not equally pleasing, because, having grown old under a different regime, they were of opinion that no change whatever should be made by the clergy in the established mode of praying." Amongst the objectors of this class were found the Doctors of the Sorbonne at Paris. Notwithstanding this partial opposition, the reformed Breviary became all but universally popular with the clergy, and a vast number of editions were published at Rome, at Venice, at Antwerp, and even at Paris, under the very eyes of the Sorbonne Doctors, who had vainly attempted to bring it into disrepute. The fact of its frequent republication at Rome proves that it still enjoyed the countenance of Paul III., and of his immediate successor in the the Papacy, Julius III.

But, unfortunately, a change soon came over this promising state of things. Cardinal Caraffa mounted the Papal throne in 1555, under the title of Paul IV. One of his first acts was to withdraw the permission which Paul III. had given, and Paul's successor had continued—the permission, that is, to use the Breviary of Quignon. Two reasons may be assigned for this retrograde policy. First, a feeling of personal jealousy against the author. For at the time that Pope Clement had commissioned Quignon to review the Breviary, he gave a similar charge to Cardinal Caraffa. The work of the former was preferred; and it is very natural, though not very creditable to the head or heart of the latter, that as soon as he obtained the power, he lost no time in prohibiting the further circulation of the work of his rival. The other reason above alluded to may be found in the fact—to which we shall advert more particularly below—that the Church of England had not long before put forth her Book of Common Prayer; in one of the Prefaces† to which the compilers stated the principles on which they had proceeded in drawing it up, and which principles were to some extent identical with those by which Cardinal Quignon had (in the Preface to the second edition of his Breviary above noticed) declared himself to have been guided. Nay, more, the compilers of the English Prayer Book had, in this Preface, actually appropriated, as best expressing their own views, some of the statements put forward by Quignon in his Preface. These reasons sufficiently explain why Pope Paul IV. discountenanced the Breviary of Quignon. The call for some reformation in the offices of the Church was, however, too urgent to be disregarded. He accordingly set himself to perfecting the work which, as we have seen he himself had already begun, and which was not approved by Clement VII. His death, however, which took place in 1559, put a stop to his undertaking before it was complete. The question of liturgical reform, pressing as it was, was laid aside for a time. The Fathers of Trent, occupied with other weighty matters, were either unable or unwilling to enter upon so momentous a matter. But the necessities of the case became too urgent to admit of any further postponement. The Court of France, especially, directed the Cardinal of Lorraine to impress upon the Council the necessity of reforming the divine offices, and purifying them from the corruptions and superstitions, "which, under the pretext of piety, serve only to deceive the people." It was also expressly demanded that public prayers should be allowed to be said in the vernacular tongue, in order to be understood by the people‡ Upon this, Pope Pius IV. sent the Council the unpublished work of his predecessor, Paul IV., to serve as a basis upon which to proceed; but after much delay, and the appointing of a commission to execute the task, nothing was eventually done. The Council, in its last session, contented itself with referring the question respecting Missals and Breviaries to the Pope. Pius IV. died soon after this, leaving the work still undone to his successor, Pius V. This Pontiff, assisted by a number of divines§ whose sympathies were all on the side of inveterate usage, and opposed to the reforming tendencies which had partially developed themselves under Clement and his immediate successors, published, at last, in 1568, the long-looked for edition of the Roman Breviary. In the Bull prefixed to it, Quignon's Breviary was abrogated, together with all other Breviaries which could not show a prescription of two hundred years.‖ By this prudent reservation the Papal See avoided any collision with the cherished usages of the Churches which had never conformed to the Roman ritual. Thus, for example, Milan was left in undisturbed possession of the Ambrosian office, and Toledo of the Mosarabic.

Not many years, however, elapsed when it was found necessary, from the numerous discrepancies which arose in the successive editions of Pius's Breviary, to undertake a new revision. This was done by Pope Clement VIII., in 1602.¶ This Breviary again was superseded by another revision under Urban VIII., in 1631, which is the Breviary still in general use in the Church of Rome,* and the one from which we have given so many extracts to our readers in former numbers.

When once the Council of Trent had stamped with its authority the traditional usages of the Church, it became, of course, a necessity to uphold the old-established Breviaries, with all their corruptions and superstitions, and to repudiate such changes as those which Cardinal Quignon had introduced. The effect, accordingly, of the successive revisions just noticed, was not to reform any of the abuses which had grown up during the dark ages, but to stereotype them, and introduce new superstitions. Fabulous legends and spurious writings were still allowed to disfigure the pages of a work professing to guide the devotions of the faithful, and promote the honour of the God of truth. Such a proceeding as this could not and did not satisfy those who were truly in earnest about the momentous subject of divine worship. Accordingly, in the year 1680, the Archbishop of Paris, Francois de Harlay, published a Breviary founded on the grand principle of Cardinal Quignon—namely, that of excluding human compositions from the responds, anthems, &c., and replacing them by texts of Holy Scripture. And upon the model of this Paris Breviary are constructed the other Breviaries since in use throughout France.†

From this retrospect it appears that the worship of the Western Church had been, in the lapse of ages, gradually becoming overlaid with abuses and superstitions of various kinds. That, at last, the evil became so intolerable as to induce the Roman Pontiff to attempt to correct it, by reforming the offices of the Breviary. That, in accordance with his desire, and at his special request, a reformed Breviary was drawn up, which was sanctioned by him and his immediate successors, and met with almost universal reception in the Western Church during a period of several years. That, at length, the spirit of determined hostility to every measure which could possibly be construed into an approval of the detested Reformation, unfortunately led to the abandonment of the course initiated by Clement VII., and caused a retracing of the steps which, under his auspices, had been so wisely, and ably, and piously taken by Cardinal Quignon. That, under the retrograde influence thus called into action, the Breviary became again disfigured with absurd fictions and superstitious ceremonies, which, however well suited to the ignorance and credulity of the middle ages, are utterly out of place in an age calling itself enlightened. That, accordingly, the Gallican Church refused to accept the Roman Breviary, thus restored to its mediæval state, and effected for itself a reform akin to that originated by Quignon, and approved by the Papal See for many years.

II.—The second purpose which we proposed to ourselves in this article was, to show that the reform of the divine offices, commenced by Cardinal Quignon, and partially effected by him, has been fully realized and carried out by the compilers of the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England. In order to show this, we cannot do better than place, in parallel columns, a few extracts from the preface to Quignon's Breviary, of 1536, and the preface to the English Prayer Book, of 1549, entitled "Concerning the Service of the Church;" from which comparison it will at once appear that the compilers of the English Liturgy so fully concurred in the sentiments of the Roman Cardinal respecting the great principle upon which the offices of divine worship ought to be based—namely, a close adherence to Holy Scripture—that they hesitated not to adopt, in some cases, his very words:—

BREVIARIUM QUIGNONII, PRÆFATIO.	PREFACE TO THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.
Factum est, nescio quo pacto, precantium negligentia, ut paulatim a sanctissimis illis veterum patrum institutis discederetur. Nam libri Scripturæ Sacræ qui statis suæ temporibus legendi erant more majorum vindemiæ incepti omittuntur. . . . Illud ante omnia visum nobis est in consuetudinem revocare, ut Scriptura Sacra maxime omnium toto anno, et omnes Psalmi singulis septimanis perlegerentur. Utrumque enim veteribus patribus summa ratione placuisse videbamus, qui plerosque libros utriusque testamenti per anni tempora legendos disponerant in Breviario, et per dies sin Psalmos distribuerant, ut singulis septimanis totum psalterium legeretur. Sed (ut supra diximus) precantium negligentia factum erat ut minima pars Scripturæ legeretur, et psalmorum plerique omissis, pauci singulis fere diebus repeterentur. . . . . Tum historiæ sanctorum, quondam tam crebræ et tam sine delectu scriptæ habentur (in also Breviario) ut nec authoritatem habere videantur nec gravitatem.	This many years this godly and decent order of the ancient Fathers hath been so altered, broken, and neglected, that commonly when any Book of the Bible was begun, after three or four chapters were read out, all the rest were unread. They (the ancient Fathers) so ordered the matter that the whole Bible (or the greatest part thereof) should be read over once every year. . . . And, furthermore, notwithstanding that the ancient Fathers have divided the Psalms into seven portions, now, of late, a few of them have been daily said, and the rest utterly omitted. (The continual reading of Holy Scripture) hath been neglected by planting in uncertain stories and legends.

† These abuses relate to the Missal as well as to the Breviary. Even the most solemn rite of the Church did not, by the confession of this writer, escape profanation.

‡ In connection with this subject, the following remarks of the same writer are deserving of attention:—"We have not yet enumerated all the abuses which, in those ages, introduced themselves into divine worship. Religious architecture prostituted itself even in the extent of presenting ignoble caricatures of sacred things in the very sanctuary itself. Indecent images of clerks and monks decked the niches; the confusion, the bizarreness, the caprice of ornamentation, opened the way to the admission of pagan forms, producing an incongruous mixture of mythological subjects, of the most carnal kind, with the mystical emblems of divine worship—l. c., pp. 362-3.

Accedit tam perplexus ordo, tamque difficilis precandi ratio, ut interdum paulo minor opera in requirendo ponatur, quam cum invenieris, in legendo.

Quod ipsi animadvertentes, rationem ineundam putavimus ut Veteris Testamenti magna et utilissima pars, et totum Novum, præter partem Apocalypsis, in anno, et singulis septimanis Psalmi omnes perlegerentur. . . . Curavimus ut ordine longè simpliciore et expeditiore magna pars laboris minueretur. Versiculos, Responsoria, et Capitula omittere idcirco visum est. . . . quoniam locum relinqui voluimus continenti lectioni Scripturæ Sacræ.

Moreover, the number and hardness of the rules called the Pie, and the manifold changings of the service, was the cause that to turn the Book only was so hard and intricate a matter that many times there was more business to find out what should be read than to read it when found out.

These inconveniences, therefore, considered, here is set forth such an order whereby the same may be redressed. And, for a readiness in this matter, here is drawn out a calendar for that purpose, which is plain and easy to be understood; wherein, so much as may be, the reading of Holy Scripture is so set forth that all things shall be done in order, without breaking one piece from the other. For this cause be cut off anthems, responds, invitatories, and such like things as did break the continual course of the reading of the Scripture.

So far, then, as the restoring of Scripture to its due place in the offices of Divine Worship, the reformed Church of England in her Prayer Book adopted, and carried into effect, the principles which Cardinal Quignon propounded, and which were sanctioned by more than one Pope; but which, unhappily, did not long find favour in the Church of Rome. But the compilers of the English Liturgy, did not, and we glory in saying so, confine themselves to the reform so ably commenced by Quignon. They went farther than he did or could presume to venture. They substituted the vernacular language for the Latin, on the plain ground that "St. Paul would have such language spoken to the people in the Church as they might understand, and have profit by hearing the same;" whereas, in the unreformed Church of England they had "heard with their ears only, and their heart, spirit, and mind were not edified thereby."* The legendary fictions which had so long disgraced the Service Books of the Western Church were wholly removed; together with all invocations and worshipping of saints and angels, which, as we have elsewhere shown in this Journal, are utterly at variance with the purity and simplicity of the primitive Christian worship, and were gradually introduced into the Church, partly by its contact with paganism, and partly by the spontaneous development of the very form of superstition which St. Paul so emphatically condemns in his Epistle to the Colossians.—ii. 18.

As a commentary upon the wisdom displayed by the Church of England in substituting the vernacular tongue for the Latin in her public offices, we cannot forbear quoting the following striking words of one of the most eminent Roman Catholic ritualists of the present day:—†

"The Breviary, let it contain ever so much of what is beautiful, tranquillizing, and edifying, has become for the people an antiquity, and has ceased to be intelligible to them. The necessity of public devotions is still acknowledged by the faithful; but they require nourishment for their head and heart, and, accordingly, they attend more willingly to the rehearsal of a Rosary than to our Psalmody. Is this to remain so always? We hope not. We maintain that it would be to the great interest of the Church, if the Breviary were again to be adapted to the devotion of the people. Who can seriously doubt that the present, frequently bungled, recitation in cathedrals and monasteries is far inferior to a morning and evening prayer in a language understood by the people? How edifying would it be if daily in our cathedrals and town churches, where the attendance of a considerable number of the laity might reasonable be hoped for, and on Sundays and holidays, at least, in our country churches, morning and evening hymns were sung by the mouth of the laity as well as by the clergy; if intelligible Biblical lessons were read; and if the service concluded with a prayer adapted to the solemnities of the day? Happy times which shall see such a ritual again established! Is not the fulfilment of the wish, in the case of nuns, who, knowing nothing of Latin, must yet sing in Latin, a crying necessity, and one which demands immediate attention? May God awaken men to undertake this great work! Undoubtedly, reform is necessary! Nay, we assert, that those very ecclesiastics, who are not only scrupulously obedient to the command of the Church, but endure this command as a sweet yoke, remembering that without it we should, as a general rule, pray but little or not at all, are exactly the persons who most fully share in our wishes for reform."

In conclusion, we beg to recal a very important fact to the minds of such of our Roman Catholic readers as may be disposed to acquiesce in the justice of our remarks as to the English Prayer Book realizing the reforms which so many of the best and wisest members of their Church have sighed for and attempted in vain. The fact to which we refer, is this—that, in the year 1560, Pope Pius IV. proposed, through his Nuncio, Parpalia, to Queen Elizabeth, to ratify the English Liturgy, as well as to allow communion in both kinds, upon condition of her acknowledging his supremacy.* This was a clear admission, on the part of the Pontiff, that he saw nothing absolutely objectionable in the English Ritual; and an admission, too, the more valuable as coming from one who, from the part he took in reference to Quignon's Breviary, must have been in a peculiar degree prejudiced against the Prayer Book of the Church of England.

ROMAN CATHOLIC ANTINOMIANISM—No. II.

WHEN we want to distinguish between true and false doctrine there is no better test than that given by our Lord himself—"By their fruits ye shall know them." Find out which is the doctrine which puts most discouragement on sin and leads most naturally to holiness of life, and that is the doctrine which is likely to have come from the pure and holy Saviour. We endeavoured in our last number to apply this test to the teaching of the Roman Catholic Church, and we gave very full quotations from the writings of one of her canonized saints, from one of the most popular books of devotion in her communion—St. Liguori's "Glories of Mary." We think we gave full proofs of the immoral tendency of that work. If there is any person who has his heart bent upon sin, who feels that sin is exceedingly pleasant, but also exceedingly dangerous, then, the "Glories of Mary" is just the book for him. It will show him how he may live all his life in sin, and yet, through Mary's help, get to heaven at last. All he has to do is to cultivate devotion to her; he may renounce Christ, or renounce the sacraments; but if he holds fast to her she will procure him in time the grace of repentance. The sinner, however, who had only read those of St. Liguori's stories which we copied in our last number, might still be haunted by an uneasy scruple. He might be sure that his veneration of her would be certain to cause in him a change of heart; but might not this change come too late? Life is uncertain, and what would become of him should he happen to be cut off in his sins before the Virgin had made him repent of them? We purpose, in this article, to show how satisfactorily this scruple is removed by St. Liguori. Before, however, we proceed to this subject, we have something to say as to the merits of Mr. Duffy's translation which we have been using. We were led in the last number to express our suspicions that Mr. Duffy had been dealing unfaithfully by the saint, and had suppressed some very important incidents in his stories. We have been since enabled, through the kindness of a friend who has furnished us with a French edition of the "Glories of Mary," to ascertain the justice of our suspicions. The story, to which we appended a note in the last number, agrees perfectly with the French edition, and differs from Mr. Duffy's; and, in further proof of the same unfair course of proceedings, we give another story (Duffy, vol. i., p. 242; Paris, 1832, vol. i., p. 187), marking in italics the parts omitted by Mr. Duffy—

"Bellnacensis and Cesarius relate, that a young nobleman having, by his vices, reduced himself from affluence to such a degree of poverty that he was obliged to beg, left his own country, in order to live with less shame in a distant land, where he was unknown. On his journey, he met a person who had been formerly a servant to his father. This person, seeing him afflicted on account of the poverty into which he had fallen, told him to be cheerful, and promised to conduct him to a liberal prince who would supply all his wants. This man was an impious sorcerer. Behold, he took the poor young man with him through a wood which stood near a marsh, and began to speak to a person who was invisible. The young man asked to whom he was speaking. He answered, 'to the devil.' Seeing the young man terrified he endeavoured to animate his courage; and, continuing his conversation with the devil, he said—'This young man is reduced to extreme necessity; he wishes to be restored to his former condition.' The fiend answered—'If he will obey me I will make him richer than he was before, but he must commence by denying God.' The young man had, at first, a horror of it, but afterwards, being excited by the detestable magician, he yielded, and denied God. 'That is not enough,' replied the demon, 'he must also deny Mary, our irreconcilable enemy. How many souls has she snatched from our hands, to bring them to God, and to save them?' 'Oh, no,' replied the young man, 'I cannot deny my mother, she is my only hope [after God]. I am content to beg during my whole life, rather than deny her.' He then departed from the place. On his return, the young man, full of repentance, passing a church dedicated to the Virgin, entered, and, kneeling before her image, began to weep and implore the most holy Virgin to obtain for him the pardon of his sins. Behold, Mary instantly prays to her son for the unhappy man. At first, Jesus answered—'My mother, this ungrateful sinner has renounced my service.' Seeing that his mother continued to pray for him, Jesus, at length, said—'O mother, I have never refused thee anything. Since thou askest pardon for this sinner, I forgive him.' The person who had purchased all the property of this spendthrift young man had secretly observed from a corner of the church all that had happened. Struck with the compassion of Mary towards this sinner, he gave him his only daughter in marriage, and made him heir of all his fortune. Thus the young man recovered, through the intervention of Mary, both the grace of God and his temporal possessions."

Now, our readers will see what a piece of deliberate falsification Mr. Duffy's translator has been guilty of. He had, no doubt, often heard Protestants say, that the necessary result of the worship paid by Roman Catholics to the Blessed Virgin, was to lead them to honour and love her more than God; and now when he finds in St. Liguori so striking an illustration of the truth of this accusation, he not only "burkes" the offensive part of the story, but when the sinner calls Mary his only hope, "his only hope after God," interpolates Mr. Duffy.

We say no more on this part of the subject, as our business now is not with the idolatry of this book of Liguori's, but with its morality. We are not now complaining that he pays too much honour to the Virgin, but that he does not really honour her at all. We are sure that the stories he tells of her would, if they were true, be very little to her credit; and we are sure that Roman Catholics who do really reverence her, without having, at the same time, lost their perceptions of right and wrong, must be pained at hearing the worship of the Virgin put forward as a substitute for all morality and all the rest of religion.

We return now to the point we have undertaken to prove from Liguori—namely, that there is very little danger of the worshipper of the Virgin being overtaken by death before he has accomplished his repentance. Perhaps our readers may have formed exaggerated ideas as to the time necessary for repentance; if so, we hasten to undeceive them.

"In the life of Sister Catherine of St. Augustine it is related, that in the neighbourhood of the monastery of this servant of God, there was a woman called Mary, who, from youth to old age, continued obstinate in sin. Her crimes were so great that the inhabitants expelled her from among them, and confined her in a cave outside the town; there she died, abandoned by all and without the last sacraments, and, therefore, was buried like a brute beast in an open field. Sister Catherine, who was accustomed to pray with great fervour for all who had passed to the other life, having heard of the frightful death of this poor old woman, never thought of praying for her, believing, as every one else did, that she was damned. But, behold, after four years, a soul in purgatory appeared to Sister Catherine, and said—'Sister Catherine, how miserable is my lot! You recommend to God the souls of all who die, and for my soul alone you have had no compassion.' 'And who are you?' replied the servant of God. 'I am that poor Mary who died in the cave.' 'What,' said Sister Catherine, 'are you saved?' 'Yes,' said the soul, 'I am saved through the clemency of the Virgin Mary.' 'And how?' asked Sister Catherine. 'When I saw that I was at the point of death, so full of sins, and abandoned by all, I turned to the Mother of God, and said to her—"O lady, thou art the refuge of the abandoned; behold, at this moment I am abandoned by all; thou [after Jesus]* art my only hope; thou art able to assist me; have pity on me." The holy Virgin obtained for me the grace to make an act of contrition; I died, and am saved. Mary, my queen, has also obtained for me the favour that my punishment should be abridged, and that by suffering intense pains for a short time, I should satisfy for the punishment due to me for many years; I now only require a few Masses to be said for me, in order to be delivered from purgatory. I entreat you to procure for me the celebration of these Masses, and I promise to pray ever after to God and to Mary for you.' Sister Catherine got the Masses offered; and, behold, in a few days after, the soul appeared to her again, more resplendent than the sun, and said to her—'I thank you, Catherine; behold, I go to sing the mercies of my God, and to pray for you.'"

We could produce many other instances of equally rapid conversions, but only refer in passing to (vol. ii., p. 204) the case of a nobleman "deserving of contempt for the depravity of his morals, who, by express compact, became the slave of the devil, and served him uninterruptedly for sixty years, without ever approaching the sacraments," and who, in his mortal illness, twice repelled the confessor who exhorted him to repentance; and yet for whom the Virgin obtained a good death, because, "though he had led such a wicked life, he had always preserved devotion to her Dolours."

But suppose the worst came to the worst—suppose the devil was too quick for the Blessed Virgin, and that he had actually succeeded in procuring the death of his victims in mortal sin before she had obtained their repentance—does it follow that her resources are exhausted? It will appear from the following that, under no contingency, can a servant of Mary perish:—

"It is the opinion of many theologians, and particularly of St. Thomas, that for many persons who died in mortal sin, the divine mother has obtained from God a suspension of their sentence, and the grace to return to life, in order to do penance. Many examples of this are related by grave authors. Among others, Flodoard, who lived about the ninth century, relates in his chronicles (Ap. Crasset, tom. i., q. 12) that a certain deacon, called Adelman, who was believed to be dead, returned to life when they were going to bury him, and said, that he saw the place in hell which had been prepared for him, but that, through the prayers of the

* Mr. Duffy is at his tricks again. All through the book he makes the same correction—St Liguori himself not being accustomed to make any such reservation.

Blessed Virgin, his life was restored, that he might do penance for his sins. Surius also relates (lib. I., cap. 35) that a Roman citizen, called Andrew, had died in sin, and that Mary had obtained for him the grace to return to life, that he might be able to repent and obtain pardon. Pelbart relates (Stellar. Cor. B. V. 1, 12, p. 2, a. 1) that, in his own time, when the Emperor Sigismond along with his army were crossing the Alps, a voice was heard from a skeleton asking for confession, and saying, that the mother of God, to whom he was devoted while a soldier, had obtained for him the grace to live in these bones until he would make confession of his sins; after confession he died.

"Father Eusebius Nierembergh relates, that in a city of Arragon there was a young lady, called Alexandra, who, being of noble birth and extraordinary beauty, was greatly beloved by two young men. Through jealousy, they one day began to quarrel, and killed each other. Their relations went in a rage and took away the life of poor Alexandra, because she had been the occasion of the death of the young men; they cut off her head and threw it into a well. In a few days after, St. Dominick passed by, and, being inspired by God, went to the well and said—"Alexandra come forth." Behold, the head of the deceased came forth, placed itself on the edge of the well, and entreated St. Dominick to hear the confession of Alexandra. The saint heard her confession, and gave her communion in the presence of an immense multitude of persons who had come to see the wonder that had been wrought. St. Dominick commanded her to state the reason why she had received so great a favour. Alexandra said, that when her head was cut off, she was in mortal sin, but that in return for the pious practice of reciting the rosary, most Holy Mary preserved her life. The dead remained alive for two days on the well in the presence of all, and then the soul of Alexandra went to purgatory. In fifteen days her soul appeared to St. Dominick, beautiful and brilliant as a star, and said to him, that the recitation of the rosary in their behalf, was one of the principal sources of relief to the souls in purgatory; and that as soon as they go to heaven they pray for all who recite for them this powerful prayer. After these words, St. Dominick saw the fortunate soul ascending in triumph to the kingdom of the saints."

After reciting the stories, of which we have given some samples, St. Liguori adds a caution, that these examples "should not encourage any rash sinner who wishes to live in sin, with the hope of being saved from hell by Mary, even though he should die in sin. For as it would be great folly in a Christian to throw himself into a deep well with the hope of being preserved from death by Mary, because she may have preserved another in similar circumstances, so it would be still greater folly to run the risk of dying in sin with the presumption that the Holy Virgin will save him from hell."

Such is the antidote with which the saint hopes to counteract the effects of all his other teaching. He must have had very little knowledge of human nature if he expected it to have much effect. He might as well supply a man with large draughts of spirituous liquors and then blandly advise him not to be intoxicated, as tell him such tales of the Virgin's reluctance to allow one of her clients to be lost, and then warn him not to be presumptuous. The saint's illustration about a deep well is not a very apposite one, because a deep well is a place that one is under no temptation to jump into; but suppose it was a place that there was some pleasure or profit to be got by venturing into, would not every instance recorded of people who had made the venture and come back safe, give strong encouragement to those who were inclined to run the risk themselves. Suppose that a young man were desirous of going over to California or Australia to try his fortune at the diggings, and suppose that his mother, alarmed at the dangers and the hardships of the expedition, had employed St. Liguori to counsel her son against the venture, how should we think the saint fulfilled his commission, if he spent the whole time of the conference in relating stories of persons who had tried the experiment and returned safe with full purses, and then dropped a few words at the close, "My son, the risk is very great, I should not advise you to venture." Just as much effect will St. Liguori's words of caution have in counteracting the tendency of all the rest of his teaching. He forgets that people do not generally commit sin for the mere sake of sinning. They do so in order to gratify some of their desires or appetites, even when that gratification is forbidden. And if they find that the risk of yielding to the temptation is much less than they had expected, that many others had yielded in a much more fatal way, and had escaped without any injury, why, then, is it likely that they will deny themselves present pleasure through fear of a very remote danger?

One of St. Liguori's readers may say, I am quite aware that the stories recorded in this book are extreme cases, and things that do not happen every day; but, then, I do not intend to ask the Virgin to do as much for me as she did for those abandoned sinners. I do not want to keep a crucifix to trample on daily (vol. ii., p. 142); nor have I any intention of getting consecrated hosts to outrage (vol. ii., p. 142); nor do I ask her to take my place among my friends while I spend fifteen years in a house of ill fame (vol. i., p. 284); nor do I mean to sell myself to the devil and sign the compact with my blood (vol. ii., p. 256); nor to absent myself sixty years from confession (vol. ii., p. 201); nor to do any of the horrible things which the sinners, St. Liguori tells of, perpetrated: I only mean to be a sinner in a small and quiet way, and to indulge in some cherished vices that I own the Gospel requires me to forsake, but which I find it hard to part with. Let me, therefore, take my own way for the present; it is no great hardship to say a few Hail Marys every day; and, no doubt, the Virgin will sometime or other enable me to repent of my sins. I will take care to ask her not to allow me to die in mortal sin, and, no doubt, she will take care I shall not. "There was, for instance, a sinner (vol. I., p. 305) who had not been at confession for fifty-three years, and who had practised no other devotion than that of saluting every image of Mary which he passed, and of asking her to obtain for him the grace not to die in mortal sin. And one day, when engaged in a duel, he broke his sword, and seeing himself at the mercy of his adversary, turning to Mary he said to her—'Ah, I shall now be killed, and damned; mother of sinners assist me.' After which words he found himself transported, without knowing how, to a place of security." Surely it is not likely that I shall die so suddenly, but that I shall have as much time as this to enlist her good offices in my behalf; and, therefore, I do not expect ever to require to give her the trouble of raising me to life, as she has done for others a great deal worse than ever I intend to be, in order to give them time for repentance.

We think we need say no more to illustrate the immoral tendency of St. Liguori's teaching; and we have now only to ask our Roman Catholic readers what they think of it. We know that there are many Roman Catholics in England who dislike the devotional writings of St. Alphonsus Liguori, and see with regret the attempts that are being made to give them increased currency in this country. An article in the Rambler (November, 1854), from which we have already quoted, gives an account of this, to which we are not disposed to yield much credence. It says—"We entirely accept St. Alphonsus as a fair type of the prevalent and living spirit of Catholic devotion towards the Blessed Virgin. We adopt his language; we venerate his example; we circulate his writings; we deny that they are disliked by the rich or the educated, or the laity as such." But it goes on to explain that in the choice of devotional, as well as of other books, personal tastes and predilections come into play; and that there are some "who have no fancy for the "Glories of Mary," and who find it rather a dull book."

A dull book! Does any of our readers believe that the book from which we have given extracts is disapproved of because of its dulness. What? the book which contains the history of "the advocate and the ape," of "the pious highwayman," of "Beatrix the porteress," and many others more extraordinary which we have not given. This a dull book! Why we might as well call Baron Munchausen's travels a dull book. If the stories St. Liguori tells are true, his work is one of the most interesting ever penned, and deserves to be deeply meditated on. And if these stories are false, his book deserves to be rejected, not because it is dull, but because it is full of lying doctrines, supported by lying stories; because it teaches its readers to offer to a creature the honour due to the Supreme God; and because it likewise degrades the character of the creature whom it deifies, by representing her as so greedy of praise and honour as to be indifferent to the sins of those who pay honour to her.

These are the reasons why we dislike the "Glories of Mary;" and, if we mistake not, these, and not its "dulness," are the reasons why it is disliked by some of our Roman Catholic brethren in England.

THE OLD IRISH CLERGY.—No. V.

All that we have said relative to the marriage of our old clergy in this island, and their mode of hereditary succession to ecclesiastical offices and benefices, receives a strong corroboration from the testimony of Pope Innocent III., who wrote, as we are told, many letters to his legate in Ireland (A.D. 1201), named Johannes Salernitanus, "instructing him, among other things, to put an end to that abusive custom, whereby sons and grandsons were appointed to succeed their fathers and grandfathers in ecclesiastical benefices."—Ciaconius de Vitis Pontif. col. 624. Romæ. 1630.

St. Paul was so strongly of opinion that the circumstance of a clergyman having married, and brought up his children well, or his being engaged in so rearing them up, was a valuable sort of experience to prepare him for the office of a bishop, that he even asks, in connection with the subject, this question—"If a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the Church of God?" as if it were next to impossible for an unmarried man to be fully qualified for that important office. How strange, then, that in the ecclesiastical system with which Father Colgan was identified, the only steps whereby a clergyman could become possessed of such a qualification were those of the crimes of "adultery and sacrilege!"

This learned author would seem to insinuate for true what is so commonly believed among the more ignorant members of the Church of Rome, as to the marrying of the clergy being a mere Protestant innovation, introduced by careless, worldly-minded men, with all the other heresies of the Reformation. We have shown, however, thus far, that it was, on the contrary, a common custom of the ancient Irish clergy from the very first; pointing, among other distinguished instances, in illustration of the fact, to the case (300 years before the Reformation), of an Abbot of Louth being father to a primate of Armagh, who one again himself father to another abbot of Louth, &c., &c. (see No. I. of this series), and this on testimony of Irish records which no Irishman will venture to object to as unworthy of trust. We shall now proceed to show proof, that in the period of Anglo Roman rule in Ireland—i.e., from A.D. 1172 to A.D. 1552—the same custom of clerical marriages continued to prevail, whatever opposition to it, or efforts to suppress it, may have proceeded from the authorities of the Roman Court.

The Church of Killala, in Mayo, seems to have been, in the 13th century, in the possession of a family named O'Mulfover; concerning some individual members of which, we have in the "Annals" these entries:—

A.D. 1224. Mellus, son to the Bishop O'Mulfover, parson of Hy-Fiachrach and Hy-Amhey, and the making of a bishop, for his wisdom, was killed by the son of Donogh O'Dowd.

A.D. 1231. Aengus O'Mulfover, Bishop of Hy-Fiachrach [Killala], died.

A.D. 1235. Isaac O'Mulfover, Erenach of Killala, died.

A.D. 1267. Hugh O'Murray, Chief of Lagan [Barony of Tyrawley], was killed at Killala by O'Mulfover, Coarb [or principal ecclesiastic] of the Church, on a Sunday, after hearing Mass.

Proceeding onwards through the "Annals," we meet in them, from time to time, with the following notices:—

A.D. 1317. Conor O'Conor, son to the Coarb of St. Coman, was slain. . . . Gillaroe, son to the Erenach MacTiernan, was slain at Kilmore.

[Dudley Firbis's Annals add, at this year, the death of "John, son to the Abbot of David." Under it they record, also, a battle fought in the Barony of Garryeastle, King's County, between two rival factions of the local sept of that county, the MacCoghlan's; one of those branches being headed by their bishop: and the bishop with his men were defeated; and, further, the bishop with his two brothers, Brian and Magnus, the two sons of the Archdeacon Mageoghlan, . . . and James, the bishop's son, Archdeacon of Clonmacnoise, &c., . . . were all killed," &c., &c.]

A.D. 1450. The Archbishop of Connaught—i.e., son to Parson Burke—died.

A.D. 1464. Redmond, son of the Prior, son of Loughlin O'Farrel, died of the plague. . . . Donogh, son of the Prior O'Farrel [beaten by Mageoghlan].

A.D. 1467. James, son to the Bishop Richard, son to the Great Deane fitzDaniel fitzJohn Gallda O'Fergagyl, Abbot of Lethraith [Abbeylara], a friar, young, learned, benign, hospitall, nobleman, died in the flowere of youth and beginning of his happiness [from D. Firbis's Annals, in O'Donovan's note].

A.D. 1470. The son of Bishop O'Gallagher was slain [in battle at Ballyconnell, barony of Tullyhaw, County Cavan].

A.D. 1474. Dermot, son of Bishop O'Brien [was hanged for murder].

[In the same year, "Art, son of MacDonnell of Clankelly. . . . was slain at Clones in a quarrel which he had with the clergy on little Christmas—i.e., with James, the son of Philip, son of the Coarb Mac Mahon," &c.—Annals of Ulster.]

A.D. 1490. Gilchreest, son of the Lector, a young priest, of Clonlish, died.

A.D. 1492. Magrath—i.e., Dermot, son of Marcus, &c.—Coarb of the Church of St. Daveog, died [and at A.D. 1496 we have mention made of "Rory Magrath, son of Dermot, son of Marcus," as Coarb of the same Church lands].

A.D. 1497. William, son of Bishop O'Gallagher, [fell in battle, near Rathmelton].

A.D. 1498. A great mournful news throughout all Ireland this year, viz., the following: MacManus Maguire died this year, i.e., Cathal Oge, the son of Cathal, &c. . . . He was a Canon Chorister of Armagh, and in the bishopric of Clogher, and Dean of Lough Erne, and Parson of Innis Cacin in Lough Erne, and the representative of a bishop for fifteen years before his death. He was a precious stone, a bright gem, a luminous star, a treasury of wisdom, a fruitful branch of the Canon, and a fountain of charity, meekness, and mildness, a dove in purity of heart, and a turtle in chastity, &c., &c.

This curious obit of the distinguished Cathal Maguire, compiler of the Annals of Ulster, is from the pen of his continuator in that work, Roger Cassidy, as translated in the Dublin copy of the Annals of Ulster; and we have introduced it here, because the eminent and famous individual concerned, who is in it so highly lauded, was himself one of those married clergymen, of whom we now write. Dr. O'Donovan, indeed, seems to indulge in a strange sort of doubtfulness on the subject, his note concerning it running thus—"Cathal Oge, compiler of the Annals of Ulster. He had several legitimate sons, though apparently in Holy Orders." Why, "apparently?" after the aggregation of clerical titles bestowed on him in the Annals. Surely, if ever there were a clergyman in Ireland, "at all at all," in full orders, Cathal Maguire was so, beyond all doubt.

And yet, after all, parson, dean, bishop's vicar, canon chorister, and what not, although having several children, he was able, wonderful man, to leave among his countrymen a memory likening him to a dove in purity of heart, and a turtle in chastity; no Father Colgan, alas, being at hand, to explain to the poor ignoramuses "the sacrilegious adulterer" that he was in reality. Let us return, however, to the thread of our subject, and the testimony of the "Annals."

Same year (A.D. 1498). Cormac, the son of Owen, son of the Bishop MacCoghlan, Official of Clonmacnoise, and a learned ecclesiastic, in Christo quievit [Annals of Ulster. Dublin].

A.D. 1499. Sile, daughter of Bishop Maguire, i.e., of Ros, the bishop, died this year, [from the same].

A.D. 1501. John, the son of [bishop] Rossa, son of Thomas Oge Maguire . . . Parson of Aghalurcher, &c., . . . died.

A.D. 1502. The daughter of Rory Caech Maguire, died in this year, i.e., Meave, who was wife to Teige MacGaillghille [now Lilly], and who had brought forth children to the young abbot. [Annals of Ulster. It does not appear whether Teige Lilly was the "young abbot's" name, or whether he married the widow of one so named.]

A.D. 1504. Andrew Magrath, son of the Coarb of Termon Daveog [i.e., the clergyman of Termonmagrath], died.

A.D. 1511. Hugh, son of Felim, son of Marcus, slain by James, son of John, son of Bishop Maguire.

A.D. 1513, The sons of Brian, son of Bishop O'Gallagher [pursued after plunderers of Donegal, and recovered what they were stealing].

A.D. 1514. Pierce, son of the great Abbot Maguire, died.

A.D. 1515. James, son of Thomas Roe, son of the Abbot Maguire, was slain.

A.D. 1518. Hugh, son of [bishop] Rossa, son of Thomas Oge Maguire, . . . Parson of Aghalurcher died . . .

The son of MacManus (Redmond, son of Cathal Oge MacManus), a charitable and humane man, died. [See A.D. 1498 sup.].

A.D. 1521. The Prior of Devenish, died; i.e., Redmond, son of the Parson of Inismacsaint [in Lough Erne], a clerical, kind, charitable, humane man.

A.D. 1527. MacManus Maguire (Thomas Oge, son of Cathal Oge, &c.), died. [This was the son of the compiler of the Annals of Ulster, whose death is recorded above under the year 1498. O'Donovan.]

A.D. 1530, Celia, daughter of O'Fallon, and wife of Carbry, son of the Prior, a beautiful and humane lady, died.

Hugh O'Flanagan, son of the Parson of Inismacsaint, died. . . .

A.D. 1531. James O'Flanagan, son of the Parson of Inis [macsaint], a man of great name and renown in his country, died.

A.D. 1540. The sons of William, son of Bishop O'Gallagher, namely, William Oge and Hugh Gruama, were slain by the sons of O'Boyle.

A.D. 1541. James Oge, son of the Prior Mac Coghlan, was treacherously beheaded by Kedagh O'Melaghlin.

A.D. 1566. Rose, daughter of Cuconnaught Maguire, the Coarb, died.

The word Coarb in the earlier times of Irish Church history, before the coming of the English, undoubtedly meant the principal ecclesiastic of the Church with which he was connected, the successor and representative of the original founder, and, as such, possessed of the lands belonging to the establishment, as well as all other honours and emoluments conceded by common usage to persons holding such an office. But when the country came under the power of England and Rome, every exertion was made to transfer the power and emoluments of the Coarbs to diocesan dignitaries, and thus to provide for the endowment of cathedral corporations with both income and ecclesiastical honours, at the expense of the old Irish Church dignitaries, who had been alike independent of England and Rome. The old Irish abbeys were discouraged and fell to decay, and new and splendid Anglo-Norman ones, in close connection with Rome, arose to fill their places. The Coarbs, however, tenaciously held to their hereditary possessions, and the result of the struggle between their national influence and that of Rome would seem to have been, in many cases, that while the power and jurisdiction, the ecclesiastical rank and office, passed over to the Roman functionaries, endowed from one source or another, in the course of time, the lands continued to be held on by hereditary Coarbs and Erenachs, retaining still these names, though no longer necessarily ordained to the priesthood or episcopate, as their predecessors, the early abbots, had been, but in many cases admitted only to the prima tonsura or lowest degree of holy orders. The Coarbs above mentioned in the Annals were probably, for the most part, of the regular sort, ordained men, as their predecessors had been.

But in whatever degree this may, or may not, have been the case, the entries above afford a very sufficient evidence as to what was the practice concerning the enforcement of clerical celibacy in Ireland in those days. A very large amount of additional evidence on the subject might, if there were need, be deduced from our ancient Registers, those of the 15th century in particular, in which occur numerous dispensations to men born of priests, to be admitted, that defect notwithstanding, to holy orders, and ecclesiastical benefices; the Pope granting to such a one, that, although de presbytero genitus et soluta ["born of a priest and an unmarried woman;" as her marriage to such a person, against the canons, would, of course, be null and void], he may, for his personal worth, be promoted to so and so. But the evidence already adduced in these papers on the subject, is in itself sufficiently conclusive on the point concerned, and we shall content ourselves with having made such a passing allusion to the other for the present.

IS IT POSSIBLE TO BE GOOD BY PROXY?

WE have to request our readers' attention to a few thoughts on a question which lies at the bottom of many of the points of difference between Protestants and Roman Catholics. Everyone knows how the Church of Rome encourages the people to rely on the merit of good works done by others—how she teaches that the saints have performed what are called "works of supererogation"—that is to say, works more than their own salvation requires, and which they can, therefore, afford to have reckoned for the benefit of others—how she teaches them to believe that if they become members of certain confraternities they will be entitled to share in the merit of the good works done by the rest of the society; and how Roman Catholics are ready to pay priests to perform certain religious exercises for them, or to pay persons to go on pilgrimages and undergo penances on their behalf. The case, in fact, is supposed to be similar to that of a man who owes a sum of money to his neighbour. If some friend is so kind as to pay a debt for you, and in your name, the creditor is as well satisfied as if you had paid it yourself out of your own purse, because all he cares for is to obtain his money for his own benefit.

But we ask our readers to reflect for a moment and say whether this illustration represents correctly the relation in which we stand to God. Every one will acknowledge that our Divine Master has no need of the services of his creatures, and that, therefore, the good works which he requires of us are not for his benefit, but for our own—for our own moral improvement. "Can a man be profitable unto God as he that is wise may be profitable unto himself? Is it any pleasure to the Almighty that thou art righteous? or is it gain to him that thou makest thy way perfect?"—Job xxii.

Now, just see what an important bearing this fact—that it is not for the Almighty's sake, but for our own, that we are required to worship and obey him—has upon the question whether such services can be performed by proxy?

Suppose that a man were to offer a map to a publisher for sale, it is no matter to the purchaser whether the man drew the map himself or got some friend to draw it for him; provided the map is honestly the seller's property, and is well executed, that is all the buyer cares for. But, on the other hand, suppose that a schoolmaster sets a boy to draw a map, by way of practice, in order that he may learn to be a good draftsman, then if the boy should get a school-fellow to do it for him, and should show it up as his own, he would be reproved and punished; for the task was set him not for the sake of the map (which the schoolmaster could have drawn better for himself), but as an exercise for the improvement of the learner.

Now, it cannot be doubted that it is the latter case which answers to ours in reference to our divine master; and that since "no man can be profitable unto God," and since He cannot stand in need of our services, it must be solely for our own moral improvement that the works which he requires of us are demanded. In arguing, then, with those who rely on the merits of the saints, we have no occasion to enter on the question whether the penances and austerities recorded in lives of the saints are real good works or not; nor, again, whether it is possible for any man to perform more good works than God requires of him, or to live so free from sin, as not to need, at least, all his merits for his own justification. Important as these questions are, they are superseded by the consideration we have been urging, that since good works are required of us for our own improvement, not for God's benefit, it must be impossible that another person should perform our duty in our stead, or that his good works, real or supposed, should be considered as done by ourselves.

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XXVIII.

"WELL, Pat," said Jem, when they met last, "is there anything new to talk of?"

"I don't know about its being new, Jem," said Pat: "maybe it's not old enough; but it's an old thing with me, anyway."

"And what is it," said Jem.

"It's confession, Jem," said Pat.

"And were you at confession, Pat?" said Jem.

"No, Jem," said Pat, "I wasn't. It's long enough since I was there."

"And was it reading the Bible put you off it, Pat?" said Jem.

"No, Jem, it wasn't that put me off it," said Pat: "sure, I quit confession, like a deal of the boys, long afore ever I took to reading; so, it wasn't that."

"Well, there's a deal of the boys surely that doesn't read the Bible, nor go to confession either, said Jem;" "more maybe than does go, a great deal. And I'm thinking they're getting more and more; and what's the reason, if it's not the reading that does it?"

"Well, the times done a deal of it, Jem," said Pat. "Sure, it was the famine put me off it; for I hadn't the dust to pay. Not but what the priest would hear my confession if I hadn't the money; but, then, you know, Jem, they don't like not to see the money; and people doesn't like to go without the money: and that put me off it first."

"Well, but Pat," said Jem, "the times got better, and sure you might get the shilling then?"

"Aye, I could," said Pat; "but, then, how would I remember all the sins I committed in five years maybe? And if I couldn't mind them, how would I confess them? And, then, where was the use of going? So, one way or another, I quit confession long afore I took to the reading."

"'Deed, Pat," said Jem, "there's a deal, I believe, quit it just in the same way. But, are you going to take to it again now?"

"Not till I find it in the Bible, Jem," said Pat.

"And what set you talking about it, then?" said Jem.

"The wife, Biddy, set me talking about it," said Pat. "Sure, she was at confession, and she wouldn't quit talking about it, wanting to get me to go, too."

"And what did you say to her?" said Jem.

"'Won't I confess my sins to God,' says I; 'and won't He be faithful and just to forgive me my sins,'* says I.

"'And what good will that do you,' says she, 'if you don't get absolution from the priest?'

"'And do you mean,' says I, 'that if God forgives me, the priest can send me to hell?' says I.

"'But how will you know it,' says she, 'if the priest doesn't say it?'

"'Well,' says I, 'I suppose that's the good of confession and absolution, just to make it more sure when we hear the priest say it.'

"'To be sure it is,' says she; 'sure, then, we're sure we are forgiven, when we hear it said; and how would we know it without?'

"'And mustn't we make a good confession, Biddy, dear?' says I.

"'To be sure we must,' says she; 'it's no good without that.'

"'Then, the priest saying the absolution over me,' says I, 'is just no security at all to me, only as far as I can be sure that I made a good confession?' says I.

"'Well,' says she, 'sure, it's the easiest thing in life to make a good confession to the priest; sure, if you do what pleases him, he won't be hard on you at all.'

"'Well, Biddy,' says I, 'it be to be a good confession, or it's no absolution after all; and if the priest lets me off a good confession, sure he is only letting me off the absolution.'

"'It's the easiest thing in life,' says she, 'to make a good confession to the priest.'

"'And isn't it just as easy,' says I, 'to make the same confession to God? But, Biddy, dear,' says I, 'what have you to confess to the priest?'

"'All my mortal sins,' says she.

"'Since when?' says I.

"'Since I went to confession afore,' says she.

* 1st Epistle of St John i. 9.

"'How long is that?' says I.

"'This time twelvemonth,' says she.

"'And did you mind all your deadly sins since that?' says I.

"'Why wouldn't I?' says she; 'sure they're not that many.'

"'And how long did it take you?' says I.

"'Not the turn of my hand,' says she; 'for his reverence was in a hurry, and a deal of people waiting.'

"'Maybe some was forgot in the hurry?' says I. 'Tell me, Biddy, dear,' says I, 'isn't anger one of the seven deadly sins?'

"'It is,' says she.

"'And did you tell him every time you were angry at me and the childer, for the last year?' says I.

"'How would I?' says she, 'when the childer angers me every turn of the day, and it's forgot as soon as over,' says she.

"'And was that confessing all your mortal sins for the year, Biddy?' says I.

"'And what can I do?' says she. 'Sure, I can't go to confession every day in the year,' says she.

"'Deed can you, Biddy,' says I.

"'Is it nonsense you're talking?' says she; 'where would I get time, or where would I get priests enough, or where would I get all the shillings?" says she. 'Sure, it would take a man's wages,' says she.

"'I'll show you the way, Biddy, dear,' says I. 'If we take to confessing our sins to God, sure, it's every night we will do that, Biddy; and we can tell them to Him while they're on our minds, and ask His pardon, and ask Him, too, to help us the next day; and won't that keep us watching ourselves? But when we leave it for once a-year to the priest, why, the sins are all forgot, and then they're not confessed at all, and then there's no absolution, nor nothing to keep us watching every day. That's the reason,' says I, 'that I would rather confess my sins to God, because it makes a better confession,' says I.

"'And didn't Jesus Christ command us to confess our sins to the priest,' says she; 'and how will it be if we don't?'

"'Can you say the Ten Commandments of God, Biddy?' says I.

"To be sure I can,' says she; 'aren't they in our catechism?'

"'Is confession among them?' says I.

"'No, then, it's not,' says she.

"'And what commandments is it in?' says I.

"'It's in the commandments of the Church,' says she; 'sure enough, that's the way it is in the catechism.'

"'Well, Biddy,' says I, 'isn't it all nonsense for them to be telling us that Jesus Christ commanded it himself, when their own catechisms allow that it is only a commandment of the Church? Sure, if He commanded it, wouldn't it be in the commandments of God?'

"'And who commanded it on us, then,' says she, 'if Jesus Christ did not?'

"'The priests did, and Jesus Christ didn't,' says I. 'Sure, that's just the meaning of it's being in the commandments of the Church, and not in the commandments of God.'

"'Well,' says she, 'anyway, I'd never be easy in my mind, if I didn't go to confession once a-year.'

"'Well, Biddy, dear,' says I, 'sure, I'll never say again your going, as long as it is in your mind to go. But, sure, Biddy, dear,' says I, 'it wouldn't do any harm, anyway, to confess your sins to God, too.' So she allowed it wouldn't. 'And now, Biddy, dear,' says I, 'wouldn't we just lay it down for ourselves to go, both of us, on our knees to God every night, and confess our sins for that day, and ask His pardon, and ask Him to help us against them for the next day; and, when Easter comes round again, you can go to the priest, if you like; and then you'll be the better judge, Biddy,' says I, 'whether confessing to the priest once a-year, or confessing to God every night, makes the best confession,' says I. Well, so Biddy agreed to do that same, and we've both done it every night since. And, now, you would wonder to see how Biddy tries not to be angered at the children. And, 'deed, Jem, since I put Biddy on that, it's making myself mighty careful, too, about things I thought little of before. And, maybe, when Easter comes round, Biddy will think that confessing to God makes the best confession."

"Well, 'deed, Pat," said Jem, "I think it's a good way you took, and the best way of all to learn what's best. Sure, it's a deal better than if you tried to stop Biddy going to the priest. And, 'deed, when a person tries that way, they'll find that it's not so easy to make a good confession to the priest once a-year. And, sure, if confession isn't done in reality, there's no good in absolution; and how can a man know, at the end of a year, if he made a good confession at all? and he getting, maybe, three minutes, more or less, to make it?"

"Well, I think that's the great harm of it, Jem," said Pat; "the people goes to the priest once a-year, and maybe not that often, and just says a few words to him in a hurry, and then thinks it's done, and all right; and then never thinks more of it till next year; and it's just the greatest stopper at all to people confessing their sins in real earnest. Sure, if a man goes to confess them to God every night, while he minds them himself and knows that God saw them, it will make him sore and sorry to have to tell the same sins every night, and make him pray the more for pardon and help, and make him strive more, too. But, when he goes once a-year to the priest, and gets clear of all in the turn of his hand, won't he just go on the same for the next year, and trust to get clean as easy. It's just like paying by Peter Burrowes,* so it is; and, sure, that never made a man honest or industrious."

"Well, 'deed, Pat," said Jem, "I thought that once myself, when I got to the sea near Drogheda, after I had the sickness, and I met Peter Reilly, the blacksmith, that is working in a great factory in Drogheda now; and he's the hardest working boy at all, and the dirtiest boy at all; for his face is as black as a sweep with the coal-dust, and his clothes that dirty with the coals and the grease they use in the factory, that you wouldn't like to touch them with the end of a stick. And Peter had just come out of the sea, washed for once in his life, and had just got the clothes on him when I came up. 'And isn't it the pity,' says I, 'to see you in the dirty clothes again, after the washing you got.' 'Well, then,' says he, 'I'm as easy in the clothes now, as if I had been confessing to the priest; sure, washing is like confessing,' says he; 'it lasts the year, anyway.'"

"Aye, that's too like what the people thinks that confesses to the priest, and then thinks themselves all right to go on again just the way they did before," said Pat; "but I'm trusting Biddy will think different afore Easter next."

And we trust that many of the Irish people may think different yet about confession of sins.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, APRIL, 1855.

In a former number we gave our readers copious extracts from an article in the Rambler, a Roman Catholic journal and review, published monthly in London, strongly and justly commenting on the Rev. Dr. Cahill, and his "violent and contumelious" mode of conducting controversy, and judiciously observing, that "controversial discussion, to be useful, requires a sound head, a cool judgment, a disciplined temper, a prudent tongue, a contempt for clap-trap, and a desire to convince opponents, rather than to elicit the applause of indiscriminating admirers." Our attention has again been attracted by an article in the Rambler, contained in the number for the present month, headed "The True Principle of Religious Controversy," which contains many sentiments in which we heartily concur, and which, if generally acted on by controversialists, would not fail, we think, to promote the progress of truth and Christian charity in the world—

"Nothing can be worse," says the writer, "than to treat a sincere man, in invincible ignorance, as if he were a hypocrite, or a wilful unbeliever. 'Man is made to be led, and not to be driven.' If you do not treat an opponent as sincere and well principled, whatever you may think of him, your cleverest arguments may be thrown to the winds without further thought. The notion against which we are protesting arises from confounding two totally distinct things—the destruction of error, and the building up of truth. Prove a man the most stupid fool in the universe, or the blackest scoundrel that ever disgraced his species, and what have you done? Shown that he deserves contempt and punishment, and nothing more. You have not even begun to make him a wise man or a good Christian. The only method of reforming a criminal is to discover what good yet remains undestroyed in him; to work patiently upon that foundation; and so, leading him from one step to another, to raise him in the end to the stature of an upright and worthy man."

"We can do no harm by treating a man as better than he is, provided only we never lead him to overlook the nature of his errors, and the enormity of the guilt of those who trifle with known truths. However little he may deserve our lenient judgment, at least he will be considerated. He will not experience the most irritating of feelings—the sense that he is wronged; that he is not fairly met; that his motives are misinterpreted, and his difficulties not made allowance for. He will be tempted to take refuge in that most true, but often perverted maxim, that God is more merciful than man; or turn away from us as hard-hearted, rigorous judges, when he has been looking for considerateness, gentleness, and patient love."

"It need hardly be added, that the principle of controversy here advocated is totally dissimilar from that which seeks to make Catholicism look like Protestantism in Protestant eyes. This latter system we think as fatal to the conversion of non-Catholics as the most bitter denunciation of every individual opponent as 'a heretic,' or the most caustic disparagement of every apparently good work of Protestants. In fact, the charitable treatment of Protestants, is really part of the very system which condemns the modification of Catholic doctrine or practice out of deference to their passion or prejudice. In both cases, we place our confidence in the ultimate power of truth and sincerity."

"It is obvious, however, that the principle of controversy here defended, does not apply in certain cases which too often come before us. It sometimes happens that the only weapons which we can employ are those of unsparing exposure and bitter satire. We have our foes, in whom not a trace of anything good appears, to which we may appeal in the hope of leading them on from good to better, for their own benefit, as well as our own protection. There are those who, in their present condition of mind, must be treated as adversaries, and nothing more. They are to be shown up, not for their own sake, but for the sake of others who stand by and watch the result."

"Still our controversies will always be more successful for a careful discrimination between a possible friend and an inveterate foe. And the surest way to convert a possible friend into an inveterate foe is, to treat him as if we regarded him, if not as a knave, yet certainly as a fool."

There is so much in the foregoing extracts completely in unison with our own sentiments, that we had well nigh hoped that we had, at last, found an opponent with whom we could have argued out all the points in controversy between the two Churches with perfect good temper, and some hope of a triumph to truth, on whichever side it is to be found. We regret, however, to add, that there are other passages in the same article scarcely, in our opinion, reconcilable with the charitable treatment of Protestants, the prudence, rather than the Christian duty, of which the writer has so strongly advocated. It is true that he says—

"We have no wish to show that all Protestants are worthless, hateful to God, and under his sentence of wrath. It is no part of our argument that every man who holds heretical opinions is himself a heretic."

Yet, in other passages he describes his Protestant opponent as—

"An opponent so vast, so pretending, so boastful, so laughably inconsistent, so illogical, so presumptuous, so lamentably ill informed, and so shameless, that it is hard to resist the inclination to give him his deserts."

And, again—

"The glaring inconsistencies, the illogical assumptions, the violations of history, the puzzled confusion of their minds, are studiously kept out of sight."

Surely the man who wrote these descriptions of his Protestant antagonists must have held them to be both knaves and fools—to use his own language, "deserving contempt and punishment, and nothing more;" or, at least, have forgotten his own judicious observations above referred to—"that controversy should be conducted with a cool judgment, a prudent tongue, a contempt for clap-trap, and a desire to convince opponents, rather than to elicit the applause of indiscriminating admirers."

We think we might safely challenge our readers to produce from our pages—from our first number (in January, 1852) to the present time—so sweeping a condemnation, or a sentence so severely uncharitable towards our Roman Catholic opponents as those we have last quoted, in an article, too, expressly written to point out the folly of attempting to "overthrow English Protestantism by abusing Protestants."

Does the writer in the Rambler think it will conciliate Protestants, or tend to prejudice them in favour of what he calls "Catholic truth," to denounce the Thirty-nine Articles as "vile"—to speak of the "chaotic world of Protestantism"—of "Protestantism as essentially a religion of negations," in which it is difficult to find two people who do not disagree in their creed"—of "that singular thing, English Protestantism . . . raising new churches, and paying additional clergy by hundreds and thousands, yet winking at burial-club poisonings, wife-beatings, and child-murders, and extolling the English people as the most moral on the face of the earth"?

Were we to have conciliated our Roman Catholic readers by similar vituperation, instead of calm argument and affectionate remonstrance, we rather think we should have long since been consigned to the oblivion we should have merited, and all our fine professions about candour and fair play would have been justly set down as mere snares to entrap the weak or unwary, instead of being considered, as we trust they are (even by our opponents), as the honest expressions of an earnest desire to follow truth wherever it leads, and of a sincere confidence that "the ultimate power of truth and sincerity" must, at last, prevail.

While, however, we protest against such harsh and uncharitable sentiments as unworthy of an article on "The True Principle of Religious Controversy," and utterly inconsistent with the sound views so ably urged in the paragraphs first cited, we are glad to be able to add some further extracts, couched in a more candid spirit. Speaking of English Protestants, the writer says, in another passage—

"They make sacrifices for religion—some of them great sacrifices. . . . . They have wonderfully improved in general morals during the last half century; and that, not under the pressure or from the example of Catholicism (of which they know nothing), but from some influence residing among themselves."

Well, this we think is some set-off against the grievous charge of winking at burial-club poisonings, wife-beatings, and child-murders;" and, probably, our readers will agree with us, is somewhat inconsistent with it. But if the Rambler expects to influence the minds of English or Irish Protestants by really doing what he professes, "placing his confidence in the ultimate power of truth and sincerity," we would recommend him to act up to his own wise principles, as we have endeavoured (we hope not wholly unsuccessfully) to do, and sincerely and steadily try to lead the minds of those who now sincerely differ with their Roman Catholic brethren (men whom the Rambler acknowledges cannot be driven) by fair reasoning, learned and logical argument, and truthful historical statements, based on adequate authority, into that glorious unity, which has been so eloquently described by the great Burke, as being not "unity of belief in the bond of ignorance, nor unity of profession in the bond of hypocrisy, but unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." In the words of the Rambler itself, we think there is, indeed, "an indescribable power, a victorious efficacy, in the very look, the voice, the gestures, and still more in the words of those rare persons in whom Christian love not only lives, but is absolutely dominant, which is unapproached by all the achievements of logic, and all the captivating beauty of human discourse. The reason we believe to be this—that the saint appeals to that which is good in a man, and treats him as being better, perhaps, than he is; while we, for the most part, attack that which is evil in him, and treat him as worse than he is, or, at the best, with the barest measure of rigid justice."

We shall forward our present number to the the Editor of the Rambler, in the hope that the good spirit in which the main part of the article we have referred to is written, will induce the conductors of that journal to try whether there are to be found in our pages any of the "illogical assumptions, the violations of history, or the puzzled confusion," which they would have their readers to believe are the characteristics of all writers who are opposed to them. Our pages have dealt with so large a number of topics as to afford ample ground for detecting and exposing such faults, if they exist; and not pretending to the supernatural powers of infallibility, we are not vain enough to suppose that we may not at times have fallen into involuntary error. One thing we are sure of, however, that we would not willingly either remain in error ourselves, or lead others into it, and shall, therefore, be truly glad to have any errors into which we may have fallen pointed out if they exist; and, with that view, we shall be happy if the Editor of the Rambler will permit us, not in a boastful or pretending, but a sincere spirit of Christian friendship, to present him with the whole of our periodical, Nos. 1 to 40 inclusive, if he likes to break a friendly lance with us in controversy. carried on in the Christian spirit we both profess to admire and approve of. We can assure the Editor that we have no party object in view, but are sincerely anxious to promote the cause of truth and virtue, and that we ever look upon those who differ with us, as friends and not as enemies, when they are trying to convert us to the opinions which they conscientiously believe to be true; and should the Rambler succeed in exposing inconsistencies, or illogical assumptions, in what we have presented to the world, he will, at least, not find us "shameless," but, on the contrary, sensitively alive to character, and anxious to repair any wrong we may have done, as all honest men ought to be, when venturing to write on subjects of such vast importance to the happiness and safety of the whole human race, as the boundaries between religious truth and error.

DISPENSATIONS BY THE POPE.

Our attention has been called to this subject by the leading article in the Tablet newspaper of March 24. A proposal has been made in Parliament to allow a widower to marry the sister of his deceased wife. It is not the object of our paper to discuss such questions; but if we were bound to give a decided opinion, we should fully agree with the Tablet in condemning this proposal, and, perhaps, on stronger grounds. For, if God has made man and wife to be "one flesh" (Gen. iii. 24; and Matthew xix. 5; and Mark x. 8.), then we do not see how it can be lawful for a man to marry his wife's sister, any more than his own sister. We hope the proposed change will be rejected in Parliament; and even if it should be adopted, we hope the Irish people will never act on it. So far, therefore, we are quite agreed with the Tablet about it. And we are sorry to find that all Roman Catholics do not agree with the Tablet on this subject; for Mr. Bowyer, an English Roman Catholic lawyer, who is member for Dundalk, did actually support this proposal in Parliament: on which the Tablet observes, "English lawyers have never been famous for their respect for the Holy See."

But our present question is with the power of the Pope to grant dispeosations to people to do what is wrong.

The law now restrains men from marrying their wives' sisters. Some people try to get up an outcry against that law. The Tablet condemns that outcry, and says, "it is a scandalous reflection on the discipline of the Church, which has ever maintained, with zealous vigilance, these unpleasant restrictions on human extravagance."

But, if this be so, how are we to understand what the Tablet says further—"We know well that these marriages are now unlawful, and that nothing can make them innocent but the permission of the Pope?" Now, if these marriages are guilty and sinful in themselves, can the Pope give men leave to incur guilt and sin? and does his permission make it innocent to commit sin?

But the Tablet goes on to say—"The dispensation is most difficult to obtain, excepting only where sin is in question." Now, what does this mean? Does it mean that the Pope gives leave to commit sin, only where people will sin, whether they get leave or not? That seems to be the meaning; for the Tablet, in speaking of the evidence which Cardinal Wiseman gave, concerning these dispensations, says—"His Eminence was speaking of one class of dispeosations, which come from the penitentiary, and which were made, in a sense, necessary by the sins of the petitioners. . . . . Nothing was further from his thoughts, or more removed from his practice, than the issue of dispensations, by which persons of blameless life and conversation could marry the sisters of their departed wives." So it seems that to get a dispensation, a man must first commit sin, and then "the penitentiary" gives him a dispensation to continue in his sin; and that makes his sin innocent!

But, if this be so, why does not the Pope allow all his subjects to continue in sin, and make them innocent, just by giving them a license or dispensation? Should he not give fair play to all? Should not the rich and poor be on the same level in respect of sin, and of the Pope's care to free them from sin?

But the Tablet says this is not so. The Tablet says—"If the law were changed to-morrow, no English Catholic under the degree of a peer, could reasonably presume that his case could be listened to; and it passes our comprehension how any Christian can say that this is a poor man's question."

In that case it passes our comprehension, too, how "dispensation" can be a "poor man's question." But it is quite within our comprehension, why dispensation is not a poor man's question. A dispensation from the Pope costs a large sum of money. So a poor man cannot get a dispensation to continue in sin with innocence, and a rich man can. The poor man, unless he gives up his sin, must go to the devil; but the rich man need only go to the Pope and be safe in his sin.

We leave it to our readers to consider, whether sin be no sin when the Pope gives license to live in sin? And, if this be so, whether the poor man should not have license to live in sin, as well as the rich man?

SPIRITUAL POWER OF THE POPE.

In our last number we showed what differences exist in the Church of Rome about the temporal power of the Pope. Many of the greatest authorities of the Church of Rome have maintained that the temporal power of kings and princes is subject to the Pope, who has authority from God to command, and even to deprive them of their kingdoms. Many Popes have claimed and exercised this power; and none have since disclaimed it; but it still stands in the canon law, as part of the law of the Church of Rome, that it is "altogether necessary to salvation that every human creature should be subject to the Roman Pontiff."

On the other hand, Roman Catholic princes, as is natural, do generally resist and deny this doctrine; and we believe that most of the Roman Catholic laity at present do reject and deny it.

This involves serious questions. Either these Popes have falsely claimed to have a power from God, which God never gave them; or else a vast number of Roman Catholics have been, and now are, resisting a power which God has given to the Popes.

It is not our intention to pursue this point of the Pope's temporal supremacy any further at present; but if any of our Roman Catholic correspondents are disposed to discuss it, we are ready to supply them with materials in plenty.

But our present object is to ask, whether Roman Catholics are better agreed among themselves about the spiritual supremacy of the Pope.

Here, at least, we might expect to find Roman Catholics agreed; and yet it is far otherwise. For many ages past the Roman Catholic Church has contained in it two parties who hold opposite views about the Pope's spiritual supremacy; and these two parties continue to differ about it at this day.

One party thinks that the Pope is only the chief servant of the Church, and subject to the Church.

The other party thinks the Pope is lord and master of the Church, and that the Church is subject to him.

But it is better that we should give these two opposite views of the spiritual supremacy, from the writings of most eminent Roman Catholic divines, and not from our own. We, therefore, give the best and clearest statements we can find of the two different opinions.

We take the first statement from the learned Æneas Sylvius.

NO. I. ÆNEAS SYLVIUS.

"It is the opinion of all those who are dead, if that ought to be called an opinion, which is fortified with sufficient authorities, that the Pope of Rome is subject to the universal Church; neither dare those who are living deny it. But they venture on this, to make a doubt among some, whether that should also be believed concerning a general council. For there are some, whether desirous of distinction, or that by flattery they expect rewards, who have begun to preach certain strange and altogether new doctrines, and are not afraid to exempt the Pope from the jurisdiction of the holy council; for ambition has blinded them, from whom not only this modern schism, but all schisms to this day, are found to have arisen. . . . . They who are half ashamed to beg, do chiefly support this heresy of to-day, of whom one cries out, that the actions of those subject to him are to be judged by the Pope, but that the Roman Pontiff is reserved to the judgment of God alone. Another says, that no one shall judge the first See, because that neither by the emperor, nor by all the clergy, nor by kings, nor by the people, can it be judged. . . . . These wretched men do not consider that the words they so earnestly preach are either the words of Popes extending their borders, or the words of those who flattered them; and because such words are easily answered,* they run immediately to the Gospel, and interpret the words of Christ, not as the sense of the holy spirit requires, but by their own fancy. They chiefly rely on this, that it was said to Peter—'thou shalt be called Cephas,' by which they make him head of the Church; 'I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven;' and 'whatever thou shalt bind on earth;' and 'I have prayed for thee, Peter, that thy faith fail not;' and 'feed my sheep;' and 'cast thy net into the deep;' and 'fear not, from henceforth thou shalt catch men;' and that Christ commanded Peter alone, as prince of the apostles, to give tribute for himself and for him; and that Peter drew the net to land full of great fishes; and that Peter alone drew his sword in defence of the Church; all which things these men, in an astonishing manner, set up on high, the expositions of the holy doctors being altogether disregarded."†

And Æneas Sylvius goes on to say—"Seeing the Pope is Vicar of the Church, no one doubts that a master may, at his pleasure, turn off his vicars; nor is there any doubt that the Pope is more truly called the Vicar of the Church, than the Vicar of Christ;"‡ and elsewhere, "whatever some men say, I cannot agree with those who call the Pope the Head of the Church, unless, perhaps, a ministerial head;§ for we read that Christ is Head of the Church, not the Pope."¶

We take this passage as a fair statement of the views of a very large party, including even whole nations and churches in the Church of Rome.

For Æneas Sylvius wrote this in defence of the Council of Basil.

That Council of Basil, in its second session, about the year 1432, had renewed a decree formerly made in the General Council of Constance, in these terms—

"This Synod, lawfully called in the Holy Spirit, and constituting a general Council, and representing the Church militant, has power immediately from Christ, to which every one, of whatever state or dignity, even though it should be the Papacy itself, is bound to obey in those things which relate to faith, or to the extirpation of the aforesaid schism, or to the general reformation of the Church of God, in its head and in its members."¶

And in their 32nd session the Council pronounced this decree, which makes the Council without the Pope supreme, and binds the Pope to obey it, to be "a verity of the Catholic faith."

This decision of the Council of Basil has been, of course, condemned as heretical at Rome; and the decree of the Council of Constance, which the Council of Basil only confirmed, has always been reprobated at Rome, although the Church of Rome expressly acknowledged the General Council of Constance as a general council, and infallible!

But the French Church has always acknowledged what was thus decided at Constance and Basil to be true and right. This is the main point of what is called the "Gallican liberties." And though the Gallican doctrine for the last few years has seemed to be forgotten in France, yet it is now rapidly reviving; and the Archbishop of Paris is known to be in favour of it. And this is what the Tablet meant (Dec. 23, p. 809), when it exclaimed in a rage against "the new sprung veneration for Bossuet;" for Bossuet was a famous French bishop who ably supported the Gallican liberties.

So the defence which Æneas Sylvius wrote at the time for the decree of the Council of Basil, may well be taken as expressing the sentiments of a large party in the Church of Rome, which exists to this day.

But we come now to the other view of the spiritual supremacy of the Pope, which is, perhaps, the one generally advocated in Ireland at this day, though it was far from being so general fifty years ago. In this case, too, we give the statement from a great authority, Pope Pius II.

NO. II.—POPE PIUS II.

"As cranes follow one; as among bees, one is queen; so in the Church militant, which is like the Church triumphant, one is the ruler and judge of all; from whom, as from THE HEAD, all power and authority is derived to the subject members, which power flows immediately to him from Christ the Lord our God. Nor truly has Christ chiefly imparted supreme authority to any other as the leader of his army, except to his own vicar, who first was Peter, to whom we have known that the care of the Lord's flock was committed. Nor do the evangelists make mention of two or more Peters, nor did the Lord institute two or more, who should hold his place as equal heads; but he appointed one, as the head, and leader, and pastor of the universal flock, Simon Peter, saying—'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church; and I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven;' and 'feed my sheep.' Which things are read to have been specially said to no other but Peter, so that unity and the highest authority is contained in Peter. Nor is any other but Simon called Peter, from the rock (Petra); that we might understand that Simon Peter is the only one who holds the place of that true and solid rock—that is, of Christ, as Paul expounds it; who alone drew his sword for his master when exposed to danger. Peter, therefore, and his successors, the Roman pontiffs, held the primacy in the Church. . . . And whosoever is set over the Roman Church, according to the canonical rules, as soon as he is elected in the sacred college, obtains supreme power immediately from God, and diffuses it in order through the whole Church, whose sins are to be left to be punished by the divine judgment."* And again, "Whoever has sat as chief priest of Rome, rightly appointed in the legitimate way, of election, called by God like Aaron, all people, all kings, all clergy, all bishops have venerated him as the vicar of Jesus Christ, and the successor of blessed Peter, the head, and ruler, and leader of the universal Church."†

We ask our readers to mark carefully how contrary these two statements are to each other.

1. Æneas Sylvius says it is not the Pope, but Christ, who is the head of the Church. Pius II. says the Pope is the head of the Church.

2. Æneas Sylvius says the Pope is only the Vicar of the Church, and not the Vicar of Christ. Pius II. says the Pope is the Vicar of Christ.

3. Æneas Sylvius says the Pope is subject to the Church. Pius II. says the Pope is ruler of the Church.

4. Æneas Sylvius says that the Pope may be judged by a general council, and that it is heresy to deny it, or to say that the Pope can be judged by God only. Pius II. affirms that the Pope can be judged by God only.

5. Æneas Sylvius ridicules the attempt to prove the supremacy of the Pope out of the passages commonly quoted about Peter, and especially that one, which does look a poor proof, of Peter having drawn his sword. Pius II quotes all these passages, the sword included, to prove the supremacy of the Pope.

Thus it appears how opposite are the two views of the spiritual power of the Pope, which have each been so widely held in the Church of Rome.

That these views are, in fact, so opposed, that one must be rejected in order to hold the other, is very plainly shown by Pius II. himself, who emphatically says—"Æneam rejicite, Pium recipite"—"REJECT ÆNEAS, AND RECEIVE PIUS."

Our readers will, perhaps, be surprised to learn (and we trust their surprise will be instructive as well as amusing) that Æneas Sylvius and Pope Pius II. were the same man! But so it was. As Æneas Sylvius (before he was Pope) he exposed the extravagant claims made for the Popes, and said that these were only the words of "Popes extending their own borders," or the words of those who flatter Popes. But when he himself became a Pope extending his own borders, and listening to his own flatterers, then he could find nothing to prove his own claims by, except the very arguments which formerly he had said were "easily answered!"

Here, then, we find the Roman communion itself quite divided about the extent and nature of the Pope's spiritual power. One large body of them leaving him hardly any; another large body maintaining that God has given all power to the Pope.

Either Popes have been falsely usurping spiritual powers which God never gave them, or millions of Roman Catholics have for ages been denying and disputing the powers which God gave to the Pope.

We trust that the statements we have given of the two opposite opinions, both given under such different circumstances, by one who was a wise and learned man, will help our readers to judge which opinion has the most honest foundation, and which has rested on usurpation and flattery.

RECENT CONTROVERSY AT BOULOGNE.

SIR—I think it scarcely fair to the pressure upon your limited space, and to the excellence of your other contributions, to trespass any longer upon the pages of the LAYMAN, especially as the account of this controversy already given is quite sufficient to show the mode in which it was conducted. I shall, therefore, with your permission, conclude with the present number, unless some reason may subsequently occur to show the continuation to be desirable.

The discussion was mainly confined to the question of infallibility. I had proposed it because, as it is the doctrine upon which the whole claims of the Roman Catholic Church really rest, I felt that being the most important doctrine, it was that one which its advocates were supposed to be best capable of defending. I, on the other side, felt assured I could show it to be impossible of proof. Thus the subject was one not only the most important, but, likewise, that which Roman Catholic controversialists should be most willing and best able to establish. I declared myself content to rest my whole cause upon the proof of this doctrine.

My own argument was, in fact, just that which any one who maintains infallibility ought, if that doctrine be true, to be able most easily to answer, because it was simply an examination of the steps necessary to prove it—nothing more.

It is evident that the main support of the doctrine is the passage—"Thou art Peter," &c. Therefore, because it is, in the judgment of Romanist writers, their strongest text, I was ready to rest my case on it, as I should have been on any other.

Roman Catholics have never yet decided whether it be the Church, or the Pontiff, or both, who are infallible.

This indecision is, of itself, sufficient to show how little really can be made from the passages of Scripture alleged in proof. However, though my two opponents disagreed on this very essential point, we entered upon this text as a proof of papal infallibility and jurisdiction.

Now, it is clear that in order to establish the doctrine from it (or from any other which speaks of Peter), three distinct steps are indispensable, or the claim falls to the ground. It must be shown—first, that this passage (or any other) does really convey, or promise, infallibility or supreme jurisdiction to Peter; secondly, that the same prerogatives are declared to be continued to his (presumed) successors; and, thirdly, that such successors are, solely, the Roman Pontiffs. If any of these three separate propositions be incapable of clear proof, the whole claim is destroyed. I felt sure that each of the three was thus incapable.

Now, then, for the first of these steps (the same mode of argument applying, of course to all). I put the question, and I believe the difficulty—how do you propose to prove it? There are but three modes of proof—infallibility, private interpretation, or the universal consent of the Fathers.

The first of these must be set aside, since it cannot be assumed for proof of itself. The second is subject to all the uncertainty which, according to the Roman Catholic doctrine, attends and invalidates it.

The only available medium of proof then is, what the

* If our readers will look back to our number for January, 1854, in the article "Forged Decretal Epistles, No. II.," page 3, columns 1 and 2, they will find that the two things which Æneas Sylvius reports to be cried out by the supporters of the Pope in his day—viz., "that the Roman Pontiff is reserved to the judgment of God alone," and that "neither by the emperor, nor by all the clergy, nor by kings, nor by the people can he be judged," are both taken from the forgeries of the middle ages, and have no other foundation. Æneas Sylvius, who was a really learned man, might, therefore, well say, that these things could be easily answered. But our readers will be surprised when they come to the end of this article, and learn by whom these things, so easily answered, were again set up.

Roman Catholic Church asserts it possesses, the universal consent of the Fathers.

I then put the simple question—produce now plain statements which show that the Fathers did really interpret this text as conveying infallibility and jurisdiction to St. Peter. Give me nothing else than proof of what you assert—that they really did concur in your interpretation.

I should suppose I was here only putting the question just in the very way in which a Roman Catholic, if this claim be true, would wish me to put it. It is clearly the most direct way of testing a valid proof.

I need scarcely say no advocate of that Church has ever yet stood this test. Their whole argument here is the common sophism of ignoratio elenchi. They produce extracts which prove not this fact, but something else which they hope may be mistaken for it. On the other side, the Protestant controversialist need only, because of the claim made to universality of consent by his opponents—a claim which, be it well remembered, they are forced to make—produce a single accredited writer who interprets the passage in a different sense. Your readers can judge whether the quotations made from the Fathers were relevant or not. To assume infallibilty when called on to prove it is, a petitio principii. The argument from the Fathers is, as used by Romish writers, an ignoratio elenchi. These are the two great sophisms of the Roman Catholic Church in its attempted proof of the cardinal doctrine of infallibility.

On the other side, when, as the only chance left, private judgment is used as an interpreter, the Protestant controversialist is enabled to urge an unanswerable argumentum ad hominem.

My opponents, as other advocates of their Church, endeavoured to escape from this difficulty by asserting, that upon the Protestant principle of interpretation their claim could be made out. To this I replied, as any one would, such mode of proof is not, upon your own principles, open to you; you contradict them in using it. You have, however, really no option in the matter, and must, at last, whether you like it or not, come to that mode of proof, though, in doing so, you prove both your own inconsistency and the truth of the Protestant principle, which you affect to decry.

It will be observed that, as yet, we were but upon the first step of the argument—namely, the proof that the Fathers did unanimously interpret the words—"Thou art Peter," &c., as conveying infallibility and jurisdiction of power over the whole Church of God to Peter. Whether all, or even one among them all, did explicitly so say, can be easily decided by any person who considers even the passages which Romanist writers, and my opponents, adduce as the strongest.

But, now, let us suppose they did with one voice do, what not one among them did—interpret the passage, as giving these prerogatives to Peter. Yet, there is then the question—Were those prerogatives held to be transmissible? were they not personal to Peter? even allowing this passage (or any other) to speak at all of infallibility and jurisdiction.

How can it be proved that these privileges (allowing them to be contained in those words) were intended by the Lord to be transmissible to any line of men.

This was the second step of the proof indispensable to be made out by Roman Catholic controversialists, or the claim fails.

To this second step I applied just the same test which I had already applied to the first. You cannot use your infallibility for that interpretation; nor can you employ your own judgment. You have nothing left but the universal consent of the Fathers. Therefore, produce now extracts from their writings by which it shall unmistakeably appear that they did, with one voice, declare their belief that this passage did say those privileges of infallibility and jurisdiction were hereditary.

I added here, I desire to direct your attention strongly to this, because I consider it to be the real strength of my argument.

The controversy was here brought to a sudden and very unexpected termination.

Mr. Gretton said—We may go on for ever at this rate. I shall take a course which you may possibly think Jesuitical. I say the passage does convey that meaning; you assert it does not. I shall assert the direct reverse of anything you maintain. How, then, can we end? I replied—This is to surrender your case as incapable of proof. It will bring the discussion at once to an end. Mr. Gretton refused to give any other answer.

I grieve to say, that the young lady on whose account I had, though an entire stranger to me, undertaken a long journey, and a very unpleasant controversy, here interposed, and said—"You have engaged in this controversy on my account, I demand, therefore, that you change your mode of proceeding. You must, I insist on it, give up your attack, and show to me some 'better way' than that of the Catholic Church."

To this I answered—"That 'better way' is in the Church you have quitted. But I now warn you of what you are doing. You have interfered at the most essential part of my argument, as I have declared this to be. You are striving to shield your own advocates from certain defeat. Is it not utterly unreasonable of you to demand that I should, as I certainly shall not do, give up what I conceive to be the right mode of proceeding, and adopt a bad one?"

Notwithstanding this, the young lady persevered in her demand, and Mr. Gretton in his refusal.* I, therefore, said—So far as I am concerned, this controversy is ended. I am ready to defend the Church of England at the proper time; but I will not be turned aside at the crisis of our discussion to do so. If Mr. Gretton persists in his refusal, he terminates the controversy. I shall then be ready to defend the doctrines of the Church of England.

The following are briefly the objections made—

Mr. Langdon endeavoured to show the Church of England not to be a true Church, because she did not come up to the conditions of a Church in Ephesians iv.—"One Lord, one faith, one baptism." He said, Protestants, differing among themselves, had not "one faith." That Mr. Gorham, the Bishop of Exeter, and the Archbishop of Canterbury differed about baptismal regeneration! therefore, the Church of England had not "one baptism."

The answers are, of course, very plain—

As to "one faith," he was confounding the articles of the Established Church with the opinions of individuals on subjects not determined by the articles. The faith of the Church of England was manifestly "one," being always in accordance with that of the Church of Christ, derived solely from the Bible, concentrated in the creeds, and maintained in the four great general councils. The Church of Rome, by his own argument, could not be the true Church. It had not "one faith." Its articles differ from those of the primitive Church. No early creed contained them; yet the creeds were the accredited summaries of faith. Pius IV. added new articles. The Church of Rome admitted that communion in one kind was neither the doctrine nor practice of the primitive Church. The immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary was a plain novelty. The faith of the Romish Church, among all Churches, had the least title to be one.

As to "one baptism." If Mr. Langdon can get any one to agree with him in translating ἓν βαπτισμα, "a community of view as to the doctrine of baptismal regeneration," his argument might stand—but not till then.

Mr. Langdon read extracts from various writers against the Church of England, and in favour of Rome: among them from Mr. Macaulay, who, in a well-known passage, says—"She may still exist in undiminished vigour when some traveller shall take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul."

To this I replied—Opinions of men are not to be considered as doctrines of the Church of England; that it would be easy to produce numbers of Roman Catholic writers who spoke of the corruptions of the Church of Rome; that as to Mr. Macaulay, it was easy to neutralize the passage which Mr. L. had read, by producing another from the same writer, in which he speaks of the debasing influence of the Church of Rome, as now constituted, in terms of strong condemnation. I then read the striking passage, which declares that the transition from a Roman Catholic country to a Protestant may be known from the different appearances of each; that, for the last three centuries, "to stunt the growth of the human mind has been the chief object of the Church of Rome."

Mr. Langdon's reply to this was—That the passage I had quoted referred only to temporal things; that Protestants looked to them, and did advance in civilization! that he could not but admire the goodness of God, who had given some comforts to Protestants in this world, seeing they would have none in the world to come!

Mr Gretton then endeavoured to convict the Church of England of a contradiction. In her catechism she said, "the body and blood of the Lord are verily and indeed taken," &c., while in one of her articles, she denied transubstantiation.

The answer, of course, was—There is a wide difference between the words "real" and "corporal." There is no inconsistency whatever in the doctrine of the Church of England. She denies a "corporal," and maintains a "real" presence in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. She specifically mentions and condemns that form, or phase of a corporal presence, known as the doctrine of transubstantiation, which is the most absurd and inconceiveable of all modes of "a corporal" presence.

Again Mr. Gretton sought to fix another inconsistency on the Church of England, because she allows the Church to be a witness or keeper of Holy Scripture, and yet denies her infallibility. It was not clear whether he meant this as an inconsistency, or as an error in doctrine.

In either case, the reply was plain. The assertions of the Church relate to different things. In the one article the Church of England speaks of the Church as a witness to the canon of Scripture, whereas, Mr. G. spoke of her infallibility as an interpreter of it. The credit of the Church at large, as a witness testifying to a matter of fact, was a very different thing from the claim of a section of that Church to infallibility as an interpreter. The Church of England did not assert the testimony to be infallible. When she denied the interpretation to be so, there was neither inconsistency nor error.

Mr. G. then spoke of the absolution services, and maintained that the Church of England held and denied the doctrine of the Church of Rome. The reply is too well known to be repeated. Your readers can see from these objections how little force there is in the charge of inconsistency made against the Church of England.

I proposed to take the peculiar doctrines of the Church seriatim, and discuss them either in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, or in an accredited French paper. I said I was ready to go through the controversy, if Mr. Gretton, and his friends, would accept the proposal. Written controversy would induce caution of statement. Every proposal was declined.

I have to add, that I was aware fully, ere I undertook this discussion, of its hopelessness to all human judgment; the young lady being quite satisfied of the truth of the doctrines of the Church of Rome. But no matter how hopeless to human view may be the expectation of a good result in any such like case, I trust I shall ever be ready to undertake it, when it is in my power to do so. Were another case of the same character to occur, I would do as I have done in this, and commit the result to God, whose strength is made perfect in weakness. I did, however, expect in this discussion to do what I was sure I could do, and so declared—namely, to show that it was impossible for any Roman Catholic controversialist to defend his faith without resorting to the defence of irrelevancies and subterfuges; that the true point at issue was ever evaded, and that the effort always was to hide the disingenuity of defence; and that the religion which not only required such unworthy defences, but could, moreover, blind men of natural truth and candour to so much dishonesty as to make them employ it without, I have no doubt, in many cases, feeling its criminality, could never be the religion of Christ Jesus, which, by manifestation of truth, commends itself to the conscience of men. Whether I have done this, the readers of your paper are, perhaps, among the best judges in the world.

I have now only to account for the undue share of space which I have made my own arguments to occupy.

I had offered—the offer was repeated by a friend—that each party should write out his own arguments, and, on mutual correction, the whole should be published. This was refused. My opponents published an account quite different from the real facts, not only without allowing me to see the MSS., but against the remonstrance of a friend, who, on learning the purpose, offered, on my part, to give every facility to a true publication.

This report of my opponents I have, and from it I have taken their arguments, so far as they have been there given. The form is condensed; the argument being merely stated.

Each man is familiar with his own mode of stating things. I had long been used to one way of conducting the argument against infallibility. I could remember my own form of statement, even to the words. I could not do the same for my opponents. Hence, in order to secure verbal fairness, I was anxious they should write out their case, and allow me to do the same for mine; this being refused, I had no option but to state my own arguments in my own way, giving those of my opponents from their condensed account, and from my own notes. Hence, the disproportionate length which I have given to myself.

I am, dear Sir,
Very truly Yours,
EDW. B. MOERAN, D.D.

* A gentleman present at this discussion has published, at Boulogne, an able letter upon it; he declares therein that, upon remonstrating with Mr. Gretton afterwards upon the manner in which he had brought the controversy to its abrupt conclusion, that gentleman admitted to him "it was a trick!"

INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Agreeably to my promise, I now bring forward other passages from the Sacred Volume which demonstratively prove the infallibility of the Church. I affectionately call the attention of your truth-seeking and common-sense readers to those very plain and convincing passages. In our Lord's last discourse with his apostles He thus addresses them—"All power is given to me in heaven and in earth. Going, therefore, teach ye all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and, behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world."—St. Matt. xxviii. 18, 19, 20. It is plain that the apostles were not to live unto the end of the world, and, hence, their successors must be implied in the promise. It is equally plain, that if Jesus Christ be with them to the consummation of ages, they cannot fall into error against faith.

We read in St. Matthew (xviii. 17) these words—"And if he will not hear the Church, let him be to thee as the heathen and publican." From this, I think, it undeniably follows that a Church exists, that we are bound to hear her under pain of damnation, and that we would not be commanded to listen to her voice under such a grievous penalty, unless it were impossible for her to lead us into error, since it would be unreasonable to condemn us for not believing a seducer. The meaning which you, Mr. Editor, attach to this passage reminds me of the verse—

> "By various texts we both uphold our claim—
> Nay, often ground our titles on the same:
> After long labour lost, and time's expense,
> Both grant the words, and quarrel for the sense."

Indeed, the verse is as applicable to all the controverted points, as well as to the one just given from St. Matthew; but the potent deciders—common sense and disinterest—ought to be allowed to put an end to the quarrel.

Infallibility of the Church is also proved—expressly and irrefragably—from the holy Apostle Paul's first Epistle to Timothy, third chapter and fifteenth verse, where he terms this unerring guide—"The Church of the living God, the pillar and the ground of truth;" and, in his Epistle to the Ephesians, he describes the tender concern of Christ for His divine spouse—"That he might present her to himself without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing." What, Mr. Editor, can be more secure from falling into error than the very pillar of truth? What more pure and inviolate in faith than the "glorious Church" of Jesus Christ our Lord, which He has presented to Himself without wrinkle and without stain?

Again, Protestants, by denying the infallibility of the Church, leave the Holy Book without a single witness to say that it was divinely written. We believe the Scriptures, because they contain the pure word of God, and were written by divine inspiration. But, setting aside the authority of the Church, men cannot have a certain knowledge that all the books of Scripture were written in that manner. St. Augustine positively declared to the Manichees that he would not believe the Gospels themselves, unless the authority of the Church induced him to it. Now, I ask your readers, of what use would that authority be, upon which St. Augustine so confidently relied, unless it was infallible? Indeed, it would be utterly worthless.

That holy doctor advances nothing but what is evident to common sense; for no book is Scripture, because it says it is so; otherwise the Alcoran might be such. Much less is any book Scripture, because it is written in an humble, grave, serious, or majestic style; for although this dress becomes the word of God, yet it no more makes it to be so than purple makes a king, or gives him a title to the crown. Neither is a book Scripture because it contains nothing but what is true; for all true relations of things are not Scripture. How, then, is it possible for mankind to have, without a miracle, a certain assurance that such and such books (written near two thousand years ago) are Scripture, if the Church, by which they are recommended as books written by divine inspiration, be fallible?

"This is the Holy Church, the one Church, the true Church, the Catholic Church, which combats all heresies. She may fight, but she cannot be overcome. All heresies have gone out from her like useless branches lopped off from the vine, but she remains in her root, in her vine, in her charity. The gates of hell shall not overcome her."—St. Augustine. I will conclude with this quotation, which, I am bold to assert, is worth all the arguments you could advance on the other side.

I remain, Sir, your humble servant,

WILLIAM ROUREE.

1st March, 1855.

P.S.—I will, with your permission, accede to the request of your correspondent "A," in my next letter.—W. R.

When first Mr. Rourke favoured us with his communications, we did not think it strange that his first letter should contain a number of arguments and texts of Scripture which had been amply discussed in our pages previously; we looked upon him then as a new reader of our paper; and, for the benefit of our other new subscribers, we entered again into a full discussion of all that Mr. Rourke had to bring forward; but when he brings forward over again the same texts and arguments to which we have already replied, and that without taking the least notice of what we said, we think we have some reason to ask, how often we are expected to slay the slain? We do not see how any controversy can be brought to a conclusion unless each of the disputants condescend to take some little notice of the arguments of his opponent. We beg Mr. Rourke to refer to our answer to his very first letter (vol. ii. 121), which contained a very full examination of every text he now brings forward. Unless he can state that the interpretations we there give are erroneous, he has no right to present us with his refuted arguments.

On the present occasion we are spared the necessity of proving that Mr. Rourke has failed in his attempt to establish the infallibility of the Church by Scripture proof, since the second part of his letter is a refutation of the first. The second part of this letter is an attempt to show that we have no ground on which to rest the authority of Scripture except the infallibility of the Church. Now, how can any one prove the infallibility of the Church by Scripture proofs, if we must first believe the infallibility of the Church before we can have any certainty as to the authority of Scripture? We have, therefore, earnestly to request, that Mr. Rourke will tell us plainly, in his next letter, which line of argument he means to follow. Let him take his choice which he will prove, the infallibility of the Church by Scripture or the authority of Scripture by the infallibility of the Church. But he cannot do both; if he chooses to prove Scripture by the Church, we beg he will tell us where he finds the Church, and how he knows it to be infallible; and if he chooses to prove the infallibility of the Church by Scripture, we ask how he can consistently maintain, that before we have found the Church we can ascertain what is Scripture, and what is the meaning of it? We shall look anxiously to Mr. Rourke's answer to this question?

THE LIVING ROSARY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In the tract called the "Living Rosary," published by James Duffy, 10, Wellington-quay, Dublin, 1846, he states, that it commenced in the city of Lyons, in the year 1826, and that "his holiness, Gregory XVI., was graciously pleased to give it his solemn sanction and approbation, and issue a brief in confirmation of it."

The publisher gives the brief in extenso, in which the Holy Father "grants to all the faithful in Christ, of both sexes, who are enrolled amongst the servants of the Virgin, according to the practice of the devotion which they call the living rosary, a plenary indulgence." And then the Pope adds—"But endeavouring on this, that the minds of all may be influenced with a more intense desire of respect, love, and devotion towards the Virgin Mary, and, whilst we, therefore, seek to furnish incentives to those even who are already running on, by proposing a most abundant reward of indulgences, we, at the same time, most earnestly urge this, that all diligently discharging also the other duties of religion, charity, and the virtues, and their morals being made conformable to the rules of Christian profession, they would present themselves more dear to the most holy mother, who promises that they shall possess eternal life, who shall have endeavoured to make her honoured."

May I beg to call the attention of your Roman Catholic correspondents to the last clause above. Perhaps some of them would, through the LAYMAN, kindly inform your readers, at what time did the most holy mother make the above promise? and to whom did she first reveal it?

It would also be desirable to know, has the power of promising eternal life, which the Pope ascribes to the Virgin, been made a dogma of faith? if so, by what councils, and when? I am, Sir, faithfully yours, W. M.

WHAT IS A GHOST?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

YOUR HONOR—I once wrote a letter that you printed,* and I'm going to write another, for I'm puzzled entirely with a story I read in the last CATHOLIC LAYMAN. Your honor took it out of a book written by one of the saints, but I can't neither call his name nor spell it. I can spell any of the blessed apostles, thank God; but it's a poor thing that I can neither call nor spell the saints; for how will I pray to them if I can't spell their names? But sure your honor will know the man I mean, and that will do. [It must be St. Alphonsus Liguori—see our last number, p. 29.—Editor.] Well, your honor, I'm bothered a good deal with ghosts, for I've got a farm now, and there's an old church-yard at the back of the byre, and when the girls goes out to milk there's all kinds of work, and when the boys goes to mind the cattle at night it's as bad; and whatever the boys and girls does, there's still a ghost in the church-yard to lay the blame on. Well, your honor, it wouldn't do at all, for the business wasn't done, with their tricks; so I set about thinking, and, says I, the ghosts isn't it; for them that's buried, says I, their bodies is in under the ground, and their souls is either in purgatory—if there be such a place—or else their souls is either in heaven or hell, and then how can the dead people be askerreting about the church-yard of a night, says I; so I'll have no more of it, says I, but I'll see the business done in byre and barn. Well, with sticking to that I got things mighty quiet, and there was no more bother with the ghosts. But, now, if the saint's story is true, I am wrong entirely, and I'm in dread the ghosts will be as bad as ever; for, your honor sees, what done the job was this—that their bodies was under the earth, and their souls was in their own proper places, wherever that be; so the dead people couldn't be there, stopping the business; for, look at the saint's story about them two young reprobates that went to the bad house; and one of them goes home to bed; then the other comes to him, and what does he say? Why, he says, "my body is lying dead in the street," says he, "and my soul is away in hell," says he; "and here I am myself," says he. Now, your honor, who was he, or what was he at all? He wasn't his body, for that was in the street; he wasn't his soul, for that was in hell; and is there anything else in a man to make himself? so who was he at all? Now, your honor, I'm thinking may be he was about as humbugging a ghost as them that the boys and girls makes in the church-yard, just to cover their own tricks; and I don't want your honor to be setting up the boys and girls again with their ghosts, and telling them the saints is for it, when I go through the church-yard myself every night of my life, and never seen anything in it worse than myself. So I hope your honor will consider it, and tell how he couldn't be there, when his body wasn't in it, nor his soul neither, by his own story.

Your humble servant to command,

PAT MURRAY, of Westmeath.

* CATHOLIC LAYMAN, October, 1851.

We think there is much sense in our correspondent's ideas about ghosts. A man is composed of two parts—one is his body, the other his soul or spirit. The word "ghost" means nothing else but the soul or spirit of a man. It is all nonsense to talk about a man's "ghost" being where his body is not, and where his soul is not. But our correspondent need not be uneasy about the story we told out of the "Glories of Mary," by Alphonsus Liguori, for in the first page of Liguori's book we find the following:—

"PROTESTATION.

"In obedience to the decrees of (Pope) Urban VIII., I protest that of the miraculous deeds and gifts ascribed in this work to certain servants of God, and not already approved by the Holy See, I claim no other belief than what is ordinarily given to history resting on mere human authority."

Now, if the writer of the book himself finds reason to protest that he does not think his own stories any more entitled to belief than the stories of ghosts which our friend Pat Murray has heard on the mere human authority of his boys and girls, we do not see why any one else should put any more faith in them. It does seem strange that "saints" who may have the Word of God, that cannot lie, should chose rather to support their moral lessons with lying stories, which they themselves do not firmly believe; but since such is the case, our friend Pat Murray will do well to disregard such stories, and follow his own sensible plan of making the boys and girls do their business, and never allowing them to see anything worse than themselves. Let him stick to that and he won't be far out.

NOTES AND QUERIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Can you, or any of your correspondents, inform me—1st, When the Church of Rome first omitted God's commandment against image worship, from the Decalogue? and 2nd, When the Bishop of Rome first claimed universal obedience as Jesus Christ's Vicar, as being necessary to salvation?

Yours, &c.,

G. F.

There is some little difficulty in replying to the first of our correspondent's questions, owing to the form in which it is put. The Church of Rome only holds herself responsible for those formularies which she has expressly authorized; and our correspondent will find the Second Commandment given in full in the Catechism of the Council of Trent. Nevertheless, it is certainly true that this commandment is omitted from a great number of the popular Roman Catholic Catechisms which are in common use, both in this and other countries. We do not know at what particular time this omission began to be practised, as most of the works to which we refer are of a very ephemeral kind, and are frequently varied from time to time.

We believe that the first Bishop of Rome who claimed universal obedience to himself, as being necessary to salvation, was Boniface VIII., who occupied the Papal chair at the end of the 13th century. An extract from his famous Bull, entitled "Unam Sanctam," in which this claim is made, will be found by our correspondent in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN for March of the present year (p. 30).

Perhaps some of our other correspondents may be able to afford "G. F." fuller information on the points to which his letter refers.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR APRIL.

[From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.]

April Wheat may be sown about the 10th of the month. It appears from the discussion lately in the GAZETTE, that this species does not do so well when sown much earlier; but that if sown any time about the middle of the month it is a most profitable crop, yielding well and fetching a fair price, and that it is a most excellent crop to sow small seeds with.

Potato planting should be proceeded with and finished without delay, as much sprouting reduces the strength of the set considerably; in fact, the potato should be planted before the eyes shoot out at all.

Oats.—Sowing should now be finished without delay, on poor, cold soils; or if late sown, an increase in the quantity of seed is desirable, in order to prevent tillering, and uneven ripening.

Parsnips may still be sown; but, as it is getting late, we would recommend germinating as directed last month, by which a good crop may be secured, even if sown in the last week of the month.

Carrots may be sown up to the middle of the month, but we would recommend germinating the seed also.

Peas and Beans, of early varieties, may still be sown. Steep the seed in water for twenty-four hours, then roll, and cover up lightly. See directions for the two preceding months.

Spring Vetches.—Sow another breadth, mixed with oats.

Fallows, where still practised, should now get a good harrowing or grubbing, and be again ploughed up.

Paring and Burning should be proceeded with vigorously, as weather serves.

THE HOLY HOUSE OF LORETTO.

On the slope of the eastern Apennines, where the mountains jut out towards Ancona—in the northern part of the Papal States—there stands, within about two miles of the sea, the little city of Loretto. Its situation is singularly beautiful. The city is built on the brow of a hill which overlooks the blue waters of the Adriatic, studded with many a white sail. The view to the west is bounded by the ranges of the Apennines, whose bare slopes are covered, towards the base, with olive and chesnut trees, and other rich vegetable productions. The fertile valley of the Musone runs along the foot of these hills; while scattered over the plain are the remains of the pine forest which once extended for miles along the coast—

"Ravenna's immemorial wood,
"Rooted where once the Adrian wave flowed o'er," the scene of many an old Italian legend.

It is not, however, the beauty of the landscape, or the interest attached to poetic fiction, that, for many centuries, has drawn to Loretto the steps of unnumbered pilgrims from all parts of the world, and has gained for it the fame of the wealthiest and most frequented sanctuary in Christendom. Its attraction is of a very different kind. The Chiesa della Santa Casa, or Church of the Holy House, which crowns the summit of the hill on which the city is built, contains beneath its dome a building which, if the legend be true, no Christian can look upon without the deepest emotion. This building is said to be the very identical house in which the Angel Gabriel announced to the Virgin Mary the Incarnation of our Blessed Lord.

If the story of the Santa Casa of Loretto were one of the many legends once circulated in the Roman Catholic Church, which rested only on the authority of some obscure monk of the middle ages, but which have long lost all claim to popular belief, we should deem it a superfluous task to expose its weakness and improbability; but the supposed miracle of Loretto stands upon very different grounds. The crowd of devotees who, to this day, frequent the shrine of the Santa Casa, prove how generally believed is the story of its Eastern origin. Its genuineness and sacredness have been affirmed by a long succession of Pontiffs, from Boniface VIII. downwards. If ever the infallibility of the Roman Catholic Church was committed to the support of an ecclesiastical miracle, it is to that of Loretto. Pius IX. refers to it in his late Bull on the Immaculate Conception; and, as we shall presently see, even Dr. MacHale, in his last Lenten pastoral to the people of Tuam, published a few months ago, distinctly affirms the truth of the miracle. It becomes, therefore, a duty which we owe to our readers, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, to put them in possession of the chief features of this wondrous story, and to discuss its historical probabilities.

In the first place, we desire to remind our readers that a miracle is a fact, which, like other facts, must be proved by the testimony of competent witnesses. When our Blessed Lord, for example, raised Lazarus from the dead, a crowd of spectators were present who could judge, by the evidence of their senses, whether the miracle really took place. The testimony of one or more such witnesses, recorded either by themselves or by trustworthy authors, becomes an evidence to subsequent ages of the truth of the event; but in no case are we bound to believe in the reality of any historical fact or narrative, much less in the truth of any miraculous event, unless it comes to us attested by evidence which, on the face of it, bears plain marks of credibility. This principle is so obviously just, that Roman Catholic writers, who have defended the truth of the story of the Santa Casa, have endeavoured to obtain as much historical evidence in support of it as they could collect. It was felt that the mere assertion of the truth of the miracle by one or more Popes could not establish the reality of a fact, supposed to have happened centuries before their time, and of which they could, therefore, have had no personal knowledge. What the value of the historical evidence for the truth of the miracle of Loretto is, we shall now proceed to inquire; but, for the sake of persons not deeply versed in ecclesiastical antiquities, we shall commence by giving a brief account of the miracle itself, taken from the best Roman Catholic sources.

Those of our readers who are familiar with the Gospel narrative, will remember that the Annunciation to the Blessed Virgin of the Incarnation of our Lord took place at Nazareth, a town which still exists, and may be visited by any traveller in the Holy Land. "In the sixth month," writes St. Luke (i. 26), "the Angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth." Supposing, as is not improbable, that the angelic salutation took place in the house which Mary then inhabited (although upon this point St. Luke is silent), the question is, how has this house shifted its place from Nazareth to Italy? The answer which the Church of Rome gives, and to the truth of which she has pledged her infallibility, is, that the house was miraculously carried from one country to the other. The following is the account given by Natalis Alexander, one of the most learned and sober Roman Catholic writers:—

"In the first year of the Pontificate of Boniface VIII., A.D. 1294, the sacred house of the Blessed Virgin, in which she heard the angelic message, and conceived the Son of God by the Holy Ghost, was borne, by a miracle, from Dalmatia into the territory of Picenum, and settled down in a wood near Recanati, belonging to a pious matron whose name was Lauretta. Thence it derived the name of the house of the Blessed Virgin of Loretto. Moreover, it has been handed down that, by a repetition of the miracle, the house thrice changed its place in the Picenian territory within one year. On this subject the reader may consult the elegant Jesuit writer, Horatius Tursellinus, in his history of Loretto."[a]

It will be observed that Natalis Alexander states that the Holy House was miraculously borne from Dalmatia (which is on the eastern coast of the Adriatic Gulf) to Loretto, on the western or Italian side; but how did it get from Nazareth to Dalmatia? This part of the story is detailed at length by Rohrbacher, a modern Roman Catholic historian, whose statement, from its prolixity, we are obliged somewhat to abridge.†

"It was in the year A.D. 1291, on the 10th of May, about the second watch of the night, that the sanctuary of Nazareth had been deposited on the shores of the Adriatic, between Tersatz and Fiume, in a spot commonly called Rauniza by the natives of the country.

"Towards daybreak some of the inhabitants were astonished on beholding the new edifice placed in a spot where nobody had ever, up to that time, seen either house or cabin. The report of the prodigy soon spread; people flock thither, examine, admire the mysterious building. It was constructed with small square red stones, held together by cement. All are astonished at its singular structure, its air of antiquity, its oriental shape; but the thing of all others that was most inexplicable was, how it maintained the erect position it did on the bare ground, without any foundation whatever to rest upon.

"Their surprise, however, was greatly enhanced on penetrating into the interior. The chamber formed an oblong square. . . . A tolerably large door, open on one of the sides, gave ingress to this mysterious abode. On the right opened a solitary narrow window; in front, somewhat elevated, stood the altar, made of square solid stones, on which was an ancient Greek cross. Near the altar one saw a small cupboard of singular simplicity, made to hold the necessary utensils for a poor establishment. It contained small vessels, similar to those which mothers use for the purpose of feeding their infants. There was placed a statue of cedar representing the Blessed Virgin, erect and bearing the child Jesus in her arms. . . . . Such was the disposition of the holy chapel when it commenced its sojourn in Dalmatia."

Our readers will perceive, by the foregoing statements, that the history of the Holy House of Loretto involves four distinct miracles. There was, first, the transit across the Mediterranean Sea from Nazareth to Dalmatia; there was then the passage across the Adriatic Gulf, from Dalmatia to Italy; and then there must have been two further miracles, if the story of Natalis Alexander be true, that the Holy House changed its place thrice in one year after its arrival in Italy.

Tursellinus—the writer to whom Natalis Alexander refers us for further details—gives us a curious account of the cause of all this seeming capriciousness and love of change exhibited by the Santa Casa. After detailing the earlier part of the story—how the angels took up the Holy House on the 9th of May, in the year 1291, and brought it through the air into Dalmatia, distant from Galilee about two thousand miles (for our legendary authors love to be exact about dates and distances)—he goes on to say, that at first there was a mighty concourse of people that came together upon the fame of this great miracle, but their zeal continued not; whereupon the Virgin, not finding there the honour she expected, ordered the angels a second time to take the house, and transport it across the Adriatic Sea into Italy. This the angels accordingly did, and set it down in the territory of Recanati, in the midst of a wood belonging to a certain lady called Loretta. This new prodigy of the second transportation of the Holy House rekindled men's devotion to the Virgin, and there was great flocking to it from all quarters; but the situation of the chapel was an occasion of a great many robberies and villanies committed on the poor pilgrims, because the forest (of which we have before spoken) afforded shelter to the rogues and bad characters, who sallied out from it to rob and plunder those who passed by. [It appears somewhat strange that neither the angels nor the Virgin seem to have foreseen the possible bad consequences of their imprudent choice of a locality for the Santa Casa; but this objection the learned Tursellinus discreetly passes over in silence.] At length the angels thought fit to remove the Holy House from the midst of the wood, and they carried it a little farther to a mountain that belonged to two brothers, who, in a short time, made a very profitable business of it by the resort of pilgrims, and the rich presents that were made. [We may remark, by the way, how invariably money is sure to come in, sooner or later, in the narrative of these ecclesiastical miracles.] As the two brothers were not able to agree in the division of the spoil, the Virgin, continues Tursellinus, was very angry, and thought they were unworthy of the honour she had done them, and, therefore, ordered the angels to transfer it to another place. Up they, then, took it for the fourth time, and set it in the highway, where now it stands. But nobody could tell from whence this house came till a long time after, when the Blessed Virgin appeared in a dream to a certain man, an intimate friend and servant of hers, and revealed the whole matter to him, as has been just related.

† Rohrbacher, Hist. Univ. de l'Eglise Catholique, vol. xix., p. 321 et seq. Paris, 1851.

Such is the tale told by Tursellinus. And now, before we proceed to examine the evidence on which it rests, it may be right to inquire, how much of this wonderful story is the Church of Rome responsible for? We have said above that her infallibility is pledged to the truth of the miracle; and it is right that we should know to what extent she has involved the faith of the whole Roman Catholic Church in this matter.

Cardinal Lambertinus, who was afterwards Pope under the title of Benedict XIV., has given us, in his treatise on the festivals of the Virgin Mary, a satisfactory reply to this question.* He tells us, that in the Roman martyrology, under the date of December 10, there is the following entry—"The sacred house of Mary, in which the Word was made flesh, was translated to Loretto in the Picenian territory." This paragraph was inserted in the martyrology by the decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites on the 31st of August, 1669. Further, a proper service was drawn up for this day, and the sixth lesson of this service was appointed to be read as follows, by Pope Innocent XII.:—

"The house which was the birth-place of the Virgin, and consecrated by Divine mysteries, was transported out of the power of the infidels, first into Dalmatia, then into the territory of Loretto, in the Picenian province, in the time of Pope Celestine V. And it was proved to be the very same house in which the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, partly by Papal diplomas and the veneration of the whole world, partly by the continued exercise of miracles and the bestowal of heavenly benefits. In consequence of which facts, Pope Innocent XII., in order that the faithful might be more fervently stirred up, and put in mind of the worship of our most exalted mother, commanded that the translation of her Holy House, which is commemorated by an anniversary solemnity in the province of Picenum, should be celebrated by a proper Mass and office of its own."†

This addition to the proper lesson of the Mass for this festival of the translation of the Santa Casa was discussed and approved of by the Sacred Congregation of Rites (the highest authority in the Roman Catholic Church on such matters), by their decree of September 16, 1699, and the use of this Mass was subsequently extended to the Venetian, Spanish, and other states.

It is, doubtless, to this Mass that Pius IX. alludes in the following passage from his late Bull on the Immaculate Conception:—

"Our predecessors gladly granted the privilege, that in the Litanies of Loretto, and in the preface of the Mass itself, the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin should be proclaimed; and thus that the belief of the Church should be fixed and defined by its prayers."‡

According to the principle thus dogmatically laid down by the Pope himself, if the Roman Catholic Church sanctioned the Litanies of Loretto (which presuppose the truth of the miracle), she must be held to have formally declared her belief in the miracle itself.

Benedict XIV. makes mention, moreover, of various apostolical constitutions, testifying that the Santa Casa of Loretto is the very same house as that in which the Annunciation took place. The authors of these constitutions are as follows—Paul II., Julius II., Leo X., Paul III., Paul IV., and Sixtus V.§ Here, then, we have the infallible attestation, not of one but of seven Popes, to the truth of the story we have detailed. They do not, indeed, expressly assert that the Holy House was carried by angels across the sea, or that it changed its place in Italy thrice within one year. But, as regards the essential features of the story, the removal of the actual house of the Blessed Virgin, at Nazareth, first into Dalmatia, then to Loretto, and the identity of the present house with that in which the Annunciation took place, to the truth of these points the Church of Rome is pledged by the formal adoption of a solemn Mass to Almighty God, sanctioned by the authority of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, and approved of by the infallible authority of seven different Popes.

After such high authorities, it may seem almost superfluous to add, that Dr. MacHale, in his late Lenten pastoral, has taught his flock to believe in the truth of this miracle. Speaking of the Blessed Virgin, he says—"Nay, even her own native land did not escape the punishment, and God himself miraculously interposed in favour of the sacred house in which the mystery of the Incarnation took place, by transporting it to the shores of Loretto."*

And now let us inquire on what evidence this whole story really rests. Let us treat it as a plain matter of fact, to be proved or disproved, like other facts, by an examination of the reasons alleged in support of it. If satisfactory proof of the truth of the legend can be adduced, then, doubtless, however improbable the story may at first sight appear, all Christians who admit the possibility of miracles are bound to believe it. But if we can show that the story is utterly destitute of any contemporary evidence—if, further, it can be proved that, for many centuries before the supposed miracle, there was no house of the Virgin to be seen at Nazareth—and if, lastly, it be demonstrably evident that the house now shown as the Santa Casa could not have occupied the supposed site of the annunciation—if any or all of these points can be established, then we think the most credulous Roman Catholic reader must admit that the miracle is untrue, and that all the seven Popes were in error.

To begin with the first point—the utter absence of any contemporary evidence—the miracle of the first transportation to Dalmatia is said to have taken place, as we have seen, on the 9th of May, A.D. 1291. But on whose authority does this story come down to us? If Natalis Alexander, who was the first author we quoted, had himself been an eye-witness of the miracle, or if he had even lived at the time, then we must confess the tale would have much greater weight; but Natalis Alexander, like a truthful writer, takes care to tell us that he had the story from Tursellinus. And where did Tursellinus get all the particulars which we have quoted above? He does not think fit to inform us. In our search for contemporary authorities, we are are at last obliged to fall back on the following statement of the German historian, Gieseler:—

"The first writer who notices the sanctuary of Loretto is Flavius Blondus, secretary to Pope Eugene IV. (about the middle of the fifteenth century). From his remarks we may infer that the wonderful removal was then either wholly unknown or only known as a popular tradition. The first writer who mentions the account of this wonderful removal, which is now found at the sanctuary itself, is Baptista Mantuanus (Opera, Antwerp, 1576, tom. iv., p. 216). . . . . The account was undoubtedly written between 1450 and 1480, and was the means of spreading the story."†

In other words, this wonderful event, which, if true, stands unique in the history of the world, is not noticed in a single authentic document of any kind for two whole centuries; there is not a Pope who even speaks of the shrine of Loretto for one hundred and fifty years; and, then, when notice is first taken of it, it is successively mentioned by a Papal secretary, and by Pontiffs themselves, in high terms of praise, but without the most remote reference to that crowning event, which, if true, would have distinguished it far above all other Christian sanctuaries. And then, finally, the first author who mentions the miraculous removal happens to have been General of the Carmelites, an order, as he says himself, "specially decorated with the title of the mother of God;" while his sole authority for it is, by his own candid confession, found to have been nothing more than a musty, worm-eaten tablet, without date, affixed to the walls of the church itself. We ask our readers, would such evidence be admissible in a trial before a jury in any of our courts of justice? And shall we believe that the laws of nature were suspended, and a series of miracles performed, upon the faith of testimony which no judge would listen to for a single instant in a trial between man and man?

But, in the second place, have we any reason for believing that the house of the Blessed Virgin really existed at Nazareth, for 1200 years after her own time? Let us examine a few of the statements made by authors who wrote about Palestine during that period.

We will begin with the eminent writer, S. Jerome. He lived in the Holy Land for upwards of thirty years; he composed a most graphic account of all the places which he visited, and the interest which attached to each; but while Bethlehem, the birthplace of the Saviour, is described with singular minuteness, all that he remarks about Nazareth is, that the name signified the flower of Galilee, and that it was the place where Christ was brought up. Of the supposed house of the annunciation he does not say a single word.

The first author who has left any specific mention of the buildings which Nazareth contained in his day, is Adamnan, who writes as follows:—‡"Nazareth has vast stone edifices, and likewise two very large churches built there. One is in the midst of the city, constructed upon two vaults, where formerly had been built the house in which our Saviour was brought up. . . . . The other church is erected over the spot where the house had been built in which the Angel Gabriel visited the Blessed Mary, and spoke to her when he had found her alone the same hour. This information respecting Nazareth I had from the holy Arculfus, who remained there two nights and as many days."

In the days of Arculfus, therefore—that is, in the eighth century—there were supposed to have been two houses of interest at Nazareth, not one; and that in which our Lord had been brought up, was not the same with that in which the Angel Gabriel visited the Virgin Mary. Venerable Bede, who was a contemporary of Adamnan, and quotes that author in his history, plainly implies that the two houses no longer existed. "One house," saith he, "is in the midst of the city, standing upon two arches, where had formerly been the house (ubi quondam fuerat domus) in which our Lord was brought up when a child. The other church is where the house was (ubi domus erat) in which the angel came to the blessed Mary.

John Phocas made a journey to the Holy Land in A.D. 1185, and has left us a minute description of Nazareth, from which the following is an extract:—*

"In the midst of the various hills, and at the bottom of a valley formed by them, stands the town of Nazareth. Immediately on entering the first gate of this village-town, there is the Church of the Archangel Gabriel, and on the left side of the altar in it is seen a small cave, in which there is a bubbling fountain, that sends up pure streams. Here the most immaculate Mother of God, after she had been entrusted by the priests to holy Joseph, and placed under his protection, used to come to draw water daily; and here it was that she was first saluted by Gabriel; and when, in her consternation, she had gone off trembling to the house of Joseph, she heard there from the angel those words—'Hail, thou that art highly favoured.' This said house of Joseph was afterwards transformed into a most beautiful church, on whose left side, near about the altar, there is a cave. . . . Proceeding from the mouth within the cave, you come down a few steps, and thus gain a view of that which was anciently the house of Joseph, in which, after her return home from the fountain, as I said before, the Archangel saluted the Virgin. On the spot where the salutation took place, there is a cross of black stone graven upon white marble, and above it an altar, and on the right side of the said altar, a small cot (οικισκος), in which the ever Virgin Mother of God had her chamber. But on the left side of the place of the salutation is seen another small cot, without inlet for the light, in which our Lord Christ is said to have dwelt."

It is clear, therefore, that whereas, in the days of Arculfus, there were two separate churches built over spots once occupied by two distinct houses; in the time of Phocas, three centuries later, one church had been rebuilt upon one of the sites, and a cave near the high altar contained what claimed to be those two very houses. Now, among all these descriptions of eye-witnesses of the scene of the Annunciation, what trace do we find of the existence of such a house as that which now stands at Loretto? The Santa Casa is a building thirty-six feet long, by seventeen feet wide. No such house could possibly have existed at Nazareth without attracting the notice of such a devout pilgrim as St. Jerome. No remains of such a house could possibly have been standing at the time when Arculfus informed Adamnan that, as Bede says, a church was standing on the spot where the house had once been. No such house or remains of such a house could have been standing at the time when the church described by Phocas was rebuilt from its foundations.

Benedict XIV. saw the utter hopelessness of attempting to reconcile the express statements of the earlier writers with the present condition of the Santa Casa at Loretto. If the house which was the scene of the Annunciation was no longer standing in the time of Venerable Bede in the eighth century, how could it possibly be transported to Italy in the thirteenth century? If, again, we take the other alternative, and suppose the house to have been converted into a church, how does it come to pass that we now find it changed back into a house again? Nay, if we are to believe the legend of Tursellinus, the house and furniture are now in the exact condition in which the Virgin left them, eighteen centuries ago! After stating various conjectures, Benedict XIV. at last tries to take refuge in the statement of Phocas, that the "cot" in the cave was a part of the original house, and that this was the part which was moved to Loretto. But here, notwithstanding, there are absolute physical, as well as historical, improbabilities involved, which not even that most ingenious of all Popes could solve. For Phocas tells us that he saw two houses, not one; both of them within a cave, some way from the mouth, which was not wide, and subterraneous; both, too, were perfectly distinct from the actual spot of the Annunciation, which was external to them, although near them. To have got one of these houses entire and unbroken through the mouth of the cave, would have been, at least, as great a miracle as to have transported it afterwards by angelic agency to the shores of the Adriatic, and yet nothing of the kind has been recorded; besides, even so, we may still ask, would it have contained within it the scene of the Annunciation?

But, even granting, for the sake of argument, that Arculfus and John Phocas saw a fragment of the house of the Virgin, when they visited the scene of the Annunciation, have we any reason to believe that either the two churches of Adamnan, or the single church of Phocas, were in existence at the date of the alleged miracle? Alas! when the Saracens regained their ascendancy, in the year 1188, the sacred places in Palestine were successively reduced to ruinous heaps. That this fate befell the church of Nazareth in particular is rendered certain by the testimony of Pope Urban IV. He was Patriarch of Jerusalem when he was suddenly elevated to the pontificate, A.D. 1261; he must, therefore, have been intimately acquainted with the state of all the hallowed spots which, as he says himself, his eyes had seen. He announces the utter destruction of the sacred places in Nazareth, which took place in the following year, to his beloved son, S. Louis, in the following terms:—

"The Babylonian Soldan . . . laid sacrilegious and destructive hands upon the venerable church of Nazareth, . . . and destroying it entirely by means of the sacrilegious and nefarious ministers of his wickedness, he levelled it to the ground by the demolition of its illustrious edifice."*

We ask any impartial reader, can he really believe that the house of the Virgin, supposing it to have then existed, could have survived this total demolition, or would Pope Urban IV. have used the language we have quoted above, and mourned the utter overthrow of the illustrious edifice of Nazareth, if the Santa Casa had, by some good fortune, escaped the destructive rage of the Saracen king?

We may add, that the testimony of Urban IV. is confirmed by that of subsequent writers. William de Baldensel, who visited the Holy Land in A.D. 1335, thus describes the scene of the Annunciation:—†

"In this spot there was a beautiful church, and large withal; but, alas! it has been, as it were, destroyed. A small place, however, has been covered over, and is diligently guarded by the Saracens, where, near a certain marble column, they assert that the venerable mysteries of the conception were consummated."

Sir John Maundevile, who travelled a few years later, confirms this account. Speaking of Nazareth and the scene of the Annunciation, he writes thus:—

"This salutacioun was don in a place of gret aweteer of a faire Chirche, that was wont to be som tyme; but it is now alle downe."‡

One argument more, and we have done. The monks of Nazareth at the present day point out to any inquiring traveller the space which is said to have been occupied by the Holy House before its flight into Italy. This space is a vestibule in front of the grotto, into which the house is alleged to have opened.§ But the position of the grotto is, and must always have been, absolutely incompatible with any such appendage as the Santa Casa. Whichever way the house is supposed to be placed against the rock, it would have closed up with blank walls the very passages by which alone the house could be entered. A comparison of the masonry of the so-called workshop of Joseph, at Nazareth, with the material of the House of Loretto, may be considered no less fatal to the theory. The former is composed, as might be expected, of the grey limestone of the country, of which, no doubt, the houses in Nazareth were in all times built: the Santa Casa, on the contrary, is built in a manner quite unlike anything in Nazareth. It has a chimney; whereas the Abbé Michon informs us that no such appendage is ever found attached to a house throughout Palestine. The walls of the sanctuary, moreover, are built, not of the native grey stone of Nazareth, but of a red brick-like stone, which, according to the competent authority of M. Saussure, perfectly resembles the red stone of which the poorer cottages in the neighbourhood of Loretto are composed. Singly, these objections are of considerable weight; but when all are united, their force may be thought well-nigh irrefragable.

Our inquiry has been protracted, we fear, to an undue length; but it will not have been in vain, if any of our readers should be induced, by what we have written, to examine into the subject, and think for themselves. The fiction of the Holy House of Loretto is one which has exercised, and is still exercising, more practical influence over thousands of Christians than the plainest precepts of the Gospel. It has been sanctioned and defended by divines, by bishops, and by Popes; surely, then, it is an important question, is this story true, or is it false? A large portion of Christendom insists upon Papal infallibility as an essential principle of Christianity; has this Papal infallibility been solemnly pledged to a true miracle, or to a false and glaring imposture? The object of our inquiry has been to contrast the story of the Santa Casa at Loretto with authentic history; and, for ourselves, we feel persuaded that there can be but one opinion of the result—even Papal authorization cannot create a fact!

ST. LIGUORI.

It is the boast of the Church of Rome that she never leaves her children at any loss what to believe. Whenever a dispute arises as to any article of faith, we are told that she is ready with her decision, rejecting every rashly invented novelty, and pointing out, without fear of error, what opinion her followers can rightly adopt. We shall not now inquire how far the boasts of her advocates in this matter are well founded; nor shall we discuss whether her decisions on matters of belief are as prompt or as true as they are represented to be. We have given enough of instances in former articles to show that the sentence of the infallible judge is most commonly pronounced, not with the confidence of one who knows himself to be in possession of the power of discriminating, with certainty, truth from falsehood, but rather with the hesitation of one who is unwilling to risk his credit by committing himself rashly in a doubtful controversy—of one who waits to see which opinion will get the upper hand, and then, when the battle has ceased to rage, steps forward to announce the victory of the winning side. Let us, however, concede that the Church of Rome is as prompt as can be desired in telling her children what to believe; and it only becomes the more wonderful why she should be so remiss as she is in directing them what to practice.

Right practice is surely a thing of as much importance as right belief—nay (if we may draw a comparison between two things both, indispensable), right practice is the more important of the two. For the Christian religion contains no revelations calculated merely to gratify curiosity; it discloses nothing on mere speculative points which do not concern us. Everything, that we are given to believe, has a direct reference to practice, and is designed to make us, not only wiser, but better. True belief, if it have no effect upon the heart and life, is pronounced by our sacred writers to be in no respect different from that faith which the devils themselves possess. It would seem, then, that a Church which made purity of faith the object of its especial solicitude, would be in a far higher degree desirous to promote sanctity of life in all its members.

But in the system of the Church of Rome right belief is not regarded as a means to an end, but as the very highest end itself. The smallest error in an article of faith is held to be of infinitely more dangerous consequence than the grossest violation of Christian duty. A Roman Catholic will regard the most virtuous of Protestants as having less hope in his death than the most abandoned profligate who has always held the right faith. A Roman Catholic believes that an error in faith is of such fatal consequences, that God interferes by a perpetual miracle to keep the head of his Church from falling into any mistake; and yet, he holds that no such interference takes place to prevent the head of the Church from falling into sin; on the contrary, he acknowledges, without scruple, that some Pontiffs have been monsters of iniquity, prodigies of ambition, cruelty, and lasciviousness. An excellent illustration of the feelings of the Church of Rome on this subject at the present day was afforded by the celebrated Achilli trial three or four years ago. If we are to believe the statements made on that occasion by the advocates of the Church of Rome, the life of the plaintiff, while he was a member of the Romish Church, was disfigured by the grossest and most scandalous vices; and yet, those vices, though known to his superiors, were no bar to his promotion; he was advanced from step to step; and it was only when he began to doubt of the truth of the doctrines of the Church that he incurred serious censure.

It is quite in keeping with the facts we have mentioned, that, however ready the Church of Rome may be to pronounce on disputed questions of doctrine, she does not interfere at all to decide the differences that have arisen on questions of morals. There are in the Church of Rome two schools of casuists, whose principles are so opposite to each other that one can hardly believe them to be believers of the same Church. The one, the school of rigorists, inculcate with fidelity the strictest morality of the Gospel; the other lay down principles so lax and accommodating, that the man must be abandoned indeed who desires to practice more vice than he can find in their books a justification for.

We copy the following passage from Mr. Macaulay's History of England, as describing, in language more forcible than ours, the charges commonly brought against some of the moral teachers of the Romish Church:—

"It was not strange that people of all ranks, and especially of the highest ranks, crowded to the confessionals in the Jesuit temples; for, from those confessionals, none went discontented away—there, the priest was all things to all men. He showed just so much rigour as might not drive those who knelt at his spiritual tribunal to the Dominican or the Franciscan Church. If he had to deal with a mind truly devout, he spoke in the saintly tones of the primitive Fathers; but with that very large part of mankind who have religion enough to make them uneasy when they do wrong, and not religion enough to keep them from doing wrong, he followed a very different system; since he could not reclaim them from guilt, it was his business to save them from remorse; he had at his command an immense dispensary of anodynes for wounded consciences. In the books of casuistry which had been written by his brethren, and printed with the approbation of his superiors, were to be found doctrines consolatory to transgressors of every class. There, the bankrupt was taught how he might, without sin, secrete his goods from his creditors; the servant was taught how he might, without sin, run off with his master's plate; the pander was assured that a Christian man might innocently earn his living, by carrying letters and messages between married women and their gallants; the high-spirited and punctilious gentlemen of France were gratified by a decision in favour of duelling; the Italians, accustomed to darker and baser modes of vengeance, were glad to learn that they might, without any crime, shoot at their enemies from behind hedges; to deceit was given a licence sufficient to destroy the whole value of human converse and of human testimony. In truth, if society continued to hold together, if life and property enjoyed any security, it was because common sense and common humanity restrained men from doing what the Society of Jesus assured them that they might, with a safe conscience, do."

It may, however, be said that though, no doubt, passages may be selected from the writings of individual casuists, where decisions so lax as those alluded to by Mr. Macaulay, are to be found, still we are not to make the whole Church responsible for the errors of individuals. The Church may be pure and sound, no matter into what extravagancies private doctors may have fallen. But if this be so, why has not the Church condemned these extravagancies? Why is it, that in a Church which boasts to have a living judge of controversies, two such opposite schools of moralists are allowed to flourish, while private members of the Church are left in uncertainty which guide they ought to follow? Our Roman Catholic friends must forgive us if we are forced to suspect that it is only worldly policy which has kept the judge's mouth silent. We copy the explanation which Pascal has offered, of the reasons which have induced the Jesuits to tolerate two such schools of moralists in their society; for, it seems to us what Pascal says with regard to the Society of Jesus, applies equally to the whole Church.

He is relating a conversation which he had had with a friend on the subject of the Jesuit morality—

"In the conversation which I had with him, he told me such strange things that I could hardly believe him, till he showed them to me in the books of those Fathers, so that there was nothing left for me to say in their defence, but that these were the sentiments of a few individuals which it was not right to attribute to the whole body; and, in fact, I assured him that I knew some of them who were as rigid as those whom he cited were lax. It was on this that he disclosed to me the spirit of the society, which is not known by everybody, and which you will, perhaps, be glad to learn. Here is what he said—

"'You think that you are doing much in their favour to show that they have some Fathers whose teaching is as accordant with the spirit of the Gospel as that of the others is opposite to it; and you conclude thence, that those relaxed opinions do not belong to the whole society. I am quite aware of this; for if the society had adopted those relaxed opinions they would not permit any of their body to publish the opposite sentiments. But since they have some members, whose doctrine is so licentious, you, too, must admit, also, that the spirit of the society is not that of Christian severity; for in that case they would not suffer teaching so opposite to it.'

"'Well, then,' answered I, 'what can be the design of the entire body? No doubt they can have no settled plan, and every one of them has the liberty to say at random whatever he thinks.'

"'That cannot be,' replied he; 'so great a body could not exist without a soul to govern and regulate all its movements; and, besides, it is one of their express regulations that none shall print anything without the approval of their superiors.'

"'Well, but,' cried I, 'how can the same superiors consent to maxims so contradictory?'

"'This is what I must explain to you,' returned he. 'You must know, then, that their object is not at all to corrupt men's morals—such is not their design. But neither, however, is it their only end to reform men's minds—this would be bad policy. But their plan is as follows:—They have so good an opinion of themselves as to believe it to be useful, and almost essential to the good of religion, that their credit should extend everywhere, and that they should be the governors of all consciences. And because the severe maxims of the Gospel are fit for governing some sorts of people they make use of them on all occasions, when such maxims are favourable to their purpose. But as there is a large number of people with whose plans these same maxims are not found to accord; why, with regard to such people, they lay them aside, in order to be able to satisfy everybody. It is just because they have to do with people of different nations, and all sorts of conditions, that it is necessary for them to have an assortment of casuists to match all this diversity.'

"From this explanation you will at once perceive that if they had only casuists of the lax school, they would ruin their principal design—namely, that of embracing all the world—since those who are truly pious look for stricter discipline; but as there are not many of this sort of people, a few strict directors are enough to conduct them; while a crowd of lax casuists is provided for the crowd of those who prefer laxity.

"It is by this obliging and accommodating conduct, as Father Petau callast, that they open their arms to everybody; for, should any one, for example, present himself to them, who has made up his mind to make restitution of some ill-gotten gains, do not suppose that they will dissuade him from it; on the contrary, they will praise and confirm him in such a pious resolution. But should another come who wishes to be absolved without making restitution, it will go hard with them if they do not find means to gratify him. And in this way, they preserve all their friends and defend themselves against all their enemies; for, if they are reproached with their extreme laxity, forthwith they produce to the public their anstere directors, with some books which they have written on the severity of the Christian code of morals; and simple people, who do not look below the surface of things, are qnite satisfied with these proofs of the falsity of the accusation."—Provincial Letters, letter 5.

Such is the account given by this pious and eloquent Roman Catholic of the reasons which induced the Jesuit body to tolerate among them two such opposite schools of moral teachers. Pascal never dreamed of making his whole Church answerable for the doctrines which he believed to be confined to one of its religious orders. But if he had lived to our day, and if he had seen that, during the century and a half which has since elapsed, the doctrines against which he remonstrated have found in his Church hosts of plausible defenders, while no Pope has interfered to condemn them, we know not how he could have refrained from pushing his conclusions somewhat further than he advanced them. The explanation he has given, at least, shows reasons why it is exceedingly convenient that there should be, in the Romish body, divines to suit all consciences—rigid moralists for the pious, and lax casuists for the thoughtless and ungodly. Those, then, who reject this explanation, are bound to provide some other. If it be not motives of worldly policy which have kept the Pope silent, what, then, is the reason why he has never employed his infallibility to decide the important practical questions on which so many Roman Catholic divines are totally at variance among themselves?

Whatever be the reason, it causes us considerable embarrassment in our attempt to discuss the moral teaching of the Church of Rome. If we want to discuss her opinions on a hundred points of speculation, we have decrees of Popes and councils to refer to, and can tell with certainty what the authoritative teaching of the Church is. But on questions of morals she has absolutely nothing fixed or settled, and her divines assert or deny as it suits their own convenience. And, accordingly, the adversaries of that Church are quite at a loss to know what it is they have to contend against.

In this uncertainty, we are sure that we do the Church of Rome no injustice in selecting ST. LIGUORI, as the representative of her moral teaching. His work on "Moral Theology," professes to steer a middle course between the extremes of severity and laxity; and his success in the execution of his plan has been attested by the highest authority. In the year 1803, when Liguori was a candidate for beatification, all his works came under the examination of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, who decreed that in all the writings of Alphonso de Ligaori, severely examined according to the discipline of the Apostolic Seat, there was found nothing worthy of censure. We have the testimony of Monsignor Artico, Prince Prelate of the Papal Household, that this examination was made with particular severity, and that his system of morality had been more than twenty times rigorously discussed by the Sacred Congregation, and that in all their decisions the cardinals had agreed voce concordi, unanimi consensu, unâ voce, unâ mente. Further, in the year 1831, Cardinal de Rohan-Chabot, Archbishop of Besançon, propounded the following questions for the oracular response (oraculum requirit) of the Sacred Penitentiary:—1. Whether a professor of sacred theology may, with safety, follow and profess the opinions which the blessed Alphonso de Liguori professes in his "Moral Theology?" 2. Whether a confessor should be disturbed for following all the opinions of the blessed Alphonso de Liguori in the confessional, simply on the grounds that the holy Apostolic See had declared that it found nothing in his works worthy of censure? The answer given to the first question was in the affirmative. Liguori's opinions might be followed and professed with safety. The answer to the second was in the negative. No such confessor was to be disturbed in his course. This decision was formally signed and dated, as issuing from the Sacred Penitentiary, on 5th July, 1831. Immediately the Cardinal Archbishop wrote to his clergy, requiring that the "judgment of Rome should be fully adhered to, and that the opinions of the blessed Alphonso de Liguori should be followed and reduced to practice, all doubt whatever being thrown aside." Pope Gregory XVI. confirmed the decree in a few weeks, and, in 1839, Alphonso exchanged his title of blessed for that of saint.

It is not necessary for us to discuss a question which has been started by the Dublin Review, whether after all this Roman Catholics are at liberty to dispute the decisions of St. Liguori. It is enough for us that they have shown no inclination to do so. Many Protestants have objected to the lax doctrines that Liguori has sanctioned; and eminent Roman Catholic divines have replied. But not one of them has attempted to throw Liguori overboard. They all accept and defend his conclusions. If, then, Liguori is wrong, he has certainly led with him into error the majority of the bishops and teachers of his Church; and it is incredible that, if the Pope believed Liguori to be wrong, he would remain silent while he saw his clergy giving pernicious instruction to their people. We are sure, then, that we are doing the Church of Rome no injustice in identifying her teaching with Liguori's. If Liguori's teaching be subversive of the plain principles of morality, nobody can excuse from blame the Church which has bestowed its highest honours upon him, and given so strong a sanction to his doctrines. But, before we enter into a particular examination of Liguori's work on "Moral Theology," we must notice one or two preliminary objections which his defenders have advanced.

It has been said that Liguori's "Moral Theology," and the other casuistical books we object to, are musty old Latin volumes which lay Roman Catholics never look into; and, therefore, supposing even that they have not arrived at right conclusions in a few instances, this is a mere speculative question, and that their errors have done no great harm to anybody. The persons who have made this objection must have counted on very thoughtless readers. Any one who reflects for a moment that these books were written as manuals for confessors, must know that there are no books in a priest's library which are so constantly and regularly reduced to practice. The lessons given by the priest in his public addresses to his congregation may or may not be listened to; but his private instructions in the confessional are certain of being attended to, and of producing a lasting impression. Now, though we cannot be present in the confessional to hear what instructions the confessors give their penitents, yet we have in St. Liguori's works the means of learning the rules which guide the confessors, and of making ourselves acquainted with the lessons given to the penitents. No lay Roman Catholic needs to be at the trouble of consulting for himself the musty old Latin volumes in which the decisions of casuists are contained. He can have them related to him by his own priest as often as he chooses to present himself for confession. If St. Liguori has made one single mistake, if he has, in any one instance, pronounced that to be innocent which the Gospel condemns as sinful, it does not remain a mere speculative error. In thousands of confessionals the uneasy scruples of penitents are lulled to rest with the assurance that the act which has caused them remorse has been pronounced, on sufficient authority, to be no sin at all. The penitents, with disburthened consciences, go their way; they feel no fear of committing the same act again themselves, and, if they are tolerably good-natured, will take care, too, to enlighten any of their friends who may not be so well informed as themselves. And so, in a short space of time, the whole public opinion of Roman Catholic countries is infected, and the morality of Liguori supplants the morality of the Gospel.

We think, then, that it is plain that the question is no speculative one; and that if the "Moral Theology" of Liguori contain errors, it is of the greatest practical importance that these errors should be exposed.

There is another objection which Dr. Wiseman has brought against taking Liguori as a type of Roman Catholic morality. But this involves too many important topics of discussion to be brought in at the end of an article. We shall, therefore, pause here, and resume the subject in another number.

ST. BONAVENTURA'S PSALTER.

OUR readers may recollect that in our number for January we presented them with an imitation of the Te Deum, taken from a book published at Rome, in 1834, under the highest sanctions that the Roman Church supplies, entitled "Preci Quotidiane alla Madre di Dio," &c.—"Daily Prayers to the Mother of God to obtain a happy death; taken from the Psalter of St. Bonaventura."* We should, perhaps, state, for the sake of our Protestant readers, that Bonaventura was born in 1221, and died in 1274. He was of the order of St. Francis, Bishop of Albano, one of the six suffragans of Rome, and passed through all degrees of ecclesiastical dignities, short only of the pontifical throne itself. Pope Clement IV., in 1265, offered to him the Archbishopric of York, which he refused, and his successor, Gregory X., elevated him to the dignity of Cardinal Bishop. He was canonized as a saint by Pope Sixtus IV., on 14th April, 1482; was afterwards enrolled among the most illustrious doctors of the Church by another Bull of Pope Sixtus V., and his works are made the standard of their schools by the Franciscan order according to a decree of Pope Pius V.; in short, we think we shall show that it is not possible for any human authority to give a more entire and unqualified sanction to the works of any human being, than the Church of Rome has given to the writings of Bonaventura.

We stated frankly in our former article, that some eminent Roman Catholic authors had disapproved of this Psalter, and endeavoured to exonerate Bonaventura of its authorship, and their Church of its adoption; but informed our readers that its genuineness had been fully discussed and decided by a learned writer in our own country, the Rev. Robert King, in a pamphlet published by Grant and Bolton, Dublin, in 1840, and that its genuineness had, in fact, been fully sanctioned by the Church of Rome at the canonization of Bonaventura.†

Having recently, however, been informed by a respected correspondent, that the authenticity of this "Psalter" has been lately again disputed by an English Roman Catholic ecclesiastic of high position in that Church, we are induced to think it may be desirable to go a little further into proof than we were able to do in our former article, especially as we believe the same view has been adopted by other conscientious Roman Catholics, who, finding it impossible to justify the daring impiety of ascribing to any creature, however exalted, the praise due alone to the Creator, would therefore willingly believe that such an effusion has never had the sanction of their Church, but has actually been repudiated by what they believe to be an "infallible guide."

The only "authority" to which we have been referred by our correspondent in proof of the assertion that the "Psalter of the Virgin" was not really the work of St. Bonaventura is, the Rev Alban Butler's "Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs, and Saints," published in Dublin, in 1833, and reprinted in London, in 12 vols., in 1847—in a note to the 7th vol. of which latter edition, p. 161, there occurs the following passage:—"The Psalter of the Blessed Virgin is falsely ascribed to St. Bonaventura, and unworthy to bear his name.—See Fabricius in Biblioth. med. ætat., Bellarmine and Labbe, de Script. Eccl., Nat. Alexander, Hist. Eccl. Sæc xiii."

Here, it will be observed, four writers of the highest authority in the Roman Catholic Church are confidently referred to as authorities for the position that the Psalter in question is "falsely ascribed to St. Bonaventura, and unworthy to bear his name;" and that, not in an obscure publication, but in a work most extensively circulated among Roman Catholics, and highly approved of by the Roman Catholic hierarchy.*

If this statement be true, will our correspondent favour us by procuring for our readers some explanation of the fact, that a work condemned on such high authority as spurious, should be contained without the slightest hint as to its real character, not only in the first printed edition of Bonaventura's works, Strasburg, 1495, but in the Vatican edition, published at Rome, under the direct sanction of Pope Sixtus V., in 1588, in the Mentz edition, 1609, and also in that published in 1668, at Lyons (the place where St. Bonaventura himself died, and was buried); and how it comes to have been reprinted hundreds of times under his name, and translated into nearly every modern European language, as a "work of the most profound piety, worthy of the great genius of the seraphic doctor;" and, above all, how it comes to pass that in Rome itself, where the Congregation of the Index so indefatigably plies its task of prohibiting and expurgating works disapproved of by their Church, no less than ten editions of it, under the title of "Tributo Quotidiano di affettuose preghiere e lodi per ciascun giorno della Settimana alla Immacolata Madre di Dio, tratte dalle opere del Seraf. D. S. Bonaventura," should have been published in modern Italian, with the express approbation of the late Pope, Gregory XVI., between the years 1834 and 1844, to say nothing of subsequent editions during the present Pontificate?

We believe we might assert that scarcely any work of "Roman Catholic piety" has been so frequently reprinted as this Psalter, or has been more vaunted as a master-piece of profound devotion. We may here, in support of this assertion, specify some of the editions of the "Psalter of the Blessed Virgin by St. Bonaventura" which have, besides those already referred to, from time to time appeared, bearing the following dates:—Venetis, 1476; Argentinæ, 1495; Venet., 1504; Belnæ, 1521; Brixiæ, 1553; Ingolst., 1593; Brixiæ, 1596; Parisiis, 1596; Coeln., 1605; Valencenis, 1605; Genevra, 1606; Colon., 1608; Constantiæ, 1611; Ulisipone, 1611; Matriti, 1613; Genuæ, 1616; Hispali, 1624; Matriti, 1625 and 1628; Insulis, 1659; Brux., 1672; Paris, 1677; Matriti, 1697; Antv., 1700; Brux., 1701; Liege, 1702; Neuhusii, 1709; Rouen, 1823; and many subsequent, both in Latin, Italian, and French.

Among some of the more recent editions, we may mention two several translations into French, one by Le R. P. J. Gallifet, Lyons, 1850, and the other by Henry de Riancey, Paris, 1852, from the preface to the latter of which we beg to give the following extracts:—

"Of all the little works composed by St. Bonaventura in honour of the glorious Mother of God, and which breathe a piety so profound, and a doctrine so elevated and sure, there is none more celebrated than that which has for its title the PSALTER OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

"It is a collection of 150 Psalms suggested by the Psalms of David. Each Psalm begins by the same words as those of the royal Prophet; the general sense of them

* Any one who wishes to get a copy of this book at Rome should go direct to the publisher, Marini, No. 4, Piazza de Collegio Romano, as it is not the custom in Rome for booksellers to sell the publications of one another, and they often affect to be ignorant of the existence of books which they do not publish themselves.

† The Bull of canonization by Sixtus IV., is given at length in Bonaventura's works, tom. vii., p. 823. Lugduni, 1668.

* Both the editions of the "Lives of the Fathers, Saints," &c., are stereotyped; and the Dublin edition, R. Coyne, 4, Capel-street, 1833, has the following approbation, signed by Archbishops Murray and MacHale, and twenty-six other Roman Catholic bishops:—

"We, the undersigned Archbishops and Bishops, having seen a stereotype edition of the 'Lives of the Saints,' by the Rev. Alban Butler, in 2 vols., royal 8vo, now published by Richard Coyne, of Capel-street, Dublin, and being satisfied of its conformity with the 12-volume edition of the same work, do most earnestly recommend the same to the clergy and laity of our respective dioceses. We assure them of the exceeding utility of this most pious and learned composition, and are glad to express our most ardent desire that a copy of it were placed in the hands of every family of the numerous people committed to our care."

is preserved and applied to the Holy Virgin with a rare aptitude of expression, and an admirable poetry of thought and language. At the end of them are placed the Canticles in imitation of those of the Prophets, a Hymn which answers to the Te Deum, and a Creed like that of St. Athanasius. All the faithful servants of the Blessed Virgin are acquainted with this book, and recite with pleasure those prayers, which breathe so sweet a charm and so touching a sublimity. We have followed the order traced by the seraphic Doctor, and we have applied ourselves to reproduce, as much as lay in our power, the simple and majestic expressions of that great saint. . . . . All that is included in the present book is taken from St. Bonaventura. The more one studies this great genius and those of his century, the more one is inspired with love and veneration toward their works, where reigns a faith so ardent, a theology so luminous, and a piety so sanguine and so sweet; we could propose for the Christians of our days nothing more worthy of them, than to borrow the learned and authorized voice of the illustrious Doctor, so justly admired by our Fathers. We beseech them to remember us in their prayers, and we love to believe that the Blessed Virgin Mary, protectress of France, our patroness and our mother, will deign to cast a look of mercy upon this humble homage, a feeble echo of the work of one of the greatest Saints who devoted himself to sing her praises!" —Passy, the Feast of the Compassion of the Holy Virgin, 1852.*

Surely, it must sound strange to ears accustomed to the sound of "Catholic unity," to hear what discordant voices proceed from their ecclesiastical guides touching the self-same matter, and almost at the same moment in England and France. In England and Ireland the faithful are solemnly counselled to believe that this oft-published work is "falsely ascribed to St. Bonaventura, and unworthy to bear his name." In France, "of all the works composed by this illustrious Doctor and greatest of Saints, there is none more celebrated, none of a piety so profound, or of a doctrine more elevated and sure, than that which has for its title the Psalter of the Blessed Virgin Mary!"

To which side shall we incline in this most perplexing contradiction? We have the Rev. Alban Butler and the Irish Roman Catholic Bench of Bishops on the one side, and the voice of Roman Catholic Europe, during six centuries, upon the other!

But we must not forget the great names referred to by Mr. Butler in support of his assertion; and really we do think, if it be true, as stated by the Rev. Alban Butler, that such learned Roman Catholic writers as Fabricius, Cardinal Bellarmine, Philip Labbe, and Natalis Alexander have pronounced this work spurious and unworthy of so great a man as Bonaventura, it is scarcely fair, either to his memory or the unlearned world, to whose devout attention it has been so often recommended under the sanction of his name, that the ecclesiastical authorities should not interpose to suppress, even at the eleventh hour, so audacious a fraud.

The truth is, however, that the Rev. Alban Butler, though the "learning and piety" of his "Lives of the Fathers," &c., was vouched for by the united signatures of all the Roman Catholic Bishops in Ireland in 1833, has signally failed, either in learning or piety, or both, in the present instance; for we have now to inform our readers that not one of the four eminent writers so confidently referred to by him—Fabricius, Bellarmine, Labbe, or Natalis Alexander—when treating of Bonaventura and his writings, asserts that the Psalter of the Blessed Virgin was not written by Bonaventura. We have ourselves carefully consulted them all, and we think it will be found impossible to point out one line in any one of the writers so flippantly referred to, which asserts that the Psalter of the Virgin was falsely ascribed to St. Bonaventura or was unworthy of his name. To facilitate our Roman Catholic friends in their search, we here subjoin, as is our usual practice, the exact references to volumes, pages, and editions, where such mention would probably be found, if any such passages really existed; and we hope that should any new edition of "the Lives of the Saints" be published in England, the compilers, before again stereotyping errors so flagrant, will take the trouble to peruse the authorities to which they refer, and see whether their character for "learning and piety" will not be better promoted among Roman Catholic readers by expunging the note we have exposed, than by continuing to misrepresent distinguished authorities to relieve themselves from a present difficulty in arguing with Protestants.†

As we wish, however, to set this subject at rest in the minds of our readers for ever, we cannot close this notice without briefly recurring to the Roman Catholic authors who have endeavoured to show that Bonaventura was not the author of this celebrated production, and the reasons which have induced us, as well as the Roman Catholic world in general, to hold the opposite opinion.

Cardinal Du Perron, in his reply to King James I., published at Paris in 1620, is the first who appears to have disputed its authenticity (though he admits he had never either seen or met with it), and the only reason he assigns for doing so is, that neither Trithemius nor Gesnerus make any mention of it.‡

This argument we shall answer by referring to another eminent Roman Catholic authority, published at Paris in 1638, under royal authority, and with the approbation of the Doctors, the "Martyrologium Franciscanum a V. P. Arturo a Monasterio Rothomagensis," July 14, section 10, &c., p. 239.

"I know," says Arturus, "that King James of Great Britain, in the book, entitled 'Triplici nodo triplex cuneus,' condemned, with much indignation, the Psalter of the most Blessed Mary, put forth by St. Bonaventura himself (as is asserted by Bellarmine, Marcus Ulyssiponensis, Willot, Galesius, Walding, and Poireus), and expressed his horror at it, as if it were some impious production; in which he was afterwards followed by some heretics raging with the same black malice, who were, however, vigorously met by the most illustrious Cardinal Perron, Archbishop of Sens, in his reply to the King of Great Britain, and by Ignatius le Gault, now Vicar-General and Apostolic Commissary of Gaul, who say that the work is, at all events, spurious and falsely attributed to St. Bonaventura; for neither Trithemius nor Gesner have made mention of it. But how futile this reasoning is, may be clearly seen from the circumstance, that we are not bound to reject whatever has been omitted or unnoticed by Trithemius and Gesner, when they are mentioned by others of the highest reputation. Wherefore the most illustrious Cardinal Bellarmine ingenuously confesses that it is the genuine work of the most holy Seraphic Doctor, and uses the following language in his learned apology for his answer to the book of the aforesaid King of England," &c., &c., ch. ii., vol. 7.

The weakness of Cardinal Du Perron's argument from the silence of Trithemius and Gesner will appear in a still clearer light to any one who will take the trouble of consulting their original works, as we have done. Trithemius enumerates but a part of the universally-admitted works of Bonaventura, and does not even pretend to give the titles of the whole;† on the contrary, he expressly adds that Bonaventura wrote other works than those he has enumerated; and as Trithemius published his catalogue of ecclesiastical writers in 1494, before the first edition of Bonaventura's works was published, and died in 1513, seventy years before the Vatican edition was published by Pope Sixtus V., it is not at all surprising that he should never have met with his minor works, among which the Psalter of the Virgin is. As to Gesner the same observations may be made; he died at Zurich, in 1565, also before the publication of the Vatican edition of Bonaventura's works, and, moreover, was much more distinguished as a physician and naturalist than in any other capacity. His "Bibliotheca Universalis seu Catalogus Librorum," published at Zurich (Tigurinum), in 1545, tom. i., p. 236-7, under the title of "Eustachius" (another name for Bonaventura), merely follows Trithemius, adding in his very words, "Alia insuper nonnulla edidit, quæ ad notitiam meam non venerunt," showing that he did not pretend to be acquainted with all Bonaventura's writings. To argue from the mere silence of such writers as Trithemius or Gesner, under such circumstances, only shows how hard Cardinal Du Perron found it to give any plausible ground for disputing the authority of this Psalter, when pressed with the character of its contents by King James.

The only other Roman Catholic writer we need name is, Fr. Jo. Hyacinth Sbaralea, who published a supplement and corrections of Wadding's "Scriptores Ordinis Minorum," in 1806, and objects to the Psalter as doubtful (p. 159), on the ground of certain strange and barbarous phrases to be met with in it. The principal ones of these, however, which he mentions, do not occur in the Psalter at all, but in the litanies annexed, and are not worse than others to be found in works acknowledged to be genuine works of Bonaventura by Sbaralea himself (as may be seen in Mr. King's book already referred to, p. 81); others are mere typographical errors, which do not exist in the corrected edition (the Vatican); to say nothing of the difference in matters of taste between writers of the 13th and 19th centuries, which alone would render such criticisms of scarcely any weight whatever. We candidly admit that two respectable Protestant writers, Orsiline and Chemnitz, have urged the same barbarisms and extravagance as objections to the genuineness of the Psalter, but we think with Mr. King, that the weight of authority is among the other way, and both Sbaralea and Orsiline treat in far too arbitrary a manner the works of St. Bonaventura, and cut off too much by wholesale, much as the one may suit their taste. If, indeed, all the works attributed to Bonaventura, except one or two, were written in a pure and elegant style, the argument might have some force, and the one or two be deservedly suspected; but when these authors find it necessary to condemn as spurious such a multitude of writings, one is tempted to think that the former ones might as well have been pronounced not his, on account of their disagreement in style with the numerous ones which bear an inferior character."

If anything further were required to set the matter at rest, we think, as far as Roman Catholics are concerned, it is furnished by what they can scarcely deny to be authority, the Decretal Epistle of Pope Sixtus V. in 1587, issued nearly simultaneously with the publication of the Vatican edition of Bonaventura's works, published under Pope Sixtus's orders, and superintended by the Cardinal Constantius à Sarnano, the sixth volume of which contains the Psalter in full, pp. 478-91. This authoritative document is headed, "S. D. N. Sixti Papæ Decretales litteræ quibus Sanctus Bonaventura, &c., inter eximios egregioseque sanctos Catholicæ ecclesiæ doctores annumeratur," and contains the following passages:—

"It was through admiration of the grace which abounded in his (i.e. St. Bonaventura's) lips and pen, that our predecessor, Pope Sixtus IV., hesitated not to use the expression, that 'the Holy Spirit seemed to have spoken in him.' . . We likewise . . . in virtue of our Apostolic authority, by these presents, decree and declare that the aforesaid Bonaventura, having been deservedly enrolled and numbered by the said Sixtus IV. among the company of holy doctors, be estimated and honoured amoog the chief and principal of those who have excelled in the attainments of the theological profession; and for this reason . . . we will and decree that his books, commentaries, tracts—in fine, all his works, as they are published in the most correct manner from our Vatican † press . . . be in the same way, as the works of other doctors who are held in repute, cited, adduced, and brought forward when the occasion shall require, not only privately, but publicly, in seminaries, academies, schools, colleges, in lessons, disputations, interpretations, addresses, discourses, and all other ecclesiastical studies and Christian exercises. To no person, therefore, is it allowed to infringe, or by rash adventure to contravene, this page of our constitution, enrolment, act, statute, mandate, concession, relaxation, indulgence, admonition, and will. But if any shall presume to attempt this (opposition) let him know that he will incur the displeasure of Almighty God, and of the blessed Peter and Paul, his apostles."

This authorized Vatican edition,‡ as we have before said, contains the "Psalter of the Blessed Virgin" in full;§ and if Popes Sixtus V., Gregory XVI., and Pius

* The Lady Psalter of Bonaventura is over and over again quoted as his by St. Alphonso Liguori in his "Glories of Mary," as may be seen by any one who takes up the book.—See the French edition, Paris, 1832 (for which we are much indebted to a friend and correspondent), pp. 268, 270, 273, 274, 276, 288, 291, 328, &c., &c. We are informed, on good authority, that the "Psalter," and Liguori's "Glories of Mary," are the most frequently used devotional books at Rome; and those who are in the habit of visiting Italian families seldom enter a house without seeing them.

R. Bellarm. tom. vii., p. 448; Venetiis, 1714; Natalis Alexander Historia Ecclesiastica, p. 143, tom. vii. Paris, 1714. One passage exists in Natalis Alexander which is not referred to by the Rev. Alban Butler, which speaks of the Psalter as being the production of either St. Bonaventura or some other pious man. Even in that passage he by no means asserts it to be "falsely ascribed to Bonaventura, or unworthy of his name;" on the contrary, he speaks of it as "an exercise of skill and piety," which he would scarcely have done if he had considered it a spurious work, unworthy of Bonaventura. This passage occurs not in Sæc. xiii., vol. vii., under the title Bonaventura, but in one of the dissertationes annexed to Sæc. v., vol. v., p. 851. Paris Ed., 1714.

* We should, perhaps, add here, that the nameless editor of the Venetian edition of 1751-1756, in his preface, p. 121, also tries to discredit the Psalter on the ground that it is "attributes praises to the Virgin which are due to God alone," but he yet prints the work in full, tom. 13, p. 232, with the following predatory statement, expressly asserting that Bonaventura composed it—"Suppono opusculum cui titulus est Psalterium B. Virginis antiquitus tantum Davidici Psalterii—Sanctus Bonaventura composuit." That the editor of this Venetian edition is held in light esteem by some eminent Roman Catholic divines of the present day, may be seen from the recent work of Bishop Ullathorne on the Immaculate Conception, p. 294, in which, after citing the second sermon of St. Bonaventura, on the Blessed Virgin, he says—"In the Venice edition of 1756, a doubt of its genuineness is raised, but on no other ground than that it asserts the Immaculate Conception. But no one acquainted with the saint's peculiar style and method, can, I think, doubt of its being from the pen of the seraphic doctor." Yet, the Rev. J. Waterworth, a Roman Catholic priest, in his Correspondence with the Rev. J. Venn asserts (though upon what other ground than that of present convenience, we cannot see) that this Venetian edition is the only critical one; a rather hasty assertion, considering the immense pains taken by Cardinal Sarnano and Pope Sixtus V. to make the great Vatican edition a complete and correct one. Where, however, authorities like Dr. Ullathorne and Mr. Waterworth differ so widely as to the power of infallibility of the Venetian editor, of whose very name we are ignorant, we may well assume that no great weight is to be attached to a mere opinion based upon no historical evidence whatever.

† An attempt has been made to make the world believe that this refers to a previous Vatican edition, which may not have contained the Psalter; but we can trace no mention whatever of any earlier edition printed at the Vatican; and as it was Pope Sixtus V. himself who erected the fine printing-office near the Vatican, which goes by that name, we think no one will believe that in this epistle Sixtus referred to any other edition than his own, though the printing of it was not completed for some years afterwards. Why Pope Sixtus should have thought fit to ratify, under an anathema, a work while in the press, and not have waited till it was actually published, we cannot pretend to explain with certainty; but he cannot be supposed to have done so till his "imprimatur" was affixed to the copy or MSS. from which the corrected edition was in the course of being printed; and the reasonable inference is, that the Decretal Epistle was simultaneous with that "imprimatur."

‡ Sixti V. justa diligentissime emendata.

§ The testimony of the Vatican editors ought, we think, to have set the question at rest; for they assure us, that they threw into the Appendix all the works about the genuineness of which there was any doubt, and that Bonaventura wrote many works not mentioned by Trithemius, which they published from the Vatican press; see preface to tom. vi.—"Quos vero de nonnullis opusculis, controvertitur, Bonaventuræ sint necne, ea, ut superioribus certis ab incertis, statim post quartum partem in appendicem redegimus." That appendix is given in the seventh volume, page 646, and is thus headed—"Appendix ad septimum tomum operum S. Bonaventuræ complectens ea opuscula de quibus an sint S. Bonaventuræ controversum est, et nonnulla alia quorum subjiciuntur indices." The

IX., treated it as genuine, who is Alban Butler that he should presume to dispute it, and that on no better authority than a false reference to respectable writers, who never said anything like what he imputes to them?

We shall probably take occasion to refer to "the Lady Psalter" again; but whatever it contains, one thing, at least, is plain, that we were perfectly justified in stating that the attempt to exonerate Bonaventura from its authorship, or the Roman Catholic Church from its adoption, is a perfectly futile one. We attach, indeed, but little importance to the question, who was the author of it; the latter question is the only really important one; and, until the Church of Rome repudiates what she has so often sanctioned and allowed to be circulated under the respectable name of one of her canonized saints, we think the evidence we have given is conclusive, that she is responsible for the sentiments contained in it.

THE ABBE LABORDE AT ROME.

WE presented our readers, in a recent number, with an important letter from the Abbé Laborde, a distinguished Roman Catholic priest in Paris, addressed to the present Pope, in August, 1854, some months prior to the dogmatic decree of 8th December last, protesting in very solemn and eloquent language, on behalf of himself and many other French priests and faithful persons of both sexes who agreed with him, against the danger and impolicy of adding a new dogma to the faith once delivered to the saints; proving most conclusively, at the same time, that the new doctrine is utterly unsupported by Holy Scripture, and contrary to the well-known sentiments of the Fathers from the earliest times.

The Abbé followed up this timely remonstrance, in which there can be little doubt that he was supported by his metropolitan, the Archbishop of Paris (who was one of the dissenting bishops at Rome), by actually undertaking a personal visit to Rome, on a mission from his brethern in France who concurred in his sentiments, and has since published a deeply-interesting and graphic narrative of the treatment he experienced in that city, which, as we think our readers will consider it instructive in the highest degree, we shall give at length. The pamphlet is entitled, "Narrative and Memoir of the Opponents of the Novel Dogma of the Immaculate Conception, by the Abbé Laborde, of Paris," and is published in French by E. Dentu, Palais Royal, Galerie D'Orleans 13.*

"I. I arrived in Rome on the 16th November, 1854. There were then but few bishops there; but they were arriving every day. By the letters they had received from those who were on the way, or who intended to set out, they expected they should have about two hundred. They did not know then what they should do with them: whether they should have an assembly, or what they should propose to them.

"The Bull containing the definition was drawn up, completed, and ready to be published on the 8th December. On the 20th of November they convened the bishops who were present to conferences, without regard to those who were on the way. They ought, however, to have waited, according to ecclesiastical regulations; and they would undoubtedly have done so, if they had attached importance to these conferences. They gave to the bishops three cardinals as presidents, of whom the first was the Cardinal Brunelli. It appeared that what caused these assemblies, were the complaints of some bishops, who would not take the trouble to come so far merely to hear a reading. They continued until the 26th—that is to say, they had in all, five, or, at most, six meetings. The particulars of what passed have remained secret; but it is certain they declared to the bishops that the Pope reserved to himself alone the whole definition, direct or indirect, as well as the question of seasonableness, and that they permitted them to discuss only as to the form.

"II. For my part, during the first days after my arrival, Providence led me into connection with persons, who by their position, rank, and station, knew all, and were able to give me, regarding matters that might be divulged, the most accredited documents. I learned also some very useful particulars during some favourable opportunities which I enjoyed.

"III. As soon as I observed the assemblies had commenced, I drew up, on the 22nd November, a petition requesting to be heard. I finished it, and double signed it, and dispatched it directly by post (for I had no other means) to our holy Father the Pope, and to the cardinal president of the assemblies. The petition is as follows:—

"'To our holy Father the Pope, Pius IX., and the Bishops assembled.

"'PETITION.

"'M. the Abbé Laborde (of Lectoure), in his own name, and that of many priests and faithful Catholics of Paris, requests to be admitted in order to unfold and prove the following theses, in opposition to the proposed definition of a new dogma of Faith, of the Immaculate Conception of the holy Virgin:—

"'1. "The Doctrine of the Church is that, which having been taught by Jesus Christ, or given by inspiration of the Holy Spirit to the apostles, has been preached by the same apostles, and has come from them to us in succession."—Council of Trent.

"'2. In the Church Catholic, the rule of faith is, that which is contained in the Scriptures, and transmitted, as of faith, by tradition, which, passing by the Fathers, returns again to the apostles.

"'3. The Church does not create new dogmas of faith.

"'4. It is a sin to decree new dogmas of faith in the Church; it is a sin to receive them.

"'5. The Church is infallible in her decisions on matters of faith; but, whether she decides in a council, or without a council, there are certain essential rules, in the absence of which the decree has neither the force of law, nor any effect upon the conscience.

"'6. The doctrine of the Immaculate Conception is in the Church but a novel opinion, which is not contained in the Scriptures, and has not come from the apostles by the course of tradition.

"'7. In all that has been hitherto done in order to arrive at the adoption of the Immaculate Conception as a dogma of faith, the ecclesiastical regulations have not been observed.

"'8. In the Bull which requested the advice of the bishops, taken each in detail, the question has been proposed in an equivocal form.

"'9. A great number of the bishops answered without any examination of the matter, and it is not proved canonically that the question has been examined, as was necessary, by any of them.

"'10. The bishops did not give their sentence, as judges of the faith, but their mere opinion, as individuals.

"'11. The mere opinion of the bishops has not been unanimous.

"'12. Four or five, at least, answered in the negative.

"'13. A certain number gave an uncertain and evasive answer; and the circumstances require that these should be counted as opposed to the decree.

"'14. A certain number of the bishops made answer to the Pope, that the clergy and faithful of their dioceses united with them to request of the holy Father a definition; while, in fact, neither the clergy nor the faithful had been consulted; while also there were in their dioceses some of the well-informed people, and of respectable priests, who did not admit the Immaculate Conception, even as an opinion, and that threats and violence were employed towards these latter, to prevent them from making known their minds.

"'15. There was also a moral pressure on the bishops themselves, at least in France, by the intrigues and secret practices of a strong party, assisted by a violent newspaper, against which they feared to compromise themselves, and were not free to speak.

"'16. There is reason to believe that if the matter had been freely examined and discussed in a council, according to the practice of the Church, the reasons of those who were opposed to the definition would have been made known to the others, and that they would have acquiesced in their opinion.

"'17. The College of Cardinals has not been consulted on the matter, and the decree had been made and prepared without their acquiescence.

"'18. The undersigned priest, as much in his own name, as in the name of the priests and faithful who sent him to Rome, requests of his Holiness, Pius IX, and the assembled bishops, to be admitted at a convenient time to develop the above articles, and to present the proofs.

"'19. The same undersigned priest declares, as much in his own name, as in the name of his constituents, that, if it is refused him to be heard at a convenient time, he will believe, and they will believe it right to add this to the other reasons for the nullity of the future decree, that they were not permitted to be heard.

"'Completed, and double signed in Rome, in the Hotel Minerva, the 22nd November, 1854.

"'L'Abbé Laborde (of Lectoure), Priest of the Diocese of Auch, resident in Paris.'

"On the 30th of November, I was obliged, in case of accident, and for a reason which will appear, to attach to this document the following form:—

"'A third copy of the present petition, and the rough draught of the same, were on last night, 29th November, seized at my house by the Lieutenant of Police of the Cardinal Vicar. I have been obliged to restore it from memory, as it appears in this document. I declare it to be as like as possible to the original.

"'Made, certified, and signed in Rome, in the Hotel Minerva, the 30th November, 1854.

"'L'Abbé Laborde (of Lectoure), opponent of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, in my own name and the name of those who sent me for this purpose.'

"IV. In answer to this petition, I received a secret order to leave Rome as soon as possible. This order was given to me on the 27th, in a very retired apartment in the Segreteria, Place St. Augustine, whither I had been drawn on the occasion of the request I had made, on the 24th, to say Mass. It was M. Ternassi, a canon, secretary general of the cardinal vicar, who gave it to me on the part of our holy Father the Pope himself: that was very explicit.

"V. I was not allowed to surrender myself on such an order; so I did not surrender.

"VI. In the morning of the 29th November, from half-past ten to eleven o'clock, the lieutenant of the police of conscience arrived in my apartment, by order of the cardinal vicar, with agents and witnesses, to effect a visitation of my residence, and to seize my two pamphlets—'The belief in the Immaculate Conception cannot become an article of Faith,' and the 'Letter to our Holy Father, the Pope, Pius IX.,' &c.

"I had presented some copies of these writings, adapted to instruct the mind, to the bishops in company with whom I found myself in the ship during the voyage, or to their vicars-general. Certain of these prelates had accepted them; others had asked for them in Rome even during the conferences. I had given them to some priests and laymen. In fine, as it was reported at the conclusion of the bishop's conferences, that the following week would be devoted to the conferences of cardinals, I had addressed the remaining copies, by post, to the members of the Sacred College, who were esteemed as the most influential and the most learned. I had retained one copy for myself, in case I should require it. It was then seized by the Commissary of the Police.

"That officer tried much to ascertain from me how many copies I had brought to Rome, and the names of all those to whom I had addressed or distributed them. I told him the number of the pamphlets, as far as I was myself aware; but I refused to name any of those who had them. I told him I did not wish to compromise any one. He replied that I would not expose them to any trouble; that they only desired to seize the books.

"One may thus perceive with what party spirit, with what preference, with what desire to check the truth they prepared themselves for the definition of the new dogma. While with such care they suppressed my writings, they posted and reposted every day in large characters, upon all the walls of Rome, the book of Father Passaglin.

"VII. Nevertheless, the Lieutenant of the Police of the Cardinal Vicar did not confine himself to seizing these two writings: his agents rifled my furniture, my portfolio, my clothes, the very bed. They took all that they could find of manuscript, and all the books and printed documents, whether of devotion, or of controversy, that they met with, excepting my Breviary. They did not fail to lay their hands upon the copy of the petition which I had made for myself, and which, by a just apprehension of the result, I had concealed as well as I could: which proves that they searched for it. They would not leave with me even the first composition covered with erasures.

"VIII. An important occurrence is again connected with this seizure. On the evening of the 28th, on returning to the hotel, I had found a printed invitation to present myself anew on the 29th, at ten o'clock, at the Secretariat of the Cardinal Vicar. Thinking they intended to issue an injunction more definite and immediate to depart, I had drawn up a protest against this violence, and proposed leaving it in the hands of the secretary. My desire to copy this document delayed me to the hour appointed. I was setting out, however, when the Lieutenant of Police entered.

"As soon as the object of his visit was announced, before I allowed him to proceed, I begged him to hear two words with his company. I said that I did not offer any resistance to exterior power, and had no reason to disguise anything; that I had come to Rome to acquit my conscience; that I opposed the new dogma which they proposed to decree, because I was certain it would be a great disaster to the Church; that this opposition was the sole cause of all these troubles; that I had already been proffered advice to leave the city; that I was at this moment on the point of going to the Secretariat, where I thought they were about to renew this order; that I had drawn up a protest intended for the secretary, and, by his interference, for the Cardinal Vicar and his Holiness; but that seeing this seizure, doubtless, superseded my appearance at the Secretariat, I protest here and lay my protest in the possession of the Lieutenant of the Cardinal Vicar, requesting it might have the same effect as at the Secretariat, and that it might be given to the proper authority. I immediately presented it open to the Commissary, in the presence of his rightful witnesses; he received it, and promised to deliver it, in his capacity of minister of the Cardinal Vicar. The protest is as follows:—

"'PROTEST of M. the Abbé Laborde (of Lectoure) committed in the presence of witnesses to the possession of the Lieutenant of Police of the Cardinal Vicar,* against the violence which has been done to M. Laborde, in the matter of his opposition to the new dogma of the Immaculate Conception.

"'1, the undersigned priest, commissioned to Rome by many priests and faithful Catholics of France, to watch the progress and the issue of the undertaking, as to the new dogma of faith of the Immaculate Conception of the Holy Virgin, and to request to be heard at a convenient time, as to the reasons which oppose the definition of this new faith, have seen, that instead of doing justice to the petition addressed by me to the rightful authorities, on the 22nd instant, for the aforesaid object, they have resorted to violence in desiring me to depart from Rome.

"'1. I protest against the irregularity of the notice given by M. Ternassi, Canon, Secretary in the Segreteria del Vicariato, between four walls and without writing, to depart from Rome as soon as possible, by reason of my opposition to the definition of a new dogma of faith of the Immaculate Conception of the Holy Virgin.

"'2. I declare that this present document shall remain as an authentic evidence that violence is one of the means employed in order to arrive at the pretended definition, which can have no other effect than to shake the foundations of the faith, and to kindle the flame of division in the Church.

"'3. I protest that I have a personal right as a Christian, as a priest, and as a theologian, to see how matters proceed in this affair; because, that this is of the last importance to my

Psalter is not in the Appendix. There is also a life of St. Bonaventura given at the commencement of vol. i. of his works, in which there is an express statement that St. Bonaventura did write the Psalter of the Virgin. It is as follows, Sect. vi., De Meditationibus contemplationibus et orationibus—"Beatissimam porro Dei genetricem, Mariam Virginem sibi patronam cœlestem delegit, et eximia pietate coluit; ideoque opuscula confecit, quibus ad ejus laudes ipse et ae et alios salutariter instruxit. Librum enim quod Mariale appellatur, et Speculum beatæ Virginis Psalteriumque ejusdem Scripsit." conscience and my faith, and that I require it for my future conduct.

"'4. I protest that I have the same right on behalf of the priests and the faithful, my constituents, because they have, in this weighty matter, the same interest as myself.

"'5. I protest that his Holiness, in his capacity of Vicar of Jesus Christ, the chief of the religion, and the spiritual father of all the faithful, cannot prevent my seeing the conduct and issue of this undertaking; my understanding the verdict of the decree, if there be one; and my demonstrating, as far as possible, the truth in that which is right, before he has done it himself: the opinions and the conscience of Christians are essentially free, and the word of God is not bound,* nor can they be enchained.

"'6. I declare that so far as concerns my body, I am at the disposal of his Holiness, as a king; that he can, in his sovereign capacity, have me arrested, imprisoned, or transported to the frontiers of his states; that on this point I offer no resistance; as also I will not submit except to violence, after the example of Jesus Christ.

"'7. As to what remains, I place myself under the protection of the French authority, and I commit myself for assistance against all violence to the General commanding for the Emperor in Rome.

"'8. I protest that since I have been in Rome, I have conducted myself as a peaceable citizen, and I have done nothing calculated to disturb the public security.

"'9. I declare that I demand an acknowledgment or procès-verbal, of the present protest from M. the Lieutenant of Police† in his capacity as such.

"'10. I declare that every refusal to receive this protest, and to give me an acknowledgment or procès-verbal, will be a new act of violence in this matter.

"'Made, and double signed in Rome, in the Hotel Minerva, and delivered in person to M. the Lieutenant of Police of the Cardinal Vicar,‡ effecting in my apartment the seizure of my books and papers, in the presence of witnesses, the 29th November, 1854.

"'L'Abbé Laborde (of Lectoure), commissioned to Rome by many priests and faithful of Paris, for the matter of the Immaculate Conception.'

"As the Commissary seized the copy of this protest which I had reserved for myself, and did not leave a vestige, I retraced it the same day from memory, and extended in case of accident, with a form similar to that which appeared after the petition, whereby I declared, as I do still declare, that it was, as far as possible, like the original.

"IX. Next day, 30th November, I received a notice to deliver myself immediately to the criminal tribunal of the Inquisition. The document is as follows:—

"'The Vicariat, 30th Nov. 1854.

"'The undersigned authority officially requests Signor, the Abbé Laborde, to present himself before him immediately, this morning, at the Chancery of the Criminal Tribunal, situated in the Piazza St. Augustine, number 18, without fail.

"'Signed,

"'RAPHAELE NICALI.'

"I confess that this notice made me somewhat afraid. I was apprehensive lest they should retain me as a prisoner in the holy office if I should go. Under this reflection, I had determined not to surrender myself, but to retire into my apartment, expecting them to come and seek me, if they had any intention of seizing me. However, upon reflection that my non-appearance would wear the aspect of defiance, and attach, perhaps, some feature of wrong to my cause, I surrendered myself. I went, besides, to the French police and to the office of our Embassy, where I was reassured against the danger of imprisonment. I awaited, however, a charge in respect of orthodoxy: there was not any. They rehearsed to me the burden of the song already delivered—that I must go. The officer wrote something, I know not what, and just then turned to me, and, with an air severe enough, displaying three fingers, he said in Italian—'They give you three days; on the 3rd December you will begone, or you will go; do you understand?' I replied, 'perfectly; three days, and the 3rd of December.' I asked him if he would not give me the copy of that which he had written; he answered that that was not the custom. I do not criticise this mode of justice. If, perchance, it is equitable, it is also very profitable. To take advantage of proofs of other people's doings, just as they please, and to give none of what they do themselves, is the means employed to surprise others and secure themselves.

"X. On the 2nd December, I was invited to submit myself to the direction of the General of Police, of the first class. The clerk that I found there, assured me, with much consideration and kindness, that he was obliged to signify to me the order to depart, and that I was allowed three days to leave the Roman States. He said the order emanated from the Pope, and inquired whether I was disposed to fulfil it. I replied that such was not possible. I showed him my permis issued by the Roman police, quite en regle, and permitting my sojourn for three months. I told him I had positively done nothing calculated to disturb the public peace, and that it was thus very strange that the police should, notwithstanding, desire to expel me. He was not unaware of the reason of this course of conduct; he seemed to me to feel the odium of the task; and I have no doubt but that he would have conciliated, if he had possessed the power. He proceeded to consult with his superior. In fine, having returned, he said to me, 'You refuse, then?' I replied, 'I refuse.' He then asked what were my reasons. I set forth three in number—1. That my business in Rome was not finished; 2. That beside the visit to my apartment, and the seizure effected at my residence, there was the commencement of a process, the issue of which I had a right to know; that I could not leave as a culprit, who deemed himself fortunate in avoiding judgment by a hasty departure; that they ought, then, before giving orders for my departure, to make known that they had no cause to prosecute me, and, also, truly and honestly, to restore to me the effects which had been seized, or, if they supposed me blameworthy, to judge me in proper form; 3. That I could not go by sea without a vessel, and that thus, even if I were disposed to leave, that depended on the sailing of the ship in which I had already paid for my return.

"He said that he was bound to draw up a procès-verbal, in order to prove that he had discharged, with regard to me, the commission which he had received. I replied, that I asked no better. He then, accordingly, wrote a procès-verbal, importing that I had appeared before him: that he had signified the order to leave the Roman States in three days; that I had refused, for the reasons assigned above, and that he had translated these, as I found when he consulted me about the document, with the same force as that in which I had given them, so far as I could judge from the Italian which he read to me. He signed, and I signed.

"XI. I believe I ought to report all the particulars of this scene. The party would try to deceive, and to raise a suspicion that I had been expelled from Rome by force, for other reasons than that of my opposition to the new dogma; it was, then, important to render this pretext impossible.

"XII. I omit in this narrative many circumstances, curious in themselves, and such as ought to be known as the affairs which occur in Rome; but these are of but little importance in comparison with the serious subject which I have here to keep solely in view; I have reviewed them in the full narrative of my voyage to Rome, which I propose to present very soon to the public.

"XIII. I must be brief then. At six o'clock in the evening I entered the office of the Director of the general police; as he informed me that it was determined to make me leave that day, willingly or by force, I presented to him the following protest, and requested of him to give me the form:—

"'PROTEST.

"'I, the undersigned Roman Catholic priest and theologian, an opponent of the future dogma of the Immaculate Conception, for myself, and in behalf of a certain number of the priests and faithful of France, protest against the formal order and disposition of his Holiness our Holy Father, Pope Pius IX., communicated to me by the direction of the general of the police in Rome, at Monte Citorio, to leave Rome as soon as possible before the 8th December, on which day is to take place the decree concerning the aforesaid dogma, interesting to all Catholics.

"'I protest that in executing the said order of his Holiness, I do nothing but yield to force, and do depart but to avoid the noise of deeds of violence.

"'I protest against the retention by his Eminence the Cardinal Vicar of a portion of the effects seized at my residence by his Lieutenant of Police, and especially of the portfolio of my private papers.

"'I demand of the Director of the Police General, the form of the said protest.

"'Completed, the 6th December, 1854.

"'L'ABBÉ LABORDE.'

"XIV. The Director read this protest; he had it read also by the chief of his officials, who had come to act as interpreter; for he did not speak French, and I did not speak Italian. They both said they could not receive it. However, the Director-General was unwilling to resort to violence. Seeing his hesitation, I said to him—'You have three courses to take.' 'Ah! let us see,' said he. 'They are these: either to allow me to leave of my own will; or to receive the protest, and I depart to-morrow of myself; or to have recourse to violence.' 'Let us examine them. The first expedient appears impossible, the second equally so.' 'Ah, well,' I said to him, 'the third is at your service. See my Breviary, which, when coming here, I took with me; I am at your service; you have nothing to do but to arrest me this very moment, if you deem it right.' 'No,' he remarked, 'I do not wish to have you imprisoned in Rome; you are a Frenchman, and the French nation we esteem and greatly love. I will escort you to Civita-Vecchia with the respect that is due to you.' 'I observed that it was rather late for to-day; for it was already past four o'clock.' 'True,' he said, 'then it must be to-morrow.' 'In that case,' said I, 'I withdraw; to-morrow you will conduct me whither you propose.'

"XIV. As to myself, the following day I did everything as usual. As it was a fast day in Rome, Thursday, the 7th December, I arranged to dine at noon, which approached; but about half-past eleven o'clock, a soldier, disguised as a civilian, came to arrest me in my apartment, by order of the Director. He told me to prepare my portmanteau; I did so. In coming down stairs he demanded the key of my apartment, which I had locked; I gave it to him. I carried my cane and my umbrella. The hall of the hotel was full of people—these were so many witnesses of my departure; and my gaoler placed the key of my chamber in a desk, advising me to deliver my luggage to the person who should [illegible] instead of him to take it. I was conducted to an [illegible] of the police to wait for a carriage. When I was ready I accosted to company with a gendarme. He, also, was dressed as a civilian.

"XVI. We did not arrive at Civita-[illegible] till eight o'clock, because of the [illegible] weather. It was ten o'clock when we passed through the [illegible]. All the bells of the town blended their [illegible] in harmony, and artillery thundered forth the announcement of the hour of the ceremony [the Immaculate Conception]. I was conducted, in view of the people, first to the police; then, passing again through the multitude, the gendarme and an agent of Civita, carrying in their hand an open order, conveyed me to the harbour. Midway they hailed a boat; in which they placed my effects, and then myself. This boat brought me alongside the Saint Pierre, a pontifical brig lying in harbour. It was at this moment gorgeously decked out, and all the colours flaunted in the breeze.

"XVII. I was then consigned as a prisoner in this vessel; Providence, without doubt, willing it, that my presence should be there to the last, as an [illegible] protest. Less favoured than was St. Paul, when a captive in Pagan Rome, I continued in the floating prison four entire days, without being able to set foot on shore, not even to go with a guard to hear Mass on the day of the Conception, and the Sunday following. The Capri, which was to convey me back to Marseilles, arrived on Tuesday morning, 12th December, to start again at four o'clock. At a quarter to four the Commissary of Police came, in full dress, to take me in a boat, and transferred me in view of all the passengers, to the Neapolitan vessel, whereupon I, at length, regained my liberty.

"I have been obliged to report successively all these things that concerned me; I now return to other transactions.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, MAY, 1855.

In the present age of daring hierarchical assumption on the one hand, and pusillanimous servility and truckling to expediency on the other, we think it truly refreshing to watch the course of a noble and independent mind, like that of the gifted and intrepid Abbé LABORDE, of Paris, honestly, and without regard to personal consequences, combating for what he believes to be the truth, against innovations which he holds to be, not only profane novelties, but fraught with danger to the Church of which he is a member.

In the preface to the work from which we have given copious extracts in another column, entitled "Relation et Memoire des Opposants au Nouveau Dogme de L'Immaculée Conception et la Bulle Ineffabilis," the worthy Abbé of Lectoure thus describes his feelings and his position in taking the course he has done at this critical period:—

"I freely confess, had I consulted the laws of a certain kind of prudence, I should have been more guarded than to have proceeded as I have done. Such prudence, however, instructs man to arrange on every occasion so as to be able, whatever may happen, to find himself in agreement with the stronger party; it tells him he must, doubtless, love truth and justice, but only up to a certain point; that it is not wise, for instance, to exhibit zeal for true doctrine so far as to commit oneself with those in power, more especially so as to lose the favour of superiors, who have in their power to do you much good, or to do you much harm; not only, by not promoting you to honours and ecclesiastical benefices, but also by depriving you of what you already have. I have had experience of this prudence; but I have discovered—and I give all the glory to God—that this pretended wisdom has positively no other first principle or final end than the interests of this world, and, consequently, that it is nothing else than that which is called, in Scripture language, 'the wisdom of the flesh,' which the apostle declares distinctly to be 'enmity against God.'"

"It is, then, according to the laws of another wisdom I have taken my part in this question. I said to myself—'the interests of the truth, especially the interests of God himself, ought to be kept in view by the Christian, much more by the minister of Jesus Christ, that God Man, who came into the world to teach us to love the truth, to serve and defend it.'

"Besides, it cannot be denied, that all the great men that religion has rendered illustrious regulated their wisdom, under similar circumstances, according to this principle."

"When there arose in their day any novelty, or any doctrinal dispute appeared, they went straight to Scripture and tradition, as the source of truth. There they faithfully sought the truth, and when they found it, they declared themselves for it with distinctness, and set themselves frankly for its defence against all those who assailed it, without exception. They doubted not nor did they hesitate; they neither dissembled nor kept silence; they varied not. They were not doubled-faced—that is, ever ready to say, sometimes 'yes,' and sometimes 'no,' according to times and circumstances. They did not consider that to be good and true in Rome, which they had found to be false and evil in Paris; they were always the same, because they loved the truth which changes not.

"It was this wisdom, this firm attachment to principles, this conduct ever consistent, that made them not men of luxury and happiness according to the judgment of this world, but great saints and great men—a St. Cyprian, a St. Athanasius, a St. Ambrose, a St. Basil, a St. Chrysostom, a St. Augustine, a St. Gregory Nazianzen."

"It is under such characteristics as distinguished themselves, that the holy Fathers describe the true Catholic."

"Can it be, then, that we are to-day so far from the mind of the holy Fathers, that their wisdom passes among us for folly! Yes. We are to such a degree in that state foreseen by the prophet, wherein evil is called good, and good is called evil, where darkness takes the name of light, and light receives the name of darkness, that the picture which the holy Fathers traced for us of a true and free Catholic is regarded as the description of a heretic. In fact, attach yourselves, as the holy Fathers did, to the study and knowledge of Scripture and tradition; appeal with them to antiquity against novelty; plead for principles against the abuse of a universal laxity; do but determine following the counsel of the apostle, to hold fast that which you have received from the beginning; you have the leprosy of individual opinion, you are charged with the heresy of private judgment, you are Protestant! If you wish to be Catholic, abjure your reason and your conscience, leave there your holy Fathers, cast aside the Word of God, make yourselves blind, and devote your whole life to the danger of being led by others as blind as yourselves."

We have been induced by these passages from the Abbé Laborde to look into the works of some of the Fathers to whom he has referred, and think we cannot do better than present our readers with a few extracts from their writings, which will show whether they deemed it a duty blindly to follow ecclesiastical authority, or whether they would themselves have acted like the Abbé Laborde, had such an emergency arisen in their day, and a new dogma, like that of December last, been urged on their acceptance.

Now, what do these great Fathers exhort their readers to do?

Hear first the great St. Basil.

St. Basil says—"The hearers that are instructed in the Scriptures must examine the doctrine of their teachers; they must receive those things which are agreeable to Scripture, and reject those things which are contrary to it."*

Hear, also, what the great St. Cyprian says—"That Christ alone is to be heard, the Father witnessed from Heaven. We are not, therefore, to regard what others before us thought, but what He that was above all, Christ, first did, for we are not to follow the custom of men, but the truth of God."†

Hear, also, what Clemens Alexandrinus says—"That the standard by which things are to be examined is not the testimony of men, but the word of the Lord. We do not believe the assertions of men, they must not only say, but prove, and that, too, from the Scriptures."*

Hear, next, St. Chrysostom—"Let us not carry about the opinion of the multitude, but let us examine things. Is it not absurd, that, when you are to receive money, you do not trust other men, but examine it yourselves; but when you are to judge of things, then to be drawn away by other men's opinions? And this is the worse fault in you, because you have the Scriptures." "You have an exact standard and rule of all things—I beseech you do not regard what this or that man thinks, but inquire all things of the Scriptures."†

Can any testimony be stronger than those passages from Clemens Alexandrinus, St. Basil, St. Cyprian, and St. Chrysostom, that, in their times, the Church of Christ did not require the faithful to submit, blindly and implicitly, to mere authority, but encouraged and enjoined their hearers to examine into the doctrine of their teachers, and avail themselves of that exact standard and rule which the Holy Scriptures supplied them with, to test the accuracy and truth of what was told them, and see thereby whether they were following the "customs of men," or the "truth of God." If the modern doctrines of the Church and Court of Rome had then been known or believed, is it possible that such inconsistent doctrines could have been cotemporaneously proposed by such eminent Fathers as those above cited?

We may here add the testimony of St. Augustine, who, in speaking of the Holy Scriptures, in contrast with all other writings, says that—"Those are to be read with a necessity of believing, but these with a liberty of judging.‡ That which is confirmed by the authority of the Holy Scriptures is, without doubt, to be believed; but for other witnesses and testimonies, you may receive them or reject them as you shall judge they have more or less weight."§ And again, when he was pressed with the authority of six or seven of the Greek Fathers, he thus answers—"I have learned to give this honour and reverence to the books of Scripture alone, to believe there is no error in them; but as for others, how learned and godly soever they be, I so read them that I do not believe anything to be true, because they thought so, but because they proved it so to be by the Scriptures."‖

One would almost think it was one of the Reformers and not Augustine that wrote those passages, so identical are they with the Protestant doctrines of the Reformation.

Perhaps, however, we may feel less surprised at St. Augustine speaking thus, if we find some of the Popes themselves holding similar language. What shall we say to the following striking passage from no less an authority than Pope Gregory the Great, himself a saint of the Roman Catholic Church—"The Church," says he, "which has been trained in the school of humility, does not command with authority, but persuade by reason, her children whom she believes to be in error, to obey what she has taught them."¶

Under such guidance as the unanimous counsel of such eminent saints and fathers as Clement of Alexandria, St. Basil, St. Cyprian, St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, and St. Gregory the Great, we would earnestly counsel our intelligent Roman Catholic countrymen, rather to follow the example of the Abbé Laborde, and attach themselves, as these holy fathers did, to the intelligent study and knowledge of Scripture than to abjure their reason and conscience, and casting aside equally the exhortations of the Holy Fathers and the Word of God, blindly devote their lives and peril their salvation by implicitly giving themselves up to be led by others who, for all they know, may be more blind even than themselves.

The next subject of interest which engaged my serious attention, and ought to occupy the minds of all those who have the eternal welfare of the human family at heart is—Why the cup is withheld from the laity in the administration of the Lord's Supper. I find very weighty reasons why the people should partake of the cup, without the semblance of one for withholding it. Not to receive the communion in both kinds is contrary to the express injunctions of our Saviour, to the commands of the Popes of the early ages, and a wide departure from the practice of the primitive Church. Christ, at the institution of the sacrament, took bread and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said—"Take, eat, this is my body;" and he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying—"Drink ye all of it."—St. Matt. xxvi., 26, 27. St. Mark also says—"And he took the cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave it to them; and they all drank of it."—Chap. xiv. 23. St. Paul, in the first epistle to the Corinthians (chap. xi. 28), says—"Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup." From these words of the apostle, which were addressed to all the Corinthians, it is evident the people received the sacrament in both kinds in those days, and from the hands of the apostles themselves. The same apostle says, in the same chapter, xi. 26.—"As often as you shall eat this bread, and drink this chalice, you shall show the death of the Lord till he come." "Amen, amen, I say unto you, except you eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you. Whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up the last day."—St. John vi., 53, 54. It appears to me to be not only a direct infringement, but a studied violation of Christ's injunction, to withhold the cup from the laity. There are not more simple or positive texts of Scripture in the Bible than those I have quoted; and the precept of partaking of the cup appears to be even more stringent, and more urgent than that of receiving the other moiety of the blessed sacrament. Every reflecting person must observe that the word all was exclusively annexed to the participation of the wine only; no doubt because our blessed Lord foresaw that, in course of time, the Church of Rome would withdraw the cup from the people; and, therefore, was more urgent in his command about the reception of the wine than of the bread.

Pope Gelasius I., and Pope Leo the Great, ordered the wine to be given to the laity, and pronounced it sacrilege to withhold the cup from the people, as you have already noticed in your publication.* Cardinal Bona, a man of great eminence in the Church of Rome, says that communion in both kinds was given to the people for fourteen hundred years, until the Council of Constance, in the commencement of the fifteenth century, prevented the use of wine, and thereby reduced the sacrament of the Lord's Supper to half a sacrament, which is no communion according to the intention of Christ and the practice of the apostles and the primitive Church. But this defect has been removed by the Reformation, and the cup has been restored to the people by the Church Catholic of England.

The Church of Rome has been driven to resort to a very flimsy argument to support her practice on this point; and endeavours to get out of the difficulty by what she fancifully calls the principle of concomitance. She says that when you receive the bread, you receive not only the body, but also the blood of our Saviour; and, therefore, it is not requisite to receive the wine. In answer to this argument, I say, did the Fathers of Constance know better how to administer the sacrament of the Last Supper than Christ, who instituted it, or the primitive Church that followed the injunction of Christ, and who, wishing to enforce his command, threatened an eternal commination against all those who refused to participate of the communion in both kinds. If it were proper to resort to a philosophical argument to explain a clear Scriptural injunction, I might say, Christ would not have acted contrary to that great principle—"Entia non sunt multiplicanda sine necessitate;" and, therefore, would not have used both bread and wine, if one or the other was sufficient for his purpose.

Here is a manifest departure from a practice of the Church that is coeval with Christianity itself, and an usurpation of wisdom superior to infinite wisdom, that instituted the sacrament in both kinds. You have shown in the article to which I have referred, that St. Jerome, St. Basil, and St. Chrysostom (to say nothing of other Fathers of the Church) distinctly recognise communion in both kinds, without any difference between the priest and the people.

I may be permitted to deviate a little from the subject in question to inquire how it is possible that the Council of Constance which decreed, A.D. 1414, that the communion should be given to the laity in one kind only (and which, I contend, is no communion at all), could have been influenced in her decisions by the unerring influence of the Holy Ghost? The Council of Constance was guilty of atrocious crimes. It deliberately engaged to respect the safe conduct given by the Emperor Sigismond to John Huss, the Professor of Prague, and his friend, Jerome, and notwithstanding, in violation of public faith and of their sacred promise, both these good men were detained prisoners until they were examined by the Council, pronounced heretics, and burnt alive by that very assembly. Jerome and Huss were both men of unblemished character, whose only crime was that they inveighed, with all the eloquence of enlightened reformers, against the vice and immorality of the Pontiffs, the Court of Rome, the bishops, and clergy, and the monks, which was a common practice of that day, and daily done, even in the Council of Constance itself.

Is it possible to view this conduct as anything but treachery and murder? No extenuation can be attempted; and, to make the matter worse, the whole proceedings were sanctioned by Poggio, the Pope's legate; though he is recorded to have said, upon that melancholy occasion—"These men spoke like ancient Romans, and died with the constancy of Socrates." Yet, this is the execrable council, who, after having assisted at high Mass, and themselves partaken of the holy communion, passed a summary law, by which the entire human family, except the priesthood, were deprived of their birthright, and the inestimable blessings that accompany the due participation of the sacred mysteries; but, no sooner had the Papal trumpet proclaimed from the summit of Adrian's Mole, that the communion which has been given hitherto in both kinds, according to the injunction of Christ, should, in future, be administered in one kind only, than a nerve of exquisite sensibility was touched, which thrilled in every bosom, from the shores of the Baltic to the banks of the Euphrates, and wars were kindled in Bohemia and elsewhere, which long raged with unabated fury.

Having thus, in the way I have very imperfectly described, examined, according to the advice of St. Paul, the doctrine of the Church, I could not but see clearly that the Church of Rome was not the first Church, "the matron and mistress of all other Churches," as alleged by her advocates, and that she had no pretence either to greater holiness or more freedom from error than any other Church within the Christian pale. I became also convinced that there was no sacrifice at the Last Supper, and what is called the sacrifice of the Mass is a mere delusion, introduced into that Church to magnify the power of the priesthood, and enable them to traffic upon the souls of mankind. I found, also, that the alleged change of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ is not supported by either Scripture or the authority of the early Fathers, while it is perfectly repugnant to our reason, and to the combined testimony of our senses. I found that purgatory and jubilees are not proved or recognised by the Word of God, but taken from the works of heathen mythologists. In the course of this inquiry I also found that the Church of Rome was not infallible any more than the Church of Antioch, which was certainly founded by St. Peter, and yet failed. I found, also, that auricular confession was not introduced in the practice of the Church of Rome until the Pontificate of Innocent III.; that the compulsory celibacy of the clergy, which I cannot but think a monstrous deviation from the divine and natural law, meriting the stern reprobation of mankind, is unsupported by the sanction either of the Old or New Scripture, and was forced upon a reluctant Church by the tyrannical Gregory VII. The Pope's supremacy I could only find as an usurped authority, unknown to the early Churches, which were all small federative republics, united together by a common faith, and the hope of a happy resurrection; and, lastly, the withdrawal of the ecclesiastical cup from the laity, by the Council of Constance, I found equally contrary to the injunction of Christ, the teaching of the apostles, and the practice of the Catholic Church until the beginning of the 15th century.

After having bestowed six months' labour, in compliance with St. Paul's precept, in examining carefully, and without prejudice, the principal tenets of that Church to which I belonged, and endeavoured, according to the text of the Word of God, to prove its genuineness, I found the Church of Rome light in the balance, and determined upon the spot to quit a Church which I see clearly has all the signs of apostacy about her, and which has established a temporal system, repugnant to the Gospel, and subversive of the vital principles of the Christian religion. I obeyed at once that striking exhortation contained in the Book of Revelations—"Come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." I call upon you, my Roman Catholic brethren, to observe how signally manifest the finger of God has been in my conversion. If the landed proprietor, with whom I usually spent the Sundays, had lived, and if the officers had still continued to occupy the barracks, it is most likely I should never have had leisure to reflect; and I should have, probably, continued to depend for my eternal salvation on the doctrine contained in the Catechism, and in the Maynooth Text-book. The observation of Dr. Johnson, which I before mentioned—"That it is time for a man at fifty to be in earnest about his religion," made a forcible impression upon my mind in my life of solitude, and I believe, under the guidance of God, was the proximate cause of my conversion. I earnestly recommend the same thought to the consideration of every person in the community who is anxious about the safety of his soul, and has passed the period of youth. It is a sermon in itself; and happy will those be who are led by it to resort to the written Word, as the parent of all religious instruction, and the fountain of eternal life.

The only reparation I can now make to an offended Deity, for all the absolutions, penances, indulgences, and anointings, given during a period of twenty years, is thus to acknowledge that I did so when I was steeped in vice, and engulphed in wickedness. I have now no abject fear of God's justice, but an humble confidence in his tender mercies, through the merits and all-sufficient sacrifice of Jesus Christ. The Church of Rome is an incongruous building, composed of heterogeneous materials, heaped together through various ages, and consolidated by the agency of Rome, and appearing to me now like a pyramid huge even to deformity, whose sides are formed of unequal triangles, and to whose privileges there is no access without a passport of gold. To reduce this incongruous building to the noble simplicity of the design laid down by the Divine Architect, ought to be the earnest desire and object of every person who has at heart the welfare of his country. How is this to be effected? Not, in my opinion, so much by the agency of those missionaries who are supported by the voluntary subscriptions of the English Protestants, as by the suppression of Maynooth, the Vesuvius of Ireland, which emits not only noxious and sulphurous exhalations, but launches forth an annual swarm of locusts the week after Pentecost, to prey upon the living and the dead—a lava, in my eyes, more disastrous in its consequences than that which overturned the cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum. I would say also, in addition to this, the Government ought to make a respectable provision for every priest of unblemished character who embraces the doctrine of the reformed Church Catholic of England. At present, if a priest becomes a convert, he must either fly from his fatherland, or, if not possessed of a private independence, submit to undergo the slow extinction of a country workhouse. A premium of this kind was held out to converts at the period of the Reformation; and I believe I am correct in stating, that Doctor Brown, the Catholic Bishop of Dublin, became its first Protestant reformed Archbishop. My only source of consolation is to think that I now belong to that true Church which was founded by Christ and his apostles, and was the subject of the world's wonder in its day. When the people gained a view of the wonders of the Christian Church, and beheld its followers pursuing with earnestness and joy the path pointed out to them by the first teachers of Christianity—men who possessed no outward marks of pre-eminence—they wondered—they reviled—they persecuted—but they ended by bowing down before a power they could not comprehend, although they saw the fruit of it visible before their eyes. The kingdoms of the world bowed down before those humble teachers, and the cross in God's good time surmounted the diadem and the sceptre.

And now, my dear Mr. Editor, I must ask your pardon for the great length to which this communication has run; it was, I assure you, no personal pride or contemptible vanity that induced me to prolong it to its present length, but an earnest desire to induce others to examine carefully, and unsophistically, the doctrines they have been taught, and which I inculcated for so many years, without seriously thinking about or inquiring into their truth, and, at the same time, to show that no pains or labour should deter us from personally investigating those truths that alone can stand us in stead at the day of general doom: when there will be no longer any time for unavailing repentance, and change of religion will be a matter of impossibility. Blessed be God, there is still time for us, and the Word of God is open for our examination, and every man who studies it will find, in that charter of man's salvation, that our eternal happiness does not depend upon our conforming ourselves to exterior rites or human ceremonies, but to the doctrine taught by Christ and practised by the apostles. If we adopt the doctrine of the primitive teachers, we can look forward with joy to the finishing of the mysteries of God; and though, in the rapid progress of events, the pillars of the earth may be shaken, and the "heavens rolled together like a scroll," still we can look forward beyond the foreground of this picture, into the golden distance where Christ will be pleading for his redeemed people with surpassing eloquence.

In conclusion, I take leave to say, that in forsaking the Church of Rome I was not actuated by any momentary impulse, or propelled by any ecclesiastical censure, but induced by a deep anxiety about saving my immortal soul, which I now consider, after a careful comparison of the doctrine of the Church of Rome with the Scripture, not only dubious, but almost impossible within the pale of that Church. I earnestly implore every other person in that Church to go and do likewise. Other priests have done the same; some, it is to be feared, impelled by motives foreign to mere firm conviction in the doctrines they embraced, and who have returned back again, and are now performing penance on the mountains of Waterford for the scandal they have given; there are others, however, whom it is needless for me to name, who are now labouring with indefatigable zeal in the vineyard of the Lord. There were ages in which men durst not make a public avowal of their change of belief, or the dungeon or the scaffold would have been the certain reward of such announcement—ages, when royalty herself resigned her crown at the feet of the Pope's chair, and exchanged the purple for a hair shirt and ashes; when Pope Celestine could kick the crown from off the head of Henry Barbarossa, and a Hildebrand could detain the Emperor Henry the Fourth for three days at his gate, suing in vain for mercy. But, thanks to God, those days are past, and man can now, theoretically at least, walk abroad in conscious dignity, under the shadow of the British constitution, inhaling the pure air of civil and religious liberty, and disregarding alike the prisons of Tuscany, and the dungeons of the Inquisition. That we have our sufferings, however, is not to be denied; but I shall not increase the length of this article by detailing the indignities I have endured from my nearest relations—such a description would be useless and unavailing. All human suffering is relative, and what have I to complain of in comparison with the sufferings of Christ and his Apostles? One alone of my bereavements I will mention: it is the loss of those bosom friends, those silent yet powerful teachers and counsellors, my books, which, I mourn to say, I was obliged to sell for the one-third of their value; and if any of your readers are disposed to criticise this communication, let them be just enough to take into consideration that, during the time I was writing it, I actually had not a book in my possession but the Bible I exchanged, in Paris, for my Breviary, and a Church of England Prayer Book.

If, however, what I have written should assist to rescue one person from the errors of Rome, I shall not have written in vain. Happy, indeed, would the writer be if he only conducted one individual to think seriously of securing his future happiness and of the stern but glorious realities of an eternity. He now, in the language of the apostle, says—Farewell. "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith," "Prove your ownselves," and remember, if you are in the faith, that the rain may descend, and the floods come, and the winds blow, and beat upon your house, but it shall fall not, for it is founded upon a rock.

I have the honour to be, Mr. Editor,

THEBA AND THE TALK OF THE ROAD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—I have been reading the Catholic Layman for April, and must confess myself greatly astonished at the "Talk on the Road." Any one ignorant of the teaching and practices of Catholics would conclude from it, that Catholics never confessed their sins to God. I have, at this moment, six prayer-books lying beside me, published in the following places:—London, Liverpool, Dublin, Belfast, Paris, and Menin; and, in every one of them confession to God is made part of the evening prayer. I copy for you the whole prayer:—

"I confess to Almighty God, to the Blessed Virgin Mary, to the Blessed Michael the Archangel, to the Blessed John the Baptist, to the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, and to all the Saints, that I have grievously sinned in thought, word, and deed: through my fault, through my fault, through my exceeding great fault; therefore, I beseech the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Blessed Michael the Archangel, the Blessed John the Baptist, the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, and all the saints in heaven, to pray to the Lord our God, for me."

So, you see sir, Catholics do confess their sins to God; at least, they are taught to do so, and the same prayer is used by Catholics at the beginning and end of their confessions to the priest. And moreover, sir, if Pat (the man who, it is pretended, reads the Bible) only waits to go to confession till he can find confession to a priest in the Bible, he may go to confession as soon as he can get any priest to hear him, after what he has said. If you will look to the 27th chapter of Matthew, in the Douay Bible, you will find that Judas, as soon as he had repented having betrayed our Saviour, "came to the priests and ancients, saying, 'I have sinned in betraying innocent blood,' and, casting down the pieces of silver in the temple, he departed."

Now, sir, I beg you to observe that, besides confession to a priest, you have here on good authority, the three parts of the Catholic sacrament of penance—contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Judas first repented, then confessed to a priest, and then made what satisfaction was in his power, by restoring the money he had wickedly obtained.

I should advise the writer of the "Talk on the Road," to learn a little more correctly what Catholics do practise before he writes again about them; because, by not telling the whole truth, he has led many Protestants to believe what is untrue.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

THEBA.

We beg to assure our correspondent, that when we published in our last number, what Pat said about confession, we were perfectly aware of the existence of the "Confiteor." Whatever our fault may be, it certainly was not ignorance of that remarkable document—"I confess to Almighty God, to the Blessed Virgin Mary, to the Blessed Michael the Archangel, to the Blessed John the Baptist," &c.. &c.

Whoever uses this confession, confesses to St. John the Baptist, and all the others, in precisely the same way, and in the very same words, in which he confesses to Almighty God. Either St. John the Baptist and all the others are raised to an equality with God in the matter of confession of sin, or else God Almighty is reduced to the level of his creatures as respects the confession of sin. Either way we think this form of confession is dishonouring to God; we think it a confession which a jealous God will not receive; and, therefore, we cannot accept it as proof that the Church of Rome teaches men to make an acceptable confession of sin to God.

But, while admitting (which we have never denied) that the Church of Rome does make some show of teaching men the duty of confessing their sins to God, we, at the same time, hold that the teaching of the Church of Rome, respecting the confession of sin, has a natural and necessary tendency to lead men to think little of confessing their sins to God, and to think much of confessing their sins to the priest. And this teaching of the Church of Rome about confession of sin, is so well calculated to produce this effect, that it would be a marvel if such an effect were not generally produced in the majority of ignorant persons, as we believe, in fact, it very often is.

The teaching of the Church of Rome about the confession and forgiveness of sins we believe to be this:—

1. If a man confess his sins to God, with perfect contrition, he will receive pardon from God without confessing to a priest.

2. This perfect contrition is a thing so difficult and so rare that few, if any, can expect to receive pardon of sin from God by it.

3. God did, therefore, provide an easier way for sinners to be saved—namely, by confessing their sins to a priest—in which method perfect contrition is not necessary; so that the majority of men who could not obtain the pardon of their sins by confessing to God, may be able to find pardon by confessing to a priest, who will let them off on easier terms.

If our correspondent, "Theba," will look to what the catechism of the Council of Trent says of confession, under the sacrament of penance, he will see that we have rightly stated the doctrine of the Church of Rome on this subject.

We think the effect of such teaching must necessarily be, to lead men to think much of confessing to a priest, and little of confessing to God. Most ignorant Roman Catholics will naturally say, "a saint, indeed, may get pardon by confessing to God with perfect contrition; but I cannot be a saint in the Church of Rome; I cannot have perfect contrition; I must be content to get forgiveness in the easiest way which God has provided; so I must look to the priest, and not to God, for pardon of sin."

We believe that this teaching does work out its natural consequences among Roman Catholics to a large extent, and we do not think that the "confiteor"—which actually puts creatures on a level with God in the matter of confession of sin—is calculated to correct this error.

But our friend, "Theba," undertakes to teach Pat where he may find confession to a priest in the Bible; and we will be happy to explain "Theba's" teaching to Pat, and see if it be sufficient to convince and to satisfy a poor Irishman who reads his Bible. Judas, when he had betrayed our Lord, confessed to the priests, and made restitution and satisfaction. "Confessing to the priests," may sound a little to the purpose; but Pat knows that these were the Jewish priests who put Christ to death, and not the ministers of Christ. Such difficulties are very small to a man who studies his Bible.

As to Judas's CONTRITION, we are decidedly of opinion that "Theba" has fallen into an error in applying that word to Judas. "Theba" ought to have said "ATTRITION." The difference, according to theologians of the Church of Rome, appears to be this—contrition means sorrow for having offended God; it is sorrow for sin, because it is sin; whereas attrition is merely sorrow for the punishment of sin. Judas certainly had not contrition—he had no godly sorrow for sin—but he had attrition—dread and horror at what he had brought on himself; and he had this attrition to a very high degree, for even the sight of his money became so odious to him that, covetous as he was, he could not bear to look at it, but cast back the price of blood to those who gave it. Thus, the horror which Judas had of his sin was great, and it worked a great effect; yet "attrition" did not save him. St. Paul says—"Godly sorrow worketh repentance unto salvation, not to be repented of; but the sorrow of the world worketh death" (2 Cor. vii. 10); and so, indeed, it proved with Judas, for his "attrition" so tormented him, that he went and hanged himself, that, as St. Peter says, "he might go to his own place."—Acts i. 25. Such, we believe, has often been the effect of "attrition"—that is, of sorrow for the punishment of sin, without a godly sorrow for having offended God by sin; an awful warning, we think, against the doctrine that "attrition, with confession to a priest," is effectual for salvation.

Some persons, we believe, are perplexed at the expression in our translation of the Bible, that Judas "repented;" we may explain that the Greek word applied to Judas is not μεταυοεω, which means a change of heart, but μεταμελομαι, which means only a change of purpose or conduct, in which sense the word "repent" is sometimes used in English.

No doubt, "Theba" makes out a very fair case for "confession, attrition, and satisfaction" in the case of Judas; but we must, at the same time, remind "Theba" that, after all, the main thing in the "sacrament of penance" was wanting in the case of Judas; for we do not read that the High Priest said to Judas, "I absolve thee." But, query, if the High Priest had said this to Judas, would it have made the "attrition" of Judas effectual for his salvation?

After all, "Theba" may be scarcely in earnest in bringing up this strange argument about Judas to us; but till some other correspondent can give us a better on the subject, we hope that Pat and Biddy, and many more, may think that Pat's simple way of confessing to God is better than either, "the confiteor," said a hundred times over, or the confession of Judas to the priests.

THE REV. DR. CAHILL AND CONTROVERSY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As I am a Catholic, of course I wish to see the priests of the Catholic Church defending the doctrines which are held and taught by us, not only in our own chapels and at our regular services, but also when challenged by Protestant ministers to a public discussion. But, really I never was more astonished and disappointed than when I read the letter of the Rev. Dr. Cahill, in reply to an invitation sent him by seven Protestant ministers to meet them at Sligo, and have a public discussion on the disputed points of our faith. I read that letter, which purposed to be a "reply" to the ministers; I expected to find argument in it in support of our faith; but could not find one, from beginning to end. There was plenty of abuse in it, however, and, indeed, if Dr. Cahill thinks that he will convert Protestants by such language as he uses in his "reply," I fear the Catholic Church will have very few converts. But he says one thing which puzzles me a good deal. He says the Protestant Church is only 300 years old, and, during that time, it has changed no less than 754 times! so that it would be very difficult for him (if he did accept the challenge) to know what Protestants believe in the year 1855. But Dr. Newman, in his "Theory of Development," says, that the more a Church changes, the more perfect she becomes. Now, which of these two doctors are right? According to Dr. Cahill, the Protestant Church, with its regiments of "lemon-coloured soupers," &c., is the apostasy predicted by St. Paul; according to Dr. Newman, it ought to be the most perfect Church in existence. I must confess that I am puzzled which to believe; or ought I to believe any of them? But Dr. Cahill says he would not be allowed by his bishop to defend his Church. Here, in Dublin, there's nothing going on but sermons, and meetings, and goodness knows what else against "Popery," and not one to defend it, except, indeed, a few laymen, that have'nt got the knowledge to meet ministers and trained Bible-readers, as well as the priests, and then Protestants will come up to us and say—"Your religion is wrong, it is contrary to the Bible," &c., and bring a lot of texts against us that we can't meet; and yet St. Peter says, that we ought to give a reason to every one that asks for the hope that is in us. Then there is your paper, where you invite any one to "break a friendly lance" with you, as you said in your last number; but no priest will do it. I am sure I can't but think that if St. Peter or St. Paul were alive now, and believed Protestants were heretics, they would not let them alone. But, now, sir, I want to get a little light thrown on what Drs. Newman and Cahill have written, to know which is right; and if some of the Catholics, who correspond so often with you, would explain it (and, indeed, I wish that Dr. Cahill would do it), for the information of one who is not so wise as themselves, they would confer a great advantage, not only on me, but on many others who are just in the same predicament.—I am, sir your humble servant,

W. RICHARDSON.

THE DOUAY BIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

MR. EDITOR—I sometimes get a loan of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN from one Jerry Donovan, a sister's son of mine, and I see that poor boys like myself sometimes write to your honour for advice, when they're any way troubled in their minds, and, more by token, you never give them a cross word. Well, sir, I was coming from Cork, after seeing off two boys of mine who left for America, when who should I meet but Jerry Donovan himself; and as it was three months since I left Keelovenogue, I was mighty glad to see Jerry, to hear how the wife and children were getting on. "How did you leave all at home?" says I. "Bravely," says he. "And how's the neighbours?" says I. "Purty well," says he. "And how's his Riverence, Father John?" says I. "Bad enough, then," says he. "And what ails him?" says I, "he was hearty and well when I left." Says he, "if you saw him now you'd hardly know him, he looks so bad." "Was it the 'fluinzy that took him?" says I. "No," says he. "Was it an attack of the rhumaticks?" says I. "No," says he, "but an attack of the Romish controversy." Well, sir, I was dumbfoundered at this, for I heard a deal about the Romish controversy in Cork, and I seen the blue, and green, and yellow placards stuck on the walls, but still I couldn't think how this would make poor Father John look so bad as Jerry said; so, says I, "tell us all about it." "I will," says he; so with that he began his story, and says he, "every creature in Keelovenogue is mad about the controversy, and that's what fretting Father John; and I'll tell you how it all came to pass. When first the Protestant clargyman began the lectures, some of us went out of curiosity to hear what he had to say." Well, Mr. Editor, when Jerry told me that he had gone to such a place, I was mighty vexed, and says I, "you mean-spirited rascal, is it turning souper you are? I suppose you'll soon be a jumper on our hands; didn't Father John warn us from the altar against going to such places? didn't he tell us that if we listened to lectures, or Scripture-readers, or missioners, we'd all become soupers and jumpers? Well, sir, Jerry got a little vexed at this, and says he, "I'm no more a souper nor yourself, and I think our religion would be a very poor one if listening to a Protestant clargyman for an hour would take it away from us." "Oh! you villian," says I, "is it crying down our holy religion you are?" "No," says he, "but it's you and Father John that's crying it down." "What do you mean by that?" says I. "Why," says he, "when Father John and you says that hearing a lecture, or talking to a reader, would make us all turn Protestants, isn't it all one as admitting that our religion is a very weak one?" Well, Mr. Editor, I was mighty vexed at this twist of Jerry's, 'specially as I hadn't an answer ready, and the fellow was too cute for me in the logic; so, says I, "go on with your story." "Well," says he, "after we were some time in the room, the minister said some prayers, and I must admit they were as good words as ever I heard." "Why, then, how did you know that?" says I; "sure with all your impudence you don't purtend to know Latin, and maybe 'twas cursing you he was all the time." "Why," says he, "'twasn't Latin at all." "What else was it?" says I. "'Twas good English," says he. "Oh! the ignorant cratures," says I; "'tis because them Protestant clargy don't know the Latin that they speak all the same as one of ourselves." "No, indeed," says Jerry, "that's not the reason, anyhow; for the minister was at Dublin College, and knows Latin and Greek as well as I know the 'ladder of larning.'" "Why, then," says I, "if he's so knowledgeable, isn't it a wonder he wouldn't say the prayers in Latin, like our clargy?" "Maybe 'tis for a reason he has," says he. "What reason could he have?" says I. "Maybe," says Jerry, "he thinks the people would understand the prayers better in English." "Cock them up with understanding," says I; "how bad they are for understanding; but," says I, "I see what you're at, you villian, you're defending the heretics, and finding fault with our own clargy." "'Deed I'm not," says he; "I was only trying to answer your question. But," says he, "the minister said one thing that night that stuck in us greatly. 'Boys,' says he, 'I like fair play, and I don't want to have all the talk to myself, and, perhaps,' says he, 'if your priest was to come here of a night, or if he was to appoint a place where we could both meet, he might be able to say something for his religion.'" Well, sir, when I heard Jerry getting on this way, I couldn't help interrupting him, and, says I, "Sure, Father John was the man for him; sure he often told us that he was longing to meet one of the spalpeens that's abusing our holy religion, till he'd give him a sacking. Why didn't you tell Father John of the fellow's boasting, and he'd soon take the shine out of him?" "Why," says Jerry, "only you stopped me I was going to tell you that we told it all to Father John next day." "And what did he say?" says I. "Why he said that, of course, if he thought it worth his while, he could put him down in less than no time, but that he wouldn't demean himself to argue with such a spalpeen, that he wouldn't be up and down with the likes of him." "And sure," says I, "Father John was right; is it for a holy man like him to be arguing with a set of jumpers and soupers?" "Why, then," says Jerry, "'tis soon you've changed your tune; five minutes ago you said that Father John was the very man to put them down, and that he was only longing to meet one of them to take the shine out of him." Well, Mr. Editor, I was clean caught—the fellow was too strong for me in the logic. So, says I, "go on with your story." "Well," says he, "some of the boys wern't quite satisfied with Father John's excuse, and as the Protestants were throwing it in our faces that we hadn't a word to say for our religion, we thought that, as our priests wouldn't speak for us, we'd speak for ourselves. So we asked Humphrey Carey, the great disputer, to come to the next lecture, and answer the minister. And, sure enough, he did, and well he spoke, too; and thinks I to myself, we owe more to poor Humphrey than to our priests; for though we pay them well, not one of them would speak up for us; but Humphrey stood his ground like a man, and gave the minister word for word, and text for text, so that we were all delighted with him; and, by the same token, we made a good collection for him after the meeting, and he was the greatest man in Keelovenogue, greater than Father John himself. But, to hasten with my story: one evening the clergyman said that the priests were against letting the people have the Bible, and Humphrey says, quite stiff, that they wern't against the Douay Bible. Humphrey was foolish (as we told him afterwards) in saying this, but he was only trying to stand up for the priests. Well, the minister took him up at once, and says he, 'Will you come with me to Father John to-morrow, to ask if he has any objection to letting his people have the Douay Bible?' Humphrey was fairly caught, and couldn't draw back, so he said he was ready to go with him whenever he liked. So the next day the minister and the clergyman of another parish, and two other gintlemen went with Humphrey to Father John. "Stop, Jerry," says I, "how do I know that you're telling me a word of truth? maybe its deceiving me you are; sure I know that Father John wouldn't let the likes of them inside his door." "Why," says Jerry, "I suppose he thought 'twas no use to be denied to them; for if he dldn't see them that day, they'd have gone the next, and the next, until they caught him; and besides," says he, "it must be true, for I've the whole matter here in my hat in a printed paper." So with that, sir, he took off the caubeen and pulled out a printed paper all about the visit to Father John. "But," says I, "Jerry, how do you know but it's lies are in the paper? There's many a thing printed that aint true, and maybe the parsons made it all out of their own heads." "So I thought at first," says Jerry; "but I brought it to Humphrey Carey and asked him if 'twas true, and he allowed that every word in it was true." "Well," says I, "read us your paper." Well, sir, Jerry read ont of the paper how the parson asked Father John, whether he had any objection to the people having the Douay Bible, and Father John said at once that he hadn't the least objection in life. "Stop, Jerry," says I, "there must be some mistake there; are you quite sure Father John said that?" "'Deed, I am," says he, "here it is in black and white." "Why, then," says I, "sure it's not six months since Father John warned us against the Bible; 'for,' says he, 'boys, 'twill only make soupers of you.' "That's all true," says Jerry; "but still what I read for you is true too." "Tear-an-ages, man," says I, "how can both be true? Sure he can't be for the Bible and against the Bible at the same time." "Why," says Jerry, "the priests have one answer for us and another for the Protestants; they're ashamed to cry down the Bible before Protestants, so they purtind they havn't the least objection in life to it." "Oh, you slandering villian," says I, "you desarve to be cursed with bell, book, and candle, for saying such a thing of your clargy." "Well," says he, "if you don't like my interpretation give us a better yourself." Well, sir, I was nonplushed again by the fellow's logic, and I didn't know how to account for Father John saying one thing to us in the chapel, and saying quite the opposite to the Protestants. "So," says I, "go on with the paper." "Well," says he, "the parson then asked Father John, why he didn't give out lots of Bibles to his people? 'Why,' says Father John, 'I'd be quite willing to give them out, but I havn't the money to buy them.'* 'Oh,' says the minister, 'that's a pity, and I'll tell you what we'll do, WE'LL BUY DOUAY BIBLES IF YOU'LL LET US GIVE THEM TO YOUR PEOPLE.' Well, Father John was greatly vexed at this, and said he wouldn't allow any such thing. 'Then,' says the minister, 'are you against the Bible?' 'I'm not,' says he, and he even said that 'twas his *wish that every one of his people who could read had one." "Well, Jerry," says I, "if Father John really wishes us to have the Bibles, and hasn't money to buy them himself, why wouldn't he let the Protestants buy them for us? Sure, let them be ever so bad, the touch of their hands wouldn't poison the book. Sure I'd eat an egg that came out of a dirty hand, for I know that the dirt could'nt get into it; and in like manner if the Bible is a good book, it would'nt be made bad by coming ont of a Protestant's hands." "Oh," says Jerry, "Father John knows all that as well as you; but he was only trying to get out of the hobble the best way he could; he was in a regular fix, for he did'nt like before the Protestants to speak against the Bible, and still he wouldn't for the world that the people got a hould of it." "Why, then, Jerry, says I, "that's not fair play; that's not honest of Father John." "Oh," says he, turning quite sharp on me and laughing as if he'd burst, "who's the souper now?" Well, Mr. Editor, I was vexed to say that I had given the cunning rogue such an advantage over me; so, says I, "stop your laughing, and go on with your story." "Well," says he, "Father John determined not to let it all go with them, so he looked quite stiff at the minister, and, says he, 'isn't it a shame for a clargyman like you to be disputing with poor unlearned men; you should be ashamed of yourselves,' says he, 'for arguing with poor tinkers and weavers, who never went through college.'" "Hurra," says I, "Father John for ever, more power to his elbow, sure I knew he had it in him if he was put to it." "Stop a while," says Jerry, "Father John never said a more foolish word in his life." "How so?" says I. "Because," says he, "it brought him into the very middle of a hobble; the parson took him up at once, and, says he, 'Father John you're the last man in the world that should bring this charge against us. Sure,' says he, 'why is it that we argue with unlearned men, but because the learned men like yourself won't come forward.'" "Oh, murder," says I, "that was a hard cut." "'Twas so," says Jerry, "and Father John felt it sorely; he hadn't a word in his mouth; and, what was worse than all, he saw that he had brought it upon himself." "And what did poor Father John say then?" says I. "Why," says Jerry, "he tried to make some excuses which I havn't time to repeat for you now;" so with that we parted. But now, Mr. Editor, I must tell you that though I did'nt let on to Jerry, still my mind is greatly troubled about Father John and the Bible. I know that our clargy are against it, and I know that our priests count it a dangerous book, that would only make Protestants of us; and I know that heavy penance would be put on any of us that had a Bible in the house; and, after all this, isn't it the queerest thing in the world that Father John told these Protestant gentlemen that he had no objection in life to the Bible? and even said he *wished we all had Douay Bibles. Now, Mr. Editor, how can you explain this? At first I explained it myself by thinking that what Father John told us in chapel was the true story, and that what was in the paper was a lie; but I had to give up this explanation, for a thousand of the papers were distributed, giving the clergymen's names, and the priests' names, and the names of the gentlemen who went with the clergymen; and these papers were stuck up about the town, and given to all the people; and still Father John never denied that he said what was in the paper; and Humphrey Carey admitted that every word was true. Still, sir, I can't think Father John would be so unfair as to have one answer for us, and another for the Protestants. Sure this wouldn't be like an honest man, much less like a holy priest of the old and true Church. I'm sure that all the difficulty lies in my own ignorance, and because I don't know anything of logic; but I think a learned man like your honour could explain what seems to be a contradiction to a poor ignorant man like me. Do, then, Mr. Editor, and good luck to you, set my mind at ease on this point.

Your humble servant to command,

DAN CARTHY.

We readily insert Mr. Carthy's letter, having heard many similar accounts of the double conduct of Roman Catholic priests about the circulation of the Douay Bible. Our conviction is, that the time is rapidly approaching when, if the Roman Catholic clergy and laity do not establish a Bible Society for their own people, Protestants will feel it their duty to do so, so as to let the people of Ireland, who are advancing in education and intelligence every day, have the only Bible which they can believe to be a true one, at the same moderate price that Protestants can procure their authorized version. For ourselves we feel no difficulty about the matter, and should wish the Douay Bible to be in the hands of every man in Ireland that can read, and is unwilling as yet to trust the accuracy of the Protestant version. We have published our reasons pretty fully for preferring the latter; but believing the original Hebrew and Greek Old and New Testaments to be truly the Word of the living God, we think any translation of it extant to be preferable to none at all; and if the Douay Bible were once in the people's hands it would, we think, be the greatest step ever made in the progress of true national education.

MAUNDAY THURSDAY AT ROME.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—A short time ago a friend of mine wrote you a letter about the Mass in the Crimea, and the height of an altar, and the like, and signed himself "Poor Paddy" [CATH. LAYMAN, vol. iv., p. 23]. Now, sir, that you know is not his real name. He was afraid to give it out and out; but as I know him—and, indeed, I put him up to write that letter—I am sorry nobody has answered his questions; but that is not your fault, for you invited them to answer him; and, as "Poor Paddy" knows me, and is in the secret of this letter, I think he will be offended if nobody answers this. So that it will be between us, your honour.

I suppose you know, sir, that every man among us feels himself honoured when his parish priest is honoured, and, indeed, your honour, we, poor people in Clerkenwell, have been very much honoured entirely, because our parish priest Father Kyne, was invited to Rome; and we hear that he had some hand in making the new faith there, last December, about the Immaculate Conception; and, sure, that's equal, anyhow, to writing a part of the Bible; and, like the Hail Mary, at all events, that took three parties to make it to its present size, so the faith of the Church has been partly made by our parish priest, Father Kyne; and it's he can make great doctrines, your honour, when he likes to put himself to it, so he can.

But that's not all—it's not my question, anyhow. What I want to know is, what I read in the Tablet (of April 28th last, in page 260), where we are told that Mr. Kyne, our parish priest, had the honour of preaching a sermon, in English, in Rome; and the sermon was all about us and our neighbours; and the man that writes to the Tablet, all the way from Rome, goes on to say these words—"Your readers will be interested to hear that Father Kyne was one of "the apostles" in the ceremonies of Maundy Thursday—that is, he had his feet washed by the Holy Father," &c.

Oh, your honour, what a washing that must have been! and Father Kyne, I'm sure, never had such clean feet since he was born as when his H[illegible] washed them; and wasn't it mighty kind of the Pope to do that to our parish priest? But what bothers me entirely is, that the Tablet-man says that "Father Kyne was one of the apostles." Does he mean to say that he actually was one of them? or that he was transubstantiated into one of them? And, what vexes me more than all is, that the parson about here read it, too; and, sure enough, it wasn't long after my breakfast, that he walks in, and, sitting down, with an arch smile on his face, he says to me—"Well, Callaghan, so Father Kyne has had his feet washed in Rome." "So it's reported," said I; "and I hope that came to no stranger to him." "Well," said the minister, "it's strange for him to have such a servant, anyhow." "True for you," said I. "But, Callaghan," says he, looking mighty cute, "you remember our conversation the other day about 'This is my body'—don't you?" "I do," says I. "And," says he, "do you still stick to the literal interpretation of the word is?" "To be sure I do," says I; "and why shouldn't I? Doesn't it mean that it really was his body, or, as the Church says, was transubstantiated into his body?"

The minister stopped awhile, and took out the Tablet, and says to me, "Sure, Callaghan, but, what do you think, Father Kyne was transubstantiated the other day into one of the apostles." "Into one of the apostles, your honour! (not Judas, I hope); but you're not serious. Are you?" "Why, I only tell you what I see here in the Tablet, that 'Father Kyne was one of the apostles.'" "Oh," says I, "is that all the proof you have? Sure that doesn't mean he was really one of the apostles, but that he only represented one of them?" "What do you mean, Callaghan?" says he. "Do you mean to say the Tablet tells a lie in saying he was one of the apostles, when all the time he was no such thing?" "I mean to say, your reverence, that he wasn't one of the apostles, anyway." "And why not believe literally what the Tablet says?" said the minister. "Why, because it is impossible," said I. "But," says the minister, "with God all things are possible." "Sure you don't mean to say," said I, "that God would turn Father Kyne into one of the apostles this time of day?" "And why not?" said he. "Because, your reverence, couldn't the people see Father Kyne, and feel him, and hear him speak, and know by his looks, and his voice, and by every bit of him, that it was Father Kyne still, and that it wasn't one of the apostles?"

The minister put up the Tablet again, and I looking at him as though I had put him down altogether in his queer notions, when he says to me, "Well, Callaghan, you are an inconsistent fellow; you told me just now that 'This is my body' means this is really my body, changed and transubstantiated; and now you tell me that the words 'Father Kyne was one of the apostles,' mean that he really was not one of the apostles, and can only mean that he represented one of the apostles. Now, you know, Callaghan," says he, "is and was are parts of the same verb, only different tenses, and what one means the other must mean; and if you would know Father Kyne to be Father Kyne, by feeling him, and seeing him, and hearing him, can you not also know that the wafer, after consecration, is a wafer, by feeling, tasting, seeing, and smelling it?" "It's mighty queer," says I to him. And so I say now to you, Mr. Editor, "It's mighty queer."

"Poor Paddy" and myself talked over the matter that evening, and we resolved that I should write you my letter, your honour; and we are in hopes somebody will give us an answer to it, and say whether Father Kyne was (that is, really was) one of the apostles, or if the word means represented; and, if so, how can I be sure, "This is my body?" I'll be keen to hear some words about it from the Protestants, never fear, and something every day, until I am able to clear up the difficulty.

Won't you help me, Mr. Editor? and, if you print this, you will oblige

Your humble servant,

TIMOTHY CALLAGHAN.

Potatoes will require close attention in weeding, hoeing, and earthing up, if not done, and weeding and careful earthing from the furrows, in the ridges of lazy-beds.

Winter-sown Salading Crops, such as cress and radishes, will be coming into use by the end of the month, salads are consumed the land should be put in preparation for turnips, &c.

New Pastures should be sown here to prevent the plants seeding, prevent filling, and cover the ground quickly to form a close sward.

"Most cordially do we recommend this useful work to the attention of all who seek for information as to the past or present state of the East. It will be found a valuable companion to all travellers visiting those regions. In particular we would strongly recommend it to the attention of our clerical friends, who, especially of late years, must have felt the want of such an addition to their libraries. The immense mass of information which it contains in so comparatively small a compass, and its very low price, will render it as easy of acquisition as useful in possession. Besides its intrinsic interest, its value as a book of reference, with regard to the state of the East, cannot be over-estimated."—Record Newspaper.

"These volumes contain a large amount of deeply interesting information. They are eminently calculated to promote the godly zeal of British Christians in favour of those parts of the world to which they themselves are indebted, under God, for the knowledge of the common salvation."—Evangelical Christendom.

"It is a work which I recommend to all who desire to become better acquainted with the present condition of Greek Christianity."—The Rev. R. Burgess, on "Greek Christianity," to the Young Men's Christian Association.

"These volumes might not inaptly be designated a delineation of Mohammedanism, or of the Christianity in the East, or of the present state of the Jews. We could not wish a more luminous and masterly disquisition on the great points here set forth. The origin and decline of knowledge in the East generally is discussed with consummate care and ability. The work deserves a place in every library, both public and private."—British Banner.

THE QUEEN OF HEAVEN.

If we were asked what we considered the distinctive characteristic of the Church of Rome at the present day, we should, without hesitation, say, it is the worship of the Virgin Mary. Not that it is a modern invention, but because it has, of late years, assumed a prominence, all-pervading and all-absorbing, which it had not known before. So far is this from being a disputed matter, that an eminent English clergyman—to whose writings we have often been indebted—the Rev. Hobart Seymour, states, that on once remarking to an ecclesiastic in the City of Rome, that it appeared to him that the religion of Christ, as received in that city, would more fitly be entitled the religion of Mary, the priest replied, approving the sentiment, that every year it was becoming more and more developed as the religion of Mary. The late dogmatic decree of Pope Pius IX. seems to have since put the top stone on her temple, by withdrawing her from the fallen race of Adam, and clothing her, from the first moment of her existence, with the sinless human nature of her Divine Son. Henceforward the Spanish form of doxology would seem to be the only orthodox or fitting one—

"Glory be to the Father,
Glory be to the Son,
Glory be to the Holy Ghost,
Glory be to the most Holy Virgin,
Through all ages for ever and ever. Amen."

We have never written, and trust we shall never write, one word disparaging of, or disrespectful towards, the Blessed Virgin Mary, the mother of our Divine Master in his human nature, as perfect man; but we earnestly believe that to confound the divine and human natures of our Blessed Lord, by calling his human mother the QUEEN OF HEAVEN, is a dangerous delusion, closely verging on idolatry, and derogatory to the divine glory of every member of the ever blessed Trinity.

Let us look back a little into the history of the world, and seriously examine and reflect whether this tendency to exalt a female to the throne of the universe has not its roots as deep and as universal as fallen human nature itself.

In almost all the mythologies of ancient times, whether in the east or in the west, there was a female divinity—a goddess whose maternity was worshipped. In one mythology it was Astarte, of the Assyrians; in another, it was Ashtoreth, of the Sidonians; in another, it was Bawancy, of the Hindoos. In the classic mythology of Greece and Rome, eclectic as it was, there was a Venus adopted from the one, and a Juno from the other. It is said that the image of Diana of the Ephesians was that of a female, from whose body, in every part, there seemed to be issuing all the various animals of creation, symbolizing the conception and production of all things. The Egyptians on one hand, and the Etruscans on the other, had their Isis, the same symbol—a female divinity whom they regarded as "the mother of the gods." Even the Scandinavian mythology had its Freigha; and of the two great systems of religion that prevailed in the Roman Empire, Judaism and the classic mythology, the latter styled Juno "the Queen of Heaven;" and the former, when corrupted by the admixture of the heathenism around it, was charged by the prophet Jeremiah with having also its "Queen of Heaven."—Jerem. vii. 18., xliv. 17.

This Divinity, in all the systems, had a mysterious and indefinite position. We do not believe that in any of them she was considered as actually supreme. Her power and province were left very much to the imaginations or feelings of her votaries; and it would seem as if it was an element congenial with all natural religious systems, as answering some impulse or feeling in the fallen and natural heart, that there should be the embodiment of some such idea—the symbol of the creation and production of all things, enthroned among the Gods, as the Queen of Heaven. The only charge we make against the Church of Rome is, that—perhaps with the apparently politic object (as M. Bougnet* considers it) of facilitating the adoption of Christianity by Pagan nations—she accommodated herself to that element and tendency of heathenism, instead of imitating the Prophet Jeremiah in denouncing this worship among the Jews—instead of following the Apostle Paul in opposing it among the Gentiles—instead of counteracting this tendency of the people of the Roman Empire, she rather encouraged it; and with the zealous, but we think short-sighted policy we have mentioned, of inducing a more rapid and extended profession of Christianity, she allowed the Easterns to accept the Virgin in the place of Astarte—their previous Queen of Heaven; and the Westerns to reverence Mary instead of Juno, the Queen of Heaven they had previously worshipped; and we think it is not the least startling fact connected with this matter, that the two favourite titles ascribed to Mary in the Church of Rome, and which are to be found in almost all her devotional books at the present day—namely, "the Queen of Heaven," and "Mother of God"—are the very same titles ascribed to their female divinity—the goddess of the ancients. She was entitled in the East, the Mother of the Gods; and in the West, the Queen of Heaven.

But, however it originated, there is no doubt that Mary is now as much recognised and worshipped in the Roman Church as was the Queen of Heaven in the widely-extended Roman Empire. In all its essential elements, the Roman Empire and the Roman Church—the Pagan Rome and the Papal Rome—are in accord in this matter. The transfer to Mary of all the devotion previously paid to Juno, Astarte, Ashtoreth, or Isis, could hardly alter the nature of the thing; and we can scarcely believe that with all the subtle distinctions theoretically drawn by theologians of the Church of Rome, in actual practice, the popular worship of Mary leads to less practical idolatry than that of Juno or Isis among the ancient Pagans.

There are persons in Italy and Spain who freely and readily admit much of this, and say that the prevalence of this conception, of a female divinity among so many ancient mythologies, was, as it were, the dispersed and scattered elements of a coming truth—a sort of all-pervading prophesy or anticipation of a future reality—and that all was to be fulfilled in the exaltation of the Virgin Mother. They imagine, that as the promise of a Messiah was once universally spread among the families of Noah, and as it passed by tradition through many generations, so the woman, through whom He was to come, became a hope, a creation in their mythologies, and was thus the great archetype of all those female divinities of the heathen world. Persons who believe this, argue that when the nations lost all knowledge of the true God, and created false gods for their worship, and worshipped them in his stead, their idolatry consisted not in their worshipping of idols or images, but in the worshipping of false gods; and, in like manner, the idolatry of the heathen was not their worshipping a female divinity, but in worshipping those that were false, instead of her who is revered as the only true one—even Mary. This view of the subject is a favourite one in countries where Mary is worshipped, not, indeed, in name and title, as a goddess, but with all the same reverence and devotion, in service and worship, as if she were a goddess. There can be no question as to the fact, that in those countries she is the divinity, prayed to more frequently, loved more fervently, worshipped more devoutly, and depended on more entirely than God the Father, the Son, or the Holy Spirit. Whether the Church of Rome approves of this is another question; but of the matter of fact, there can be no doubt whatever.

The answer which they usually give on this subject is, that they do not worship Mary as a goddess or as a divinity, but they regard her as a creature, the most exalted of all, even as Queen of angels and of men, but a creature still—that they feel as strongly as ourselves the heinous sin of giving divine worship to a creature; but they give to her a different worship, an inferior worship, to that which they give to God. And, inasmuch as they do not worship her as a god or a goddess, they say they are not liable to the charge of idolatry, which, in their view, consists in giving to a creature that kind and degree of worship which belongs only to the Creator.

But wherein consists the practical difference between the worship paid to Mary and the worship rendered to God? The offering prayer—the presenting hymns of praise—the making solemn vows—the consecration of the votaries to her service—the devoting gifts and offerings of wealth—the dedication of children—the sacrifice of the Mass—the trusting to her in the hour of death—all these are done to Mary, or in honour of Mary, as well as to God, and in honour of God. They pray to her by her sufferings beneath the cross. They plead her merits even as they do those of Jesus Christ. Wherein, then, consists the distinction in the Church of Rome between the practical worship paid to Mary and the worship paid to God?

The general answer is, that there are two great points of distinction, and that they are so marked as to place the two kinds of worship as wide apart as the poles. The first is, that they never pray through the merits of Mary, but only through the merits of Christ; pleading not the merits of a creature, but only the merits of Christ. And, secondly, that they never pray to Mary, as if she could grant anything of her own power, or as if she could grant any blessings of herself; but only to exert her influence with Jesus Christ, that He may grant the petition. They state that they never pray for anything by her merits, or ask her to do anything by her own power.

This is a statement of fact, and must be examined like every assertion of fact, and accepted or rejected according to the evidence.

Let us lay aside the private statements or practices of individuals, and look at the devotional books in use in the Church of Rome—the authorised formularies of that Church.

We have now before us the four volumes of the Roman Breviary, in each of which, p. cxxxv., may be found the Offices of the Blessed Virgin, "Officium Beatæ Mariæ in Sabbato; Officium Parvum B.M.; Officium B.M. in Adventu." In these offices we find several times repeated, pp. 136, 151, and 159, the following prayer:—"May the Lord conduct us to the kingdom of heaven, by the prayers AND MERITS of the Blessed ever Virgin Mary, and all the Saints. Amen."*

Let us now turn to the Missal—in the service of the Mass, the priest bows before the altar and prays thus—"We beseech thee, O Lord, by the merits of thy Saints, whose relics are here, and of all the Saints, that thou wouldst vouchsafe to forgive me all my sins. Amen."†

In the Missal, published in England, for the use of the laity (1836, p. 527), there is the following prayer to be used in a votive Mass:—

"O God, who, by the most glorious Mother of thy Son, was pleased to appoint a new order in his Church for delivering the faithful out of the hands of the infidels, grant, we beseech thee, that we also may be delivered from the slavery of the devil, by her merits and prayers, whom we devoutly honour in the institution of so charitable a work."

The following is the form of absolution, as given in the "Ursuline Manual," a book in very general use among Roman Catholics both in England and Ireland:—

"May our Lord Jesus Christ absolve thee from every bond of excommunication or interdict, as far as I have power, and thou hast need. I, therefore, absolve thee from all thy sins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen. May the passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, the merits of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and of all the saints, may whatever good thou shalt do, and whatever evil thou shalt suffer, be to thee unto the remission of sins, the increase of grace, and the recompense of life everlasting. Amen." p. 182.—Ed. 1851, R. Coyne, Capel-street, Dublin, printer and bookseller to the Roman Catholic College, Maynooth.

Such instances might be multiplied almost indefinitely. They seem to set at rest the question as to whether Roman Catholics are taught to pray through the merits of the Virgin Mary.

We, of course, do not mean to say that they do not also trust in the merits of Christ; but we do say, that such prayers are dishonouring to the merits of the Saviour, and revolting to the spirit of true Christianity. Not content with the infinitely precious merits of Christ, they require, also, the merits of Mary, as if the merits of Jesus Christ were not adequate, without pleading the merits of Mary also—as if the Creator needed the assistance of any creature, however exalted, to complete his work.

But there is a second assertion, that though they pray to Mary, it is only for her intercession; and that they never suppose that she has any power, or can herself do anything, but only that she intercedes for those who pray to her.

This, likewise, is a question of fact, and must be determined, not by the statement of any individual as to his own belief or practice, but by evidence.

The evidence is abundant; the only difficulty is in selection; and our space at present compels us to be brief.

In the "Brief Account of Indulgences conferred on the Order of the Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel"* (p. 13), occurs the following passage:—

"The affection of an earthly mother bears no proportion to that of the Virgin, who, to show herself truly the mother of those who wear her holy scapular, did not rest fully satisfied with having preserved them from bodily harm, and kept them out of hell, as far as lies in her, through the mediation of her powerful protection, but also promised as a truly loving Mother, not enduring the sight of her dear and beloved children suffering in the flames of Purgatory, that she would free them as soon as possible, particularly on the first Saturday after their death, as being a day set aside for her honour, and bring them to eternal joy in paradise."

That this is not by way merely of prayer to God or intercession with her Son to free them from Purgatory, but by her own personal act, is put beyond dispute by the words of the Bull of Pope John XXII., bearing date March 3, 1322, generally known as "The Sabbatine Bull." As this may be unknown to many of our readers, we transcribe the words of it, which they may also see, given verbatim, in the "Devotion to our Lady of Mount Carmel"† (p. 17):—

"One day that Pope John XXII. had, as usual, risen very early to pour forth his soul in prayer, being on his knees, in a kind of ecstacy, the Queen of Heaven, the comfort of the afflicted, appeared to him, surrounded with supernatural light, and wearing the Carmelite habit, and spoke thus to him—'John, vicar of my Son, it is to me you are indebted for your exaltation to the dignity which you enjoy, in consequence of my solicitations in your behalf with my Divine Son, and as I have delivered you from the snares of your enemies, so do I expect that you will give ample and favourable confirmation of the holy Carmelite order, which was first instituted on Mount Carmel, and which, descending from Elias and Eliseus, has been always particularly devoted to me. . . . And if among the Religious or Brethren of the Confraternity, who depart out of this life, there shall be any who for their sins have been cast into Purgatory, I, their glorious Mother, will descend in the midst of them into Purgatory, on the Saturday after their death, and take them up to the holy mountain, in the happy regions of eternal life."‡

This Bull was confirmed, in 1412, by Popo Alexander V., by another Bull, which commences "Tenore cujusdam privilegii;" and, again, by Pope Clement VII., in 1524, in the Bull "Dilecti filii," which, after recounting the indulgences and privileges given to the Carmelites, continues thus—"And, on their departure from this life, the glorious Virgin Mother of God herself will, on the Saturday succeeding the death of the members, whether brother monks or sister nuns, visit them, and free their souls from the punishment of Purgatory. Pius V. conferred the same privileges, in a Bull, "Superna dispositione," dated 18th February, 1566, and Pope Gregory XIII., in the Bull, "Ut laudes," 18th September, 1577. The same statements are reiterated in a work, entitled the "Wonders of God," published, with authority, at Rome itself, in 1841, under the pontificate of Pope Gregory XVI., vol. ii., p. 31.

Here, then, we have no private statement, but the Bull of one Pope confirmed by four other Bulls, from four subsequent Popes, and republished, by authority, at Rome, so late as 1841, teaching that the Virgin Mary herself visits Purgatory every Saturday, and releases certain privileged persons.

We might add, if space permitted, many further proofs that the power attributed to Mary is not that of mere prayer or intercession—though, doubtless, she is constantly prayed to both as intercessor and mediatrix. But here we must close our observations for the present, hoping to resume them at no distant period.

ROMAN CATHOLIC MORAL THEOLOGY.

In our last number we inserted an article, which was intended to be the first of a series, on the moral teaching of the Church of Rome, and we gave some reasons for thinking that the "moral theology" of St. Alphonsus de Liguori was the most authentic representative of that teaching to which we could refer; but we are met here by some preliminary objections of Doctor Wiseman,* which we are bound to consider. We are obliged somewhat to compress Dr. Wiseman's essay; but we shall faithfully reproduce all his arguments, and, as far as we can, preserve his words. His point is, that the moral theology of St. Liguori is a book written for the guidance of confessors, and not for general instruction in morality. The "moral theology" of the Church, he tells us—which is altogether remedial of sin committed—is quite different from her moral teaching, which is directed to the formation of character.

The office of a confessor may be compared to that of a physician. "Sin is the 'disease;' the state of grace is the condition of spiritual health, and the sacrament of penance is the ordained means of recovery. The confessor, like the physician, is bound, by the obligations of his office, to get his patient out of trouble as well as he can; and treatises of moral theology are his guides as to the most improved method of doing his work." But these treatises, which are mainly occupied with the circumstances of disease, are quite different from those which give directions to the healthy how they may avoid sickness. "To confound the one with the other is as absurd as to confound a book of culinary receipts with one of medical prescriptions. If a gentleman in a good state of health were to propose sustaining himself upon beef-tea and barley-water, instead of roast mutton and port wine, he would not make a greater mistake than would the Catholic who should seek for spiritual direction in the pages of Busenbaum, or any other work of the kind."

True, Cardinal Wiseman. But suppose a man wished to know whether certain symptoms with which he found himself affected were consistent with sound health, or whether they indicated disease, he would consult a medical work, and not a treatise on diet. If a Roman Catholic is in doubt whether certain actions are, in the opinion of his Church, sinful or innocent, we should say that the most proper work he can consult is one of those treatises which informs confessors whether such actions are justifiable, or whether they are venial or mortal sins—whether they require absolution or not. If the objection brought against Liguori had been, that he was too strict and ascetic, then it might have been in point to say, "we prescribe penances to those who have fallen into sin, which we do not think it necessary to impose on those who have not erred. You must not confound the medicine which is necessary for the restoration of the sick with the ordinary diet of Christians." But, in fact, the objection is quite the reverse. The charge is, that the morality of Liguori is altogether too lax—that he regards as innocent, equivocations which Protestant gentlemen feel to be shameful lying; and treats as pardonable, appropriation of other men's goods, which we should call downright stealing. What answer to this is it to say, that such lessons are only intended to be given in the confessional? Are truth and honesty to be compared to roast mutton and port wine? Are they virtues which a Christian can only safely practise when he is in rude spiritual health, but which he cannot indulge in if, through frailty, he has fallen into sin? Surely, if we are asked what is sin, and what is not, we must give the same answer, whether saint or sinner ask the question. Let us hear, however, what reasons Dr. Wiseman gives for the opposite opinion. Our quotation will be a long one, but it is necessary to do justice to the cardinal's argument.

"A physician must provide, not for what he himself might desire, but for what his patient can bear. But his object, above all, must be that of hindering despondency. In the pursuit of this object, he will practise a prudent reserve in speaking to his patient; he will make the best even of serious disease, not from any love of dissembling, still less any habitual untruthfulness, but simply in pursuit of his object, which is, to lighten, not to aggravate; to heal, not to wound. A pretty kind of doctor would he be, who should go about frightening his patients in their first respite after danger, and ere they were well out of it, by telling them, in their feeble state, all that he would say of their maladies to their friends in health, or to themselves when recovered! When he sees them too easily elated, ready to presume upon a momentary amendment, or to calculate upon years, when he knows their days to be numbered, then, cautiously and kindly, but firmly, he advises them of the danger, or, at least, moderates their sanguine hopes. But, in a case where calmness and confidence are the very conditions of recovery, to speak to a sick man of his disease, after the fact, in the same terms in which you would speak to a sound man of the same disease, before it, would be a course of action for which worldly men would very soon find a suitable, and not very complimentary description, were it to be practised in regard to themselves and their families.

"The penitent, moreover, has a claim upon his confessor for tenderness, which is peculiar to himself. A sick man does no violence to his natural feelings in having recourse to a physician; on the contrary, he acts in obedience to them. He feels his malady, which all sinners unhappily do not. And even when sinners are moved by the promptings of divine grace to go to a confessor and disburden their consciences, what a victory must they not gain over their self-love! They may, if they please, keep their secret to themselves, so that even their best friends shall not know of it. Unlike the man attacked with illness, they have neither natural inclination within, nor friends without, to force them on using remedies. They may stay away from confession if they please, but they actually prefer, for their souls' health, to do a thing most repulsive to their natural self-love. Are such the persons for a sinner, like themselves, to frighten and discourage? Is it for him to exaggerate, or even to exhibit, in formal shape, the sin which, as it is, appals them by its hideous appearance? Does not human kindness, as well as sacerdotal duty, suggest to a confessor the course of gentleness and moderation? And has not his Lord warned him against bruising the broken reed and quenching the smouldering flax? We repeat, it is one thing to warn from mortal sin as a danger, quite another to deal with it as a fact; and it would be just as unchristian to use, in the confessional, the language of the pulpit, as to tell men, whom we wish to maintain in innocence, of all the excuses which might be made for them, if, unhappily, they should fall into sin.

"It may be said, indeed, that a sin is as much a sin at one time as at another, and that the course we are now advocating is favourable to hypocrisy and falsehood. But how different is the fact? The preacher, or spiritual director, speaks of sin, in the abstract, as hateful to God and destructive of the soul. The confessor, on the contrary, who deals with sin as a fact, has to view it in connection with all its circumstances, in the particular case—such as the amount of knowledge or deliberation with which it was committed, and the degree of completeness to which it was carried; its place in the series of which it is one; its relation to the temperament and situation of the penitent, &c. It will be hard, indeed, if there be no extenuating circumstances in the particular instance; one fact to move compassion and suggest tenderness there must always be—the fact of the confession itself. A penitent always deserves mercy, but a hearer does not even always claim it.

"Hence it is, that so great a part of moral theology consists in framing excuses for sinners. The consideration of favourable circumstances in every variety of form, or in their effect, whether upon the intention of the agent, or the character of the act; the possibility of reducing the sin to some less aggravated class of transgressions, or of accounting for it upon some indulgent hypothesis; the admissibility, without compromise, of some lenient construction, or the adoption of some moderate opinion of a divine of weight, upon which the confessor, desiring to be lenient, might safely act. These and the like are topics which receive so prominent a place in our authorized treatises on confession, that it is no wonder if hasty observers should carry away from the perusal of them notions at variance with the strictness of Catholic morality, though a wonder it is that men of credit should persevere in misrepresentations, which have been so often and so completely exposed."

We do not think that Dr. Wiseman has a right to complain of misrepresentation; for it appears to us that, as to the matter of fact, he is quite agreed with the censurers of Liguori, and that his difference with them is only a matter of opinion. We have marked in italics his acknowledgment, that a great part of Roman Catholic works on moral theology is taken up in framing excuses for sinners, and he owns that hasty observers would carry from the perusal of them notions at variance with the strictness of Christian morality. As to the general tone of laxity, then, that pervades the moral theology of Liguori and his brethren, there is no dispute—habemus confitentem reum—and the only question to be discussed is, whether this ought to be the characteristic of a work intended to be a guide for confessors.

Now, the defence of Liguori that we have just copied, is based on an extraordinary confusion of thought. If Protestants denied the possibility of pardon for sin, even when repented of; if they required that a confessor should terrify his penitent with denunciation of judgment, and teach them to despair of the mercy of God, then it would be quite in point to say that a good physician would not needlessly alarm his patients, and it would be a fair answer to appeal to the example of our Lord himself, who would not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax, and who "dismissed even the woman taken in adultery with the admonition, 'go, and sin no more.'" The fact is, however, that Protestants hold no such doctrines; they acknowledge the fulness of forgiveness which Christ is willing to bestow on penitent sinners, in terms as ample as can be desired; but they hold, that the first step, in order to obtain such forgiveness, must be, the conviction of sin, and sorrow for it. The penitent must feel his malady before he will accept the services of the physician. We find fault with Liguori, not because he teaches confessors to bestow forgiveness on sinners, but because, as Cardinal Wiseman acknowledges, he "makes excuses for sinners," and tries to show that the actions for which we condemn them are, in reality, not sinful, and do not require forgiveness.

It is one thing to repudiate a debt; another to acknowledge it, and ask, at the same time, to be forgiven it. The latter is the course which the sinner is directed to pursue by Protestant teachers; the former, that which he would be taught by confessors trained in the school of Wiseman and Liguori.

Let us, in fact, compare the different instruction which a penitent sinner would receive if he sought for spiritual consolation from a Protestant clergyman, and if he made his confession to one who adopted Dr. Wiseman's views as to the duties of a confessor. The Protestant clergyman, however tender his feelings towards the penitent might be, would never dream of giving him consolation by diminishing his conviction of the guilt of the sin which he had committed. He knows that there is no sin too great for the blood of Christ to blot out; while, therefore, he is able to repress every suggestion of despair by fixing the sinner's thoughts on that all-sufficient remedy, he would prefer to deepen in his mind his sense of the guilt of his sin, and endeavour to fix in his soul such a lasting abhorrence of it, as should prevent him from falling into the same sin again.

There are good reasons why a Roman Catholic clergyman, if really anxious for the moral improvement of his flock, should be even more careful than a Protestant clergyman to deepen convictions of sin before pronouncing words of comfort. For every one must admit that the Roman Catholic institution of confession has too often the effect of leading the penitent to suppose that he has got rid of the sin the moment the priest's absolution is pronounced. The Author of our nature has willed that the commission of sin should always be attended with certain remorse and uneasiness, and these uncomfortable feelings are the natural means provided to guard against the repetition of the sin. Now, one of the principal objects for which people resort to the confessional is, in order to get rid of those unpleasant feelings. A judicious confessor, therefore, would be careful how he removed these safeguards against future sin before he had taken advantage of them to gain a security for reformation. Just the opposite of this is the course which Jesuit confessors have been charged with pursuing. It might be expected that Cardinal Wiseman would have denied the truth of the accusation; but any one who reads over the passage we have cited will see that the method which Dr. Wiseman says a confessor ought to pursue, is precisely the same as that which Jesuit priests have been accused of pursuing.

According to him, it is the confessor's business to get his patient out of trouble as well as he can; and the very fact of the penitent's coming to him gives him a claim on his tenderness and compassion. He is to show this tenderness by putting in practice the lessons he has learned from the science of moral theology, in framing excuses for sinners. If he finds his penitent overwhelmed with undue sorrow for his sin, he is kindly to point out that the case was by no means so bad as might be supposed. He is to consider the "relation of the sin to the temperament and situation of the penitent." It was a sin to which, perhaps, he was greatly addicted, and from which the poor fellow would have found it difficult to abstain; or, perhaps, he had provocation, and so may stand excused. Then must be taken into consideration favourable circumstances with regard to the "intention of the agent." When we shall have expounded, in a future article, the Jesuit doctrine of "guiding the intention," the reader will see what resources this alone affords the confessor for reducing the character of the sin, and how fully they have been recognised by Cardinal Wiseman. Then, we are told, the confessor is to consider the possibility of "accounting for the sin upon some indulgent hypothesis, or the admissibility, without compromise, of some lenient construction, or the adoption of some moderate opinion of a divine of weight, upon which, desiring to be lenient, he might safely act." The reader will not understand the full force of these recommendations unless he is acquainted with the Jesuit "doctrine of probability," and knows how confessors are instructed that they may treat as innocent, actions, which they themselves believe to be sinful, provided that some respectable divine has pronounced them innocent. And so lax are the decisions of some of the Jesuit doctors, that a confessor, wishing to be indulgent, need scarcely have recourse to any other method than this of getting his patient quickly out of trouble.

We return, then, to Cardinal Wiseman's own illustration, and ask how a physician might best show his tenderness to his patient. He would, to be sure, not needlessly terrify the sick man's friends, by expressing distrust of the ultimate result, provided the patient made use of the remedies which he knew were sufficient to overcome the disease. But would he show his leniency and moderation in the manner suggested by Cardinal Wiseman? According to him, the physician ought never to admit, if he could help it, that the patient was affected by serious disease, and ought to try to account for his distressing symptoms, on some lenient hypothesis. Perhaps they only indicate some small constitutional derangement—at all events, even if the physician cannot convince himself that they indicate mere trifling disease, still, if he can find in any approved medical work that the symptoms complained of might possibly exist without formidable disease, he is not to act on his own opinion, but he is to do everything in his power to avoid the employment of severe remedies. Now, how would our readers like to call in a medical man who told them that the rule of his practice was, never to employ a strong remedy if he could possibly help it; who, if he was called in to treat a bad fever, would say, "perhaps it is only a heavy cold;" or, if called in for a case of apoplexy, would say, "probably the patient is a man of sleepy habits, or possibly he has taken a trifle more than is good for him; let us deal leniently with him, and by no means have recourse to any severe remedy." We fancy our readers would not much admire the gentleness and moderation of such a physician; but would have recourse to the doctor who was not afraid to act "severely," provided that was the proper way to make them well.

We confess, then, that we cannot understand how our Roman Catholic friends, if they think over the matter, can have any confidence in the efficacy of absolutions pronounced by confessors who acknowledge that they act on such rules as Dr. Wiseman lays down. We do not say a word here against the efficacy of absolution in general. We are willing here, for the sake of argument, to accept the account which Roman Catholics give of it. But every one is agreed that, in order that the absolution should be effectual, it must be pronounced with perfect understanding of the case—the remedy must be adapted to the disease. If the penitent mislead the confessor, and pass off on him his mortal sins for venial, and his venial sins for no sins at all, why, then, the absolution does not reach down to the root of the evil, and the penitent still remains loaded with the guilt of his sins. And it must be all the same if the confessor mislead himself; if he lay down such rules for his guidance as will always lead him to form too low an estimate of the guilt of his penitent. It will follow, then, too, that his spiritual remedies will not be proportioned to the malignity of his disease, and so the sinner will remain unabsolved and unforgiven.

It would be even well if the mischief were only that the one past sin remained without absolution. But what encouragement will the sinner receive for a repetition of his offence. When he goes as a penitent to his confessor, filled with remorse or uneasiness for his ill conduct, and when his spiritual adviser informs him that his scruples were unfounded; that his natural character, and the provocation he had received, must be regarded as mitigating circumstances, and that what he had done is, in the opinion of some grave doctor, no sin at all: what will be the practical effect of such teaching as this? Evidently that he will take care not to give himself unnecessary anxiety on another occasion, and that he will commit, without scruple, the actions which he has found by experience he may commit with impunity. To illustrate this, we may employ the example which Dr. Wiseman himself has selected. He says—"The nice distinctions, which our theologians draw, (between sins that destroy and such as only wound the soul, for instance) are apparently believed to be devised for the special purpose of enabling young Mr. A. to murder his enemy with only a venial quantity of deliberation, or Lady B. to play her cards so neatly as to commit a decided faux pas without forfeiting the good opinion of her spiritual adviser. Such an imagination is not less ludicrous than would be that of supposing all the vagabonds in Hampshire to subscribe, in order to get Mr. Justice Coleridge to go down to some central spot in the county, that they might repair into his presence, and consult him as to the approved method of housebreaking, or other such practices, so as to come off with the least quantity of punishment at the next ensuing Winchester Assizes."

Now, Dr. Wiseman must be very simple if he supposes that the vagabonds aforesaid need any other opportunity of instruction than the Winchester Assizes themselves. If they find that house-breakers are in the habit of getting off there with impunity, they will not require any further instruction to know how far it will be safe for themselves to venture in the same way; nor could they have a better instructor in vicious practices than a judge whose invariable rule was to secure the acquittal of the prisoners.

We think we need say no more as to the moral tendency of the general rules laid down by Liguori and approved by Dr. Wiseman; and we shall on a future occasion return to give some practical illustrations of the application of them.

THE ABBE LABORDE AT ROME.

"XVIII. When the Episcopal Conferences were ended, on the 25th November, the great proportion of the bishops had not yet arrived. They arrived on the following days; but they had nothing more for them to do; and, indeed, they themselves had done nothing.

"XIX. It must here be observed, that the bishops of Spain had not answered the invitation they had received. They had urged three reasons which had hindered them presenting themselves:—The first, that it did not appear to them a fitting time to define this question; the second, that as the cholera was raging in Spain, they could not leave their flocks; the third, that the government opposed their journey. There came no more than one or two, and these for some particular motive. The Archbishop of Toledo, having some time before been promised the cardinalate, came to receive the cardinal's hat—as he has, in fact, received it in the public consistory, which took place in St. Peter's, on Thursday, the 21st November.

"XX. They have not had any conferences of the cardinals; there was only a secret consistory held on the 1st December. What was said there? What was done there? No one knows; but it is certain, that, had they wished, they might, in this one session, have examined the question to its root. Moreover (not to suffer any doubt), their part had been resolved upon—the Pope willed, and his will was known. For, according to the habitual customs of the Court of Rome, even the Sacred College believes itself warranted in always submitting in silence, as soon as the Pope has said, 'I will.'

"XXI. I will add some particulars with reference to those things which the newspapers published, after the account of the Abbé Gaume, about that 'unparalleled enthusiasm,' and that 'general intoxication' (of joy), in which 'Rome was plunged' on the 8th December. It was not possible, as has been seen, that I could have witnessed this; but it must have been, either that this enthusiasm and intoxication were a very sudden outburst, or that they had no other existence than in the heated imagination of the 'Apostolic Notary.'

"Up to the 7th, at two o'clock in the afternoon, when I departed from Rome, I can affirm that no symptom of this enthusiasm and intoxication had as yet presented itself. For five days, at least, the Cardinal Vicar had caused to be advertised a lengthy instruction, to prepare the people for this unparalleled event in the Church, and to animate their devotion. I have read it throughout on the walls of Rome, it enjoined prayers, sermons, and exhibitions of the holy Sacrament in the Churches. The solemn day approaching, a second exhortation followed the first. I had intended to inform myself accurately, both by my own experience and that of others, as to the sentiments with which the people were animated. With this design I visited many Churches, as well during the week, as on two consecutive Sundays, 26th November and 3rd December. I saw in many places the great scaffoldings of monuments prepared for the statue of the holy Virgin, much tapestry displayed, many draperies of all colours, many wax candles; this was the work of the Sacristans; but the enthusiasm of the people—the people—nowhere!

"XXII. During the week, I attended on one occasion an evening sermon, in St. Mary, of Ara-Cœli, a large church, which had, at other times, been the Temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. In the middle of the nave, in front of a raised dais, on which a cordelier was preaching, I saw a small circle reserved for females, and in the sanctuary five or six religious of the house. I attended twice at the morning exercises, and at the High Mass, in the Church of the Holy Apostles. There were about fifty persons there, besides many who took the opportunity to see the Church, and were going in and out.

"XXIII. On Sunday, 26th November, I spent a great portion of the afternoon in the large parish church of St. Ambrose and St. Charles, in the Corso, in which the Holy Sacrament was exhibited all the day, for the appointed prayers. I hoped to have heard vespers there; but there were not any. In Rome, the curés do not give themselves the trouble to perform the office of vespers on Sunday in the parish churches. I wish to be candid—people came in some proportion, men and women, to adore the Holy Sacrament. Each fell upon his knees before the altar, richly illuminated, and withdrew. When I was retiring, I was induced, by the sound of the bell, to enter the Church of St. Lawrence, another parish church in the vicinity of the Corso, to attend at evening prayers. It had, also, but few people in the long aisles, fewer than were in St. Ambrose; but not at all the concourse that we are accustomed to see in France. On the same Sunday, and following (3rd December), I visited other parish churches at the time when vespers ought to have been sung—the Holy Sacrament was exhibited in these also. But, notwithstanding that, I attended in some well-disposed districts, where I saw no one but a priest in adoration before the altar, and three or four persons in the whole church.

"XXIV. On the latter Sunday, I proceeded as far as St. Mary Major, hoping to hear the Roman vespers at least once; for there is a Chapter there bound by the State to sing them. St. Mary Major is the first church in Rome after St. Peter's. This occurred in the midst of the Novena, and was the first Sunday in Advent. The Holy Sacrament was exhibited with pomp, and the Abbé Gaume was speaking as one who is excited to greater enthusiasm by the exhibition of the relics of the 'Cradle.' I saw a very small number of persons at the entrance of the chapel where the Holy Sacrament was, a school of little children, and some priests and gentlemen who moved about in the quite empty church, visiting it as an edifice.

"But, what is beyond all expression, the workmen wrought with great diligence, as on every other day of the week, in the Chapel Borghese, the most beautiful of the Basilicas; and here, while on this subject, is an anecdote to occupy us.

"While waiting for the choir to be opened, where they go to sing vespers, I was near an adjoining confessional, engaged in praying to God from my Breviary. A French priest approached me with a sad and irritated countenance, and said to me—'Sir, there ought to be weighty reasons of necessity to induce these folk to work as they are doing to-day, Sunday, and in the very church; however, such reasons do not appear, and we have not heard them say that any ceremony is to be performed here. Can you inform me of these reasons, to relieve me of the scandal that I suffer?' 'Sir,' I answered, 'I am not aware of any such reasons from necessity, nor can I see any more than yourself why these things should be.' 'But,' he replied, 'are you not employed in this church?' 'No, sir,' I rejoined, 'I am a stranger.' 'I beg pardon,' said he, 'I thought, by seeing you here, that you were the vicar commissioned to hear the confessions of the French.' And he withdrew with a murmur, profoundly scandalized by the religion of Rome.

"Immediately after, the choir was opened. The vespers were sung rondément by seven or eight canons, and there was no one else present that I saw, save another man and myself. I remarked they did not sing the vespers of the Sunday. Consequently, they had not performed the Sunday service. The first Sunday in Advent is, however, privileged, following the rubrics of the Roman Breviary, and not yielding to any saint. Evidently at Rome, for the sake of good example, they save themselves the recitation of the Sunday service as is directed in the Roman Breviary, because they find it too long!

"XXV. Can it be that a people, who see so little faith at home, and so great indifference—who practise religion so badly, and who so prepare themselves, in the midst of such preparations and exhortations, for the proclamation of a new dogma—can it be, that they would be suddenly seized with enthusiasm and spiritual exultation, amounting even to intoxication ('ivresse') on the day in which the new dogma was proclaimed.

"XXVI. The truth is, that the Roman people were very indifferent to the new faith which has been announced. Such of the laity as had received any instruction did not regard it with any gratification. The people properly so called—the masses—did not understand even what was intended to be done. It must be known that, in Rome, the people, so far as religion is concerned, are in such ignorance, the like of which is nowhere seen. I have been myself informed in Rome, by respectable, well-informed persons, that this ignorance amounts even to brutishness. When they saw so many bishops arriving, they inquired for what reason they came; and they said among themselves—it was related to me in Rome—that it was to apply a remedy to the public misery, by giving some freedom to agriculture, to commerce, and to industry. Women and girls who practised religion, believed that they had come to decide that the holy Virgin is a virgin, and showed in the confessionals that they were scandalized, because the priests were not all agreed upon this matter. I have learned this fact from a sincere man, and one who knew what was passing.

"XXVII. The great bulk of the Roman ecclesiastics of all orders and of all ranks continue in Rome itself, in proportion, as ignorant as the people. Can we wonder, then, that it should be easy to make them receive the Immaculate Conception as of Faith! I have, however, positively learned that among the priests and the religious who have any information, one cannot fail to find some who entertain, regarding the new dogma, the same difficulties as myself. One person of exalted dignity assured me, that the Dominicans of the Minerva have always held the doctrine of St. Thomas, and even engaged me to see them. But in Rome, none has any liberty to think, nor liberty to speak, nor liberty to write, according to the purity of the Gospel and the spirit of the Fathers; in Rome there is the Inquisition to strangle the truth. Father Perrone and Father Passaglia have liberty to write everything: but true and sincere men, nothing.

"XXVIII. The Abbé Gaumé instances, as elements of the 'general intoxication,' the music that the Pifferari play before the Madonnas at the corners of the streets. I have heard the music, and have seen the musicians. They are simply two wretched men, clad in rags, of whom one plays on the fife, and the other on the pipes. Government pays them; I ascertained this from a trustworthy source.

"The other element of enthusiasm was the nightly procession of the brotherhood of Ara cœli. The Abbé Gaume says, 'that with their song mingled the deep responses of the heart:' I have not heard them but in the distance, crying Viva Maria, which seems to be the burden of their song; but some persons who have heard them near at hand, have assured me that their music resembled more a burlesque, than the seriousness of religion. I do not wish to contradict the Abbé Gaume, who is, doubtless, experienced, and to assert that a person may not heartily join in their procession and their song; but it appears that no Frenchman, at least, will take part in their melody.

"In fine, the Abbé Gaume devotes himself, in his poetic spirit, even to the lamps suspended before the Madonnas, and observes—'Even the poorer classes exhibited little lamps in their windows, and the numerous Madonnas were illuminated with lights.'

"It is true there were in Rome Madonnas at the corners of every street, and almost at every step. More frequently the venerated image had a lantern before it. To read the inscriptions, each of these Madonnas is more miraculous and more celebrated, one than another. I left them to enjoy in peace their old titles, and the celebrity which they possessed in the eyes of the people, by reason of the miracles they had wrought at other times. Far be it from me, at least, to refuse them the common legitimate respect due to them all, as representing the image and the remembrance of the Virgin, Mother of God. In this respect, I willingly rivalled the people of Rome. But not having seen the rest with the same eyes, nor with the same imagination as the Abbé Gaume, I cannot help saying, that I was disgusted on seeing almost every Madonna and lantern covered with filth. Thus I must bring home to those who had the duty of keeping them, the charge of hideous negligence rather than of true religion. As for the lanterns, I saw them so densely blackened with smoke, that the light burning in them by night could with difficulty be distinguished.

"It must have been that they had been washed, or rather re-cast, when the Abbé Gaume sees them to be so brilliant as to enhance the splendour of a general illumination; but this I gravely doubt. These little attentions to cleanliness are not the social character of the Romans.

"XXIX. I conclude my narrative for the present. I proceed in my Memoir to examine the authority of the Bull of the 8th December. I shall continue to speak without reserve. I have led my readers to understand that we deal here with a question of faith, and that when we deal with matters of faith, we must lay aside compliments. I will imitate the liberty, and, if I can, the power of the Fathers. If I have uttered truths which appear harsh, so much the worse for those who, according to the apostle's language, will corrupt the word of God—Adulterantes verbum Dei. I ought in a question which excites by reason of the feelings which it arouses, but nevertheless a question wholly of faith and salvation, to be as Jesus Christ, our master and our model—'a true teacher, teaching the way of God in truth, having no regard for any man, nor considering the person of men.'"

We must pause here for the present, as the Memoir attached to the above narrative is too long and too important to attempt to give even an outline of it in our present number. The narrative which we have given in detail requires no comment from us, and we shall only say we deeply sympathize with the wrongs and insults inflicted on this learned and heroic champion of truth by the tyranny of ecclesiastical authority at Rome, more worthy of the middle ages than the nineteenth century; practised, also, be it remembered, towards a distinguished Roman Catholic priest, and a citizen of the great French nation, but for whose continued support the monarchy of the Papacy would, most probably, at this moment, be no more.

LA SALETTE.

SOME months ago, we presented our readers with the prospectus of a work printed at Grenoble, by several of the diocesan clergy of that place, with the object of laying before the Pope a memorial, exposing, in detail, the imposture of the alleged apparition of the Blessed Virgin on the Mountain of La Salette, and showing the dangers attending the (Roman) Catholic Church from the adoption of such false miracles; and at the same time we called our readers' attention to the persevering exertions of the ultramontane journals—the Tablet, L'Univers, and Catholic Standard—to uphold the apparition as "a stupendous supernatural event which happened in an unbelieving age, to confound the infidel and blasphemer!"

The French work itself, which we have now before us, consists of a closely printed octavo volume of 368 pages, and is entitled "La Salette devant le Pape, ou Rationalisme et hérésie découlant du fait de La Salette, suivie du Memoire au Pape, par plusieurs Membres du Clergé Diocésain; signed L'Abbé Deleon, de Grenoble; and printed by E. Redon, Rue Bayard No. 13, Grenoble; and as it is rather difficult of procurement in this country, and has, so recently as the 2nd May, 1855, been made the subject of legal proceedings before the civil tribunals of Grenoble, we think it may be interesting to make known its contents somewhat particularly, and the more so, as it affords an instructive lesson, how easily false miracles may have been palmed upon the credulous in former ages, by showing how a similar one can be got up, even in such a country as France, at the present day, and in the enlightened nineteenth century.

The whole subject is too large, and has been too minutely dealt with by the Abbé Deleon and his colleagues, to be satisfactorily disposed of in a single article, and we, therefore, propose to confine ourselves, for the present, to that part of the work alone which has reference to the lady plaintiff in the court of Grenoble, and which will enable our readers to understand, without going any deeper into the supposed mystery, why Mademoiselle Lamerliere should have brought an action against the Abbé Deleon for 20,000 francs damages for alleged injury done to her character by the publication of the work in question, and, at the same time, to estimate, at somewhat of its real value, the importance of the decision at Grenoble, as bearing on the veracity and faithworthiness of the reverend author and his colleagues, when we state that the court dismissed her proceedings, with costs.

We propose, also, in order to make the matter more fully intelligible, to annex some extracts taken verbatim from the recent work of the Right Rev. Dr. Ullathorne, Roman Catholic Bishop of Birmingham, which contains some important admissions and statements upon the subject, and which, as coming from the pen of a professed advocate of La Salette, will naturally carry more weight with those predisposed to believe such matters (if such persons exist in this country) than any statement made by the open opponents of the prodigy, even though those opponents should be (as, in fact, they are) Roman Catholic priests, of high character, living near the spot, and in the very diocese in which the disputed miracle occurred.

What follows is a verbatim translation (and, perhaps, may be considered by some too literal a one) of the early part of the 4th chapter of the Abbé Deleon's book, pp. 59-69.

THE APPARITION on the Mountain of La Salette on the 19th September, 1846—Mademoiselle Lamerliere.

MADEMOISELLE CONSTANCE LAMERLIERE, de Saint-Ferréol, was born of rich parents, and received a careful education. After several years' sojourn in the Convent of St. Pierre, at Grenoble, under the religious direction of M. Rousselot, Canon and Vicar-General of Grenoble, she entered the Convent de la Providence, in 1822. That convent had only just been established, and had at its head a lady of high merit, Madame Chantal. Mademoiselle Lamerliere filled several offices in this convent, and was at last chosen as the mistress of the novices. Gifted with a lively imagination, she became remarkable for an exaggerated piety, and gave herself up to practices the most mystical. To fulfil the rules of her convent was not sufficient for her ardent zeal. In her class, in her cell, in fact, everywhere, she desired to have little shrines which might recall to her more particularly the presence of God and the Holy Virgin. By the aid of a fluent speech, she easily fascinated her pupils—simple, young, country girls, who were scarcely initiated into the first elements of the most ordinary instruction. This continued tendency to fanaticism excited the solicitude of her superior, Madame Chantal; and, as it was her duty to guard the novices of the institution against rash innovations, or any dangerous exaggerations, Madame Chantal submitted the explanations and commentaries of a private catechism, which Mademoiselle Lamerliere had composed, to the consideration of M. Desmoulins, at present attached to the Seminary of St. Joseph, at Grenoble.

This surveillance annoyed Mademoiselle Lamerliere, who already had made known to her pupils and the sisterhood her project of founding particular congregations (the Holy Family, La Crêche, &c., &c.); and, after eight years' sojourn in the establishment as teacher of the novices, she suddenly pretended to have need of repose, in order to give herself up more completely to the exercises of an absolute retreat.

Madame Chantal readily yielded to this request, and Mademoiselle Lamerliere entered into retreat, which she did in a manner so complete, that she shut herself up in her cell, and never quitted it but to go to the church or the refectory.

Three months thus passed on, when, without giving any one notice of her intention, Mademoiselle Lamerliere quitted the house as a fugitive, and directed her steps to Notre Dame du Laus, in the Diocese of Gap. There she rested for some days, and then commenced her route for Marseilles, on foot. On her way, she visited all the churches, pointed out to the curé of each place defects to be corrected, and repairs to be made, and, to induce them to enter into her views, put down the name of C. LAMERLIERE, de Saint-Ferréol, for large sums, which she promised should be paid as soon as they informed her that the improvements were made. It is needless to say that not one of these promises were fulfilled. Arrived at Marseilles, she associated herself with a priest who was occupied with several institutions and pious works, among others, societies for the working classes. This excellent clergyman, however, died, and Mademoiselle Lamerliere proceeded to Valence. There she associated herself with an ecclesiastic whose name had had much notoriety, and she only left him when he himself sunk under the reverses of ill fortune. During her sojourn there, however, Mademoiselle Lamerliere had pursued the realization of her favourite dream, and had organized the congregation of "the Holy Family," and made desperate efforts to obtain the patronage of the Bishop of Valence, Monseigneur Latourette.

At Grenoble, where she came often, she placed herself under M. Rousselot, the first director of her conscience, and M. Canon Bouvier, the second director.

Among all these projects she dissipated her fortune, and her correspondence evinced such a constantly-increasing change in her intellectual faculties, that some members of her family became alarmed, and tried to lead her back by kindness. Mdlle. Lamerliere took no notice, however, of their friendly overtures; and, as matters appeared only to grow worse, her own sister and brother-in-law commenced proceedings for her protection before the tribunal of Saint Marcellin on the 28th August, 1846, and the 5th September following, the court assigned to Mdlle. Lamerliere guardians appointed by the court (un conseil judiciaire).

Deeply wounded by this measure, and, above all, irritated because it had been taken at the instance of her brother-in-law (a military officer, whose name already is distinguished, and will probably figure still more hereafter in the records of our history), remembering also, with complacency, the benevolent reception she had experienced from several members of the clergy at Grenoble, Valence, and Marseilles, Mdlle. Lamerliere at once formed her resolve. Having been placed under a kind of tutelage by the magistrates of her country and at the instance of her own family, it was by means of the clergy of her country and by a bold stroke that she was to regain her liberty.

The clergy take the lead in matters of civilization; it is their duty, and their disposition; if the clergy, therefore, should bow before her proceedings, and proclaim her above the laws which govern feeble humanity—if this proclamation should be accepted by the Catholic world—if the magistrates themselves should respect it and keep silence—the decision of the 5th September would be, in fact, reversed, and the superhuman nature of Mdlle. Lamerliere, and the success of her divine mission, would be for her an ample compensation! Thus thought Mdlle. Lamerliere, and thus she set herself to act.

Very skilful in the art of embroidery, she prepared an aerial costume; it was a white robe, trimmed with a garland of silver flowers, ornamented with arabesques, rising in graceful designs to the waist; on the front of the body was embroidered a brilliant cross, which appeared supported by a chain embroidered in the same manner; on either side, two similar embroideries represented the pincers and hammer, the instruments of the passion of the Saviour. A yellow apron, surrounded with a silver fringe, a scarf, bordered with roses, shoes of white satin, ornamented with a little garland of flowers, and, lastly, yellow stockings were prepared by her; and, as if one single costume was not sufficient for her purpose, she further prepared a dark blue dress, and another rose-coloured one, and, carefully packing them up in a paste-board box, set off for Grenoble.

At St. Marcellin she took the diligence; and, as the conveyance was already full, she was obliged to mount the imperial, and share the seat of the conducteur, whose name was Fortin.

She had with her her precious box. Her whole soul was set on the execution of her project. She commenced speaking mysteriously at first, but afterwards without disguise, to her "compagnon de voyage." "Her brother-in-law had rendered his name illustrious by his feats of arms; she aspired to acts of renown of another kind. She was going to the mountains of the Alps; there she was sure of success!" The conducteur, Fortin, laughed, and, like an agreeable traveller, began to banter Mdlle. Lamerliere; but, far from disconcerting her, she displayed the resources of her imagination, and her brilliant and fluent elocution charmed her companion, who was satisfied with becoming a listener. When they reached Grenoble, he restored her box to his fair passenger, and wished her good fortune, and complete success.

The same day Mdlle. Lamerliere presented herself at the house of M. X——, a merchant, at Grenoble, and asked for a particular kind of trimming ("galons en points d'Espagne"). She specified the size which was necessary to enable her to complete her work; and, as the merchant could not satisfy her with the lace which he showed her, of which the breadth was not exactly what she required, Mdlle. Lamerliere opened her box, took out her several dresses, and displayed, before the eyes of the merchant and his family, the white robe embroidered and ornamented with arabesques and garlands, and especially the cross, pincers, and hammer, which decorated the upper part; the yellow apron, yellow stockings, scarf trimmed with roses—in short, the whole contents of her box. In vain the merchant searched his stock for trimming which would match those so artistically used by Mdlle. Lamerliere. He was obliged to ask for a delay of 48 hours to enable him to get it from Lyons, but the traveller was too much hurried to agree to his proposal—for she wished to continue her journey the next day. The merchant then gave her the address of Messieurs X—— or Y—— as the only persons in Grenoble who could supply her.*

Mdlle. Lamerliere, in the presence of all the members of the family of the merchant, shut up her goods again in the box, and retired, leaving them in a state of astonishment; for none of them could comprehend the design or aim of a costume so eccentric.

The next day she returned; she had found, at one of the places to which they had directed her the evening before, the kind of material which she was seeking for. She thanked the family of M. X—— for the assistance they had given her, and left them, to re-appear no more.

All this took place in the early part of September, 1846, and before the event of La Salette, which occurred on the 19th of the same month.

Mdlle. Lamerliere betook herself towards the Alps.

In the very heart of the mountains, at a few miles distant (huit kilomètres) from Corps, there is a village called La Salette-Fallavaux, of difficult access, and which is surmounted by wild and abrupt mountains, which serve as pastures for cattle. Every day the children of the village climb these mountains, and drive there the beasts of their parents or masters, and, in the evening, lead them back to the hamlet.

Melanie Mathieu, a native of Corps, and who had been for nine months in the service of Baptist Pra, met on this mountain, on the 18th September, 1846, Maximin Giraud, also a native of Corps, whose services his father had given for eight days only to Peter Selme. She descended the mountain with him, promised to meet him again the next day; and, on the 19th September, the two children again betook themselves to the mountain.*

Maximin was always accompanied by his master, who, not to lose sight of him, went to till a field, from which the little shepherd could watch the cows, and sent him, at noon, to water them at a rivulet which flowed near the place, desiring the child to rejoin him immediately. On this 19th September, at noon, Peter Selme despatches his young herd to the fountain. Maximin commenced by calling Melanie; then joined, and went away with her, and, contrary to his usual custom, did not come back to his master. He did not, in fact, rejoin him until the evening, at his house; and when the latter scolded him for the liberty he had taken, Maximin replied by telling a story of a beautiful lady who had appeared to him, and also to Melanie, and had amused them for a long time, and had made them both talk familiarly with her ("les a fait deviser l'un et l'autre").†

I extract these details and the chief part of those which follow from a report of MM. Rousselot et Orcel, printed under the title "Verité sur l'Evènement de La Salette," p. 51, &c.

The question is, who was this beautiful lady? and under what circumstances did she appear to the two shepherds?

Having lunched tête-a-tête at a little fountain called "fontaine des hommes," Melanie and Maximin betook themselves to the other side of the rivulet (le Sezia), and, contrary to their habit, went to sleep at some distance from one another. Melanie awaking first, woke Maximin. The two shepherds crossed the brook, set about searching for their cows, then came down again to get their bags, which had remained near the place where they had gone to sleep, when all of a sudden their dazzled eyes perceived a lady bright with light seated on the stones of the fountain, in an attitude which indicated profound grief.

Frightened at first, the children, however, soon regained courage. The lady rose, advanced towards them, invited them to approach her, then crossed her arms, and announced to them that she was there to tell them great news, which she then proceeded to relate. Her language, at first, was French; she perceived afterwards, however, that she was not understood, and, without recommencing, she continued her discourse in patois, then finished in French, and, taking some fifteen paces (quinzaine de pas) to ascend to the highest part of the hillock, she then disappeared (Verité sur l'Evènement de La Salette, par MM. Orcel et Rousselot, pp. 32, 3, 4).

The beautiful lady had risen, and the children had been able to see her costume.

It was a white robe, with pearls all over it, a handkerchief with roses round it, a yellow apron, yellow stockings, white shoes with roses round them, a small chain to which a cross was suspended, on the right, the pincers, on the left, a hammer (Verité sur l'Evènement de La Salette, page 39).

Now this costume is precisely that which Mdlle. Lamerliere displayed some days before, at Grenoble, in the warehouse of M. X——. This costume was distinguished particularly by the fantastic yellow apron and yellow stockings, a colour which has never in any place been employed to ornament the statues, altars, or chapels of the Holy Virgin. It was distinguished still more by the pincers and hammer, which it never occurred to any painter or sculptor to annex to a statue of the Blessed Virgin, and it is certainly something very singular that such a coincidence should exist between the costume previously imagined by Mdlle. Lamerliere, without any foundation in the pious usages regarding the Holy Virgin, and the costume worn by the beautiful lady of La Salette; and still more singular is the coincidence between La Salette, the mountain on which "the beautiful lady" appeared to the two shepherds, and the mountain of the Alps towards which Mdlle. Lamerliere directed her course some days before, carrying with her the costume of the Lady of the Apparition, and with the design of doing "something which was destined to make a great noise in the world."

But these two striking coincidences are not the only strange things in the story.

"The beautiful lady" commenced speaking in French, and then, when she had recounted one half of her great news," she perceived that the children did not understand French, and, without going over again what she had already said, she proceeded in patois, and, subsequently, began again to speak French, to tell the children what must have been the most unintelligible to them of all—"You will make this to be known to all my people" ("Vous le ferez passer a tout mon peuple")—(Verité sur l'Evènement, par MM. Orcel et Rousselot, pp. 56, &c., 61, &c.).*

The Holy Scriptures inform us that Jesus Christ, after his ascension, sent down his holy spirit on the apostles, and enabled them to speak in divers tongues, to the end that every one of the nations collected at Jerusalem—Parthians, Medes, Elamites, Mesopotamians, Egyptians, Lybians, Jews, Cretes, and Arabians—might all hear, in their own tongues, the wonderful works of God; and, accordingly, 3,000 souls were converted to the faith in one day. God was with the apostles, He rendered his presence sensible by a miracle, the miracle produced its proper effects, and nonesense would have been the man who would attempt to deny it.

But at La Salette, the Lady of the Apparition (who came also, according to MM. Orcel et Rousselot, to perform an apostolic office, for the conversion of the world) employs the common language of the country, which the shepherds did not comprehend; and instead of reproducing in a simple form, in reference to the two children, the miracle which the apostles had wrought in a multiform manner with relation to twenty different nations, she accommodates herself to the ignorance of the two shepherds, and speaks "patois" to them, but only after her young auditors had let her know that they could not comprehend her. Could the most ordinary mortal have acted in a different manner?

But this is not all. The lady announces to the shepherds that she is come to La Salette to tell them great news (Verité, pp. 55 et 65). She adds that their duty is to make it known to all the people (Verité, pp. 57 and 68). Both these important paragraphs were announced in French, a language that neither of the children understood. Those shepherds are the channel chosen of God to communicate to all Christian people the great news which so miraculously reached them. Was it not necessary that they should understand what was told them, in order that the Divine communication should be preserved in all its purity, and that the first intriguer who met with them might not be able to change it to his own purposes? Both the honour of God and human reason seem to demand that this should have been so.

But how did things really happen?

The lady related, in French, the half of her news, and then only when the children informed her that they did not understand it, she continued in "patois," but without repeating what she had already said, and which was, moreover, the essential part, the very soul of the mission which she came to fulfil; for it is the expression of the Lord's complaints of the iniquities of his people.

On this capital point did the Lady of the Apparition, after the example of the apostles, open the understandings of the two shepherds? Let us see. MM. Orcel and Rousselot have taken on themselves to inform us.

In their joint work (Verité, p. 57), they represent, as inspired, the answer which they put into the mouth of Melanie, when pressed with questions on the difficulty she must have experienced in remembering the recital of the lady—"Oh! no," said she, "she (the lady) told it to me but once, and I remember it well; whenever I did not understand her well, in saying what she said to me, those who understand French comprehend it, when even I did NOT comprehend it; that is sufficient."

If that was sufficient, why did the lady change her language with the object of making herself understood? If that was not sufficient, why did she not repeat the part of her news which was not understood by the shepherds?

In either case the white lady has to choose between the absurd and the ridiculous—a dilemma not unnatural for Mdlle. Lamerliere, but superlatively indecent to imagine, much less to say, in reference to the Holy Virgin. The answer of Melanie, so far from being inspired, was either silly or impious.

One other strange thing, and I proceed.

The white lady, after having fulfilled her mission, ascends to the highest part of the hillock, her feet only touch the top of the grass; then she disappears, by rising into the air (Verité, pp. 58 and 68).

Now, in the first place, in those high parts of the mountains where the ground is scarcely covered with a light

* A feeling of strict propriety, and, still more, the duty of not exposing to inexorable attacks the persons whose testimony I appeal to in the course of my story, is the reason that I designate them by mere initials: but their names and addresses have been placed in the hands of his Eminence the Metropolitan Cardinal De Bonald, Archbishop of Lyons, also of the Archbishop of Paris, the Archbishop of Avignon, the Bishop of Gap, and his Excellency the Apostolical Nuncio; and if Mdlle. L. shall ever take it into her head to bring her case before either an ecclesiastical or civil tribunal, each of these persons to whom I have referred, will appear, and will find their security in the publicity of the legal proceedings.

* Dr. Ullathorne states that Maximin was then eleven years of age, and Melanie, fourteen.

† Dr. Ullathorne, p. 18, states his words to have been "Qui nous a amuses long temps et qui nous a fait deviser avec Melanie."

* Our readers will understand this better if they take the trouble to read the extracts in the next page, taken verbatim from the work of Dr. Ullathorne, Roman Catholic Bishop of Birmingham, on "The Holy Mountain of La Salette."

coating of earth, and the grass is so short that it does not even afford the teeth of the sheep or goats anything to lay hold of, how could the feet of the lady touch anything else than the top of the grass, since the top is, in fact, the whole of it?

Moreover, why was this ascension of the white lady from the very top of the hill? The Holy Virgin could just as easily have raised herself to heaven from the bottom of the hollow where she was; then every natural explanation of the phenomenon would have been anticipated and prevented. In surmounting the hollow, she reached a crest which presented at the other side a rapid descent, and allowed a human being to disappear and vanish adroitly before the dazzled eyes of two little ignorant peasants—a precaution very suitable to Mdlle. Lamerliere, but which it is ridiculous to attribute to a messenger from heaven.

Thus, the agreement between the Lady of La Salette and Mdlle. Lamerliere in the choice of a fantastic dress, and in the choice of a mountain of the Alps destined to become the theatre of a great event, affords, in the first place, a strong presumption that Mdlle. Lamerliere is the Lady of La Salette; for without a divine revelation, Mdlle. Lamerliere could not have foreseen either the eccentric costume which the Holy Virgin was to choose, or the apparition of the 19th September on La Salette, a mountain of the Alps. This presumption is strengthened still more by the nature and variation of the language of the white lady to the shepherds, and by the human precautions which she took to disappear adroitly from their view. I am still, however, only at the preface of this sad drama, which they call the Event of La Salette. As we proceed, this probability will soon change to certainty.

"THE APPARITION.

(Extracted verbatim from Dr. Ullathorne's work, entitled "The Holy Mountain of La Salette." By a Pilgrim of the year 1854. Published by Richardson and Son, 172, Fleet-street, London.)

"The 19th of September, 1846, fell on a Saturday. It was also the eve of the Festival of Our Lady of the Seven Dolours. Maximin and Melanie, conducting their cows, came down together from the mountain of La Salette upon the level, or terrace, called Sous-les-Baisses. The day was serene, the sky cloudless, the sun shone brilliantly. It was about mid-day, for they heard the distant sound of the Angelus bell. They took their provisions, and ate them by the side of a little spring, called des hommes, on the right of the little stream called Sezia. When they had finished their repast they descended, crossed the stream, and laid down their bags separately near the place where another spring sometimes flowed, but was at that time dry, though soon to become for ever famous. They descended a few more paces, and then, contrary to their usual habits, as they afterwards said, they lay down at a little distance from each other, and fell asleep. Melanie awoke first, and not seeing the cows, she awoke Maximin. They then crossed the stream together, ascended in a straight line to the opposite ground, and, on turning round, saw the cows lying on a gentle slope of Mount Gargas. They were about returning towards the dried-up spring to pick up their bags, but scarcely had they turned, when they saw a bright and dazzling light. Here we will give the recital of the children. We will give it exactly as they gave it on the same evening to their employers; as they gave it the next morning to the Curé of La Salette; as Melanie recounted it the same day to Monsieur Peytard, the Mayor of La Salette; as they gave it on the following days, Melanie to the inhabitants of La Salette, Maximin to the inhabitants of Corps; and as they have constantly given it to all inquirers ever since.

"MELANIE'S RECITAL.

"We fell asleep.....then I woke first, and I did not see my cows. I woke Maximin. 'Maximin,' I said, 'quick, let us go and look for the cows.' We passed the little stream which went up straight before us, and saw the cows lying down on the other side; they were not far off. I was coming down first, and when I was five or six steps off the little stream, I saw a brightness like the sun, it was far more brilliant, but it had not the same colour; and I said to Maximin, 'Come, quick, and see the bright light down there;' and Maximin came down, saying, 'Where is it?' I pointed to it near the little spring, and he stopped when he saw it. Then we saw a Lady in the bright light; she was sitting with her head in her hands. We were afraid; I let my stick fall. Then Maximin said, 'Keep your stick; if it does anything, I will give it a good knock.' The Lady rose up, crossed her arms, and said to us, 'Come near, my children, be not afraid, I am here to tell you great news.'

"Then we crossed the little stream; and she advanced to the place where we had been sleeping. She was between us both. She said to us, weeping all the time that she spoke (I clearly saw her tears falling)—

"'Si mon peuple ne veut pas se soumettre, je suis forcée de laisser aller la main de mon fils.

"'If my people will not submit, I shall be forced to let go the hand of my Son.

"'Elle est si forte, si pesante, que je ne peux plus la maintenir.

"'It is so strong, so heavy, that I can no longer withhold it.

"'Depuis le temps que je souffre pour vous autres! Si je veux que mon fils ne vous abandonne pas, je suis chargée de le prier sans cesse.

"'For how long a time do I suffer for you! If I would not have my son abandon you, I am compelled to pray to Him without ceasing.

"'Et pour vous autres, vous n'en faites pas cas.

"'And as to you, you take no heed of it.

"'Vous aurez beau prier, beau faire, jamais vous ne pourrez récompenser la peine que j'ai prise pour vous autres.

"'However much you pray, however much you do, you will never recompense the pains I have taken for you.

"'Je vous ai donné six jours pour travailler, je me suis réservé le septième, et on ne veut pas me l'accorder. C'est ce qui appesantit tant la main de mon fils.

"'Six days have I given you to labour, the seventh I have kept for myself, and they will not give it me. It is this which makes the hand of my Son so heavy.

"'Ceux qui conduisent les charrettes ne savent pas jurer sans y mettre le nom de mon fils au milieu.

"'Those who drive the carts cannot swear without introducing the name of my Son.

"'Ce sont les deux choses qui appesantissent tant la main de mon fils.

"'These are the two things which make the hand of my Son so heavy.

"'Si la récolte se gâte, ce n'est rien qu'à cause de vous autres. Je vous l'ai fait voir l'année passée, par les pommes de terre; vous n'en avez pas fait cas. C'est au contraire, quand vous trouviez des pommes de terre gâtées, vous juriez, vous mettiez le nom de mon fils. Elles vont continuer ; que cette année pour Noël, il n'y en aura plus.'*

"'If the harvest is spoilt, it is all on your account. I gave you warning last year in the potatoes, but you did not heed it. On the contrary, when you found the potatoes spoilt, you swore, you took the name of my Son in vain. They will continue to decay, so that by Christmas there will be none left.'

"And as I did not well understand what was meant by potatoes (pommes de terre), I was going to ask Maximin what was meant by potatoes, and the Lady said to us—

"'Ah! my children, you do not understand; I will say it in a different way.' Then she continued—

(Melanie continues the recital in the patois of the country.)

"'Si las truffas se gastoun eï rien que per vous aoutres; vous öou aïou fa veyre, l'an passa, n'aïa pas vougu fas conti; qu'éra öou countrère, quand troubava de truffas gastas djurava, l'y bitava lou nouc de moun fis öou mey.

"'If the potatoes (las truffas) are spoilt, it is all on your account. I gave you warning last year, but you would not take heed of it. On the contrary, when you found the potatoes spoilt, you swore, and introduced in your oaths the name of my Son.

"'E van continua, qu'aqèy au per tsalendas n'y öourè plus.

"'They will continue to decay, so that by Christmas there will be none left.

"'Si ava de bla, föou pas lou semenas, que tout ce que semenaré las bestias vous lou mendjarein, é ço qne vendrè tombarè tout en pouasièra quant l'eyquoïre.

"'If you have corn, it is no good to sow it; all that you sow the beasts will eat. What comes up will fall into dust when you thrash it.

"'Vendrat una granda famina.

"'There will come a great famine.

"'D'avant que la famina vène lous maris öou dessous de sept aus prendren un tremble, muriren entre las mas de las personnas que lous tendren, è lous äoutres feren leur penitença de famina.

"'Before the famine comes, the children under seven years of age will be seized with trembling, and will die in the hands of those who hold them; the others will do penance by the famine.

"'Las nouzes vendren boffias, lous rasins puriren.

"'The walnuts will become bad, the grapes will rot.†

"'Si se couvertissoun, las peyras, lous routsas seren de mounteous de bla, las truffas seren ensemensas per las terras.

"'If they are converted, the stones and the rocks will change into heaps of corn, and the potatoes will be self-sown on the lands.

"'Fasa bian vouatra priéra, mous marris?'

"'Do you say your prayers well, my children?'

"Tous deux nous avons répondu—'Pas guaïre, Madama.'

"Both of us answered—'Not very well, Madam.'

"'Tsöou bian la fas, mous marris, vèpre é mati, quant diria öoumen qu'un Pater é un Ave Maria, quant pouiré pas mey fas; é quant pouiré mey fas n'en maï dire.

"'N'ava djis vegu de bla gasta, mous marris?'

"'Have you never seen corn that is spoilt, my child?'

"Maximin répondit—'Oh! nou, Madama.' Moi je ne savais pas à qui elle demandait cela, et je répondis bien doucement—'Nou, Madama, n'ai dgis vègu.'

"Maximin replied—'Oh! no, Madam.' For me, I did not know of which of us she asked this question, and I replied very gently—'No, Madam, I have never seen any yet.'

"'E vous, moun marri, n'en deva bian avé vegu, un viadje vès lou Couïn embe vouetre païre.

"'You must surely have seen it, you, my child (turning to Maximin), once when you were near the farm of Coin with your Father.

"The master of the field told your father to go and see his ruined wheat. You went both together. You took two or three of the ears into your hands and rubbed them, and they fell all into dust; and then you returned home. When you were still half-an-hour's distance from Corps, your father gave you a piece of bread, and said to you, Here, my child, eat some bread this year at least; I don't know who will eat any next year if the corn goes on like that.'

"Maximin a répondu—'Oh! si, Madama, m'en rappellou avus, adès me n'en rappellavou pas.'"

"Maximin replied—'Oh! yes, Madam, I recollect now; just this moment, I did not remember.'"

"After this the Lady said to us in French, 'Well, my children, you will make this to be known to all my people.'

"She passed the little stream, and turned again to us to say, 'Well, my children, you will make this to be known to all my people.' Then she ascended to the place where we had gone to look for our cows.* She did not touch the grass. She moved along on the tips of the grass. I and Maximin followed her; I passed before the Lady, and Maximin a little on the side, two or three steps. And then this beautiful Lady arose a little from the ground (Melanie raised her hand a yard, or more, above the ground, by way of illustration), then she looked towards heaven, then towards the earth; then we saw her head no more, then the arms no more, then the feet no more; we saw nothing more but a brightness in the air; after this the brightness disappeared. And I said to Maximin—'Perhaps it is a great saint.' And Maximin said to me—'If we had known it was a great saint, we would have asked her to take us with her.' And I said to him—'Oh, that she was here still!' Then Maximin darted his hand out to catch a little of the brightness; but there was nothing there any more. And we looked well, to see if we could not see her. And I said—'She will not let herself be seen, that we may not see where she goes.' Afterwards we looked after our cows.

"At this point Melanie is asked—Did she tell you nothing else?

"Melanie.—No, Sir.

"Q.—Did she not tell you a secret?

"Melanie.—Yes, Sir, but she has forbidden us to tell it.

"Q.—What did she speak about?

"Melanie.—If I tell you what about, you will soon find out what it is.

"Q.—When did she tell you your secret?

"Melanie.—After speaking of the walnuts and the grapes. But before giving it to me, it seemed to me that she spoke to Maximin, and I heard nothing.

"Q.—Did she give you the secret in French?

"Melanie.—She told it me in Patois.

"Q.—How was she clothed?

"Melanie.—She had white shoes, with roses round them of all colours, gold-coloured stockings, a gold-coloured apron, a white robe, with pearls all over it, a white cape over her shoulders, with roses round it; a white cap, a little bent forwards; a crown with roses round her cap. She wore a very small chain, on which was hung a cross, with a figure of our Lord; on the right were pincers, on the left a hammer. At the extremities of the cross another large chain fell, like the roses round the handkerchief. Her face was white and elongated. I could not look at her long together, because she dazzled us" (pp. 23-29).

"The Abbé Lagier was one of the earliest and most searching of their interrogators. He said to Melanie—You do not know French, you do not go to school; how could you recollect what the lady said? She told you several times over? She taught you to remember it well?

"Melanie.—Oh, no; she told me but once, and I remembered it. And even if I did not understand it, those who know French understand it; that is sufficient.

"Mdlle. Des Brulais was on the most familiar and affectionate terms with Melanie. She asked—

"Q.—Did you know French before the 19th of September, 1846?

"Melanie.—I did not know it.

"Q.—Did you understand it?

"Melanie.—I did not understand it.

"Q.—Did you immediately afterwards repeat in French what the Blessed Virgin told you in French?

"Melanie.—Yes, I said it as she said it to me.

* To this point it will be observed that the Lady spoke wholly in modern French.—ED.

† The Abbé Deleon has proved that these words about the walnuts and grapes were not part of the original recital, and never appeared in any narrative prior to that of the 22nd of May, 1847, when the children were interrogated by M. Long, the "Suppléant du Juge de Paix," and their statement transmitted by him as a procès-verbal to a magistrate of Grenoble.—p. 115.

* Maximin's statement, which we have not room to give in detail, contains the following passage:—"Then she ascended some fifteen paces, gliding over the herbage as if she was suspended and moved on by other hands—her feet only touched the top of the herbage; we followed her up the ascent," &c.—Dr. Ullathorne, p. 30.

"Q.—You are very sure you repeated it in French, and not in Patois?

"Melanie.—I said in French what the Blessed Virgin said in French, and in Patois what she said in Patois.

Q.—You are very sure, quite sure, you did not say it in Patois the first day when you came from the mountain?

"Melanie.—How could I manage to say it in Patois when I could not say it (for translate it). I did not know French.

The account given of Maximin's and Melanie's previous character in Dr. Ullathorne's book is also worthy of notice; we have only space for the following passages:—"Maximin was eleven years old; he was utterly without education—could neither write nor read. . . . His father declared it had taken three or four years to teach him, and that with difficulty, to say the "Our Father" and the "Hail Mary". . . When asked some time after the event of his life, "Maximin, I am told that, before the apparition of La Salette, you were somewhat of a story-teller?" he smiled, and honestly said, "They have told you true; I told lies, and I swore when I threw stones after my strayed cows." Such was Maximin Giraud.—p. 17. Then, as to Melanie—"Her parents were of the very poorest, and at an early age she had to earn her bread by guarding cattle; she rarely entered a church; for her employers kept her at work on Sundays and festivals as well as on week-days. She had scarcely any knowledge of religion; and her ungrateful memory could not retain two lines of her catechism. . . She was idle, disobedient, and inclined to pout."—p. 18. Interrogated at a later period, the superioress said—"During the year past, Maximin, though taught almost every day, has not learned to serve mass well, nor has Melanie learnt to say well by heart the 'Acts of Faith, Hope, and Charity,' though I cause them to be taught her twice a day."—p. 22.

We must here close for the present our extracts from Dr. Ullathorne's account of the "stupendous event" of La Salette, but have, we hope, given enough to enable our readers to follow the Abbe Deleon's masterly exposé of what we believe to have been the most palpable imposture of the present age.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, JUNE, 1855.

A KNOWLEDGE of the real nature and tendency of any religious system may, in general, be arrived at in two ways. We may either examine its doctrines and the statements of its advocates, in order to learn the principles on which it is professedly founded, or we may study the system itself, and observe the actual result of its operation, in those cases where it is allowed free scope to develop its tendencies, and display its true character to the world.

If the Church of Rome be studied under either of these aspects, we fear that we must arrive at the conclusion, that intolerance is one of its essential features, and one most deeply rooted in its constitution. In order to see Romanism as it really is, we must study it, not as it appears in Protestant countries, where its action is controlled and modified by a variety of conflicting influences, but we must examine it at home. Italy and Spain are the countries where the Roman Catholic Church holds undisturbed away; and by an examination of the amount of religious liberty which is there enjoyed, we shall be enabled to form a correct opinion, whether the zeal for freedom which is so often professed by Roman Catholics in Ireland, is really in accordance with the principles by which the Church of Rome is actuated when she feels herself at liberty to stand forth in her true colours.

A trial has taken place within the last few months before one of the law courts at Florence, which appears to us calculated to throw considerable light on the question—what degree of liberty in religious matters is conceded to a person living under a purely Roman Catholic government? An account of the legal proceedings to which we allude has appeared in many of the public papers.* The facts of the case are briefly as follows:—

Domenico Cecchetti, a cigar worker by trade, was brought before the Council of Prefecture of Florence, on the 21st of March, 1855, on a charge of "irregular conduct in matters of religion." It was proved that, on the evening of the 16th of December, 1854, the police having proceeded to make a perquisition in the house of Cecchetti, found him, in the company of two of his sons, and of another person, seated at a small table, on which there were lying open a copy of the Bible, translated by Diodati, another copy shut, a third copy being found in the drawer of the table. The judicial decree then proceeds as follows:—

"Considering that it results from the inquiries made, that on certain fixed evenings there met in Cecchetti's house persons not belonging to his own family; and that there is just reason to believe that such meetings were held for the purpose of propagating the anti-Catholic ideas entertained by the accused—Cecchetti having himself confessed that whilst reading the Bible, according to his constant custom, there have been present not only the members of his own family, but persons unconnected with the same, and that he did not refuse to give, but actually held it to be his duty to impart explanations on religious subjects to those who asked him.

"Considering that in this state of matters it appears necessary that the efforts of Cecchetti to damage the Roman Catholic religion be rendered ineffectual, and that the government authorities are bound to take steps for the prevention of further mischief; for these reasons, having seen the articles of the law of 16th November, 1852, the council hereby decree that Domenico Cecchetti be condemned to imprisonment for one year in the House of Correction."

We ask our readers to consider for a few moments the facts of the foregoing trial—a trial not of ancient occurrence, but which took place a few brief weeks since, in the middle of the nineteenth century, in one of the most polished and refined capitals of Europe. A quiet, inoffensive man, after his day's labour, is seated in his own house, in the midst of his family, engaged in reading to them the Holy Scriptures; while so employed, the agents of the government, inflamed with zeal for the Roman Catholic religion, break into his house; they lay hands on every copy of the Scriptures they can find; they bring this unoffending individual before the courts, and cause him to be sentenced to imprisonment, as a common felon, for the space of twelve months!

Now, why do we call attention to the foregoing facts? Because we believe that this and similar occurrences are calculated to throw much light on the real nature of the authority which the Church of Rome seeks to exercise, wherever she can obtain the means and the opportunity of doing so. Whatever professions of liberality her advocates may make on her behalf in this country, she is at heart essentially intolerant, and it behoves all persons who sincerely value religious liberty, to study well the consequences that will infallibly take place, if the Romish Church should unfortunately ever obtain among ourselves the same amount of power and influence which she now wields in Tuscany, and of the disastrous consequences of which poor Cecchetti has had such painful and melancholy experience.

We have seen that in Italy the possession of a copy of the Holy Scriptures appears to constitute a heinous crime in the eyes of these modern inquisitors. Every corner and recess is explored which may, by possibility, contain a copy of the sacred volume. The modern Christian Church of Rome seems disposed to wage the same unrelenting hostility against the circulation of the Holy Scriptures in Italy as was carried on by the Pagan Emperors of Rome in the days of the early martyrs. We have met with an account of a transaction of this latter description which appears to us to bear some resemblance to the case of Cecchetti, and from which we are tempted to make a short extract, as it is given by an ancient author. It relates to the martyrdom of Felix, an African bishop, in consequence of his refusal to give up his copies of the Scriptures, in obedience to the commands of the Roman Emperor.

"On the next day (writes the ancient martyrologist) the Bishop Felix came from Carthage to Tibiura. He was addressed by the magistrate Magnilianus—"Bishop Felix, give up the books and parchments that you are possessed of." Felix replied—"I have them, but I will not surrender them." The magistrate Magnilianus subjoined—"Your words must give way to the Emperor's orders. Surrender up your books, that they may be burnt." Bishop Felix replied—"It is better that I myself should be burned rather than that the divine Scriptures should be given to the flames; 'for it is right to obey God rather than man.'" The magistrate Magnilianus said—"You must go before the chief governor." The chief governor said to him—"Why will you not surrender these useless Scriptures?" Bishop Felix replied—"I have them, but I will not surrender them." Then the chief governor ordered him to be cast bound into the lowest dungeon of the prison. And he said again—"Felix, why will you not give up the Scriptures? perhaps you have them not?" He replied—"I have them, but I will not give them up."†

It will be seen, from the above interesting fragment of antiquity, that the heathen governors were in the habit of burning any copies of the Scriptures that fell into their hands. We cannot tell whether the Florentine inquisitors consigned to the same fate the three copies of Diodati's Bible that they found in the house of Cecchetti, but we can refer to a notable example of a similar circumstance, which took place in England shortly before the Reformation. On Sunday, the 11th of February, A.D. 1526, Cardinal Wolsey sat in state in St. Paul's Cathedral, in London, while Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, preached a sermon against Luther. Before the pulpit, within the rails, stood great baskets full of books (copies of Tyndale's New Testament, in English), gathered up from search made by the Romish agents in London, Oxford, and Cambridge, ready to be burnt in the great fire before the crucifix, at the north part of St. Paul's. Thus Testament after Testament were consumed.

Most persons will, we think, concur in the justice of the remark which Burnet the historian makes, with reference to this method of destroying the Word of God—"This burning had such a hateful appearance in it, that people from thence concluded there must be a visible contrariety between that Book and the doctrines of those who so handled it; by which both their prejudice against the [Romish] clergy and their desire of reading the New Testament was increased."*

We trust that the persecution of Cecchetti will have the effect of stirring up many of his countrymen to read and study the Word of God for themselves, notwithstanding all the obstacles and impediments which the agents of the Church of Rome may interpose. And we ought to return thanks to Almighty God, that He has been pleased to place us beyond the power of Romish inquisitors, and that we have been born in a free land, where we need not fear that we shall be cast into a felon's cell, if we venture, in the privacy of our chambers, to read and meditate on that blessed Book, which "is able to make us wise unto salvation through faith that is in Christ Jesus".—2 Tim. iii. 15.

RELIGIOUS TOLERATION IN ENGLAND.

WHAT is toleration? The dictionary defines it to be an allowance given to that which is not approved. What, then, is religious toleration? An allowance given to the free and unconstrained exercise of a religion which those who have the power to prevent it do not approve. Our Roman Catholic brethren in England and Ireland, living under a Protestant Queen and Protestant constitution, which does not approve of their form of faith, but, on the contrary, solemnly protests against its errors in many important respects, and yet enjoying the free and unconstrained permission to exercise their religious worship as they please, have the largest and noblest exemplification of what is meant by religious toleration that, perhaps, the history of religion has ever afforded. Do we grudge them all this? Far from it; we rejoice at it and glory in it. We would persuade their understandings and convince their judgments by fair argument and sound reason; but we would never for a moment coerce or control their religious liberty.

But civil and religious liberty has been a party cry among politicians of a certain class, who style themselves liberals, and has been for thirty years a party toast among Roman Catholic agitators, at every political demonstration. The Roman Catholic Archbishop, Dr. Cullen, at the Rotundo meeting in Dublin, some time since, stated that the Pope and the bishops (Roman Catholics) were the true friends of civil and religious liberty. But what do they mean by religious liberty? In a Protestant country, we know very well that they mean liberality to themselves—that liberty to exercise their own religion in Protestant countries freely which they deny to all other religions in Roman Catholic countries; elsewhere religious liberty means the liberty to oppress and banish all other professions of faith but their own. "But if he were lord in the land, and the Protestants in a minority, if not in numbers, yet in power, what would he do to you? If it would benefit the cause of (Roman) Catholicism, he would tolerate you, if expedient he would imprison you, fine you, or, perhaps, banish you, (as the Pope did the respectable Roman Catholic priest, the Abbé Laborde, a few months ago); but be assured of one thing, he would never tolerate you for the sake of the glorious principle of civil and religious liberty." These are not our sentiments, but the candid avowal of a widely-circulated Roman Catholic publication in England (the Rambler), expressed in the year 1851.

If the Roman Catholics of any parish in Ireland were anxious to build a chapel, and had collected the necessary funds, and had purchased an eligible site, but, after they had just laid the foundation, were prohibited by a Protestant Government from putting a single stone of the edifice upon another, would they not consider it a mockery and a mere humbug to say that this was religious liberty? And how would they be satisfied if they were told that as the English nation prohibits the burning of widows in India, so the Queen of England is in duty bound to hinder, if she can, the perpetual burning of the souls of her own people in hell? Yet this is the very apology given by the Tablet newspaper, for the Pope's preventing the erection of a Protestant Church in Rome; and this is what Dr. Cullen means by religious liberty when he says that the Pope is the friend of religious liberty; he means only in those cases in which liberty is to be received at the hands of the liberal and enlightened Protestants, to whom the slightest reciprocity or return is contemptuously denied. No better reason is vouchsafed for prohibiting their reading of the Bible in Tuscany, or the decent burial of Protestants in Lisbon or Madrid. In Italy, Naples, Spain, or Portugal, where the power of the Pope is dominant, the public exercise of their religion by Protestants is a crime. Compare with this, the condition of our Roman Catholic brethren in Ireland and England. Their reason is addressed when it can be approached; their attention is affectionately and respectfully invited to the hearing of truths from which they may forbear if they will; they are sometimes, we rejoice to say oftentimes, convinced, but never coerced. The only invasion of their religious liberty comes from their own priesthood and bishops who employ menaces and terror, and sometimes physical force, to influence their religious conduct and profession. But so far as the Protestant government under which they live, and the Protestant ministers by whom they are surrounded, are concerned, they hear but the words of kindness and of protection, of counsel and encouragement.

We are not about to enter into the vexed politics of the day, or to meddle in any way with the recent discussions in Parliament or elsewhere relative to the Maynooth Endowment; but we ask any dispassionate Roman Catholic reader, does not the very existence of an endowment, in a Protestant state, of a seminary for the education of Roman Catholic priests, present the most extraordinary instance of religious toleration that even the history of Protestant England could produce? Those who struggle for its withdrawal complain—we do not say whether rightly or wrongly—that it passes beyond the fair limits of toleration, and amounts to an encouragement and patronage of what the Queen and the Parliament profess to be a schismatical creed, in the most substantial and unequivocal shape. We do not ask our readers to consider whether these people are justified in their complaints or not; such considerations as these are beyond the sphere of our inquiries, and we meddle not with them; but let them endeavour to realize the fact of an endowment of a Protestant seminary for Protestant clergymen, patronized and endowed by the Pope and cardinals in Rome, and when they have stretched their imagination to such a point as this, then, we believe, they can more temperately estimate the conduct of those Protestants, whether in England and Ireland, who are demanding the withdrawal of the endowment from the College of Maynooth by the Parliament of a Protestant country.

Liberty is one thing, liberality is another; but endowment is certainly a step considerably in advance of either; and those who are willing to concede the fullest liberty to the exercise of a faith of which they cannot approve, and are disposed to act with the greatest liberality towards those who profess that faith, may, nevertheless, with perfect consistency (but whether wisely or not we do not now pretend to say), decline to bear the responsibility of its propagation, by the endowment of seminaries for the purpose of educating a priesthood in what they believe to be serious errors in doctrine and morals.

THE APOCRYPHA.

THE controversy between Protestants and Roman Catholics respecting the Rule of Faith involves two principal questions—first, Is the Rule of Faith contained in the written Word alone, or must we join to it the unwritten Word (Tradition)? Secondly, What constitutes the written Word? Does it include the apocryphal Scriptures or not? Does the Protestant Bible contain the whole or only a part of it? In short, what is the canon of Scripture?

The Church of these realms agrees with the Church of Rome respecting the canon of the New Testament; not so, however, with respect to the Old Testament. We acknowledge those books only to be canonical which our blessed Lord and his inspired apostles stamped with their authority, and which the Christian Church, during a period of fifteen centuries, recognised as divine. Roman Catholic theologians admit that our Lord and his apostles sanctioned the Jewish canon (which excluded the Apocrypha); they allow, moreover, that the Apocrypha was not admitted into the Christian canon for the first three or four centuries; but they contend that, at that date, and in virtue of the developing power inherent in the Church, the apocryphal books were enrolled in the Christian canon, and thenceforward continued to be recognised as the canon of the Church; and that the Council of Trent merely declared what had been the immemorial doctrine of the Church upon the subject, when it pronounced the Apocrypha to be divinely-inspired Scripture, and anathematized all who should dare to deny it.

The proofs usually relied on by Roman Catholic writers of the reception of the Apocrypha as divine by the Church, from the fourth century onward, are the following:—1. The catalogue of canonical books given by Augustine at the end of the fourth century. 2. The decree of the Council of Carthage, also about the same date. 3. The decretal of Pope Innocent I., at the beginning of the fifth century. 4. The decretal of Pope Gelasius, at the close of the fifth century. 5. The decree of Pope Eugenius IV. in the "Instruction to the Armenians," drawn up after the close of the Council of Florence, about the middle of the fifteenth century (1439).

Now, without dwelling at present upon the insuperable objection to the canonicity of the Apocrypha, arising from its admitted non-reception as canonical during the first four centuries, and which fatal objection the ingenious fiction of gradual development in vain attempts to remove, —without, we say, enlarging on this now, we will address ourselves to the so-called proofs, by which it has been attempted to show that since the fourth century the Apocrypha has been acknowledged by the Church to be inspired. We have already shown (CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. ii., pp. 112, 125) that the authenticity of the documents enumerated above under the second, third, and fourth heads, is more than questionable, and, in fact, that the evidence of their spuriousness is so strong as to deprive them of any weight as proofs of the point under discussion. We have shown, with reference to the decree of the Council of Carthage, that it contains a gross anachronism of no less than twenty years. We have also shown that Pope Innocent's decretal, which purports to have been written at the opening of the fifth century, was first brought to light late in the ninth century—more than four centuries and a half after it professes to have been written. And, lastly, we have shown that the evidence on which Pope Gelasius's decree rests is, in the highest degree, precarious. But, even admitting the genuineness of these questionable documents, we are prepared to prove that they lend no countenance to the Tridentine decree respecting the Apocrypha. We commence, then, by making a very important distinction, upon which the whole question turns, and which, therefore, Roman Catholic controversialists endeavour, as much as possible, to keep out of sight and ignore. The distinction referred to is that between the restricted meaning which we now exclusively attach to the terms "canonical," "Scripture," "sacred Scriptures," and the wider sense in which they were frequently used by the earlier writers. We moderns restrict their application to the inspired Scriptures exclusively, and this is the sense in which the terms are always understood in the controversy between Protestants and Roman Catholics. But it was otherwise in times when controversy did not oblige men to use theological terms in a precise and definite sense: hence we occasionally find the term "canonical" applied by early writers, not merely to the inspired books of Scripture, but to one or more of the apocryphal books, not with the intention of placing them in the same category, as to divine authority, with the inspired books, but simply in order to express the fact that these apocryphal books were read in the churches, and were held in reverence, as containing rules (canones) for the practical guidance of life. The truth of this assertion we will establish presently, and especially we will adduce in support of it the express authority of one of the greatest of the Romish divines themselves—Cardinal Cajetan. Similarly, the earlier writers frequently quote the apocryphal books as "Scripture," and sometimes even as "divine Scripture;" but what they meant thereby was merely to distinguish the books read in the churches, and which, on that account, might, in a certain sense, be called sacred books, from the legendary stories, and spurious apocryphal writings, which, even then, certain superstitious or even heretical persons were endeavouring to palm off as genuine productions of the apostles or other inspired men. In contradistinction to these spurious forgeries (which were sometimes also called apocryphal books, because their authors and their origin were alike unknown)* the Church writers occasionally applied, as we have said, the terms "Scripture," "sacred Scripture" to what we now exclusively call the apocryphal books, to denote that they were genuine works, valued by the Church for the useful lessons which they contain, and, on that account, read in her public services. For this reason they were sometimes also designated ecclesiastical books. We may add, that another very probable reason why the term "Scripture" was so often extended to the apocryphal books in ancient times is this, that these books were bound up in the same volume with the inspired books, and so were naturally called by the same name.† However, that the writers who thus extend the term "Scripture," &c., to the apocryphal books had no intention whatever to canonize them (in our sense of the word) is clear from this, that those very same writers elsewhere apply the terms "Scripture," "divine Scripture," "Revelation," "holy Inspirations," and the like, not only to those apocryphal books which the Church of Rome rejects equally with us, namely, the third Book of Esdras, and the fourth Book of Maccabees, but even to the Prophecy of Enoch and the Shepherd of Hermas.‡ So that it is plain the terms in question were employed in a wide and loose sense, and that any argument founded upon such patristic usage by the advocates of the Tridentine decree would be useless, because it would prove too much. In further illustration of this patristic usage, we may observe, that in the English books of Homilies, the authors of which were certainly very far from recognising the divine authority of the Apocrypha, the apocryphal Book of Wisdom is several times quoted as Scripture, and even as holy Scripture.§ Nay, more, we find the highest Roman Catholic authorities themselves using the terms "Scripture," "divine Scrip-

* Burnet's History of the Reformation, vol. i., p. 120. Dublin, 1730.

* It is very necessary to bear this fact in mind, in order to avoid confusion; what we term apocryphal books the ancients frequently call ecclesiastical, and what they sometimes call apocryphal we should term spurious forgeries.

† The Apocryphal books and portions of books, which were all either originally composed in Greek or very soon translated into it, were incorporated with the Septuagint version of the Old Testament not long after the time of our Lord and his apostles; from the LXX. they were transferred into the Latin translations of the Old Testament, which, before the time of Jerome, were all made immediately from the LXX.

‡ Thus Clemens Alexandrinus and Theodoret quote the third Book of Esdras; so does Athanasius, who yet, in his catalogue of the inspired books, excludes the Apocrypha. Ambrose quotes the fourth Book of Maccabees. Irenæus and Tertullian quote the Prophecy of Enoch; and Origen quotes the Shepherd of Hermas.

§ The first book of Homilies is generally thought to have been composed by Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer; the bare mention of whose names is a sufficient evidence of their opinions respecting canonical Scripture. The second book was published simultaneously with the Thirty-nine Articles in 1562, in which revised edition of the original Articles an addition was made to the article concerning Holy Scripture, the object of this addition being to draw a distinct line of demarcation between the canonical books and the Apocrypha, and to declare that the latter were not to be applied to establish any doctrine.

ture," &c., in the same wide sense, as distinguished from merely secular writings. Thus Pope Nicholas I. speaks of "the divinely-inspired opinions of the Fathers": Pope Innocent III. quotes a passage of Augustine as "sacred Scripture," which expression Melchior Canus tells us is to be understood in the same sense as when the Papal laws are called "sacred"—viz., in order that they may be distinguished from the laws of temporal princes: and Bellarmine says, that "although the canons of councils and the decrees of popes are distinguished from and inferior to divine Scripture, yet that, in their own way (suo modo), they are, and may be called, sacred and canonical Scripture, in order to distinguish them from the writings of profane authors and of the Church Fathers, which are not a rule."—De concil. auct., lib. ii., c. xii.

Having premised thus much respecting the usage which prevailed in ancient times relatively to the the terms "canonical," "Scripture," &c., we proceed to examine the documents above enumerated, and which are those whereon Roman Catholic divines found their defence of that part of the decree of the 4th session of the Council of Trent which concerns the Apocrypha. First, then, we take the famous passage of Augustine, in his treatise "de Doctrina Christiana" (lib. ii., cap. 8). Speaking of the study of writings connected with sacred subjects, which (in accordance with the usage above noticed) he calls by the generic name of "divine Scriptures" (divinæ Scripturæ), he recommends that particular attention should be bestowed on the Scriptures called canonical. He then proceeds—"The following method is, therefore, to be observed in reference to the canonical Scriptures; those which are received by all the Catholic Churches are to be preferred to those which some of the Churches do not yet acknowledge; and in the case of the latter class, again, those which are received by the more numerous and more important Churches are to be preferred to those which are received by the fewer and less important." Having laid down this general principle, he then gives a catalogue of all the canonical Scriptures ("totus canon Scripturarum"). In this catalogue he includes Tobit, Judith, two Books of Maccabees, Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus.* This catalogue has been termed the Canon of Augustine, in contradistinction to the Canon of Jerome (from which the Apocryphal books are excluded); and is the Canon which the Council of Trent has ratified, declaring all the books, with all their parts, to be sacred and canonical. The advocates of the Council appeal to the authority of Augustine in justification of the canonization of the Apocrypha; but the slightest attention to Augustine's words shows that he uses the word "canonical" in a very different sense from that in which the Tridentine Fathers employ it. With them "canonical" means "inspired;" he uses the term in a much wider sense, as denoting the books which were held in reverence and read in the Churches, in which category, besides the inspired books, the apocryphal were also contained. And that the word, as employed by him, must be understood with this latitude of meaning is obvious, from what he says as to the preference to be given to some of the canonical books over others. In the case of inspired Scripture, it would be absurd to talk of preference. Inspiration does not admit of degrees. The divine element of the Scriptures is not a quantitative thing, conferring different values on different parts of the Scriptures, in proportion to the amount of it that may be found or thought to exist in them. The above is no new explanation of Augustine's words in the passage under consideration; it was given by one of the most renowned Roman doctors, and one, moreover, who was the personal antagonist of Luther, Cardinal Cajetan. We shall quote his own words, as they occur at the close of his Commentary on the Book of Esther. The whole passage is most remarkable, and, therefore, we will make no apology for giving it at length:—"Here we end our commentaries on the historical books of the Old Testament; for the remainder—viz., Judith, Tobit, and the Books of Maccabees—are not included by St. Jerome among the canonical books, but are placed, along with Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus, among the Apocrypha. Do not be uneasy, tyro, if you should anywhere find those [apocryphal] books enumerated amongst the canonical, either by holy councils or by holy doctors; for the words both of councils and of doctors must be reduced to the judgment of Jerome; and, according to his decision, those books [the apocryphal books enumerated], and if there be any others like them in the canon of the Bible, are not canonical—that is to say, do not contain rules for confirming articles of faith; they may, however, be called canonical, as containing rules for the edification of the faithful, inasmuch as they have been admitted into the canon of the Bible and authorized for this very purpose. With this distinction you will be able to discern the meaning of the words of Augustine (de Doctr. Christ., lib. ii.), as, also, of the decrees of the Council of Florence, under Eugenius IV., and of the provincial Councils of Carthage and Laodicea, and of Popes Innocent and Gelasius."† These striking words were penned before the Council of Trent had uttered its anathema against all who should dare to deny the canonical authority (in the fullest sense of the word canonical) of the apocryphal books. We learn from them—First, that a Roman cardinal (who is described by his contemporaries as an "incomparable theologian," "to whom, as to a common oracle, men were wont to resort in all difficult questions of theology"), an avowed enemy of the Reformation, writing shortly before the Council of Trent, adopts Jerome's canon, and rejects the Apocrypha as authority in questions of faith, while he allows its value for the edification of the faithful; thus assigning to it exactly the same place as the Church of England does in her 6th Article. Secondly we learn that, in the passage of Augustine under consideration, as also in the other documents referred to by Cajetan, the word "canonical," when applied to the apocryphal books, is used in a wide sense, which must not be confounded with that which it bears when applied specially to the inspired books. Thirdly, we see from Cajetan's own usage, that, even in his day, the phrase "Canon of the Bible" (Canon Bibliæ) meant the whole list of books contained in the Vulgate, comprising the non-canonical as well as the strictly canonical Scriptures.

Bearing in mind, then, this usage of the word "canonical," we come to the primary argument in support of the divine authority of the Apocrypha, derived from the decree of the Council of Carthage. We said we would consent to waive all the objections to the genuineness of this decree, weighty as they are, and admit its evidence in the case. Let us hear, then, what it is. In the 47th canon it is decreed, "that, with the exception of the canonical Scriptures, nothing should be read in the Church under the name of divine Scriptures" [i.e., no forgeries or legendary tales pretending to be the compositions of inspired men]. Then a catalogue is given of the "canonical Scriptures" ("sunt autem canonicæ Scripturæ," &c.), which agrees exactly with that given by Augustine, except that in it the authorship of the books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus is attributed to Solomon, which is a manifest error, and, of itself, invalidates the claim of the council, not only to be regarded as infallible (for this it can hardly claim, in any case, having been only a provincial synod), but even as competent to pronounce an opinion upon the subject. Without, however, insisting upon this, and allowing the decree all the weight that its advocates claim for it, our simple answer is, that the word "canonical" is used in the wide sense above explained—the sense in which Augustine, who is said to have been present at the council, himself employed it—the sense, moreover, in which Cajetan expressly tells us we must understand it. Nay, more, the decree itself explains the sense in which the word "canonical" is used in it; for at the close thereof we read, that the council declared the aforesaid books to be canonical, "because they received them from their ancestors "to be read in the Church" ("in Ecclesia legenda"). And, lastly, that the African Church of the fourth century never intended to place the Apocrypha on a par with the inspired Scriptures—to canonize it, in the modern sense of the term—is clear from the explicit testimony of the two African bishops, Junilius and Primasius, who wrote about a century and a half later (the middle of the 6th century). Junilius expressly excludes from the canonical Scriptures (strictly so called) the books of Judith, Wisdom, and Maccabees; and, for this reason, because the Hebrews and Jerome excluded them—a reason, which, of course, excludes the rest of the Apocrypha also. And Primasius, commenting on the 4th chapter of the Apocalypse, says, that St John, in mentioning the twenty-four wings and twenty-four elders, alludes to the number of the books of the old Testament, "which number," he adds, "we have received as possessed of canonical authority."* Surely, the African Church of the 6th century, speaking through two of its most eminent bishops, may be allowed to be a better expositor of the sense intended to be assigned to the word "canonical" by their great bishop, Augustine, and a council at which he assisted, only a century and a half before, than a few Italian bishops of the 16th century, who, as we shall hereafter see, were very far from being unanimous respecting the conclusion which was, at last, arrived at.

In our next number we hope to resume this subject, and complete our examination of the proofs usually urged in support of the Tridentine decree respecting the Apocrypha.

* Augustine does not expressly mention the Book of Baruch or the apocryphal parts of Daniel and Esther, but it may be assumed that he intended to include them: because the African Bible was a translation from the LXX., in which they form constituent parts of Jeremiah, Daniel, and Esther, respectively.

THE TWO VERSIONS OF THE BIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I have been induced by your paper to compare some chapters of the Douay and English versions of the Holy Scriptures together, and am struck with their substantial agreement.* I wish, however, to know which translation (for they are both, of course, only translations) is really correct in the following passages. The Prophecy of Isaias, ch. i., v. 18, Douay Bible, has—"Come and accuse me, saith the Lord." The English Bible translates the same words—"Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord."

I cannot but think this appeal to reason savours strongly of Protestantism, though I confess I cannot well make sense of the Douay translation; for why should "learning to do well, relieving the oppressed, or defending the fatherless and the widow," lead any one to accuse God; or why should accusing God make sins that are as red as scarlet, white as snow. The expression, to say the least of it, is not a happy or very intelligible one, though I doubt if your English version be a bit more so; for what has reason to do with the forgiving of sins, any more than accusing God could lead to such forgiveness.

I dare say I am only displaying my own ignorance by these remarks; but not pretending to be a learned scholar myself, I am really anxious to know from those who are learned in said matters, what they have to say on the subject. As to asking a (Roman) Catholic priest for such information, I have long since given that up as useless, or worse; for I should at once be marked as a heretic if I did so.

When my hand is in, I may as well ask you about another passage—Isaias, ch. ii.; after speaking, in the 18th and 19th verses, of the total destruction of idols, and man going into the holes of the rocks and caves of the earth from the face of the fear of the Lord, and the glory of His Majesty when he shall rise up to strike (or shake terribly) the earth, proceeds, according to the Douay Bible, in v. 20, thus—"In that day a man shall cast away his idols of silver, and his idols of gold, which he made for himself to adore, moles and bats." Your authorized version has it—"In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver and gold which they made to worship, to the moles and to the bats." This may appear to be a trifling difference, but there must be some reason for it; both cannot be right. Can you tell me whether idols of silver and gold were ever made by any one in the shape of moles and bats. Did any nation ever worship moles and bats, or, rather, silver and gold images of them? I am sincerely anxious to come at the truth, and especially with reference to the note of the Douay version on v. 18 of that chapter—Your obedient servant,

AN INQUIRER.

The two questions put by our correspondent can be shortly answered. On the first point—namely, whether the translation of Isaiah i. 18, given in the Douay Bible, or the English authorized version, is the correct one, we have no hesitation in giving a preference to the latter, for the following reasons:—The particular form of the Hebrew verb† which the Douay Bible translates "accuse," and the authorized version "reason," unquestionably means, "to argue a point, reason." Thus, for example, Gesenius, the best modern Hebrew authority, stands as the meaning, "disputavit cum aliquo," to dispute with any one. The LXX version of this word, in the passage before us, is ἐλεγχθῶμεν, and the Syriac version reads ܢܬܬܟܚ, both of which give the same interpretation as the authorized English translation. It may be added, that this form of the verb never has in Hebrew the active meaning "to accuse." Our Roman Catholic readers can satisfy themselves on this point by referring to the only other passages where it occurs—viz., Gen. xx. 16, and Job. xxiii. 7. Our correspondent appears to have found some difficulty in perceiving what reason has to do with the forgiveness of sins; but a moment's consideration of the entire passage will, we think, remove this objection. The verse contains an invitation to discuss the question whether God was willing or unwilling to show mercy, implying that reason, as well as justice, was on his side, and asserting his power and his willingness to pardon the most aggravated sins. The implied conclusion of the reasoning is, that God's willingness to pardon the Jews threw the blame of their destruction on themselves. The fulness and freeness of this offer of pardon arose from the fact, that God had himself provided a way, whereby, in the fulness of time, a full and sufficient atonement would be made for the sins of the whole world; a way whereby all mankind might "be justified freely by His grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus."—Rom. iii. 24.

The second question of our correspondent, with reference to the "moles and bats," may be disposed of more briefly. Here the Douay version appears plainly wrong; for the preposition "to" (in Hebrew ל), occurs before both the words moles and bats in the original. The Vulgate version (which the Douay translator, as usual, has servilely followed) appears to have concluded the sense of the passage to be, that the idolaters were either to worship images as blind as moles and bats, or to worship moles and bats themselves (ut adoraret talpas et vespertiliones). But the context obviously relates, not to the moral deterioration of idolaters, but to their terror and despair. It is absurd, however, to infer, as the note in the Douay version does, that because men on their first conversion to Christianity threw away their idols of silver and gold, that such a form of idolatry was never afterwards to arise in the bosom of the Christian Church. The Douay writer might with as much reason infer, that because the early Christians, as we are told in the Acts, had "all things common," therefore, all distinctions of property are henceforth to cease in the world.

* Both versions, for instance, of Isaiah i. 18 are literally the same—"Incense is an abomination to me."

† יִוָּכְחָה

We shall be very glad to hear again from our correspondent, with respect to any further differences he may discover between the authorized and Douay versions.

THE PROTESTANT BIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I have thought that the following testimony from an enemy, to the excellence of our English translation of the Bible may interest some of your readers. It is taken from Faber's "Essay on the Characteristics of the Lives of the Saints," p. 116:—

"Who will say that the uncommon beauty and marvellous English of the Protestant Bible is not one of the great strongholds of heresy in this country? It lives on in the ear like a music that never can be forgotten—like the sound of church bells which the convert hardly knows how he can forego. Its felicities seem often to be almost things rather than mere words. It is part of the national mind, and the anchor of the national seriousness—nay, it is worshipped with a positive idolatry, in extenuation of whose grotesque fanaticism its intrinsic beauty pleads availingly with the man of letters and the scholar. The memory of the dead passes into it. The potent traditions of childhood are stereotyped in its verses. The power of all the griefs and trials of a man is hidden beneath its words. It is the representative of his best moments; and all that there has been about him of soft, and gentle, and pure, and penitent, and good, speaks to him for ever out of his English Bible. It is his sacred thing which doubt never dimmed, and controversy never soiled. It has been to him all along as the silent, but, oh, how intelligible voice of his guardian angel; and in the length and breadth of the land, there is not a Protestant with one spark of religiousness about him, whose spiritual biography is not in his Saxon Bible. ON CHARITY TO PROTESTANTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

MR. EDITOR—I crossed the mountain to Jerry Donovan's, the other evening, to hear something more out of the paper about Father John. I found Jerry, and the wife, and childer sitting down to supper, and, of course, I took a seat; but 'twasn't like the supper in the old times, when we had the praties, enough and to spare; and, says Jerry, "I wonder will them good old times ever come back to us again." "Please God they will," says I; "sure the praties looks beautiful this blessed minute." "True for you," says he, "and glory be to God for that same; sure 'twas he sent the blight, and 'tis he can take it off again if he pleases; and," says he, "Dan, I'm thinking we never feel our blessings till they're taken from us; but then we see how good God has been to us all along, and we never giving him a bit of thanks for it." Well, sir, when the childer finished their supper, Nelly took the creatures off to bed, and I asked Jerry to get the paper about Father John, and read the rest of it. "Where did I leave off?" says he. "You were just beginning," says I, "with Father John's reason for not arguing with the minister." "Here's the place," says he. "The minister turned to Father John, 'and,' says he 'either you or I must be wrong, and 'twould be well to find out which of us is wrong; for we can't both be right.' 'That's true, anyhow,' says Father John; 'but 'tis easy known which of us is wrong; for,' says he, 'every heretic must be wrong, and you're a heretic; therefore, you must be wrong.' 'Well,' says the minister, 'I think I could pick a hole in your logic if I wished; but,' says he 'even granting, for argument sake, that we Protestants are heretics, isn't it your duty to reason with us, and set us right?' 'Sure 'tisn't with heretics I'd be arguing,' says Father John. 'Why,' says the minister, 'the worse heretics we are, the more you ought to try to convert us; don't you care at all,' says he, 'for our poor souls? and, if we're wrong, would'nt it be a charity to try to set us right?' 'Well,' says Father John, 'I do care for your souls, and I pray that you may all be brought into the true Church before you die.' 'But,' says the minister, 'tisn't enough to pray for us; you should give us lectures, and put up notices, saying, that on such an evening you'd prove the Protestant religion to be wrong; and you should invite us all to come to hear you; and,' says he, 'if you did that, I'd believe that you felt some care for us; and,' says he, 'I'd go to hear you myself; for,' says he, 'all I want is to get at the truth; and,' says he, 'nothing brings out the truth like a good discussion; and' says he, 'if we're wrong, 'tisn't intentionally; 'tisn't our fault, but our misfortune.'" "That's fair, Jerry," says I; "nothing could be fairer; and it reminds me of what Bill Flaherty, the jockey, once said to poor old Father Ned of Kilbarry. Bill sold him a horse, that he swore hadn't a fault in the world; but, he wasn't three days bought when 'twas found that he was blind of an eye, and had the spavin. So Father Ned sends for Bill, and, says he, 'you deceiving villian, is that the horse that you told me had'nt a fault in the world, and he only fit for the crows.' 'Arra, your Reverence,' says Bill, 'don't be slandering the poor beast, sure that isn't his fault, but his misfortune;' and, in like manner, we shouldn't be running down the Protestants because they hadn't the luck to be born Catholics like ourselves; but we should do our best to convert them; and 'tis often my heart bleeds for the poor creatures when I think of their miserable state; sure 'twould be the greatest charity for our clargy to try to set them right." "True for you," says Jerry; "and 'twas last Sunday in chapel I was thinking that same, when Father John was telling us of the elegant mission the priests are sending out to convert the black niggers in foreign parts; sure we've poor niggers of Protestants here at home who are as ignorant as any heathen; they never say a prayer to the Blessed Virgin, nor a Rosary, nor even a 'Hail Mary;' they never ask the intercession of a saint, nor care for holy water, nor even as much as cross themselves, and all for want of our priests teaching them the differ, and proving to them that we're right. But to go on with the paper—the parson told Father John, 'that 'twasn't enough to pray for Protestants; but that the surest way to set them right, if they were wrong, would be to reason with them.' 'But' says Father John, 'I've many things of my own to look after, that are of more importance than attending to Protestants.'* 'Well,' says the minister, 'that surprises me; you think that we're all going astray, and that our souls will be lost: don't you?' 'To be sure I do,' says he, 'only 'tisn't think it I do, but know it.' 'Why then, if that's the case,' says the minister, 'how could any business be more important than trying to save us? and,' says he, 'if you really believe what you say, you ought to preach to us, and try to set us right.' 'Sure we do preach to you,' says Father John, 'by our example.'* 'Oh,' says the minister, 'the Apostle Peter wasn't content with setting a good example to the people in his time; but he reasoned with them, and proved that his religion was the right one; and why don't you follow his example?'" "Why, Jerry," says I, "that's the very way Father John told us they converted the niggers; he said they reasoned with them, and proved that the heathen religion was wrong, and that the Holy Roman religion was right; and sure 'twould be as easy to prove this for the Protestants as for the niggers." "Anyhow," says Jerry, "they ought to try it; for charity should begin at home, though it shouldn't end there. But to go on with the story; the parson stuck to Father John, and hunted the poor man from one excuse to another, till he was almost beat out; but when Humphrey Carey saw him so hard pushed, he came to his help, and, says he, 'I'll tell you the reason why the priests of the Holy Catholic Church don't enter into discussions with heretics, because,' says he, 'the word of God forbids it.'† 'What part of it?' says the minister. 'The verse in Corinthians' says he, 'where St. Paul forbids us to be contentious.'"‡ "Well, Jerry," says I, "Humphrey is a real clever fellow; that was chapter and verse for the parson; sure 'tis well I knew the priests must have some good reason for never meeting the Protestant ministers in discussion; and sure they couldn't have a better reason than St. Paul being against it; but I suppose Father John was glad of the help." "'Tis he that was," says Jerry; "he looked, for all the world, like a man just let off the tread-mill, smiling with delight, but very tired; and, says he to the parson, 'I hope you'll take St. Paul's word, if you won't take mine!' Well, the minister began to laugh, and says he, 'that text won't save your bacon.' 'Why so?' says Father John. 'Because,' says the parson, 'St. Paul was a regular controversialist;' and, says he, 'if you read your Douay Bible as often as you read your Breviary, you'd know that St. Paul was one of the greatest disputers ever lived;‡ and, moreover, says he, 'that text has nothing at all to say to religious discussion.' 'Arra what else?' says Father John. 'Why,' says he, 'it merely refers to whether women should have their heads covered in church, or not.'" "Oh, murder, Jerry," says I, "that was a pity. Sure I thought Father John was all right when I heard the text." "But," says Jerry, "the worst of all was, the Protestants began to laugh, and Father John began to lose his temper; and, when the minister asked for some other reason why he wouldn't enter into discussion, he got fairly vexed; and, says he, 'the truth is, when we see people determined on going to old Nick, we think it as well to let them alone.'"§ "Oh, murder, Jerry," says I, "did Father John really say that?" "'Deed he did," says Jerry, "and 'twas a hard word for a Christian and a priest to use to poor creatures that don't know the differ; sure Father John is always talking to us about charity, but I don't think there was much charity in that; and," says he, "I seen a thing in Cork that might be a pattern to Father John, in the way of charity." "What was it?" says I. "Why," says he, "I was standing near Patrick's Bridge, watching the steamers, and, among the crowd, I saw a great, fierce-looking sailor, with a squint in one eye that would look round a corner, and a big cut across his face, and as much curled hair under his chin as would stuff a bed; and while I was looking at him, a poor creature fell into the sea, and, as he couldn't swim, he was sinking fast. We all began to screech and bawl, but never a one of us did anything to help the poor man; but the big sailor whips off his jacket, and jumps into the sea, and brings the poor fellow out by the hair of the head. Well, the boys gave a cheer for him that would rise the cockles of your heart, and a grand-looking gentleman began to praise him for what he had done; but, says he, 'sir, I only did my duty; and, moreover,' says he, 'sure the poor fellow was a countryman of my own, and even if he was my worst enemy I'd have done the same.' Well, the crowd gave another cheer that almost lifted the roofs off the houses. And I'm thinking, Dan, that same big sailor might be a pattern to our priests in the way of charity. There's the poor Protestants drowning, according to their account—drowning, body and soul—and still they won't say a word to hinder them from going down to hell." "Oh, Jerry, says I, "that's a hard word of yours; I don't think myself that every Protestant will go to hell; there are some very honest, decent people among them." "Well," says Jerry, "if it's a hard word, it isn't mine; for" says he, "don't you remember the words of the book that we were taught out of, and that the priests teach our childer out of, and where we're told that no person can be saved who does not belong to our Church; that out of the Church there is no salvation; and that no Jew, Turk, heretic, or schismatic belongs to that Church.* Sure that's only a civil way of saying that every Protestant must go to hell, or to Old Nick, as Father John said; and" says he, "there's nothing makes me so doubtful of the truth of the priests' religion, as seeing that, with all their talk about charity, they never try to convert Protestants." "But, Jerry," says I, "what do poor ignorant boys like us know about such things? You may be sure our priests have wise reasons for not arguing with the Protestants." "True for you," says he, "and 'tis what I'm thinking myself this long time; but 'tisn't any of the reasons Father John gave." "What other?" says I. "By my word, then," says he, "I think the truth is, that our priests are afraid to argue with the ministers; I'm thinking that's the true reason." "Jerry," says I, "I'm ashamed of you; Jerry," says I, "you're a disgrace to the woman that owns you; Jerry," says I, "arn't you afraid the roof would fall on you for speaking such blasphemy of your clargy?" "Why," says he, "I can't think of any other reason; but if you know of any other, let us hear it." Well, Mr. Editor, as I hadn't an answer ready, I turned again on Jerry, and, says I, "why should our priests be afraid to meet the Protestant clargy; sure they know the Latin and Greek as well as any of them." "I don't deny it," says he; "but 'tisn't Latin and Greek would do for them in an argument with the ministers; 'tis out of the Bible they should argue, and 'tis myself thinks our priests don't know much about that book, whatever they may about the Latin and Greek." Well, sir, on this I was so vexed with Jerry, that I got up and left the house; but as I went along, I began to think over the matter, and I tried hard to find a good reason for our priests never meeting the Protestant clargy; but the more I tried, the more I couldn't find one. It seemed to me that even if our priests didn't care for winning a victory over the Protestants, still for charity's sake they ought to reason with them; for, surely, if our religion is the right one, the priests ought to be able to prove it; and then the Protestants would come over to the true Church, and their poor souls would be saved. Still, I know there must be some good reason for our priests not doing so; and if your honour knows it, maybe you'd tell it to me, and set my mind at rest.

Your humble servant to command,

DAN. CARTHY.

ON PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I fear the dreary, monotonous repetition of extracts from the Fathers cannot long be agreeable to the taste of the generality of your readers; but your reply to my letter, in CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. iv., p. 34, col. 1, renders it necessary to cite again a passage from St. Cyril, given under the above reference.

You decry the argument which this holy patriarch uses to illustrate the nature of prayers and sacrifice for the relief of the dead as very poor, and not to the taste of some Roman Catholics.

To highly-intellectual minds, trained to abstruse metaphysical disquisitions, and profound theological deductions, it may appear trifling; but, for my part, I fancy it is quite appropriate, and capable of combining into regular system the elementary instructions hitherto given to his neophytes.

*Abridgment of the Christian Doctrine, by way of Question and Answer. Dublin: Printed by C. M. Warren, Wholesale Catholic Bookseller, 21, Upper Ormond-quay, 1850, pp. 17 and 18.

He submits to them the example of an earthly king, punishing offenders against his crown and person, and of their obtaining pardon, through the mediation and supplication of friends; and to imprint this illustration indelibly on their memories, that they may be able thereby to carry it in their minds throughout the whole of what he next proposes to teach them, he intimates to them the necessity of doing so by κατα αυτον τροπον, which is indicative of a repetition of the example proposed—"After the same manner that they supplicate the king to obtain pardon," &c.—και ημεις υπερ των κεκοιμημενων αυτῳ τας δεησεις προσφεροντες, καν αμαρτωλοι ωσιν, ου στεφανον πλεκομεν, αλλα Χριστον εσφαγιασμενον υπερ των ημετερων αμαρτηματων προσφεραμεν, εξιλεουμενοι υπερ αυτων και ημων τον φιλανθρωπον.—"So do we offer up supplications to God for those that are dead, if they be sinners; we do not propose a crown, but we offer Christ slain for our sins, propitiating, both for them (the dead) and for us, Him who is so beneficent." This passage is of paramount importance; it is plain and simple in construction, and cannot be misunderstood; it is the climax of all St. Cyril has advanced respecting prayers, &c., for the relief of the dead; and if allowed to be the exponent of the doctrine of the Christian Church on this point, the controversy is at an end, and the distinction between prayers for the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, &c., and those for the other dead must be admitted. This you are aware of, and throughout paragraphs No. 1 and No. 2 of your reply to my letter referred to above, after a number of varied, desultory, but ineffectual attempts to ignore the plain, obvious meaning of this passage, you resign it as hopeless, and concede to me, on the authority of St. Cyril, this very distinction. An inextricable dilemma presents itself before you—you must either agree to the truth of St. Cyril's teaching, "If they (the dead) be sinners, we offer supplications for them; we offer Christ slain," to propitiate God for them, to make atonement for them, to obtain pardon for them, &c.; and the admission of this would be fatal to the Church of England doctrine in Article xxii. of her religion; or you must adopt the only alternative at your disposal, which, I think, still involves you in no trifling difficulty. This latter course you take, and, in pointed allusion to the doctrine enunciated in the foregoing passage of St. Cyril, you ask—"How, then, are we to account for the fact of St. Cyril being driven to justify prayers for those who died in their sins—αμαρτωλοι?" Now, if anything can be a proof, clear and inevitable, this query affords such proof—first, that I have not been guilty of "evident misconstruction" with regard to the passages of St. Cyril; second, that I was justified, on their authority, in making the distinction, as I have done, between "commemoration of patriarchs, &c., that God, through their prayers and intercessions, may receive our supplications," and prayers, &c., for the relief of the dead, "if they be sinners;" thirdly, that all you have attempted by way of argument to disprove this distinction is purely gratuitous, and utterly inconclusive—in fact, no argument at all.

These observations are supported by other arguments of yours, equally incontrovertible. In the reply you afford to the above query, you answer—"There is only one possible account of it; this corrupt practice had grown up of praying for such, and St. Cyril had the weakness to try and defend it," &c. Thus, you admit that St. Cyril inculcates prayers and sacrifices to obtain pardon for the dead, to free them from the punishment of sin; hence the purifying and cleansing of souls after death, and the consequent doctrine of purgatory—virtually, I allow; but the word virtually, in this case, is, I maintain, explained by verily and indeed; and these latter words are not to be taken in the sense in which you use them with respect to the real presence in the Eucharist—that is, to express a real absence; but in reality and in truth, without any doubt. These prayers, &c., you call "a corrupt practice," and that it had "grown up;" but you do not tell us where it had grown up; "and that St. Cyril had the weakness to try and defend it," &c.

Now, as this corrupt practice of prayers and sacrifice for the relief of the dead is admitted by you to have prevailed in the time of St. Cyril—nay, more, that it "had grown up" before his time; for you do not charge St. Cyril with having originated it; and as this practice differs nothing from the doctrine of purgatory taught by the Catholic Church of the present day, and as you say "St. Cyril had the weakness to try and defend it," &c., I think, in justice to the cause of truth, you cannot refuse to afford the most ample and unequivocal proofs of these statements, instead of having them come begging, supported only by a petitio principii, the mere dictum by which you have asserted them. If St. Cyril had, as you assert, to try and defend a corrupt practice in opposition to the teaching of the Church, let us see this corrupt practice traced to its origin. When, and where, and how. I ask you, did it spring up? Who planted it? Who watered it and watched over its progress, until St. Cyril took it under his fostering care and ingrafted it upon his Explanations of the Christian Liturgy? What council, pope, bishop, or priest, if we except Aerius—an apostate priest in the beginning of the fourth century—ever denied the efficacy of prayers, &c., for the relief of the dead? And, as you so confidently assert, that, in the time of St. Cyril, this corrupt practice had neither the sanction of the Church, nor of the Liturgy—and as the different phases of the Church, whether bleeding under the sword of the persecutor, or embroiled by the turbulent and poisoning influence of heretical factions, or spreading far and wide the enlivening rays of the Gospel, are faithfully recorded on the page of history, from that time forward—you cannot fail to inform us, at what subsequent period this corrupt practice became a dogma of Catholic faith; this, surely, is not too much to require from you. You have before you the ecclesiastical records of every age of Christianity, the decrees of councils, the volumes of the Fathers—deduce from any of them, if you can, clear, decisive evidence on the different points I have here enumerated; or, in default of such evidence, all you have stated with respect to St. Cyril must pass for empty sound, mere assertion, a figment worthy of no credit. If, as you say, the Church gave no sanction to these prayers for the dead, how could St. Cyril charge those, who denied their utility, with having contradicted the Church? This disposes of another of your conclusive arguments. Lastly, I require of you to show that the word αμαρτωλοι means hardened sinners only; or, as I understand you, those who die in mortal sin; and that St. Cyril uses it in this sense.

When you satisfy me with information on all these points, I will then show you that the liturgies agree with St. Cyril in the distinction for which I contend. I will show you that in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, Goar's Rituale Græcorum, page 63, is stated a doctrine in substance thus—"By the intercession of the most holy, Immaculate, blessed above all, our glorious Lady, Mother of God, and our Virgin Mary, &c., and of all the saints, may Christ, our true God, have mercy on us." And, again—"We offer thee this rational service, for the sake of the prophets, apostles, martyrs, and particularly the most holy, pure, blessed above all, our glorious Queen and Mother of God, ever Virgin. Perfect us, O God, by the prayers of St. John the Baptist, the saint whose memory we celebrate, and of all the saints." And, in page 78, I will show you a paragraph for the relief of the dead, to this effect—"We entreat thee for the repose and pardon of the soul of thy servant, in a place of rest from which grief and lamentation are far removed." Thus do St. Cyril and the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom afford corroborating evidence; and, on the authority of the former, until you shall prove that he teaches a corrupt practice, I am justified in rendering αναπαυσιν, by repose, relief, rest, from pain, trouble, torment, &c.; and, further, that the whole of your long paragraph No. 5 of reply is utterly inconclusive and nugatory. The substance of that paragraph amounts simply, to this—"Those who have no 'rest' are in hell, and those who have 'not' are in heaven, from the time of their death," and because, these two conditions are, as you have stated; and because, in Apocal. xiv. 11, 13, "there is not one word to prove the pain and torment of purgatory," you would thence reason your readers into the belief that there is no such place as purgatory!! I think, as a lover of truth, I have stated my views of these points honestly and openly, and with the same unbiassed feelings, I shall return again to a consideration of the remainder of your statements. I am, Sir, yours with respect.

EDMOND POWER.

Mullinavat, May 30, 1855.

We are happy to hear from Mr. Power again, after so long a silence.

We shall first notice briefly what is NOT in Mr. Power's letter.

In his last letter (No. for March, 1855), Mr. Power asserted that prayers for the dead may be offered for other purposes besides getting souls out of purgatory. We agreed to this, and we asked Mr. Power if he could produce, out of the ancient liturgies, a single prayer which cannot be for anything else but for getting a soul out of purgatory. Mr. Power says nothing about this. It is clear from his letter that he HAS searched the ancient liturgies, and it is also clear that he has not found in them any prayer for getting a soul out of purgatory. This is an important point to have settled.

Mr. Power affirmed in that letter that there was a distinction in the ancient liturgies—commemoration being made for the saints, and prayers and intercessions for the other dead.

We proved, from the ancient liturgies themselves, that there is no such distinction in them; Mr. Power does not now produce any such distinction in the liturgies (which he has been studying); but he says he was justified by St. Cyril in saying that there is such a distinction in those liturgies. To this we answer that, since there is no such distinction in the liturgies, neither St. Cyril nor any one else can justify Mr. Power in saying that there is.

Mr. Power in that letter quoted two passages from St. Cyril—the first, about "commemoration," the second, about sacrifice for the dead. We said that, in the first, Mr. Power argued on an evident misconstruction. Mr. Power does not attempt to justify his construction of that passage, but he says he did not misconstrue the second passage (which we never charged him with), and that, therefore, we have no right to charge him with misconstruction of St. Cyril. We think there is danger that our readers may get tired of such arguments.

The real point raised in this present letter of Mr. Power is this—he produced a passage from St. Cyril, arguing in favour of prayers for the dead who were "sinners"—αμαρτωλοι. We admit this passage is now in St. Cyril's works. Mr. Power says, that if this passage be "allowed to be the exponent of the doctrine of the Christian Church on this point, the controversy is at an end."

We admit this IF, but we deny the fact, we affirm that this passage is not an exponent or example of the doctrine of the Christian Church, and we prove it thus—In the liturgy of the Church in St. Cyril's time, there was not anything to justify prayers for the dead who were "sinners"—αμαρτωλοι. If there be, Mr. Power would have produced it, but there is not. The liturgies only authorise commemoration for those "who had gone to rest, in hope of the resurrection of eternal life"—not for "sinners"—αμαρτωλοι. Therefore, when St. Cyril argues for praying for the dead who are sinners, αμαρτωλοι, he is only arguing for an opinion of his own, not for the doctrine of the Christian Church.

Mr. Power argues from this passage of St. Cyril as if the production of a single passage from one Father was enough to prove a doctrine or practice to be right. But Mr. Power must know that such an argument may be produced to prove anything, however erroneous. The Fathers were men subject to error like ourselves. Does Mr. Power admit or deny this?

How are we to account for St. Cyril defending a use of the liturgy, which was opposed to the liturgy itself? We can only account for it thus—a practice had probably grown up of praying for "sinners."—αμαρτωλοι—in the public service of the Church, although that service itself did not warrant such a practice. Some justified the practice, others condemned it. If St. Cyril argued in favour of that practice, instead of saying boldly that it was an abuse of the liturgy, he was guilty of a great weakness, unworthy of a Christian bishop.

But Mr. Power calls on us to tell the name of the man who first introduced that abuse, and the precise time when he introduced it, all which we promise to tell Mr. Power, if he will first tell us the name of the man who sowed the tares in the field, and on what night he did it.—See the Parable of the Tares, Matt. xiii. 24-30. When we see the tares, we are sure that somebody sowed them, even though we do not know the name of the man.

Mr. Power also says—"lastly, I require of you to show that the word αμαρτωλοι means hardened sinners only; or, as I understand you, those who die in mortal sin; and that St. Cyril takes it in this sense."

We subjoin a note* of FORTY ONE places in the New Testament in which the word αμαρτωλοι is used for sinners; and in every place, the word seems to us to be intended to express those who are in mortal sin. Will Mr. Power show us in which place it means those who are under venial sin? or can he show us that the word ever was used in that sense?

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR JUNE.

(From the Irish Farmer's Gazette).

TURNIP CULTIVATION should be proceeded with briskly; and, in order to prevent undue evaporation in dry weather, keep the harrow, and rollers going close after the plough. Let the Swedes be got in with as little delay as possible, to be followed by the hybrids, then the Aberdeens, and, last of all, the soft white turnips. The land under the soiling crops of vetches, rye, or rape, should be prepared and sown, as fast as cleared, with suitable varieties of turnips.

Carrots and Parsnips should be singled out to intervals of about 8 to 9 inches, and kept well hoed, and grubbed between, during the summer.

Cabbages.—Continue planting in well-tilled and highly-manured land. Cabbages planted during this month, or early in July, will produce much valuable food for sheep and cattle, during the winter and early spring months.

Beans and Peas should be kept hoed, and the earth slightly ridged up, when cultivated in drills; when sown broadcast, careful hand-weeding can only be resorted to.

Potatoes will require much attention in weeding, and, if in drills, drawing up a little earth to the stems as they advance, taking care not to bury the leaves. Those in beds should have a little fine, fresh earth cast over them from the furrows, just as they are coming to the surface, but before the leaves are developed.

Buckwheat may be sown as soon as all danger of frost is over. It is useful for ploughing in as a green manure, for a soiling crop, or for seed.

Hemp, when sown in rows, should be singled out to 10 or 12 inches apart, as soon as fit, and subsequently kept clean by the hand and horse hoe. If sown broadcast, hoe and single out to 12 inches apart, and keep it clean by the hoe till grown so much as to smother all weeds.

Fallows should be well harrowed during the month, grubbed if required, and ploughed up again.

WITH ADDENDA AND APPENDIX.

BY THE

REV. WILLIAM LE POER TRENCH, D.D.,

Rector of Killereran, Diocese of Tuam, and one of the Honorary Secretaries of the Church Education Society for Ireland.

"The invaluable 'Digest of the Evidence,' by Dr. Trench, has placed the substance of the 'Blue Book' in a clear, comprehensive form before all those who are interested in this great question. It was a work of great labour, of no ordinary patience, and requiring the utmost discrimination. But the result has been eminently successful. The plan of the 'Digest' is admirable; and the subjects so well classified, that immediate reference can be made to the most important evidence on every branch of the inquiry. It is a volume which will never lose its interest, so long as there is a friend of Scriptural Education to be encouraged, and an advocate of a godless expediency to be put to shame."—Christian Examiner.

Important Work on Controversy.

Preparing for publication,

THE "CONTROVERSIAL CORRESPONDENCE," Between R. W. KENNARD, Esq., London, and the Rev. PAUL MACLACHLAN, Roman Catholic Priest, Falkirk.

This correspondence, conducted with great ability on both sides, has, at length, terminated by the withdrawal of the Rev. Mr. Maclachlan from the contest, who has republished the whole of his letters, WITHOUT THOSE OF MR. KENNARD! As such a proceeding is evidently unfair, and might produce evil results, it is intended that the entire correspondence, consisting of about 70 letters, shall be published, so as that the nature of the Controversy may be thoroughly understood by all parties.

Dr. Irving writes—"This is a remarkable publication. Mr. Maclachlan is sufficiently skilled in the Romish arts of controversy; but in logical dexterity, and even in theological learning, the priest is no match for the Protestant layman." Dr. Croly says of Mr. Kennard's letters—"I sincerely admire their learning, reasoning, and spirit of Christianity; and I know of no production fitter to produce a more ample assurance in the mind of any man open to rational conviction." It has also been characterized as the "most important controversy that has taken place since the days of Stillingfleet."

The work will be handsomely printed in one vol., royal 8vo, and will contain about 600 or 700 pp., with a copious Index. Price, to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY, 5s.

THE CATACOMBS AT ROME.

It was about the middle of the sixteenth century that the existence of these extensive excavations, called the catacombs,* became known at Rome. It was then discovered that, underneath the city and the surrounding campagna, there lay a vast extent of subterranean galleries, dug out of the tufa and puzzolana, of which that district consists. The greater number of these galleries had a height from about eight to ten feet, and a width of from four to five, and they often ran in stories two or three deep, communicating with each other by flights of steps. The entrance was generally by an oblique gallery, with steps, which, on reaching a certain depth, took a horizontal direction. Numerous perpendicular shafts had been sunk to these galleries, by which light was admitted. Along them were ranged five, or sometimes six, tiers of graves, some of which are still closed by slabs of terra-cotta cemented to the rock; others are partially opened; and over most of these graves were inscriptions written in various characters and languages. Many of these galleries terminated in oblong and square chambers, which appeared to be merely enlargements of the galleries, and which were generally vaulted above, and were also lined with graves on every side.

It is also worthy of remark, that we have a description of these excavations as they appeared in the fourth century, which corresponds exactly with that above given. Prudentius, who lived in that century, says—"Among the cultivated grounds, not far from the walls, lies a deep cavern, with dark recesses. A descending path, with winding steps, leads through the dim turnings; and the daylight, entering by the mouth of the cavern, somewhat illumines the first part of the way; but the darkness grows deeper as we advance, till we meet with openings cut in the roof of the passages admitting light from above. There have I prayed prostrate, sick with the corruption of soul and body, and each time obtained relief." St. Jerome, also, about the same period, thus describes them—"When I was at Rome, still a youth, and employed in literary pursuits, I was accustomed, in company with others of my own age, and actuated by the same feelings, to visit, on Sundays, the sepulchres of the apostles and martyrs; and often to go down to the crypts dug in the heart of the earth, where the walls on either side are lined with the dead; and so intense is the darkness, that we almost realize the words of the prophet—'They go down alive into Hades;' and here and there a scanty aperture, ill-deserving the name of a window, admits scarcely light enough to mitigate the gloom which reigns below; and, as we advance through the shades, with cautious steps, we are forcibly reminded of the words of Virgil—'Horror on all sides, even the silence terrifies the mind.'"

Such is the description left us of these remarkable excavations, shortly before the time when they became forgotten by the inhabitants of Rome, and such they appeared when, after the lapse of 1,000 years, they were again disclosed to its astonished inhabitants.

The number of graves contained in this vast necropolis is very great, and has been estimated as, at least, amounting to 70,000; and when it was also found that the inscriptions over them were all expressive of Christian faith and Christian hope, the interest attached to them became naturally of a great and exciting character.

The origin of these excavations seems now to be tolerably well agreed upon by antiquarians. It appears that they were, in the first instance, quarries out of which were abstracted the materials for the extensive buildings that adorned the capital of the world, and in the age of Augustus had become so extensive, as to excite alarm. When worked out as quarries, they became the burial-place of those outcasts to whom the pagan custom of cremation was denied. The quarries, however, thus used by the pagans, appear to have been confined to the Esquiline Hill, and the immediate neighbourhood of Rome, and had no other connection with the catacombs than that of a common origin. The way in which the Christians came to be connected with them seems to have been this—The arenarii or sand-diggers were, of course, persons of the lowest grade, and from the nature of their occupation probably formed a distinct class. There is reason to believe that Christianity early spread amongst them, and it would also appear from a number of testimonies, that, during the early persecutions, many of the converts to Christianity were sentenced, as a punishment, to work in the sand-pits; for we find it stated in the "Acts of the Martyrs," that the Emperor Maximian "condemned all the Roman soldiers who were Christians to hard labour, and in various places set them to work, some to dig stones, others sand." He also ordered Ciriacus and Sisinnus to be strictly guarded, condemning them to dig sand, and to carry it on their shoulders. Marius and his companions are also stated to have been sentenced to the same employment; and there is a tradition that the baths of Diocletian were built with materials procured by the Christians. If we admit the truth of these statements; of course nothing would be more natural than that the converts thus employed should not only take refuge in them themselves in times of persecution, but also gradually put the whole Church of Rome in exclusive possession of their retreats, and, for the purpose of increasing their security, extend and enlarge them.

At all events, the fact that the catacombs were, during the first three centuries of the Christian era, employed as a place of refuge from persecution, rests upon evidence that can hardly be doubted. For history informs us, that not only did the Christians take refuge there, but, also, were sometimes overtaken by their pursuers. It appears that Xystus, Bishop of Rome, and Quartus, one of his clergy, suffered martyrdom in them in the time of Cyprian. And Stephen, who was Bishop of Rome, was followed by heathen soldiers to his subterranean chapel, and there beheaded. St. Chrysostom, also, who lived not long after the days of persecution, alludes to the concealment of a noble lady under ground in an indignant remonstrance addressed by him against those who held festivities over the graves of the martyrs. "What connection," he asks, "is there between your feasts and the hardships of a lady, unaccustomed to privation, trembling in a vault, apprehensive of the capture of her maid, upon whom she depends for her daily food." Indeed, so well known to the pagans was this way of escaping their vengeance, that several of the edicts against the Christians made it a capital offence to enter the cemeteries. The rescript of Valerian and Gallienus begins with this prohibition; and, at the close of the persecution, Gallienus gave the Christians a formal license to return to the catacombs. This permission was afterwards repealed by Maximian, on the renewal of the Diocletian persecution.

In addition to the historical evidence thus afforded us of the uses to which the catacombs were applied by the early Christians, there is amongst the inscriptions found in them one strongly corroborative of the same fact; and, as the whole inscription is beautifully expressive of the trials and hopes of the primitive Church, it is given at length—

"In Christ. Alexander is not dead, but lives above the stars, and his body rests in this tomb. He ended his life under the Emperor Antonine, who, foreseeing that great benefit would result from his services, returned evil for good. For, while on his knees, and about to sacrifice to the true God, he was led away to execution. Oh, sad times, in which, among sacred rites and prayers, even in caverns, we are not safe. What can be more wretched than such a life? and what than such a death? when they cannot be buried by their friends. At length they sparkle in heaven. He has scarcely lived, who has lived in Christian times."

Such, in addition to being a place of sepulture, were the uses to which these vast excavations were applied by the early Church. Of course when Christianity ceased to be an object of persecution, and was, in the fourth century, elevated to the throne of the world, the catacombs were no longer required as a place of refuge, and, probably, ceasing at the same time to be a place of burial, quickly passed from the memory of men; and for centuries this most conclusive evidence of the persecutions and trials of the early Church lay buried and unnoticed. When, therefore, at length, they were again opened to the inquiries of scholars and antiquarians, it is, perhaps, now difficult to realize the impression their discovery made on the minds of their explorers. A vast necropolis, rich in the bones of saints and martyrs—a stupendous testimony to the truth of Christian history—a faithful record of the trials of a persecuted Church: such were the objects presented to their view. And, in the first transports of joy, Rome boasted that her cemeteries contained as many trophies as epitaphs—as many martyrs as graves. Then began the removal of the inscriptions to various museums; and as by far the largest number of them were deposited in the Vatican, it is in the galleries of that palace of the popes, and under the guardianship of the chief of the Romish hierarchy, that these records of the early Christian Church are now to be found. Thus the elements of the faith once delivered to the saints are written with an iron pen; thus the customs of the primitive ages, stamped indelibly on the walls of the catacombs, silently rebuke those superstitious practices of which no trace can be found in their simple memorials. If the Church of after ages had looked back to her subterranean home—"to the hole of the pit whence she was digged"—she would there have sought in vain for traces of forced celibacy, the invocation of saints, or the representation of the Deity in painting or sculpture. Could it be that the Church of the catacombs believed in the doctrine of purgatory when we find almost universally in their monumental inscriptions the Christian hope that the deceased now rests in peace; thus we have—"Domitianus, a simple soul, sleeps in peace;" "Irene in peace;" "In Christ died, on the calends of September, Pompeianus the Innocent, who lived six years and nine months—he sleeps in peace." Again we find—"In Christ, Bolosa—may God refresh her;" "Nicoplenus, a sweet soul, in refreshment." Still more expressive are the following:—"Lawrence to his sweetest son, Severus, the well-deserving, borne away by angels on the first day before the Ides of January." Another runs thus—"This grief will always weigh upon me; may it be granted me to behold in sleep your revered countenance. My wife, Albana, always chaste and modest, I grieve over the loss of your society, for our Divine Author gave you to me as a sacred boon. You, well-deserving one, having left your relations, lie in peace—in sleep; you will arise; a temporary rest is granted you. She lived forty-five years, five months, and thirteen days; buried in peace. Placus, her husband, set up this." Again, can we believe that the Church of the catacombs enjoined the celibacy of the clergy, when we find inscriptions in which the wives of bishops, priests, and deacons are commemorated; thus one runs—"My wife, Laurentia, made me this tomb; she was ever suited to my disposition, venerable and faithful. The Bishop Leo survived his eightieth year." Another—"The place of Basil, the presbyter, and his Felicitas. They made it themselves." Another—"Once the happy daughter of the presbyter Gabinus; here lies Susanna joined with her father in peace." Another—"Petronia, a deacon's wife, the type of modesty. In this place I lay my bones. Spare your tears, dear husband and daughters, and believe it is forbidden to weep for one who lives in God. Buried in peace." Again, can we believe that if the early Church encouraged the invocation of saints, or of the Virgin Mary, we should not find some traces of it: in these numerous inscriptions; but not one can be produced indicative of such a practice.

* The word means a cavity under ground, from two Greek words—κατὰ, down, and κύμβος, a hollow.

We notice the above particulars because they are those which, if held by the Church of the catacombs, would most naturally find expression in the epitaphs of the dead; for, of course, it is not to be expected that monumental inscriptions would contain any elaborate discussion of doctrine, or, perhaps, allude in any way to many of the more abstruse mysteries of the Christian religion. The doctrine of transubstantiation, even if held by the primitive Church, would, we admit, hardly find a place amongst these records of the dead. On the other hand, it may be safely asserted that there is not one of those peculiar doctrines or practices which the reformed Churches allege to have been imposed on the Christian world by the usurped authority of the Roman Pontiffs, that finds the slightest support or recognition amongst these records of the early Church. Nor is this all—higher purposes still are served by the examination of these monuments, inasmuch as they express the feelings of the great body of Christians whose leaders alone are known to us in history. The Fathers of the Church live in their voluminous works—the lower orders are only represented by their simple records. And it may, perhaps, be safely asserted that their ancient Church appears in the gallery of the Vatican in a more favourable light than in the writings of those Fathers or historians. It may be that the sepulchral tablet is more congenial to the display of pious feeling than the controversial epistle, or even the much-needed episcopal rebuke. Besides the gentle and amiable character and spirit everywhere breathed, the distinctive character of these remains is essentially Christian. The name of Christ is repeated in an endless number of forms, and the actions of his life are figured with every degree of rudeness of execution. The second person of the Trinity is neither viewed in the light of a temporal Messiah, nor degraded to the estimate of a mere example; but is invested with all the honours of a Redeemer. On this subject there is no reserve, no heathenish suppression of the distinguishing feature of our religion. On stones innumerable appears the Good Shepherd, bearing on his shoulders the recovered sheep, by which many an illiterate believer expressed his sense of personal salvation. One, according to his epitaph, "sleeps in Christ;" another is buried with a prayer that "she may live in the Lord Jesus." One has his sepulchre sealed with the inscription, "Christ is God," happy in not having to learn that truth when his sepulchre shall be rent asunder. But, most of all, the cross, in its simplest form, is employed to testify the faith of the deceased. Indeed we have but to examine these records of the early Roman Church to find out that its past and present can in no way be identified, and that we gain nothing in resemblance to the Church of the catacombs by a movement towards modern Rome. That persecuted Church which in the early ages of Christianity fought and triumphed in the cause of Christ has, in truth, no affinity with that proud and intolerant Church which has deluged with martyr blood every country in Europe, which has cursed our forefathers, and retains in full force against ourselves every anathema she ever pronounced against them.

TRUE AND FALSE MIRACLES.

CARDINAL BELLARMINE, in his enumeration of the "Notes of the True Church," reckons the power of working miracles among the number. "The eleventh mark of the Church," he says, "is the glory of miracles." "This note," he continues, "rests upon two foundations—the one, that miracles are necessary for the confirmation of a new doctrine; the other, that they are efficacious and sufficient. From the first principle we deduce that the true faith cannot be among our adversaries; from the second, that it exists among ourselves."*

It is not our intention to discuss the validity of the two principles here laid down by the learned Cardinal—as, with some limitations, they represent pretty nearly the opinions of most Protestant divines. There is no doubt that both the Jewish and Christian dispensations, at their first promulgation, were accompanied and attested by a series of extraordinary and stupendous miracles; and, upon this point, all fair readers of the Bible, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, are agreed. It is not quite so clear, however, whether miracles alone, and considered merely by themselves, are sufficient to establish the truth of a divine revelation. It appears possible, for anything we know to the contrary, that evil spirits may be permitted by God to perform supernatural prodigies, for the purpose of leading mankind astray. Our Blessed Lord forewarned his disciples that, "in the last days, false prophets shall rise, and shall show signs and wonders, to seduce, if it were possible, even the elect."—Mark xiii. 22. And St. John, in the Revelation, when describing the second beast that was to arise in after times, represents him as "doing great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth in the sight of men, and deceiveth them that dwell in the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do."—Rev. xiii. 13, 14. These passages sufficiently show that miraculous signs, taken by themselves, cannot be regarded as sufficient to establish the truth of a revelation, independently of all consideration of the nature of the doctrines which that revelation contains.

But we hasten to consider the two conclusions which Cardinal Bellarmine deduces from the principles he had laid down. "From the first principle," he says, "we deduce that the true faith cannot be among our adversaries." He means, we suppose, to assert, that no Church can be a true Church which does not possess the power of working miracles; and, therefore, as no Reformed Church claims to possess this power, Protestants cannot be members of the one true Church of Christ.

Now, we beg leave to enter a decided protest against the misapplication which the learned Cardinal here makes of the principle which he himself laid down. "Miracles," he says, "are necessary for the confirmation of a new faith." So far we agree with him. But although miracles may be necessary, when a new religion is for the first time promulgated to the world, this fact by no means proves that they must be always necessary. We are as earnest as Cardinal Bellarmine in upholding the truth of the miracles wrought by our Blessed Lord and his apostles, for confirming the truth of Christianity. But when the Christian Church had been firmly established in the world, we do not see that there was any necessity for a further display of miraculous power. We find it nowhere stated in Scripture that the Christian Church was always to possess within itself the power of working miracles. Protestants now profess to believe the same doctrines which were preached by St. Peter and St. Paul; they hold the "faith which was once delivered to the saints."—Jude 3. If the miracles by which the first preaching of the Gospel was accompanied were true miracles, the evidence which they afforded to the early Christians ought to satisfy us. If we believe the Bible, we must be satisfied of the truth of the miracles then wrought; and, therefore, we must believe the faith which those miracles were intended to confirm. Protestants have added no new doctrine to the Christian faith, as the Church of Rome has lately done. When the Church of England and Ireland thinks fit to promulgate a new dogma, which is not to be found in Scripture, and was not taught by the early Church, and when she requires all her members to assent to it on pain of forfeiting their everlasting salvation, it will be time enough to demand of her to attest her claim by miraculous evidence—but not till then.

We have thought it right to make these few brief remarks on the unfair and illogical application which we conceive Bellarmine to have made of his own fundamental principle. Until he can show that it is essential to a true Church to possess the power of working miracles, he has no right to conclude that those who dissent from the Church of Rome cannot belong to the true Church, because they do not claim to possess this power. Roman Catholic controversialists have sometimes put the question in a taunting way to members of the Protestant communion—"Can you show us any miracles that ever were wrought in testimony of the truth of your religion?" The observations we have already made will, we think, furnish our readers with a satisfactory reply to this question. The religion which we now hold is that same holy Christian religion which was taught by our blessed Saviour and his apostles; and, therefore, all those miracles which they anciently wrought in confirmation of their doctrine do at this day confirm ours also, which, inasmuch as it is the same with theirs, needs no fresh or additional confirmation. When our first Reformers rejected those Romish errors which had overlaid and corrupted the ancient Christian doctrines, as they needed no extraordinary commission for their reformation, no more did they need any miracles to confirm their commission. And when, after removing those abuses which in latter times had crept into the Church, they preached the pure doctrines of that primitive Gospel, which had been abundantly confirmed already by mighty signs and wonders, it is plain that they no more needed any new miracles than if such errors and abuses had never been brought in.

But we must now proceed to consider Cardinal Bellarmine's next assertion—namely, that the existence of miracles within the Church of Rome proves her to be the true Church of Christ. Now, even if, for the sake of argument, we should grant that real, unquestionable miracles were performed within the bosom of the Romish Church, yet a moment's consideration will show that it would by no means follow from thence that the Church of Rome was the only true Church. For example, in the time of the prophet Elijah (1 Kings), who wrought such astonishing miracles—who called down fire from heaven, and raised a man from the dead—we know that the Israelitish Church in Samaria was so fearfully corrupt, that there were but 7,000 persons who had not fallen into gross idolatry. True miracles prove that the individual who performs them acts under divine direction in that particular message which he delivers; but they do not prove that either he, or the body to which he may belong, are, in all respects, infallibly true.

But, then, the important question arises—are the miracles of which the Church of Rome tells us so much, really true, or are they not? If they are, then, doubtless, they demand our serious and reverent attention. However strange or improbable the circumstances connected with any supposed miracle may appear, yet, if we are once satisfied that a miracle has actually taken place, all seeming objections arising from its antecedent improbability are at once silenced.

Now, it is needless for us to undertake to demonstrate in detail the absurdity of many of the miraculous stories to which the Church of Rome has given her sanction, and which she has even introduced into her public services; for this is fully acknowledged by many learned and impartial writers of that communion. Peter, Abbot of Cluny, had the honesty, even so far back as the twelfth century, to complain of these lying legends. "You know," saith he, in an epistle to one of his friends, "how irksome these false hymns in the Church of God must needs be to me."* And a little after, in the same epistle, he adds, that "he had found, at least, four and twenty lies in one hymn of Benedict."† Lindanus, another learned writer, cites a bishop of Lyons, who states, that he had corrected the Antiphonary, "having cut off many things which seemed superfluous, trivial, false, blasphemous, and fantastical;"‡ and then Lindanus adds, in his own person, that if that bishop had lived to see the Missals in his days, "Deum immortalem! quo ea nomine pingeret?" Good God! by what name would he have described them?" We are told also by Melchior Canus, one of the most eminent of the Roman Catholic Canonists, "that he cannot deny but that even their best writers, especially in describing the miracles of the saints, have gathered up scattered rumours, and transferred them to posterity in their writings, herein too much indulging themselves, or the ordinary sort of believers, whom they supposed not only ready to believe, but also vehemently desirous of such miracles."§ When the great majority of people are so prone to credulity, as to be willing to yield implicit credence to scattered reports, and to be vehemently desirous of new miracles, it requires but little experience to predict that they will never want writers willing to gratify their taste for the marvellous and improbable. Whether such legends, however, are to be classed among Cardinal Bellarmine's "Notes of the Church," or among the "lying wonders" which are to characterize the apostasy of the latter days, (2. Thes. ii. 9) we leave all impartial readers to decide.

But let us come down a little nearer to our own times. It may be said that we have no adequate means of knowing the truth or falsehood of the reputed miracles of the dark ages. Be it so. But surely we ought to be able to judge of the truth of such as are said to be performed in the present time. Cardinal Bellarmine, as we have seen, goes the length of asserting, that the true Church must possess the power of working miracles. If so, then Protestants may surely ask, are there any clear, well-attested miracles wrought in the Church of Rome in our own day? If there are, let us be informed of them; if not, what becomes of Cardinal Bellarmine's mark of the true Church?

We fear we may search in vain the history of the modern Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, for even the semblance of a miracle. Whether it be that Irish Romanists have now grown "cold in the faith," and do not deserve to have a miracle performed amongst them—or whether the close proximity of inquisitive Protestants holds out but little chance of establishing a general belief in a miracle upon insufficient grounds—certain it is that few such attempts have been made in our own days, and that Ireland enjoys the unenviable distinction of being almost the only country professing allegiance to the See of Rome, which cannot boast of a modern miracle.‖

When we turn our eyes to France, we do not meet with much greater success. Those of our readers who have read the history of the miracle of La Salette, given in our last number, will there find a most instructive example of the way in which the story of a miracle may be got up. In this case the imposture was so cleverly managed that it deceived the Roman Catholic Bishop of Grenoble, along with a large proportion of the people of his diocese; and we doubt not that there are great numbers of Romanists, not only in France, but even in England, who are still ready to fix their faith upon one of the most audacious acts of fraud and mendacity that ever imposed upon the credulity of an unthinking age.

Spain is the next Roman Catholic country which invites our notice. Here, at least, there are no heretics to infuse doubts into the minds of the faithful and obedient subjects of the Pope, or, if any such do exist, they are compelled, by the strong arm of the law, to keep their doubts to themselves. Accordingly, we find that there is no lack of modern Spanish miracles. We copy from a Dublin paper of the last month* an account of one of the most recent of these "notes of the true Church."

‖ The only modern attempt to get up a miracle in Ireland is, we believe, the case of the Ecstatica of Youghal, in 1843, which may still be in the recollection of some of our readers. We have the published account of it, and may, probably, on some other occasion, record the substance of it for the edification of our readers.

"Within the last few days (May 18) a report was spread in Madrid, that a figure of the Saviour, in the Church of St Francisco the Great, sweated blood and water out of grief for the sale of the church property! Forthwith the people thronged to the place to behold the miracle, and there was much excitement. Some of the faithful and credulous were heard to declare that they had wiped the exudations from the countenance of the graven image, whose eyes and mouth others imagined they saw move. The ferment was such that the authorities were obliged to clear the square in front of the church, and some soldiers removed the figure from its niche, as no workmen could be got to do it. It need hardly be said, that neither the soldiers, nor officers who commanded them, detected any supernatural appearance in the image."

On reading this story we were at once reminded of a similar event which took place in the Cathedral of Christ's Church, Dublin, about the time of the Reformation. As the authenticity of the narrative is unquestionable, and the matter excited considerable interest at the time, we think many of our readers will be glad to have an opportunity of comparing it with the Spanish miracle of our own day.

When Queen Elizabeth succeeded to the throne of England, in November, 1558, one of the first measures adopted by the new government, with reference to the Irish Church, was the restoration of the use of the Church service in English as it had been adopted in the reign of Edward VI. The prospect of a revival of the reformed worship was little pleasing to the more bigoted of the Romish party, who were ready to go any length, or have recourse to any expedient, rather than resign, without a struggle, the use of the Latin Mass. Something must be done, now or never, to keep up the reputation of the old superstition; and a miracle appeared the most suitable expedient.

On Sunday, September 3, 1559, the Lord Lieutenant, (Sir Anthony St. Leger), the Archbishop of Dublin, and the rest of the Privy Council, were assembled in Christ's Church Cathedral, and the Litany was sung in English, as part of the divine service. "There was in that Cathedral" (we copy the words of the historian, Strype)† "an image of Christ in marble, standing with a reed in his hand, and the crown of thorns on his head. And, while service was saying before this great assembly, blood was seen to run through the crevices of the crown of thorns, trickling down the face of the crucifix. The people did not perceive it at first; therefore, some, who were in the fraud, cried out to one another, and bade them see how our Saviour's image sweat blood! Whereat several of the common people fell down with their beads in their hands, and prayed to the image. Vast numbers flocked to the sight, and one present, who, indeed, was the contriver, and formerly belonged to the priory of this cathedral, told the people the cause—namely, 'That he could not choose but sweat blood, while heresy was then come into this church.' The confusion hereupon was so great that the assembly broke up; but the people still fell upon their knees, thumping their breasts.

"But the Archbishop of Dublin, being displeased, caused a form to be brought out of the choir, and bade the sexton of the church to stand thereon, and to scrub and wash the image to see if it would bleed afresh. The man soon perceived the cheat, observing a sponge within the hollow of the image's head. This sponge, one Leigh, sometime a monk of this cathedral, had soaked in a bowl of blood, and, early on Sunday morning, watching his opportunity, placed the said sponge, so swollen and heavy with blood, over the image's head within the crown; and so, by little and little, the blood soaked through upon the face. The sponge was presently brought down, and showed to these worshippers; and some of them arrested Father Leigh, who was soon discovered, and three or four others that had been contrivers with him.

"The Archbishop, the next Sunday, preached in the same church, before the Lord Lieutenant and the council, upon the text (2 Thess. ii. 11)—'God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie;' exposing the cheats, who openly stood there with Father Leigh, upon a table before the pulpit, with their hands and legs tied, and their crime written upon their breasts. This punishment they suffered three Sundays, were imprisoned for some time, and then banished the realm. This converted above one hundred persons present, who swore they would never hear Mass more."

We make no apology for the length of the foregoing interesting and instructive extract; and we are sure that our readers will at once perceive how closely it resembles the recent Spanish miracle of the 18th of last May. In both cases the priests had a direct personal motive for their conduct. In Ireland, they wished to retain the old Latin liturgy; in Spain, they wanted to prevent the sale of the Church lands. In both cases the pretended miracle was precisely the same—namely, the production of the appearance of drops of blood upon the face of an image of our Saviour. In Dublin, the energy and sagacity of Archbishop Curwen at once detected the imposture; and, doubtless, if the present Archbishop of Madrid had been a man of the same stamp, the exposure of the Spanish miracle would have been just as crushing and complete. It is one of the proud boasts of the Church of Rome that she is unchangeable. In one respect we are ready to acknowledge that there is some truth in the assertion—she is unchangeable in the devices she has recourse to, in order to impose upon the credulity of mankind.

We have not space to discuss the notable modern miracle of the winking image of the Virgin at Rimini, or any other of the stories of the same class which abound in every part of Italy. On some future occasion we may return to the subject. Meanwhile, we request our readers seriously to consider how far a Church, professing to be guided by a love of truth and sincerity, can be justified in having recourse to such deliberate fraud and imposture. We have seen that this is no new practice of the Church of Rome. From the twelfth century downwards, honest and impartial writers have complained of the atmosphere of falsehood and deceit which hung, like a thick cloud, over the religious services of the Church of Rome. To this day the Romish divines do not venture to defend the absurd legends of their own Breviary, many of which we have recently exposed at length in former numbers of this journal. Now, what defence can be offered for these lying legends and false miracles? If the rulers of the Church of Rome were really in earnest in their professed love of truth, they could have no difficulty in rooting out of their system all such "refuges of lies." If, according to the laws of our realm, the forgery of the Queen's signature justly subjects the offender to a heavy punishment, what shall we think of the conduct of those persons who take part in, or give countenance to, the perpetration of a false miracle, which is nothing less than a wicked attempt to give to a lie the attestation of the God of Truth? And if, in fine, the gift of miracles claimed by Bellarmine for his Church, is to be estimated by the specimens which we have indifferently selected from France, Spain, and Ireland, we think the learned Cardinal has no reason to pride himself on such notes of the true Church.

THE HISTORY OF THE DOUAY BIBLE.

THE history of the Douay Bible, and the various steps and attempts by which it has been brought to its present state, has lately received an elucidation more full and complete than we had hoped ever to possess.

The Ven. Henry Cotton, Archdeacon of Cashel, has published a work, entitled "RHEMES AND DOUAY—an attempt to show what has been done by Roman Catholics for the Diffusion of the Holy Scriptures in English." Oxford, 1855.

The importance of such a work is very great. The Church of Rome claims to have sole power of giving the true sense of Scripture. She boasts that to her it belongs to judge of translations and supply interpretation. What can be more important than to be able to know how the Church of Rome has fulfilled her duty in this respect?

We have, from time to time, called attention to this subject; but we have felt deeply how much remains to be done before this subject could be fully treated. We felt the necessity of the various and successive editions being collected and arranged before the history of the Douay Bible could be fully known; and we hardly hoped to see so great a task efficiently performed.

The manner in which this task has been performed by Dr. Cotton is deserving of admiration. With vast labour he has collected all the editions, and noted their several peculiarities, both in the text and the notes, and also the "approbations" given to each.

The tone and temper of Dr. Cotton's work is equally deserving of approval. He has, of course, to give quotations in which Roman Catholics and Protestants say very hard things of each other; but all that is written by Dr. Cotton himself is precisely in that temper which we desire to maintain—giving credit where credit is due, and speaking with moderation where censure is required.

We invite the attention of the Roman Catholic priests to Dr. Cotton's work. We trust they will feel their obligation to a Protestant clergyman, who has given them what they must feel was wanting—a history of their own translation of the Bible.

The book is not the less valuable from Dr. Cotton having confined himself to ascertaining facts—"My chief object has been to ascertain facts, to supply correct information, to collect and arrange materials, from which my readers may be enabled to draw their own conclusions, and to pursue the subject, if they choose, to the full extent which its importance may be thought to justify. All which I propose to do here is to exhibit the present state of the Roman Catholic Bible in these countries, and to trace the successive steps and stages by which it has been brought to that condition."

Our readers may remember an article in our number for June, 1853, in which we showed in what a vast number of places the Douay Bibles now in use differ from the Douay Bibles first published, and the importance of many of the alterations. We then stated our inability to give a full history of all these changes. But all this has been cleared up by Dr. Cotton's labours. We cannot, of course, go through his observations on each separate edition, many of which were mere reprints of former editions, but Dr. Cotton gives a classification of the various Roman Catholic translations and editions—viz.:—

I. Those which have been published by authority.

II. Those put forth by individuals.

Among the former he reckons—(1) Rhemish Testament, published in 1582, 1600, 1621, 1633, 1738, 1738, 1789.

(2). Douay Bible (Old Testament), published in 1609-10, and again in 1635, and never since.

(3). Dr. Challoner's revised Old Testament, published in 1750, and often since reprinted.

(4). Dr. Challoner's New Testament; first edition, 1749; second edition, 1750; third edition, 1752. The second of these editions differed from the first in 124 places. The third differed from the first in more than 2,000 places (p. 49).

Dr. Cotton classifies other later editions, which are not without interest, but the above are the most important, because Dr. Challoner's second edition of the Old Testament, and his third edition of the New Testament, are the basis of all the Roman Catholic translations now in circulation, although several of the editions in circulation still differ more or less from each other: but to Dr. Challoner belongs the credit of the greater number of differences between the old and modern Roman Catholic Bibles, which we noticed in our number for June, 1853.

The things which have been most insisted upon by Roman Catholics respecting translations of the Scripture have been—(1) approbation by the authority of the Church; (2) notes directing to the true sense of Scripture. The facts collected by Dr. Cotton are most important in both respects.

Dr. Cotton gives the "approbations" prefixed to each addition, with a table of all the "approbations," in page 172.

From this table it appears that up to the year 1783—that is, until seventy-two years ago—no edition of the Roman Catholic Bible ever had the approbation of a Roman Catholic bishop prefixed to it; up to that time the "approbations" or recommendations were all from Roman Catholic divines, who were NOT bishops.

It further appears that Dr. Challoner's editions of the Old Testament had no "approbation" from either divines or bishops. Dr. Challoner's first edition of the New Testament, published in 1749, had an "approbation" from two divines, but not from any bishop. His second edition had none. His third edition, which differed in 2,000 places from his first, and which is the basis of all the modern editions, had none! The modern Roman Catholic Bibles have, therefore, sprung from the learned labour, the private judgment, of an individual bishop, and though subsequent bishops have given to his translation an "approbation" which the bishops of his own time did not give, yet they also acted on their private judgment; there is no English translation of the Scripture authorized by the Church of Rome; the approbation of Roman Catholic bishops is a late invention, only seventy years old, and does not give the authority of the Church of Rome to the translations so approved; for if there were an "authorized translation" of the Church of Rome, how could Bishop Kenrick have made a new one in 1849?

There is much more in Dr. Cotton's book, which shows of how little value or weight these "approbations" are; but we must be content for the present with the foregoing, which is quite enough to prove that there is no English translation of the Bible authorized by the Church of Rome, and that the Douay translation, as it now stands, is the fruit of "private judgment."

The same conclusion is true of the NOTES in the Douay Bible. Nearly all the original notes have been rejected. The present notes in the Douay Bible have nothing to rest on, but the private judgment of persons whose names even we often do not know. We quote from Dr. Cotton's book, p. 167, the evidence given by Dr. Doyle before a committee of the House of Lords, A.D. 1825—"The notes carry, in our editions of the Bible, no WEIGHT, for we do not know the writers of many of them. If we find them clear enough in explanation of doctrine, we leave them there; but whenever we find anything exceptionable, we put it out" (Report, &c). Dr. Cotton's brief comment upon this appears to us to be very forcible—"It is difficult to prevent the question from continually recurring to one's mind—that if notes are of no authority and no weight, what is the paramount necessity (as alleged) for their being always appended to the text?"

We shall often have to recur to Dr. Cotton's valuable labours, and we recommend his book to all who are desirous of knowing the history and authority of the Douay Bible, with a strong conviction that the perusal of it will tend to lead intelligent Roman Catholics to a more fearless and diligent study of Holy Scripture.

LA SALETTE.

On the evening of the 19th September the two shepherds described the apparition of the beautiful lady to their respective masters, who treated it very lightly, Melanie declaring that he attached no faith to the recital (Verite, p. 46), and Maximin's master not even taking the trouble to accompany the two children to the cure's house, when they went there the next day, Sunday, the 20th, before Mass, to tell the whole to the cure. So little did he mind what he stated, that he took Maximin to Corps, without allowing him time to hear Mass, at which neither one or other were present, and the young shepherd did not return to La Salette (Verite, p. 48).

M. Perrin, Curé of La Salette, however, though scarcely informed by the children of the event of the day before, made it the subject of his sermon; his intentions were very good without doubt, but he stammered in such a way that no one knew what he wanted to say. At this point, the members of the municipal council, when they met together after Mass, and were interrogated by the Mayor, M. Peytard, "if there were any of them who could make out what Monsieur the Curé had wished to say in his sermon," all answered, "no" (Nouveau Récit de l'Apparition, par Mgr. Villecourt, p. 198).

The earnestness of M. the Curé Perrin had been without result at La Salette. The good old man in the earnestness of his zeal, however, departed that very evening for Grenoble, and, having completed in the one night a journey of forty miles, which separates his parish from that city, he recounted this great event to his bishop.

Doubtless the good Curé was able to make himself better understood than he had done the day before to his parishioners; for on the very day after—viz., the 22nd September —Mgr. de Bruillard, the Bishop of Grenoble (then an old man of eighty-one),* having gone to Corene for the closing of the annual retreat of the governesses nuns, then collected together in the convent there to the number of 400, himself announced to them the great news, and those 400 sisters, who separated that very day to return to their respective schools, spread over the whole extent of a diocese of 600,000 souls, proceeded in their turn to announce it to the respective scholars under their care; more than 20,000 children who frequented these schools repeated what they had heard to their respective families, and thus, in less than five or six days, the apparition of the Holy Virgin on the mountain of La Salette was known through the whole diocese, and the parishes which adjoin it. No inhabitant of the country dreamed of calling it into doubt; how could they, when it was on the credit of their bishop that it had been announced to them?

The Curé Perrin is a man of simple manners and language (Verité, p. 83). He was seventy years of age, and had exercised his ministry for forty years at La Salette and other parishes of the Canton de Corps; the event which he had heralded had earned for him the right of ending his days at La Salette, but his simplicity might have been compromising, after the official announcement of the fact by Mgr. de Bruillard, and he was carried off from his parish and banished to St. Sixte, a little hamlet of the Canton of St. Geoire, more than sixty miles from La Salette. This change was effected ten days only after the 19th September, and operated to the profit of another Perrin (Verité, p. 83).

As for the shepherd Maximin, a liar by nature, and without education or discipline (Verité, p. 39, &c.), such a witness remaining on the spot might also become indiscreet. He returns, therefore, to Corps, not to his family, but in the character of a boarder in the house of the nuns, who were the teachers of the parish (Verité, p. 42). Under this continued surveillance his levity would no longer be attended with any danger.

As for Melanie, she alone remained at La Salette; she was fourteen years of age, but "she was careless, lazy, and pouting to that extent that she was unwilling even to answer those who interrogated her (Verité, pp. 44-45). With such a character, Melanie was not likely to be compromising.

While all these things were taking place apart from Mdlle. Lamerliere, the Lady of La Salette took the road to Notre Dame du Laus (Diocese of Gap), and arrived there on the 25th September. She was welcomed by the nuns who manage the establishment appropriated to pilgrims, and was lodged in a chamber on the ground floor. She did not wish to have anything to do with the persons whose piety had attracted them to Laus; her dignity would not permit it! This language astonished the good and humble nuns, and they manifested their surprise. "I am here," said the stranger, "to pursue the mission which I commenced at La Salette; Mother of God, I come to bring you news of heaven!" More and more surprised, the nuns went to impart to their superior the language which had struck them so much, and, when they returned together, they found the stranger clad in an emblematical robe, with cross, pincers, and hammer, nothing wanting; they heard her repeating the same language, and the moment they set about making some observations on her, the Lady of La Salette made her escape from them through the window, and took a rapid flight over the side of the mountain, with her aerial costume.

They hastened to give information on the subject to the Bishop of Gap; but while he sends to Laus to obtain such exact information as would enable him to act, they came to tell him, that a strange lady, clothed in a white costume, with flowers and emblems of the passion of our Lord, had presented herself as the Mother of God in a hotel at Gap. Mgr. Deperry at once took on himself the duty of putting a stop to these pious freaks; the lady, however, by departing precipitately, relieved him of this trouble.

The shepherds of La Salette are, therefore, no longer the sole heralds of the event of the 19th Sept. (page 72); the nuns of Laus, and mine hosts of the hostelry of Gap, are henceforth called on to share in this task. The apparition cannot fail to make noise enough.

All had been effected for the Alps, something already done for the department l'Isere; it was in l'Isere that the self-esteem of Mdlle. Lamerliere had been wounded by the legal decision which placed her under tutelage; it is there, therefore, that it behoved her to make the event resound, which was to compensate for all her mortification. She arrives at Tullins, a town between St. Marcellin and Grenoble, in the end of September; there she finds an asylum at the house of a schoolmistress, who soon became her faithful companion. Her feet were bruised by the fatigue of her journey, and the course she had taken over the rocks of the Alps. She received, for some days, the attentions of her hostess, and those of a young governess, Mdlle. F——, and they bathed her feet with spiced wine, and bound them up with soothing bandages. Touched with these marks of affectionate kindness, Mdlle. Lamerliere soon yielded them her full confidence. "It was in fulfilling her mission at La Salette that she was reduced to this state, but God had rewarded her zeal, and willed that her supernatural character should be recognised by all, even by the animals who climbed the holy mountain; for that, in descending from La Salette, an ass had bent his knees before her, in a part of the road where no accident was possible." The young F—— and her companion listened and sighed and redoubled their care for their incurable patient. The 1st October arrived. At Parmenie, a hill which overlooks Tullins, there is an oratory, long served by a priest, who was attached to the petite eglise, and, since his death, was a place of pilgrimage, confided to the care of the Capuchin fathers, and afterwards to the friars of Marie. The 4th October was the Sunday of the Rosary; the pilgrimage had drawn there a number of the inhabitants of the neighbouring country. Mdlle. Lamerliere learned this, and, notwithstanding the pain which the ascent of the Parmenie caused her, she mounts to the chapel, clothed in the costume of La Salette, and proceeds there again to announce herself as the Mother of God, as deputed by her Son to visit mankind with intentions of mercy and pardon.

While Mdlle. Lamerliere was performing these various evolutions, the apparition of the Holy Virgin, at La Salette, had begun to be spread abroad by the sisters of La Providence, to whom the Bishop of Grenoble had announced it, on the 22nd September. The conducteur Fortin heard it spoken of, and immediately thought of Mdlle. Lamerliere and her conversation with him, on their journey; he had no doubt that it was her doing, and that the shepherds were the dupes of their own simplicity. The eccentricities of Mdlle. Lamerliere were well known at Tullins; but when Fortin shrugged his shoulders at some medals which were shown him struck off in honour of our Lady of La Salette, exclaiming "La Salette! it is all a trick of Mdlle. Lamerliere," his language was considered improbable and absurd. He explained, however, his reasons for this opinion, and, while actually discussing them, providence permitted that Mdlle. Lamerliere should, at that very moment, come in to visit the family M——. Far from being disconcerted at the sight of her, Fortin laughed, and commenced the history of their journey together. Madame M—— relieved him from proceeding, and, taking on herself the conversation, repeated to Mdlle. Lamerliere all that Fortin had just said. "You ought not to believe the conducteur," she contented herself with answering coldly; "that would do injury to religion." Fortin laughed again; he was obliged at the time to rejoin his Diligence; but, some days after, in passing through Tullins, he espied Mdlle. Lamerliere, and accosted her, saying—"We are here alone to-day, all disguise would be useless, tell me what whim induced you to go to La Salette to play the Holy Virgin?" In vain Mdlle. Lamerliere seeks to escape from her questioner, he had her in his grasp, and recalled to her mind all the confidential disclosures of the carriage. She was overcome and reduced to say to him, "Well! be it so, you are at liberty yourself to disbelieve; but, at least, allow others to believe; that will be for the good of religion!"

Since this definite reply, Mdlle. Lamerliere has met Fortin many times, but has always refused to speak to him; she pretends even never to have known him.

In the course of the month of November, 1846, one of the persons who played the most active part in the affairs of La Salette came from the Canton of Corps to Grenoble, to superintend a legal affair with his attorney, M. Z——. When interrogated by M. Z——, in the presence of his chief clerk, upon the great event of La Salette, he at first contented himself with smiling, and making no answer; but when, pressed again and again, he was reduced to the necessity of speaking, it was only to make this decisive revelation—"We all know in the locality that the apparition was the act of Madame X—— and of Mademoiselle Lamerliere!"

Such an unequivocal admission, made within two months after the 19th September, at a period, too, when no one was thinking of Mademoiselle Lamerliere, would, in itself, be sufficient to remove all doubt, even if any remained after the details already given."

Thus far we have followed the Abbé Deleon in detail, translating his narrative of the events with a verbatim exactness, which may not be quite agreeable to our more cultivated readers. Our limited space, however, warns us that we must abridge what remains within a narrower compass than it occupies in the elaborate and painfully-interesting volume, in which the writer has exposed, in so masterly a manner, every stage of the proceedings, by which this gross imposture has been given currency to among a certain party in France.

Dr. Ullathorne, in page 38 of his pamphlet in advocacy of the truth of the apparition, entitled "The Holy Mountain of La Salette," makes the following statement:—

"Miracles, through the instrumentality of the water of the fountain, began to be reported at a very early period, and, as the cases increased in numbers, they began also to be inquired into.

"On the first anniversary of the apparition, a most extraordinary and unlooked-for spectacle took place on the mountain. The anniversary occurred on a Sunday. It was anticipated that far greater than the usual number of pilgrims would come, and in order that the obligations of the Sunday might be satisfied, the bishop allowed Mass to be said for the pilgrims. But, to the astonishment of every one, for no measure had been taken, either to invite or draw persons together, and the clergy of the diocese were yet under the injunction of silence, from fifty to sixty thousand persons, of all classes, came together on the mountain. They arrived from all parts of France, and even from other countries. Amongst them were two hundred and fifty clergymen. Though as yet there was neither habitation nor place of shelter, and the rain fell heavily from eight the night before until ten next morning, fifteen hundred persons passed the night on the mountain. And by one in the morning, illuminating the darkness with torch-light, the head of a procession began to ascend the mountain, whilst its farther extremities extended some twelve or fifteen miles along the various roads in the directions of Gap and Grenoble, besides crowding the different paths of the mountain; and every hour of the morning poured some thousands of persons upon the scene of the apparition. Two altars were erected, and covered over with sheds, and on these the holy sacrifice was offered, some thirty or forty times. Pressed together as this vast multitude was, yet by all accounts there was no disorder. Only four gensdarmes were on the spot, and their sole occupation was to open the passage to the altars for the communicants, or to the fountain, for those who came to drink of its waters. A thick cloud covered the mountain, and filled the valleys beneath, so that for a considerable time the pilgrims could only see the masses of human heads buried in the fog at a hundred paces from where they severally stood, though the whole breadth of the mountain resounded with pious canticles. At last the sun raised the cloud from the top of the mountain, and revealed the entire scene, whilst the stream of fresh arrivals were emerging out of the mists that still lay below. The Magnificat was chaunted in two choirs by some thirty thousand voices. And then, an ecclesiastic, tall of stature, and with stentorian voice, rose up above the multitude, and cried out over the vast assembly—"My brethren, let us pray for France." Then one common emotion united the hearts of all in one, and their prayers for their country were offered up with many tears. Mary had indeed called her people together through the voice of her young apostles. They were there, those two simple children, almost forgotten in the multitude. And it was only a year since they had been there alone, with Mary in their company. There has never been such an assemblage, though the anniversary has not once passed without calling together many thousands."

M. L'Abbé Deleon, in page 78, gives us a somewhat more credible account of the scene—

"The anniversary day approached; they took care to spread a report through the country that the Holy Virgin would appear a second time on the 19th September, 1847. From all sides were seen pilgrims, drawn there by curiosity. In arriving at the mountain, on the day indicated, they all pressed about the chapel, they pray, they wait, they invoke the realization of the promise which had been made to them. It was needful to satisfy their pious credulity, to fortify their faith in La Salette. M. Gerin, curate of the Cathedral of Grenoble, undertakes this charge, and, in a mystical address, utters these words—'If the Holy Virgin has not appeared on this mountain, she is under obligation to show herself to-day; if she does not show herself there, it is because she has already appeared' (Verité, par MM. Orcel et Rousselot, page 99). And as all the auditors, with their eyes raised to the sky, waited with a holy awe, hoping still for a new apparition, M. Gerin has recourse to a pious stratagem—describes the splendour of the apparition of 1846, and speaks 'of angels placed at the windows of heaven to contemplate the Holy Virgin in the for ever happy moment when she was descending the preceding year upon the holy mountain.' He then announced that the holy mysteries would be celebrated at La Salette by a special authority from the bishop, without interruption, to the 3rd October, and that thus, for fifteen days, hymns in honour of Mary would resound upon the holy mountain."

Dr. Ullathorne, the pilgrim from Birmingham, and the Abbé Deleon, of Grenoble, differ as widely upon other matters of fact; as to which, we think it much more likely that a French priest, resident on the spot, should be accurately informed than an English pilgrim, even though he may be a bishop.

Dr. Ullathorne asserts, page 56, that "a vast conversion has taken place. Swearing has ceased amongst the mountaineers, and the Sunday is observed to a very great extent. There is a great religious change in all the south of France, and the pilgrimage to La Salette has been a main instrument of this conversion."

MM. Rousselot and Orcel, in pp. 94 and 208 of their report, also assert that "though the population of the Canton of Corps amounts to between five and six thousand souls, there are not a hundred who are not converted!"

"But," says M. Deleon, p. 105, "the pilgrim strangers who traverse the country on every side to reach La Salette see the inhabitants working on Sundays just as they did before; see them eat meat on prohibited days, as they did before; and hear them blaspheming the name of God, as they did before; though these three grave faults are precisely those of which the lady had complained upon the mountain, and which had provoked her menaces.

"The establishment of these facts by all the pilgrims rendered it needful for M. Rousselot to change his ground, and in another work of his, published 3 years afterwards, in 1850 ("Nouveaux Documents sur L'Evènement de La Salette," page 26), he pleads the contrary cause. In speaking of the revolution of 1848, in which he finds the accomplishment of the first prophetic words of the Lady, and the secret of the two shepherds, he adds, 'who knows if the other parts of the prophecy may not also have their terrible accomplishment, if the people are not converted.'"

Which of these two statements is most to be relied on? If the former, MM. Rousselot and Orcel, through inadvertence, no doubt, have forgotten to tell us why "the rocks were not changed into corn, and the potatoes self-sown on the lands" according to the formal promise of the prophecy!—See last No. of CATHOLIC LAYMAN, p. 66.

Dr. Ullathorne, p. 96, proceeds thus—

"I will now select a few examples of these miracles, and will give a brief account of them. Those who wish to read the attestations may refer to them, as they are recorded in the works I have so often quoted.

"Sister St. Charles Pierron, of the Hospitalières of St. Joseph of Avignon, was reduced to the last stage of decline; for eight years she had been compelled to lie in bed, and besides the severe affection in her lungs, had violent pains of stomach, frequent spittings of blood, dysentery, and a continuous slow fever. In December, 1846, her sufferings became much aggravated, her throat, tongue, and palate grew ulcerated, and emitted a fetid odour; she had great difficulty in swallowing, as well as in speaking so as to make herself understood; and from that time until the 16th of April, 1847, the day of her cure, she took no solid food, and only a small quantity of fluid daily. In the month of February, her two physicians, to quote the attestation of one of them, 'gave her up to her sad destiny.' The superioress of the community had a great desire to obtain a confirmation of the evidence of the two children of La Salette; and as the maladies of Sister St. Charles had been long and publicly known, she selected her case in preference to that of any other of the sick of her community. But when it was proposed to Sister St. Charles, that her cure should be sought through our Lady of La Salette, this good religious declared that she had no desire to recover her health, as it would keep her from eternity. The superioress urged the proposal upon her repeatedly; but as the sister continued reluctant, the superioress used her authority, and told her that she had no right to consider herself, but only the glory of God and the augmentation of the honour of the Blessed Virgin. Sister St. Charles then consented, and expressed a conviction that she should be healed, and a small quantity of the water of La Salette was provided for her to drink. She was requested to point out herself the exercises to be followed during the novena. Each day of that novena, a sister of the community went to holy communion in reparation for the sins of blasphemy and the profanation of the Sunday, which the Blessed Virgin had pointed out. There were three fasts for the same intention, and each day the community recited the Salva Regina, three Aves with the invocation, O Mary conceived without sin, &c., and the Mater Admirabilis.

"On the seventh day of the novena, Sister St. Charles was not only worse, but swooned and cast up a great quantity of blood. Seeing her condition, the superioress said to her—'I think the Blessed Virgin is going to cure you by sending you to heaven." Whereupon the sister replied—'All my maladies do not weaken my confidence; as I have only three days more to suffer, I pray our good Mother not to spare me.' In fact, she would have everything made ready, and begged that her habit and veil, which had not been used for a long time, might be put by her bedside. On the Friday morning, the day before the conclusion of the novena, after a very bad night, she spat blood as usual. The community on that morning anticipated their general communion for her, as the Bishop of Chalon said the Mass in their chapel. This was a trial to Sister St. Charles, as she had hoped the following day to make her communion with them. She was planning in her mind to ask for a general communion again for the following morning, in which she hoped to be able to join, and was full of this thought, when she suddenly felt a great revolution in her frame, her maladies ceased at once, and she felt, to use her own expression, as if a invisible hand had raised her up. She cried out, 'I am healed.' Sister St. Joseph, who was in bed in the same room, did not understand what she said, and thought, on the contrary, that she was becoming worse; she was the more alarmed, as she was alone at this moment, and too ill herself to go and help her. Sister St. Charles hearing her weep, quitted her own bed and went herself to console her. She did the same to the portress, who looked after the convent during Mass, and was terribly frightened at hearing some one running about the room in which she had only left sick people in bed. She came rushing in quite out of breath and feeling quite ill. Sister St. Charles calmed her, gave her something to drink, as well as to the Sister St. Joseph, and assured them that she was cured. She then went down to the chapel, and heard the remainder of the Mass, kneeling without any support. Her two physicians were astounded when they saw her, and declare in their testifications that they could not believe their own eyes. She joined the labours of the community, was as active as any other sister, could carry heavy loads, and remained in perfect health.

"This cure is declared by the physician-in-chief of the hospital of Avignon, to have taken place in a manner beyond the intervention of art, and to partake of the nature of a prodigy. It is certified in similar terms by two other medical men, also by the three Capitular vicars general, by one of the first barristers of Avignon, and by the superioress and officials of the community."

The Abbé Deleon in treating of this alleged miracle, p. 147, proceeds as follows:—

"On the 5th Sept. Mgr. de Bruillard writes to his colleague of Rochelle—'I have ascertained the certainty of the miracle wrought in favour of the nun of St. Joseph, Sister St. Charles, of Avignon. His Grace the Archbishop is preparing a mandement as to this fact.'

"This double assertion has nothing equivocal, it was repeated at the conferences at the bishop's house; the majority of the commissioners accepted it without examination; but it was from Avignon that the light ought to come; for in the terms of the decree of the Council of Trent, no miracle ought to be proclaimed without the approbation of the bishop of the place. Avignon, however, preserves silence; a year elapses and the announced mandement does not appear; the archbishop dies; he has a successor, a prelate who would not allow himself to be taken in by the artifices of Rose Tamisier; that prelate speaks, but it is only to declare positively that the miracle did not exist! He declared this to his colleague and friend, the Bishop of Gap, and on the 23rd June, 1850, the Bishop of Gap, in the presence of a dozen priests, collected at the rectory of Vizille, communicated this canonical sentence to M. Chambon, vicar-general, and to M. Bonvier, the Dean of the Chapter, and afterwards honorary vicar-general of Grenoble. M. Rousselot learned this sentence of the Archbishop of Avignon from his two colleagues; and how did he reply to it? One way alone was open to a Catholic priest—to obtain a revision of the sentence of the archbishop of the place, or to maintain a respectful silence. Neither one course or the other was resorted to in regard to this pretended cure of the Sister St. Charles. The miracle of this cure does not exist; priests, the faithful, the Catholic world, have been all deceived, first by rashness, and afterwards by design."

We must here pause, not to weary our readers, who, probably, have read enough to satisfy their minds as to the true character of the whole matter. There is much, however, remaining to be told as to the means used to give currency to the affair, which we may hereafter recur to, if our space should permit.

ROMAN CATHOLIC MORAL THEOLOGY.—No. III.

In the articles on this subject, inserted in our last two numbers, we complained that while the Church of Rome boasts of her readiness to pronounce a decision on disputed matters of faith, nothing is more difficult than to obtain an authorized exponent of her system of morality. In default of any more authoritative guide we selected, as the representative of her moral teaching, one of her last canonised saints, St. Liguori; and we answered the objections which have been made against our taking such works as his as fair specimens of the morality taught in the Church of Rome. Having thus disposed of preliminaries, we come to the questions what are the actual contents of St. Liguori's work, and whether his moral teaching reaches a high standard or not.

In selecting his doctrine of equivocation and mental reservation to begin with, we are guided principally by the consideration, that it is one for which materials are the most abundant, and in which the theory of Liguori has been recently adopted, defended, and put in practice by high authorities in the Church of Rome. A couple of years ago Dr. Murray, of Maynooth, who, as a controversialist, possesses more courage than discretion, and who seems to have a particular fancy for knocking his head against stone walls, selected this topic of equivocation and mental reservation for the subject of one of his theological essays, and did all that an ingenious man could to make a plausible defence for the Jesuit doctrine. The controversy was renewed in a very able article in the Christian Remembrancer, January, 1854 (Liguori's "Theory of Truthfulness"),* to which we shall be much indebted, and in which a complete account was given of all that part of Liguori's work which treats of the subject now under discussion. This article received two replies—one in the Rambler for April, 1854, founded on Dr. Murray's essay, and reproducing all his arguments; the other in the Dublin Review, January, 1855, so dull and heavy that we consider we have given great proof of self-devotion to the cause of enlightening our readers, by reading it conscientiously through, and enabling ourselves to give a summary of its principal contents. With all these materials, then, we think it will be easy to find what is now the received doctrine in the Church of Rome on the subject of equivocation and mental reservation; and what is the best defence that can be made for it. We may add, as another reason for selecting this subject, that it is one the application of which very frequently occurs in practice. Numbers of people, who are under comparatively little temptation to murder, or theft, or adultery, will often be tempted to offend with their tongues; many of our readers will, therefore, feel a practical interest in knowing what is recommended as right, or condemned as wrong, by persons who are considered by thousands of Christians as approved moral guides.

Nothing can, at first sight, be more promising than the doctrine of Alphonsus on the subject of lying. "A lie," says he, "is always a sin, even though it be told in joke, or to benefit our neighbour; even though by a lie a man could save his life, it would not be lawful to tell it."† So, likewise, Theophilus Raynaud—"So foully venomous is a lie, that even though honour, life, or the salvation of the world, were at stake, and could be saved by ever so slight a lie, which would bring injury to none, yet ought that little lie to be rejected, and the world's destruction rather permitted." We seem to hear the voice of one bred up in the very strictest school of morals; and men of the world will be tempted to take fright, and receive no counsel from so impracticable a theologian. But let them not be startled so easily. We shall find, as we study the Jesuit moral theology, that its general method is to lay down a rule, strict enough to satisfy the demands of the strictest of theorists, and then to eat out the heart of the rule with exceptions, numerous enough to permit of the laxest of practice. And so all parties are satisfied; for the pious are gratified by the conformity of the rule to Gospel morality; while all who do not want to sin for the mere pleasure of sinning will find that means will be found to enable them to gratify all their wishes, without ever encountering this rule, which looks so formidable. For instance, what could seem more inconvenient to a man who desired to deceive his neighbour than this rigorous condemnation of "ever so small a lie," even were one's "own life, or the salvation of the whole world at stake." But it will be seen that though we may not deceive our neighbour we may lawfully take steps to let him deceive himself. And what a hardened sinner must that be who would prefer to accomplish his object by a sinful lie, when he could, with a good conscience, attain the same end by an innocent equivocation. But we had better begin at the beginning, and give St. Liguori's explanation what equivocation is.

"Equivocation may be in three ways—1. When a word has a double sense, as the Latin word 'volo' means either to wish or to fly. 2. When a sentence has two meanings—for example, This book is Peter's, may mean either that Peter is the owner of the book, or the author of it. 3. When words have two senses, one more common than the other; or one literal, the other metaphorical. . . . . Thus, if a man is asked about something which it is expedient to conceal, he may answer, I say no—that is to say, I pronounce the word 'no.' Cardenas doubts about this; but, saving his better counsel, he seems to do so without reason, since the phrase I say really has two meanings; it means to pronounce a word, or to assert; and here we use it in the former sense, pronounce."

"These things being laid down, it is certain and admitted by all the doctors, that, for a good reason, it is lawful to use equivocation in any of the ways we have explained, and to confirm it by an oath. And the reason is, that we then do not deceive our neighbour, but allow him to deceive himself; and, on the other hand, we are not bound to speak according to the understanding of others, if there be a good reason. And any honest end, in order to preserve things good for the spirit, or useful to the body, would be a good reason."

We do not intend, in this article, to enter into the discussion whether Liguori's morality is good or not; we only want to learn what his doctrines are, and we have it here stated distinctly enough, that for a good reason we may use equivocation, and confirm it by an oath; and that the preservation of any temporal or spiritual advantage is to be considered as a good reason. To illustrate, by example, the three kinds of equivocation just described—Suppose that we are asked whether we have seen a woman, and that we wish to conceal the fact that we have seen her, we must, on no account, answer "No;" for this would be a lie, and it is not permitted us to deceive our neighbour, even if the salvation of the whole world were at stake; but we may let him deceive himself in any of the three following ways:—1, We may answer, I saw her not—meaning "I saw the knot in which she tied up her hair;" or else meaning "I am not cutting her with a saw;" and if the hearer is so careless as to suppose us to mean that we did not see her, he is only deceiving himself, and we are not responsible. 2, We may answer, "I saw persons who were in search of her, but did not see herself;" we mean that the persons who were in search of her did not see her; and if the hearer supposes us to mean that we did not see her, his own carelessness and not we are to blame. 3, Or, lastly, we may answer, "I say, no;" and as it is literally true that we do say the word no, of course there is no danger of our being guilty of a lie in the matter.

It may happen, however, that, at the moment we are asked a question, equivocal words may not be in readiness; in that case we must have recourse to MENTAL RESERVATION. It will be convenient, for reasons which will presently appear, before giving St. Liguori's opinion as to the lawfulness of mental reservation, to commence by giving the explanation of this method, which we find in Pascal.—Provincial Letters, let. ix.

"Do you know what is to be done when no equivocal words can be got?"

"No, father."

"I thought as much," said the Jesuit, "for this is new; it is the doctrine of mental reservation. Sanchez gives it in the same place. 'We may swear,' says he, 'that we have not done a thing (although, in reality, we have done it), if we understand in our minds that we did not do it on such a particular day, or before we were born, or if we supply some other such circumstance without making it known in the least by the words we employ.' This is very convenient on many occasions, and is quite innocent if necessary or conducive to our health, honour, or advantage."

"What, father, is not that a lie, and a perjury, too?"

"No," replied the Jesuit; "Sanchez proves it at the same place, and so does our father Filiutius, because he says, 'it is the intention which regulates the quality of the action.' But he gives another surer way of avoiding falsehood; it is after having said aloud, 'I swear that I have not done it,' add, in a whisper, 'to-day;' or after having said 'I swear,' aloud, then add in a whisper, 'that I say,' and go on aloud, 'that I have not done it.' This, you perceive, is speaking the truth."*

"I confess it," said I, "but I fear it is speaking the truth in a whisper and a falsehood aloud; and, besides, I should be afraid that many people would not have presence of mind to make use of these methods."

"Our fathers," replied he, "have taught in the same place, for the benefit of those who are not expert in the use of these reservations, that, in order to avoid lying, it is sufficient to say simply that they have not done what they have done, provided they have, in general, the intention of giving to their language the sense which an able man would give it."

The quotation we have given is taken from the celebrated work in which, as many of our readers are aware, Pascal, himself a devout Roman Catholic, unsparingly exposed the relaxed morality which was then taught with approbation by the Jesuit divines. The Jesuits attempted to reply, but with a total want of success. And though they obtained in Louis XIV. of France a powerful protector, yet, within a score of years, they found themselves in the disagreeable position of being disowned by the Pope. Innocent XI., who has been even called a Jansenist Pope, condemned (on March 2, 1679) 64 propositions, including several of the most remarkable of those tenets of the Jesuit casuists which were held up to scorn by Pascal. On this subject of equivocation he condemns the three following propositions:—

26. "If any one, either alone or in the presence of others—either in answer to questions, or of his own accord—either for amusement or for any other reason—swears that he has not done what he really has done, understanding in his own mind something else which he did not do, or another way from that in which it was done, or any other added circumstance which is true—he, in fact, tells no lie and is not perjured."

27. "There is a good reason for using these equivocations as often as it is necessary or useful for the protection of his person, honour, or property, so that the concealment of the truth is then counted expedient and desirable."

28. "Whoever has been promoted to a public office by means of a recommendation, or by bribery, may take the oath required by the king's mandate, with mental restriction, without respecting the intention with which it is exacted, because he is not bound to confess a hidden crime."

These three propositions, then, being among those condemned by Pope Innocent XI., Rome has spoken, and surely all controversy ought to be at an end. It must be disagreeable for members of the Jesuit body, no doubt, to condemn, as contrary to sound morality, teaching published under the sanction of the society; but when the infallible judge has pronounced his decree, surely no alternative is left them. Can any means be devised at once to save the credit of the Jesuit society and to preserve the reverence due to the infallibility of the Pope? To effect this miracle a word of power is appealed to, DISTINGUENDUM EST. To quote from the Christian Remembrancer—"Given the problem, how to retain a certain practice, and at the same time to pay outward respect to a Papal decree forbidding it, the method to be adopted is the following:—Take the thing condemned, and divide it into two species, distinguished from each other by a distinction without a difference; assume that the Papal condemnation applies to one of these species, but not to the other; range everything which you wish to do under the uncondemned head; whatever you have no temptation towards, under the other; the result will be the conclusion desired. Thus the Pope condemned mental restriction; immediately mental restriction is divided into two kinds—pure mental restriction and non-pure mental restriction." A similar distinction is made between formal and material—or, as it has been translated, between discoverable and undiscoverable—equivocation.

An undiscoverable equivocation is when the words employed have but one real meaning, and that is not the meaning intended by the speaker. Thus, to use the example given by Dr. Murray, of Maynooth, if we were to take it into our heads to understand by the word horse, what is commonly understood by the word man, and say, "I saw a horse sitting on a sofa and discussing metaphysics with another learned horse from Maynooth;" this is an undiscoverable equivocation, and, if spoken seriously, must be considered as a lie. But the case is very different when the words employed really have two meanings, as in the examples given above; then the equivocation is discoverable, and is perfectly innocent. And the theory of mental reservation is the same, when the concealed idea is wholly undiscoverable, then the mental restriction is pure, and is forbidden by Pope Innocent XI.; but if the concealed idea is discoverable by proper sagacity and attention on the part of the hearer, then this is non-pure mental restriction, and it would be unreasonable to suppose that Pope Innocent XI. meant to condemn anything so innocent. Thus, for instance, the method which Pascal ascribes to Sanchez of mentally supplying part of the sentence, without giving the least indication of it in words, is pure mental restriction, and is condemned; but the method of Filiutius of speaking the lie aloud and the truth in a whisper, or under cover of a cough, is non-pure mental restriction and may be lawfully employed.

We give another illustration from the Christian Remembrancer—"As St. Francis, of Assisi, was one day walking, he was passed by a person whom he recognised. Hardly was this person out of sight when there came by others in search of him, and asked St. Francis if he had passed by? The saint did not wish to say yes. His conscience forbade him to say no. What was he to do? He threw his arms into the air, brought his hands together, and in so doing pointed with his finger down his sleeve. Then he answered with a safe conscience—'He has not passed this way.' It was quite true, he had not passed down the saint's sleeve. Now, had he not pointed down his sleeve, this would have been a case of pure mental reservation, and would have been a mortal sin; but the adroit movement of the finger altogether withdrew the act from this class of sins and placed it among justifiable and right acts. St. Francis' soul would have become spiritually dead, had it not been for the finger; he would have been 'deprived of God's grace,' but for the finger; he would have earned eternal damnation, but for the finger; but the finger was a talisman." Liguori's doctrine, then, on the subject of mental reservation is, that while purely mental reservation is condemned by the decree of Innocent XI., non-pure mental restriction is not. "For if it were not allowable to use non-pure mental restriction, there would be no way of lawfully concealing a secret which a man could not discover without loss or inconvenience, and this would be as hurtful to intercourse between man and man, as lying. The condemnation passed by the Pontiff on mental restriction is rightly to be understood of restriction purely and strictly taken, for that alone ought to be called true mental restriction, which takes place solely in the mind, and which there remains concealed, and can by no means be discovered from outward circumstances."—De juramento, Dub. iv., art. 152.

And, again (Art. 168)—"Is it lawful to swear something false, adding in a low voice some true circumstance? Yes, answer Hurtado and Prado with others quoted by the Salamanca doctors against Torre. They say that it is enough to make the words true, that there should be some external conformity with the conception of the mind, whether shown by a gesture or whisper, and that the other's not hearing it is a matter of accident. The Salamanca doctors, however, with more correctness, allow of such a whisper if it can be at all perceived by the other, even though its meaning be not caught; but not so if the whisper is wholly concealed from the other."

We now proceed to give some of Liguori's applications of his theory to particular examples. It will be seen that there is a good deal of difference between the saint's doctrine and that popularly received by English gentlemen. We should have been inclined to think that the intention to deceive is the essence of a lie, and that the form of words by which the deceit is accomplished is a matter of minor importance; however, it will be found that in Liguori's principles everything depends on the cautious use of the words employed.

(1) We shall commence with the common instance of a servant saying—Not at home. We do not mean here to discuss the lawfulness of instructing a servant to give this answer when his master really is in the house; but we should have supposed that the only grounds on which it could be defended would be, that these words have acquired, by use, a conventional meaning; that they were universally understood as implying no more than the master did not wish to receive visits; and that, therefore, no one was deceived by them. And if this could not be asserted with truth, then we should pronounce this answer to be indefensible. St. Liguori, however, treats the matter in a very different way. One answer which some Roman Catholic divines recommend the servant to make, we fear, cannot be practised in England. The servant might lawfully answer—"Non est hic." For, as profound Latin scholars are aware, these words may not only mean "He is not here," but also, "he is not eating here;" in which latter sense the words are supposed to be true. However, St. Liguori is too thoughtful to provide only for the use of servants who answer in Latin. His solution is as follows, Art. 165:—

"May a servant, by his master's order, deny that he is at home? Cardenas asserts that the servant may fix* his foot on a stone, and say he is not here [i.e., on the stone]; because this is not a mental restriction; but I do not agree with him if the other could, by no means, perceive the action. [If the other could not see you strike your foot on the stone, it would be a pure or undiscoverable mental restriction; but it would seem that if you strike your foot in an off-hand way, as if meaning nothing, but still, so that the other could see the action, then this answer becomes lawful.] But I should rather allow him to say, He is not here, meaning not in this door, or in this window, or (as Tournely says), understanding, not so that he can be seen. Cardenas also says, that he may answer—"He went out," meaning that he went out yesterday, or at some other past time; for (as he says with Lessius) we are not bound to answer according to the meaning of him who asks the question, if there be good reason. This, however, will not do, if he is asked, "Did your master go out this morning?" So also Cardenas says "that in the case of a nobleman who is in mourning, the servant may answer that he is out, meaning that he is removed from society." Now, our readers will see that in place of Liguori making the defence, that the words, "Not at home," are used only in a conventional sense in which they are not intended to deceive, he suggests different senses in which the words, "He is not here," may be literally true; but yet, in every one of which there is an attempt to deceive, which, in our opinion, cannot be cleared of the guilt of falsehood.

(2) We pass to another example. It is Lord Brougham, we think, who somewhere tells a story of a gentlemen travelling in Italy who, to his great surprise, was sued at law for a sum of money which he had never received, and which was asserted to have been lent him by a man whom he was not at all acquainted with. The gentleman put the matter in the hands of his lawyer, and presented himself before the judge. He heard the debt proved against him by several witnesses, on oath, who swore that they had seen the money given him by the alleged creditor, and he wondered how his lawyer would contrive to break down this mass of testimony, and expose its perjury; but what was his surprise to hear an equal number of credible witnesses brought forward on his own side who swore that they had seen him return the money! and to obtain, triumphantly, by these means, a judgment in his favour. We had always considered this story to be rather libellous on Italian morality, but really we do not know what to say now, when we find the converse case treated of by Liguori—Art. 158—"He who has received a loan, but afterwards paid it, may deny that he received it, understanding in his mind so as to be bound to pay it."

(3) We pass on to another case by which St. Liguori attempts to add a good deal to the comfort of travelling abroad. What can be more vexatious often than quarantine regulations? How annoying to be detained on one's journey for a fortnight or three weeks, when we know that we are perfectly free from plague. Well, St. Liguori teaches that if we know the place we have come from not to be infected, we may deny that we have come from it. Thus, for example, suppose that we are asked at Constantinople, have we come from Cairo? We have come from Cairo, but we know that there is no plague there at the time. Since the object for which we are asked is only to guard against plague, we may deny that we have come from Cairo. A great number of doctors teach that even if the plague were at Cairo, but if we had passed quickly through, so as to be sure we had caught no infection, we might still deny that we had come thence—meaning not so that danger might be feared from us. St. Liguori, however, does not agree with this.

(4) Art. 160.—If a guest is asked, if his dinner is good, when really it is bad, he may answer, that it is good—meaning, good for mortification.

(5) Suppose a man has spoken ill of his neighbour, which ill is true, but yet which the speaker ought not to have divulged; what is he to do? I am accustomed, says Liguori, to recommend people to equivocate and say—"I said it out of my own head;" for all words do come out of the mind, for which the head is taken. Or else the speaker may say—"I have told a lie;" for he has done wrong in what he has said; and St. John says (where?) that all sin is deceitfulness, and a lie.†

* Another example of mental reservation is cited by the Christian Remembrancer, from the "Treatise on Equivocation," by Garnet, the Jesuit, p. 31—"I will give you a hundred pounds," mentally subjoining, "if I find it in Cheapside."

* There is an unaccountable misconception of this in Blakeney's translation of Liguori.

† Homo. Apostolicus, Tr. xv. 18., cited by Christian Remembrancer.

(6) Art. 162.—May an unfaithful wife declare to her husband that she has not committed adultery, meaning (aside) so as to have to tell him? She may assert equivocally that she has not broken the marriage, for the bond still exists. And if she has sacramentally confessed her adultery, she may answer, "I am innocent of this crime," because it has been taken away by confession. So Cardenas, who, however, remarks that she may not make that affirmation with an oath, because the probability of a fact is sufficient for asserting a thing, but certainty is required for swearing. But it is replied that moral certainty is sufficient for swearing; and moral certainty of the remission of a sin can be had when a person has received the sacrament of penance with a good moral disposition.

Thus we see two ways provided to enable an unfaithful wife to deny her adultery without being guilty of falsehood, and the saint proceeds to give more. If in danger of death, she may say, "I have not committed adultery"—meaning, I have not been guilty of idolatry; for idolatry is called adultery—Ez. xxiii. 37; or, fourthly, if the crime is really concealed, she may deny with an oath, and say, "I have not committed it," in the same way that a culprit may say to a judge who does not legitimately interrogate him, "I have not committed it"—meaning that she has not so committed it as to be bound to declare it unto him.

We must not trespass too long on the patience of our readers, or we could go on for another page in giving specimens of the notions entertained by Liguori on the subject of truthfulness. Next month, however, we hope to return to the subject, and shall discuss the examples produced by the defenders of Liguori. We shall enquire how far the statement of the Rambler is true that "private life would be intolerable without equivocation," and that "the common proverb, 'ask me no questions and I'll tell you no lies,' embodies alike the Catholic doctrine and the common judgment of humanity." We readily admit that if St. Liguori is to be taken as a representative of "Catholic doctrine," asking questions would seem necessarily to involve telling lies as its consequence; but as to the "common judgment of humanity," we shall beg leave to differ with him.

TALK OF THE ROAD—No. XXIX.

"Jem, did you ever see a holy well?" said Pat.

"Why wouldn't I, Pat," said Jem; "sure there's enough of them, though they're not as plenty as they were when I was young; but there's enough still; and I seen them many a time, with the rags on the bushes, and the cut knees, and the whisky, and the prayers, and the card-playing, and what not? But why do you ask, Pat?"

"Well," said Pat, "I was down in Galway to fetch up some sheep, and I come in for a pattern at a holy well, and it was a sight anyway; of all the people ever you saw there was there; and some crawling on their knees round the well, and some praying, and some drinking, and some courting; and for the thorn bushes you would take them to be patchwork quilts, with the sewing left out; and I took to thinking what was it for at all; so I goes up to an old creature that was cutting her knees creeping round the well, and, says I, 'what are you serving your old bones that way for?' says I. 'Isn't it getting quit of my sins,' says she. 'Well,' says I, 'sure I'm a Catholic long enough, and I never got quit of my sins that way, and never a priest ever told me of that way of getting quit of them.' 'Och, jewell,' says she, 'sure you're at the right place at last, and why don't you turn up the knees of your breeches and get quit of your sins?' And now isn't that the quare way, Jem? and is it the Catholic religion at all?"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "it is the Catholic religion, or it isn't. If it is, why did the priest never tell you that way to get quit of your sins? and if it isn't, why does the priests allow them poor creatures to be deceiving their own souls with such folly?"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "I learned something about that anyway; for I was stopping in a decent man's house, and, indeed, he's a very knowledgeable man, and he has a deal of old Irish books, and I fell to talking to him about the holy well; and, at first, he wouldn't let on that he knew anything about it; 'but,' says he, 'sure the people always did it;' but when he seen that I didn't think much of the well, he let out his mind; 'and sure,' says he, 'I have something about it here in a book;' and he fetched down a book that was written by Dr. O'Connor, that was a priest, and, he said, was the learnedest priest that ever was in Ireland, and one of the real ould O'Connors of Ballynagare, that come of the Kings of Ireland; and he showed me out of the book that Father O'Connor said the holy wells was all paganism; and how the heathens had the holy wells in Ireland in the time of St. Patrick and Columbkill, and how some stuck to it after, in spite of them; and how it was part of the worship of Baal, the God of the heathens, that the Israelites worshipped on Mount Carmel, in the time of Elijah.—1 Kings xviii. 3 Kings, Douay Bible. 'So,' says he, 'there's something old in our religion anyway; for holy wells is older than the Christian religion itself, for they're as old as paganism; so it's a fine old religion, it is,' says he."

"And the rags, Pat," said Jem; "where did they get them?"

"Well, if he didn't show me that, too, out of Father O'Connor's book," said Pat; "for I asked him, and he just turned to a page where Father O'Connor says, that some travellers were going through a heathen country, away beyond the Crimea, where the soldiers is, and they found a tree all covered over with rags, just the same as a bush beside a holy well, and it was people with the ague stuck them there to get cured; so there's paganism again for you, Jem."

"I wonder why the Catholic Church lets people follow paganism instead of the Christian religion," said Jem.

"Well, I seen in Father O'Connor's book that the canons of the Church is against it," said Pat; "and that the Catholic Church isn't to be blamed for it at all; and he says a deal of the bishops would like to stop it.

"And why don't they stop it, then?" said Jem.

"Well," said Pat, "I suppose it was because the people were so fond of the holy wells that they couldn't."

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "if the bishops wasn't able to stop paganism, isn't it enough to make a body guess that they wern't the right bishops at all? But did any one ever hear tell of them trying?"

"Well, Father O'Connor doesn't say they did," said Pat. "But he tells about Bishop Milner anyway; that's the man that wrote a book called 'The End of Controversy,' that the priests get all their learning out of, against the Protestants."

"Aye, I seen that book with the priest's clerk," said Jem; "but what about Bishop Milner?"

"Why, Father O'Connor allows that Bishop Milner wrote a book crying up the holy well of St. Winifred, for the miraculous cures that it worked; and seemingly, Bishop Milner was mighty mad at Father O'Connor, for saying what he did of holy wells," said Pat.

"And did Bishop Milner cry up the rags, too?" said Jem.

"Well, I can't say for that," said Pat; "for I didn't see that book; but there is one bishop for you anyway that helped on the paganism, instead of stopping it."

"And did any ever try to stop it?" said Jem.

"Well that's just what I asked the man that showed me the book," said Pat; "says I, 'did any priest ever try to stop the people going to a holy well?'

"'Deed did they,' says he; 'I seen them do it a few years back.'

"'And could they do it?' says I.

"'Quite easy,' says he, 'once they tried it in earnest. The people just quit the well at once when the priests gave the orders.'

"'Well,' says I, 'there's some of the priests anyway that's for stopping paganism.'

"'Sorrow bit you'll say that,' says he, 'when you hear why they did it. It's down the country a bit,' says he, 'and it was the greatest well at all, with rags enough on the bushes to cure all Ireland, if it was any good; and there comes a clergyman out of Dublin, one Mr. Gregg, and he just takes a slip of a branch off the bush, with all the rags on it, and away he goes about England and Ireland with it in his hand, just to show people the Catholic religion; and with that there comes lots of Englishmen just to look at the well and the bush; and then the priests gave out that no one was to go to the well any more; and there was an end of the holy well at wonst.'"

"I seen that same man and his twig," said Jem; "I was in Kilcommon one day, and I seen a great meeting, and I just went to it, and I seen him with the twig in a glass-case, and him holding it up, and it with the rags on it, and that's the man that has the Irish tongue; now you could'nt help listening to him, like as if he was singing a song; and he told how that twig built a church and a school-house, beside that same holy well; and how the church is full of people that gets the water of life out of the Holy Scriptures now. So I don't wonder that the priests made the people quit that well; for maybe them that went there would get the living water once for all, like the way the woman of Samaria got it at the well."—John iv. 10-15.

"So you see, Jem," said Pat, "the priests can stop the paganism, when the Protestants makes them ashamed and afraid."

"Aye," said Jem, "the priests is following, not leading, when they put down the like of that. Why didn't they do it always? and why don't they do it everywhere now?"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "sure it's getting plain every day that it's the Word of God, and not the priests, that will drive out the darkness and ignorance out of the people's minds, and let the true light shine in old Ireland. Will we ever see the paganism and the darkness put out, and the religion of Christ just what he made it himself, and the people looking to the Saviour only to put away their sins?"

"Well," said Jem, "isn't it going on anyway? Isn't there two of us that has learned a deal these last two years; is'nt there hope that a deal more may learn the same way?"

Those that have this hope, we trust will be stirred up to aid in promoting the enlightenment of the Irish people. Every one who learns to look at the True Light, is himself an instrument to show that light to others.

If any one should wish to see more of the book that was shown to Pat, he may find it in "Columbanus' Letters," written by Dr. Charles O'Connor, an Irish priest, of whose learning and talents Irishmen may justly be proud. The passage relating to holy wells is in the 3rd letter, vol. i., pp. 73 to 105, and is well worthy of being read by any one who wishes to understand what is practised in Ireland, and the origin of the practice. The letter was published in the year 1810, and very soundly Dr. O'Connor was handled for it by Bishop Milner and others. Dr. O'Conner speaks of Bishop Milner's "miraculous pamphlet" in defence of the well of St. Winifred. We have not seen that pamphlet, and should be obliged to any of our readers who can tell us where it can be found; coming from the author of the "End of Controversy," it is deserving of notice.

We know the truth of the story about "the twig" that built the church and school-house. Now that Pat and Jem have got upon the holy wells, we think it would be very desirable if our readers, in various places, would send us the particulars of "holy wells" in their several localities, with a brief account of what is done at them, and whether the practice is declining.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, JULY 19, 1855.

NEW POST-OFFICE REGULATIONS.

To prevent disappointment to such of our friends and subscribers as are in the habit of transmitting the CATHOLIC LAYMAN to other parties through the post, we request their particular attention to the following new regulations, which have just come into operation under the provision of the recent statute, 18 and 19 Vict., c. xxvii.:—

1. No newspaper or stamped periodical can be sent free through the post, unless posted within fifteen days from the date of publication, which must be henceforth printed at the top of every page; consequently, after fifteen days from the date of publication, the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, whether stamped or unstamped, can only be forwarded by post on affixing a penny postage stamp, under the regulations of the Inland Book Post, which we shall give below for the convenience of our readers.
2. To go free through the post within the fifteen days, the paper must, as formerly, either have no cover or a cover open at the ends; and must be so folded that the whole of the stamp shall be exposed to view, and be distinctly visible on the outside. If the paper be otherwise folded, it will be marked in the post office, stamp not visible, and a postage of one penny will be charged on it, in addition to any other postage to which it would have been liable, if properly folded.
3. It must contain no enclosure whatever.
4. It must have no writing or other mark on either the paper or cover, but the name and address of the person to whom it is sent.
5. If sent through the post from one part of Dublin to another, within the limits of the General Post-office delivery, it must have a penny postage stamp affixed to it.

Our friends will observe that it follows, from No. 1 of the foregoing new regulations, that we shall no longer be able to forward back numbers of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN free through the post; but such back numbers will be post paid to all new subscribers who desire to commence from the preceding January, without any additional charge, on payment of their subscriptions, which are, as usual, payable in advance.

N.B.—Copies of almost all the back numbers can still be had by subscribers requiring them for completing sets, or lending in their neighbourhood, on forwarding penny postage stamps to Mr. Curry, the publisher, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin. No charge will be made to subscribers for such back numbers, beyond that of a penny stamp for each number, to cover the postage.

In future an unstamped edition will be published, price 3s. per annum, and the price of the bound volume at the completion of each year will be reduced to 5s.

The new REGULATIONS of the Inland BOOK POST are as follows :—

and so on, 2d. being charged for every additional half pound, or any less weight.

The postage must be pre-paid in full by means of postage stamps affixed outside the packet on its cover.

3. The head post-master who first receives a book packet must, whenever he has ground for suspecting an infringement of the above conditions, and occasionally, even where there is no ground for suspicion, open and examine the packet; and every book packet, which shall not be open at the ends or sides, or shall exceed two feet in length, width, or depth, or shall have any letter or any communication of the nature of a letter written or printed on it, or upon its cover, or shall bear no postage-stamp, will be sent up to the dead-letter office in London, Edinburgh, or Dublin, as the case may be. If deficiently stamped according to the above regulations, it will be charged with the deficient book postage, together with an additional stamp of 4d.

SCRIPTURE PROOFS OF THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

WE have just met with a pamphlet, by the Rev. Edward Murray, P.P., Kilfian, which, on the title-page, is respectfully presented to the candid judgment of the Protestant clergy. It is called the "Orthodox Sword of the Word," and purports to contain Scripture proofs of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Nothing delights us more than to find our Roman Catholic friends appealing to Scripture, and we are always happy to meet them on that ground. We, therefore, proceed to give to Mr. Murray's Scripture proofs the benefit of our circulation. We cannot afford space for the 35 pages of comment with which Mr. Murray accompanies them; but, surely, if it were the intention of the Spirit of God to declare in Scripture the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, He was able to do so in words sufficiently intelligible to a plain reader. We wonder that it escaped Mr. Murray's sagacity, when he employs twenty pages in deducing the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception from his first text, that he inevitably forces his readers to feel that an interpretation deduced by so laborious a process cannot be the true one. His proof must be not only a proof out of Scripture, but a long way out of Scripture indeed.

Here, then, are the proofs. We give the authorized translation and the Douay :—

AUTHORIZED.	DOUAY.
1. Luke i. 35.
Therefore, also, that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.	And, therefore, also, the Holy which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God.
2. St. John i. 16.
And of his fulness have all we received, and grace for grace.	And of his fulness we all have received, and grace for grace.
3. Luke xi. 27.
Blessed is the womb that bore thee, and the paps which thou hast sucked.	Blessed is the womb that bore thee, and the paps that gave thee suck.
4. Luke i. 42.
Blessed is the fruit of thy womb.	Blessed is the fruit of thy womb.
5. GEN. iii. 15.
I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed, it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.	I will put enmities between thee and the woman, and thy seed and her seed; she shall crush thy head, and thou shalt lie in wait for her heel.*
6. Prov. xxxi. 10.
Who can find a virtuous woman? for her price is far above rubies. The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her so that he shall have no need of spoil.	Who shall find a valiant woman? jewels from the uttermost coasts is the price of her. The heart of her husband trosts in her, and he shall have no need of spoils.
7. Cant. iv. 7.
Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee.	Thou art all fair, O my love, and there is not a spot in thee.
8. Cant. viii. 5.
I raised thee up under the apple tree: there thy mother brought thee forth; there she brought thee forth that bare thee.	Under the apple tree I raised thee up; there thy mother was corrupted, there she was deflowered that bore thee.†

We leave these texts as a puzzle for our readers; and we shall give any of them great credit for ingenuity who may succeed in finding the slightest connection between any of these texts and the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. And as these, no doubt, are the best texts that can be had in support of the doctrine, we leave our Roman Catholic readers to judge what is the Scripture foundation on which this doctrine rests.

One word more. We think it would have been consistent in one who has pledged himself never to interpret Scripture but according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers, to name some early writers who have put the same interpretation as he has done upon the texts quoted. We are far from approving all the interpretations of Scripture we find in the works of the Fathers; many of them we make no scruple to reject; but we think, on the other hand, that it is a strong presumption against the truth of an interpretation if it is started in 1855, for the first time, nor do we think that the true sense of these passages of Scripture was left for Father Edward Murray to discover.

* Note to Douay Version.—"Ipsa, the woman; so divers of the Fathers read this place, conformably to the Latin (vulgate); others read it Ipsum—viz., the seed. The sense is the same: for it is by her seed, Jesus Christ, that the woman crushes the serpent's head."

† Note to Douay Version.—"That is, that Christ redeemed the Gentiles at the foot of the cross, where the synagogue of the Jews (the mother Church) was corrupted by their denying him, and crucifying him.

THE APOCRYPHA.

IN our last number we were engaged with the examination of the arguments urged by Roman Catholic theologians in support of the Tridentine Decree respecting the Apocrypha. We discussed the passage quoted from Augustine, and the Decree of the Council of Carthage (on the supposition of its genuineness); and we proved, unanswerably we believe, that the word "canonical," as therein applied to the apocryphal books, is not used in the restricted sense in which we employ it—viz., as denoting inspired books—but in a wider sense, as designating writings approved by the Church, and read in her public assemblies on account of the rules (canons) of conduct which they contain, and the edifying lessons which they inculcate.

We come next to the Epistle of Pope Innocent I. to Exuperius, which professes to have been written at the commencement of the fifth century, and which enumerates some of the apocryphal books in "the Canon of the Scriptures." We have already given the weightiest reasons for concluding that this epistle is a forgery, concocted no less than four centuries after its pretended date.—See CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. ii., p. 126. But, even admitting its genuineness, the very same remark may be made upon it that we already made respecting Augustine and the Council of Carthage—viz., that the word "canon" is not used in the restricted, but in the wide sense before explained. In support of this assertion we have, as we said in the last number, Cardinal Cajetan's authority.

The next document which presents itself is the Decree of Pope Gelasius (at the end of the fifth century), which professes to have been drawn up by him together with a Roman council of seventy bishops. In this decree, a list—or, rather, three lists, differing more or less from each other—of the Books of the Old Testament is given, which includes the Apocrypha. We have already shown (CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. ii., pp. 112, 126) that the gravest doubts exist as to the genuineness of this decree, and we might, accordingly, fairly refuse to admit it as evidence. But, as in the three preceding instances, we will consent to receive it, and then set it aside by the "distinction" before made, and which Cajetan teaches us to apply to this very case.

Down to the end of the fifth century, then, the Western Church, equally with the Eastern, knew nothing of the Tridentine doctrine of the equality of the Apocrypha to the Jewish Scriptures. The words "canon" and "canonical" were, indeed, frequently applied to all, indifferently; but, then, it was only in the sense of a list or catalogue of writings, stamped with ecclesiastical authority, and read publicly in the churches. It was never intended to confound the fundamental distinction which Jerome, and Cyril of Jerusalem, and many other western and eastern Fathers expressly made between the inspired and the non-inspired books contained in the same volume—between the canonical books (strictly so called) and those which were properly designated ecclesiastical (our Apocrypha). That the Western Church did not, down to the period specified, and even for a century later, intend to confound this distinction, is proved, beyond all question, by the decisive authority of Pope Gregory the Great. This eminent pontiff, in the 19th book of his "Moralia," written at the close of the sixth century, expresses himself, in reference to the Apocrypha, in very nearly the words of Jerome (whom we, Protestants, follow). Being about to cite a passage from the 1st Book of Maccabees, Gregory introduces the quotation with the following apology :—"Concerning which matter we do not act irregularly if we bring forward a testimony from books, which, though not canonical, have yet been published for the edification of the Church."* Gregory here uses the word "canonical" in its restricted sense—viz., as applied to the inspired books of the Old Testament; and, as the head and organ of the Roman Church of the sixth century, he declares that in this sense the term was not applicable nor applied to the Apocrypha.

The next authority, after the decree of Pope Gelasius, adduced by Roman Catholic divines, is a catalogue contained in the decree of Pope Eugenius IV., passed at the close, or, rather, after the close of the Council of Florence, A.D. 1439. It is, certainly, somewhat striking that this is the only synodical authority in support of their canon which Roman Catholics can even pretend to adduce during the eleven centuries and a half which elapsed between the Council of Carthage and the Council of Trent. However, the catalogue in question professes to form part of Pope Eugenius's "Instruction to the Armenians," which document Roman Catholic writers contend must be regarded as included among the acts of the Council of Florence. Now, in the first place, there are strong doubts as to the genuineness of this catalogue, and weighty reasons have been adduced to show that it is a forgery of Caranza, the epitomizer of the councils. But, in the second place, even admitting its genuineness and that it did really form part of "The Instruction to the Armenians," this latter document, having been drawn up by the Pope himself, after the breaking up of the council, does not possess synodical authority, and, therefore, does not bind the Church, even on Romish principles. And, lastly, admitting it to have emanated from the council as such, yet this synod has no claim whatever to the title of a general council, even so far as regards the Western Church; for the majority of the western bishops refused to attend it, and remained at Basle. In fact, so far were they from acknowledging the authority of the Council of Florence, that they anathematized it as a schismatical assembly and a synagogue of Satan. Consequently, the Latin Church (to say nothing of the Greek, which has never, to the present hour, admitted the canonicity of the Apocrypha) never, up to the date of the Council of Trent, received the Apocrypha as of equal authority with the rest of Scripture; never, in other words, recognised it as canonical in the sense that we hold the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament Scriptures to be canonical.

In corroboration of our assertion that the Council of Florence was not deemed to have canonized the Apocrypha any more than the Council of Carthage or Pope Gelasius's Council had done, we can adduce the recorded opinions of some of the most eminent divines of the Latin Church, who lived in the interval between that Council of Florence and the Council of Trent, and who have most clearly distinguished between the canonical Scriptures (properly so called) and the apocryphal books; denying most emphatically that the latter are of co-ordinate authority with the former in matters of faith, and agreeing with Jerome and us (Protestants) in assigning to them the subordinate function of being useful for edification and moral instruction. Of these witnesses in our favour we will adduce a few as a specimen of the entire. Antoninus, who was canonized by Pope Adrian VI., and who was present at the Council of Florence, and, therefore, may be presumed to have known what that council decreed respecting the canon of Scripture, writes thus—"The Hebrews reckon xxii books in all as authentic. They designate as apocryphal the books of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Tobit, Judith, and Maccabees. The Church, however, receives the Apocrypha also as true, useful, and moral, although not valid for proof in controversy concerning matters of faith."* More decidedly, if possible, in our favour, is the testimony of Alphonsus Tostatus, the contemporary of Antoninus, and who was regarded as the wonder of his age in learning of every kind. We will quote but one of the numerous passages to the same effect, which occur in his writings—"None of those apocryphal books (although it may be inserted amongst the other books of the Bible, and may be read in the Church) is of such authority as that the Church can argue from it to prove any truth; and so far forth as this she does not receive them. And in this sense Jerome is to be understood, when he says—The Church knows nothing of the Apocrypha."† We come next to Cardinal Ximenes, to whose piety and munificence we are indebted for one of the noblest monuments of human learning—The Complutensian Polyglott. In the preface to that work, the reader is specially informed that "the books outside the canon, which the Church receives rather for the edification of the people than to confirm the authority of ecclesiastical dogmas, are written in Greek only (not in Hebrew)."‡ These books are enumerated—viz., Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Maccabees, and the apocryphal additions to Esther and Daniel. Now, when we remember that the Complutensian Polyglott, preface and all, was published by the authority of Pope Leo X., to whom it was dedicated, we have a very striking proof that, at the commencement of the 16th century (A.D. 1517), at the very time when Luther commenced his opposition to Rome, neither the Pope nor the Church of Rome held the canonicity (in the strict sense of the word) of the Apocrypha, but regarded it in the same light as Jerome, whose very words, in reference to it, Cardinal Ximenes quotes in the passage above cited.

Another eminent witness on our side is the great Erasmus, who, in addition to his vast general learning, was the first Biblical scholar and critic of his age. In his explanation of the Apostle's Creed and the Decalogue, he proposes this very question, as to the number of Books contained in canonical Scripture, and he answers it by adducing the catalogue of Ruffinus (of Aquileia, and a contemporary of Jerome), in which our apocryphal Books are expressly separated from the canonical, and designated by a distinct name—viz., ecclesiastical. Again, in his epistle to students of Scripture, prefixed to the 4th volume of his edition of Jerome's works, Erasmus says—"It certainly is of great moment to ascertain what the Church receives, and with what intention she does so; for, although she may attribute the same honour to the (22) Books of the Hebrews and the Gospels, she certainly does not mean that the same weight should be assigned to Judith, Tobit, and the Books of Wisdom as to the Pentateuch."§ What a striking prospective commentary on the decree of Trent, passed about sixteen years after, in which it was asserted that the Church always received the Apocrypha as of equal authority with the rest of the Bible!

Cardinal Cajetan's testimony we have already adduced in our last number. His works abound with statements of a similar kind. We will here quote two more, if possible stronger than that which has been referred to. One occurs in his commentary on the first chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews—"We have adopted Jerome's rule to prevent us from error in the determination of the canonical Books; for we esteem as canonical those which he delivered as such, and those which he separated from the canonical Books we hold to be outside the canon."‖ The other passage is found in the Dedicatory Epistle to Pope Clement VII., prefixed to Cajetan's Commentaries on the Historical Books of the Old Testament. "Most blessed father," he writes, "the universal Latin Church is most deeply indebted to St. Jerome, not only on account of his annotations on the Scriptures, but also because he distinguished the canonical books from the non-canonical, inasmuch as he thereby freed us from the reproach of the Hebrews, who otherwise might say that we were forging for ourselves books or parts of books belonging to the ancient canon, which they never received."* Cajetan's work appeared but twelve years before the Council of Trent, and was dedicated, as we have just said, to Pope Clement VII., and received his approbation. Consequently, Jerome's rule, relative to the broad distinction between the canonical books (properly so called) and the apocryphal, was then recognised by the Roman Pontiff himself.

Such was the state of opinion respecting the canon of Scripture, among the greatest divines of the Western Church, and even some, at least, of the Roman Pontiffs, immediately prior to the Council of Trent. Disregarding, however, everything but the exigencies of the moment, that Council published, in 1546, its portentous decree, whereby it swept away the barrier which had existed for seventeen centuries between the canonical Scriptures of the Old Testament and the Apocrypha. The one great object of the Council was, to arrest, by every possible means, the reformation movement, and to sustain, by every available expedient, the corruptions in the doctrines and practices of the Western Church, which had been for many ages making silent but sure progress. The Reformers appealed to Scripture, and to it alone, as the arbiter of the points of dispute between them and the Church of Rome. The Tridentine Fathers, while they refused, and for a very plain reason, to rest everything on the decision of Scripture, alleging, as a co-ordinate authority, the traditions of the Church, yet were naturally anxious to have Scripture on their side as far as possible. With this view they enlarged the limits of canonical or inspired Scripture, admitting within its sacred pale the apocryphal writings, because from them they thought they might derive what they searched the canonical Scriptures for in vain—viz., some show of proof in support of such dogmas as purgatory, the worship of angels, and the atoning efficacy of alms-deeds.

The history of the manner in which the Tridentine decree in question was passed is highly instructive. In the "Congregations," or preliminary meetings, held prior to the fourth Session the question of the Canon of Holy Scripture was debated. Some of the divines recommended that the distinction made by Jerome, and approved by Pope Gregory, between the canonical and non-canonical books of the Old Testament, should be still maintained. Others were of opinion, that no distinction should be expressly stated, but that a general catalogue should be drawn out of all the books together, like that of the Council of Carthage, and nothing more said on the subject. Others, again, suggested that a threefold division should be made, the third class being composed of the books that had never been received as inspired by the Church—viz., the Apocrypha. A fourth party, the smallest in point of number, but the most zealous and energetic, proposed that the Apocrypha should be placed upon the same footing as the rest of Scripture, and an anathema pronounced against all who should dispute it. This opinion at last prevailed, and the famous Decree de Canonicis Scripturis was passed, in the fourth session, by some fifty bishops, of whom sixteen, at least, utterly dissented from it in reality, and merely acquiesced in the opinion of the majority. Such is the way in which this awful decree was passed, and such is the authority on which it rests. Fifty-three bishops, or rather thirty-seven, with a specific object in view, to the attainment of which they felt themselves constrained to make any sacrifices, assumed the privilege of raising to the rank of inspired Scripture books which hitherto had not only not been admitted within the sacred pale, but had been expressly excluded from it by many of the greatest Fathers and Doctors of the Church.†

We have, then, on the one side, this decree, passed by the men, and in the manner just described. We have, upon the other side, the authority of our Blessed Lord and his inspired apostles; we have the undisputed authority of the Church of God, Jewish and Christian, during a period of seventeen centuries; we have the deliberate opinions of the greatest Fathers and Doctors down to the very time when the Council of Trent was assembled; we have all the reformed Churches of Western Christendom, and the whole orthodox Eastern Church from the remotest times to the present hour. We are willing to take our stand upon this side; we accept, as regards the Old Testament, the canon of the Jews, notwithstanding the contemptuous epithet of "the canon of the Scribes and Pharisees," with which some of our opponents, with more zeal than reverence, have stigmatized it. The idle taunt, that this is a Jewish, not a Christian canon, the Protestant can easily afford to disregard, when he bears in mind that an inspired apostle has expressly enumerated it amongst the privileges of the Jews, that "to them were committed the oracles of God;" and when he further recollects that two of the greatest Fathers of the Christian Church deemed it no disgrace to Christianity to be indebted for the Old Testament to the Jews. "The Church," says Jerome, "knows nothing of the the Apocrypha; recourse must be had to the Hebrew books, from which the Lord speaks, and out of which the disciples take their examples."* "The Jews," says Augustine, "carry the volume on which the Christian faith is built; they have been constituted our librarians."† And as to the anathema with which the Fathers of Trent have thought fit to sanction their decree, we console ourselves with the assurance of the inspired sage—"The curse causeless shall not come."

† Roman Catholic controversial writers, we may observe, usually divide all the books of the Bible into two classes—which they term respectively the Proto-canonical and the Deutero canonical. The first class comprises the 22 Jewish books of the Old Testament, and the entire of the New, with the exception of the seven epistles, whose canonical authority was not universally established so soon as that of the rest. The second class embraces the seven apocryphal books and parts of books of the Old Testament, and the aforesaid seven epistles of the New. By this classification, a twofold advantage is secured—first, by admitting a quasi-distinction between the Apocrypha and the Jewish Scriptures less violence seems to be done to antiquity; and, secondly, by placing the Apocrypha in the same category as the said seven epistles, of whose inspired authority the Church at large never entertained any doubt, an argument is tacitly insinuated for the inspiration of the former.

Correspondence.

HOW MUCH IS YOUR SOUL WORTH?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Jerry Donovan, and myself, and a lot of the neighbours went down to old Ned Bryan's, the other day, to see his boy, who's just come home from California, with a mint of money; for though Ned is a Protestant, still he's a very decent man, and we were all glad to hear of his luck; and while he was telling us all that he seen in his travels, and how the lumps of gold were as thick in the ground as the praties used to be in the old times, who should come in but the minister himself. "God save all here," says he. "God save your reverence," says we. "Well, Ned," says he, "I'm glad to hear that your son has come back to you, and has brought something with him." "Thanks be to God," says Ned, "he has come back safe and sound, and brought enough with him to stock a farm; and I'm telling him that he must be careful not to lose what he has got; for if once he lost it, he'd find it hard to get it back again." "True for you," says the minister; "and," says he, "Ned, that's a hint we should all take; we should all look sharp after the treasure God has given us; for if once it's lost, it's lost for ever." "Why, then, your reverence," says I, "there's some of us that won't have much trouble in looking after our treasure; for," says I, "we haven't any to look after." "Deed, then, you have," says he; "poor as you are, you have each a great treasure that's well worth looking after." "What can it be at all?" says the boys; "sure we haven't amongst us what would buy a fat pig." "Still, for all," says the minister, "it's truth I'm telling you, when I say that each one of you, Protestant and Roman Catholic, possesses a treasure that's worth more than all the gold young Ned brought home with him; for," says he, "boys, each one of you has an immortal soul that's worth more than all the gold in California;" and with that, he took down Ned Bryan's big Bible that was on the shelf, and read out for us a verse which said that "'twould be no profit to a man if he gained the whole world and lost his soul." Well, the boys began to look at each other, and, says Mick Flyn, "he's going to attack our holy religion out of the Protestant Bible." "And," says Jerry, "that's the Protestant Bible, sir, and sure we don't care for a word that's in it;" "and," says another of the boys, "didn't Father John tell us it was the devil's book;" "and," says another, "sure 'twas made by Luther and Henry VIII." "Easy, boys," says the minister, "don't get into a passion; and," says he, "is the Douay Bible the devil's book?" "No," says Mick Flyn, "that's the real sort, that's the genuine article." "And," says the minister again, "was it made by Luther, or Henry VIII.?" "No," says Jerry, "they had no call to it, and we'll believe anything that's in it." "Very good," says the parson, "that's all I want;" and with that, he put his hand into his pocket, and pulled out a real Douay Bible. "Now, boys," says he, "is that your own Bible?" So Jerry, and some of those who were knowledgeable about such things, allowed that it was our own Bible. So the parson handed it to Jerry, and, says he, "find out the Gospel of St. Mark, viii. chap., 36th verse. Well, Jerry looked very foolish, and twisted and turned it, hither and over, but all to no purpose; so he handed it to Mick Flyn, but Mick passed it on to the next, and, at last, it came round to me; but the never a one of us could find out the place. So the parson began to laugh, and, says he, "boys, I think you know as little about your own Bible as about ours." So he found out the place himself, and gave it to Jerry, and, says he, "I'll read first out of the Protestant Bible, and then do you read out of your own Bible." So with that, he read, "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" Then Jerry read out of the Douay Bible, "For what shall it profit a man, if he gain the whale world, and suffer the loss of his soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" "Well, boys," says the minister, "I don't think there's much difference there; and now," says he, "didn't I tell you the truth, when I said that each one of you possessed a treasure that's worth more than all the gold in California?" "True for you," says Jerry, "and 'tis myself that never thought much about the matter; for," says he, "though I knew that I had a soul, still I never thought of how much 'tis worth." "Well," says the minister, "you now see that a man's soul is worth more to him than the whole world; and," says he, "boys, I'll show you another way of finding out the value of the soul;" says he, "if you went into a shop to buy a coat, how would you know the value of it." "By the price I'd have to pay for it," says Jerry. "Just so," says the minister; "and if you knew the price that was paid to save our souls, you'd know the great value of a soul." "Why, then," says Jerry, "there's not a boy in Keelovenogue that knows it better than myself; sure I paid Father John £1 10s. for my father's soul, and £1 5s. for my mother's soul; for he took off five shillings on account of her belonging to the Holy Order of the Scapular; 'tis I that know the price right well, for it set me hard to scrape it together." With that, the minister looked Jerry straight in the face, very sorrowful like, and, says he, "'twas a greater price than that I was thinking of." "Maybe," says I, "your reverence, was thinking of old Jim Crowly, the miser, who made all his money during the famine by robbing the poor starving creatures; his son had to pay £5 for his soul; but sure Father John couldn't do it for less, and it's myself thinks 'twas cheap for such an old villian." With that, the minister turned to me, and, says he, "my poor man, I'm sorry to find you so ignorant; but," says he, "I pity you more than blame you; for," says he, "I can hardly blame a Roman Catholic for the mistake you have made, as long as the priests make such bargains with you; but," says he, "I'll tell you the price that was paid for our souls, 'twas the precious blood of our Lord Jesus Christ; nothing less would pay for our sinful souls, so he laid down his life upon the cross to save those souls; and now, boys," says he, "don't you see the great value of your souls?" "But," says Mick Flyn, "won't every one's soul be saved at that rate?" "No," says the minister; "only those who come to Christ in humble faith, and in the way that he has pointed out, and," says he, "that's the reason I'm showing you the great value of your souls, that you may try whether you are going the right way to have them saved." "Well," says Mick, "I leave it to the priest; for it's his business to see after it." "But," says the minister, "I think it's your own business, and you should see to it yourself; and," says he, "when Ned's son made his money in California, I'm sure he didn't trust to any one to look after it for him, but he looked after it himself." "True for your reverence," says young Ned; "'tis a poor account I'd have of it, if I didn't look after it myself; for there's fellows there that would steal the teeth out of your head, if you slept with your mouth open." "Well," says the minister, "bad as the thieves are in California, there's a worse thief here at home, that's looking out for your souls, and that's the devil; and," says he, "boys, he'll surely rob you if he can, and that's the reason I'm telling you to look sharp about your souls." "But," says Jerry, "if we're wrong, 'tis the priests that will be punished for it, and not us; for we only do what they bid us." "Don't trust to that," says the minister, "every man will have to render an account for himself, and it's for that reason I'm urging you to look well after your souls." "At all events," says Jerry, "I'm no worse than others; and if I'm lost there's many will be lost along with me" "I suppose," says the minister, "there's many of you think that a good argument; but," says he, "boys, do you see that red sod of turf in the middle of the fire." "We do your reverence," says we. "Well, now," says he, "is that sod of turf anything cooler for having a dozen other sods burning around it?" Well, Mr. Editor, we all looked at each other, and we couldn't but allow that it was nothing cooler, but, on the contrary, hotter. "Well," says the minister to Jerry, "if your poor soul was in hell, would you be any better off for having many others in hell with you? boys," says he, "don't be satisfied with the argument that others are as bad as yourselves; for," says he, "it's a bad argument, and if you trust to it, you'll find the differ when too late." "But," says Jerry, "is it wanting us to quit our holy religion you are? the old, ancient religion that our fathers and grandfathers held before us." "No," says the minister, "I don't want you to give up your religion for my words, all I want of you is to examine it; and surely if it's the right religion, the more you examine it the more you'll be convinced of its truth. Some other time," says he, "I may try to show you that your religion is a new religion, and not an old one; but," says he, "as I like to take a man on his own ground, even supposing your religion to be the old one, yet, if it be the wrong one, you shouldn't hold to it; and," says he, "do you remember when first the English farmers began to plant turnips for the cattle how you were all against it? and when first the iron ploughs came into fashion many of you declared that you'd rather stick to the old wooden ones that your fathers and grandfathers used before you." "That's true," says Ned Bryan; "sure I held out myself against the turnips and iron ploughs until I tried both ways of farming, and then I found that the new way was the best." "That's the very thing I'm at," says the minister; "though you were all against the new plans, still, when you tried both, you found the new so much better, that you gave up the old. Now," says he, "all I want of you is to examine both religions, and don't be content with holding your religion because your father held it before you; for if you act on that principle, you ought to go back to the old wooden ploughs again." "But," says Jerry, "Father John tells us one thing, and your reverence tells us another, and how are we to know which of you is right?" "How did you know which way of farming was best?" says the parson. "We tried both ways," says Jerry. "Very good," says he, "that's just what I want you to do with respect to religion; try what Father John tells you, and what I tell you, by your own Bible, and see which of us sticks closest to that; remember," says he, "all I want of you is to examine your religion; I'm not saying whether it is right or wrong, all I say is, EXAMINE IT; for," says he, "boys, remember that your souls are of more value than the whole world, and remember that those souls will be lost unless you're going the right way about having them saved, and remember that if your religion be right it will do it no harm to examine it;" and with that he left the house. So when he was gone, all the boys began talking; and, says Jerry, "I'm thinking that's not bad advice the minister gave us; for surely 'twill do our holy religion no harm to examine it." "Take my advice," says I, "and don't examine it at all; for," says I, "every one of the boys that began examining never stopped till they left it." "Why, then," says Ned Bryan, "'tis a bad sign of a religion, if the more you examine it, the less you like it." "True for you," says Jerry, "and I'm determined to get a Douay Bible by hook or crook, and examine for myself." "Jerry," says I, "if once you take to the Bible you'll never stop till you become a jumper." "Why, then," says he, "if our own Bible is against our Church, it's time to jump out of her; but," says he, "I'm sure the Bible is for us, if we only examined it; anyhow," says he, "I heard a verse out of it this day that I won't forget to the hour of my death—'What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and suffer the loss of his soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?'" I don't know, Mr. Editor, whether Jerry will have the courage to get the Bible; but if he does, I'll let you know.

Your humble servant to command,
DAN CARTHY.

ST. CYRIL ON PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I read your admirable paper with great pleasure, and derive much valuable information from the pages of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN; but there is, perhaps, no part of it I admire more than your manner of treating correspondents who write on controversial topics. The tone of Christian courtesy, the entire absence of all low, vulgar abuse, the concise method with which you fairly sum up an opponent's arguments, and the skill and learning displayed in your answers, must surely command the respect of every candid, well-informed man, whether he agrees with you or not.

These remarks I make with reference especially to the controversy going on some time between you and Mr. Power; that gentleman, indeed, deserves the courteous treatment he receives at your hands, for he is no contemptible opponent, and puts forward exceedingly well the very best and strongest arguments that can be urged in favour of his Church, avoiding the rock on which almost all his co-religionists split—unmeaning and unmeasured abuse; such painful vocabulary as men like Drs. Cahill, O'Connell, and Marshall think indispensable, when speaking of those that choose to differ from them.

Mr. Power has, to my mind, found it impossible to prove that the doctrine of purgatory was held by the early Christian Fathers, and I think that you have satisfactorily shown that the practice of praying for the dead did not, of necessity, arise from belief in a purgatorial region. In your last number he has chiefly built his argument on a passage from St. Cyril; but as you have already in a former number explained this passage, I need not say anything respecting it. It is quite evident, that if the Liturgy spoke one language and St. Cyril another, that so long as that Liturgy remained unchanged, the opinion of St. Cyril must be only regarded as the opinion of a private individual, and not that of the Church at large; but though the opinion of St. Cyril has great weight and high authority in this matter with Mr. Power, yet I am sure he would not receive his testimony where that testimony was opposed to the language of the public Liturgy. If we admit that St. Cyril in this instance spoke of purgatory, and that the passage could fairly be adduced as a proof that Cyril believed in the existence of such a place, would any one say that the doctrine was true because such a man held it? I should, for my own part, be very sorry to bind myself to a quarter of the statements made by St. Cyril; and we may see from his solitary example the danger of taking as guides any uninspired man.

What must any rational person think of St. Cyril—what value can be placed on his testimony—of what worth are his opinions—when he makes such outrageous statements as the following—viz., "That the state of virginity is equal to that of the angels; that when Christ descended into hell the door-keepers of that place, on seeing Jesus, all ran away in terror; that Simon Magus mounted in the air in a fiery chariot, drawn by a pair of dragons; that St. Peter and St. Paul dissolved his enchantments, and he fell to the ground, and broke his bones." And what must we say, but that St. Cyril was a very poor and left-handed friend to Christianity, when he considers that the resurrection is proved by St. Clement's absurd and utterly false account of the phœnix, and that one of the proofs of the truth of the crucifixion is, the fact of the world being full of the chips of the cross!

It is, indeed, high time that those who seek for the truth should look for other teachers than St. Cyril, and not take such a dull and credulous writer as an exponent worthy of the least attention. Many of the men who are styled "Fathers" of the Christian Church, are venerable only for their age, but never gave an opinion on Scripture of the slightest value, and were utterly unable to decide a controversy even in their own day; many of them having written things which prove that they were neither wise nor learned in their generation, compel us to ask of their productions the question put by a shrewd observer of human nature—

"Si meliora dies ut vina poemata reddit, Scire velim pretium chartis quotus arroget annus?"

Had some of the "Fathers" lived in the time of the apostles, if they occupied any station at all, it would have been in the arrangements of St. Paul, only in giving "judgments of things pertaining to this life;" such being the occupation of those who were "least esteemed in the Church."—1 Cor. vi. 4. How the lapse of centuries could render a foolish or unscriptural opinion of any value or authority, I must confess I never could understand.

Faithfully Yours,
C. A. M., C. T. R.

In inserting our correspondent's letter, we wish to explain why we have not taken up the line of defence which he suggests. We were quite aware that when the authority of any Father is quoted against us, it would in many cases be easy to show that the writer cited did not possess a sound judgment, and that many of his opinions and interpretations are false, and even ridiculous. We feared, however, that this line of argument would leave the impression on the minds of many of our readers that we were against the Fathers, only because we knew the Fathers to be against us. Now we are persuaded that this is not the case.

We are persuaded that it is just as hard to prove the peculiar doctrines of the Church of Rome out of the early Fathers as it is to prove them out of the Bible. We have, therefore, never shrunk from the appeal to antiquity. When any of our Roman Catholic correspondents can succeed in finding any of the peculiar doctrines of Romanism maintained by any writer of the first three centuries, it will then be time enough for us to enter into the further discussion what the opinion of that writer is worth, and how far we are bound to follow him.

AN ENLIGHTENED ROMAN CATHOLIC ARCHBISHOP.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—The following pastoral letter, addressed during the last year, by the Archbishop of Lucca, to the people of his diocese, in consequence of the re-appearance of the cholera and its dreadful ravages in Italy during last summer, may be acceptable to your readers, first premising a few words concerning the prelate from whom it emanates. Not many years ago he was known in Florence and other Italian cities as "Padre Giulio Arrigoni," of the order of Franciscans, and enjoyed a very high reputation as a popular preacher. Indeed, whenever, during Lent, he delivered a course of sermons either in the "Duomo," at Florence or in the Grand Duke's Chapel, the crowds of people that flocked to hear him (and amongst them hundreds of English and continental Protestants), could hardly be imagined. It was not, however, so much the superiority of his rhetoric, or the purity of his diction (for he spoke with a harsh Lombard accent) as the superiority of his matter and the purity of the doctrine he propounded from the pulpit, which excited the greatest interest and astonishment, and rivetted the attention of his numerous hearers. Often and often did the writer of these lines go to hear him preach, and often was he in raptures with the beauty and simplicity of the evangelical sentiments abounding in those sermons. Some of them (and even some English clergymen, who formed part of the audience, will bear him out in the statement) could have been preached, in their integrity, in any English Protestant Church, and not even the most rigid critic could have impugned their orthodoxy. The names of the Virgin Mary, or of the saints, were scarcely, if ever, mentioned—at least, "not as intercessors." The Saviour was pointed out as being all in all—our only example—our only way—our only hope. The follies and vices of the people, especially those by which the Italians distinguish themselves from other nations, were severely animadverted upon, and even the priests themselves did not escape his censure. If there was any defect in those discourses, it was that they sometimes had the character of what one would call moral dissertations. The text was always given out in Latin, which is customary in the Roman Church, and is another instance, amongst so many, of the utter reluctance that Church evinces against the Scriptures being heard "read, marked, learned, and inwardly digested" in the vernacular tongue, not even giving the people a chance of hearing a portion of it "by way of a text." "Bibliophobia" would not be an improper term for that characteristic aversion That such a style of preaching must have been highly displeasing in some quarters—that the plain-spoken "Padre" suffered persecution, nay, that he even received anonymous threats of being poisoned, or assassinated, if he persisted in that line—will, hence, not be surprising, and is too well known and remembered. On hearing him preach, one was forcibly struck with the idea, "That man knows the truth."

After this the question might naturally be asked; Why did the intolerant and wary Church of Rome appoint such a man to an office of that power and eminence? The reason perhaps, is, that in so doing it made him "less obnoxious," as troublesome commoners are sometimes got out of the way, by being raised to the peerage (the so-called full up stairs), or to lull the apprehensions of Protestants as yet "half inclined," and to allure them over, by seemingly patronizing evangelical principles, thus more effectually to hide the danger, lurking behind, that of "superstition and slavery." The reader of that circular will observe two points particularly striking—first, that the name of the Virgin or of any of the saints is not even mentioned, and secondly, that the archbishop attributes the scourge of the cholera to divine chastisement, looking upon it as a visitation for the sins of the people (not like the archbishop of Genoa, who, in his letter, attributes it to "the liberty of the Press!") It is also remarkable that he dissuades people from walking in procession and attending extraordinary church solemnities in great crowds, confessing naively that experience has proved such assemblages to be highly prejudicial to public health, and that people should pray, but not tempt God. I shall only add further, that recent accounts from the neighbouring city of Leghorn describe it as completely deserted in consequence of that visitation, that the greater part of the shops were closed, and that the railway companies have suffered to a large amount through the panic, the excursion trains having been discontinued, as there was no one to go by them.

'I am, sir, your obedient servant,
VIATOR.

The following is the translation of the letter alluded to.

PASTORAL LETTER OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF LUCCA.

"If, when scrutinizing our consciences without pride and self-deception, we feel that our guilty lives are the cause of that pestilence that comes every day nearer and nearer to us; if, to appease the divine anger roused against us, our first care ought to be to detest our wickedness, to implore God's forgiveness, and to make all the amends in our power, that does not dispense with our duty to use all those precautions which experience as well as the theories of men of science have pointed out as necessary for preserving these our frail bodies from the Asiatic cholera, which is threatening us at present, and, indeed, we find it written in Ecclesiasticus (xxxviii. 1, 2, &c.)—"Of the most High cometh healing. The Lord hath created medicines out of the earth, and he that is wise will not abhor them. The virtue of remedies belongs to the knowledge of men and the Lord has revealed their properties to them. With such doth he heal men, and taketh away their pains. My son, in thy sickness be not negligent, but pray unto the Lord, and he will make thee whole; leave off from sin, and order thine hands aright, and cleanse thy heart from all wickedness, and then give place to the physician; and let him not go from thee on account of thy necessity, for the highest Lord has created him."

Not wishing, therefore, to disregard those precautions which are universally recognised as useful for the preservation of our bodily health in the present dangerous contingencies, we have determined as follows:—

1. So long as in this our diocese the Asiatic epidemic has not ceased, we give everybody permission to eat meat on the forbidden days and each day that dispensation is taken advantage of, we desire (without fettering your consciences thereby) that you would recite an act of contrition, abominating all the iniquities that have called down God's anger upon us. And here, brethren and children, we cannot refrain from putting you in mind of the duty of temperance, which, if always a duty of a Christian conscience, is now also a certain means of preservation against the threatening mortality. We read again in Ecclesiasticus xxxi. 20, xxxvii. 30—"The pain of watching, and cholera, and pangs of the belly, are with an insatiable man—excess of meats bringeth sickness, and surfeiting will turn into cholera."

2. In case symptoms of cholera should have manifested themselves in any locality, we forbid all processions and extraordinary religious ceremonies likely to attract great crowds of people, since it has now become an historical well-ascertained fact that such assemblages are prejudicial to public health, on account of the facility of contagion. We ought to pray, but not to tempt God.

3. We recommend to the parish priests and sacristans the attending most particularly in the present time to the cleanliness and decency of the churches, taking care to have them properly ventilated, especially during the time of public worship.

4. We order all priests to recite in the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice of the Altar instead of the prayer—"A domo tua," the following:—"Pro vitanda mortalitate," and that until the cessation of the present epidemic. And here, permit us, dearest, again to remind you that "sin is a reproach to any people" (Proverbs xiv., 34)—that, let the Almighty cast us down or lift us up, let Him afflict or comfort us, it is always for our benefit—that He wills not the death of a sinner, but that he should be converted and live. O combat, therefore, with the energy of your souls an evil endangering our mortal existence; humble yourselves under the omnipotent hand of God; reform your lives, and the scourge which appals us now with so many horrors will be changed for us into a mercy and we shall afterwards be able to give thanks and rejoice for those days of sorrow and affliction.

The all-merciful God grant you peace, concord, charity, tranquillity of mind, resignation such as, with our blessing, we wish you all to obtain from on high.

Lucca, from our Archiepiscopal Palace,
August 16, 1854.

✠ T. Giglio, Archbishop.
Carlo Biscotti, Chancellor of the Diocese.

A PORTUGUESE MIRACLE!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—Allow me to send you a short story, illustrative of the modern miracles which you have been lately exposing in your paper.

In Lisbon, the priests, some years ago, found, or pretended to have found, an image dug up from the earth, and proclaimed it to be the effigy of an eminent saint. It was, accordingly, set up in one of the churches, where crowds of devotees assembled to offer their devotions. To his saintship was referred the decision of the then disputed point—"Who was the legitimate monarch of Portugal?" The officiating priest put the question in an audible voice—"Is Don Pedro the lawful sovereign of the realms? The saint shook his head as a negative indication. "Is Don Miqual the sovereign?" The image nodded assent. This was repeated on various occasions to increased congregations, and was considered by the multitude as an astonishing miracle. At one time, in the presence of my informant, the first inquiry had been replied to as usual; to the second, no answer was returned, upon which the priest several times repeated the question, and at length assumed great vehemence of manner, when a boy popped out his head from behind the curtain, and exclaimed, "It is not my fault, sir, the string is broken."

Possibly, sir, the winking image of the Virgin, at Rimini, may have ceased to wink from some similar reason. Can any of your readers inform me whether any Italian priest has ventured to expose this imposture in the same manly way in which the French Abbé Deleon seems to have done that of our Lady of La Salette—alias Constance Lamerliere!

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
Scrutator.

THE WAY TO SAVE LIVES IN THE CRIMEA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Honoured Sir—I got your paper to read a couple of times from a friend, and I was greatly took with it; for your honour seems to be very kind to poor men like myself, who has but very little larning. Well, sir, when I seen Dan Carthy's letter in your paper, says I to myself, he is a kind, good gentleman to print such a poor man's letter, and maybe he would be good enough to print a letter for me too—moreover, as my letter may do some good for the poor soldiers who are fighting to death out in the war.

The way, your honour, that I came to know about doing the soldiers so much good entirely was, as I'll tell you straight.

The other day a woman came to me, and says she—"Humphrey, dear, I came to trouble you for to write a couple of words for me to my son, who is fightin with the Rooshins in Sebastable; 'tis only a couple of words," says she, "I have to tell him, and you won't be a minute writing it," says she. So, your honour, I began to write the letter as well as ever I could; for I thought it would look mighty disgraceful entirely to send a bad letter so far away. I filt up the paper, and was going to give it the finishing stroke, and says I—"I am going to put your name to it now." "Oh, Humphrey, avourneen," says she, "for the love of all the saints keep a little corner of it empty a while, for I am sending him something," says she, "and I want you to explain it to him." "But," says I, "I filt it all up, only one little bit that will be hardly long enough for your name." "And," says she, "will you fill another piece of paper for me, for I want to send him a thing that will save his life." With that, your honour, when I heard that she was to save his life, "of course I will write," says I." Well, sir, when I began to write she pult a little weeney bit of a red silk purse out of her bosom, that was for all the world as big as a tailor's thimble; "and," says she, "Humphrey, agra, tell my son that I am sending him the blessed stones of Barigowen well inside in this purse; and tell him, that if he'll receive them, and wear them in this purse round his neck with the same faith that his own mother is sending them to him, that there will be no fear of him, please God; and that he will come home safe and sound again; for any one that ever wore them blessed stones about his neck could not be harmed." Well, your honour, I looked mighty curious at the little purse, and I thought it very quare entirely that a small little bit like that could save one's life. To be sure I knew that Biddy Corcoran, and many of the neighbours, took her lame child there to be cured; but I never heard that the little pebbles had any power at all; and so I says—"Is it in earnest you are, or do you think them stones will save him?" "Oh," says she, "I am sure if they overtake him alive that there will be no fear of him." Well, then I remembered to hear many one say that the priest wouldn't let one go to a well; "and," says I, "I'll bet my life Father Mick won't let you send the stones, nor go to the well at all at all." With that, sir, she gave a jump, "and," says she, "'deed, then, Father Mick knows that I gave rounds at the well for my son, and that I sent him the *lining of the well in a letter, and he did not say 'ill you did it' to me when I told him of it." Well, I hadn't a word to say when I heard that Father Mick knew all about it. So I stopt for a while, "and," says I, "after all, I am thinking it might be better for you to pray to God to spare your son to you than to be sending those little stones; for I read somewhere that God is mighty jealous of his honour; and, perhaps, you or your son may lose your life by provoking him against you." With that, sir, she looked very cross; "and," says she, "I will send the stones at any rate, for I am sure they will do the good." So, then, when I saw that she could not be put off, and that she kept a firm hold of the purse, I told her son that his mother was sending him the stones of Barigowen well, and that she said they would save him from the Roosbea bullets. Since she sent off that letter, she sent for the priest to say Mass for her son; so that between the stones and Mass I suppose he is all right. To finish, sir, the reason I send this account to you is, that, if you think the stones could save our poor countrymen who are fighting in the trenches, you would advise the people to send them off at once; they wouldn't increase the postage much, for a little sample of them would save ever so many.

I remain, sir, your humble servant till death,
Humphrey Leary.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR JULY.

(From the Irish Farmer's Gazette).

In the more favoured districts this is the principal month for hay-making, some general directions for which we gave in our last impression, and would recapitulate the principal points necessary to attend to, which consist in preserving the nutritious saccharine matter, by cutting before the principal grasses form woody fibre. Cut as close as possible, tedding it out after the scythe, gathering it up into windrows or lap-cocks, before the dew begins to fall, to keep airing it, and gradually increasing the size of the cocks each day, so as to permit the expulsion and evaporation of the superabundant water, and retain the concentrated juices and colour; avoid cutting in wet weather, and lose no time, after being properly seasoned, in permanently securing it in ricks, to prevent waste and deterioration in quality.

Weeds now spring up in every direction, and should be quickly destroyed by hand or horse hoeing, or scuffling between the crops, and by the scythe or reaping-hook along the ditches, pastures, or roadsides, and thistles and docks pulled out of the corn; the earlier in their growth weeds are destroyed the better; but none should be allowed to mature their seeds—"one years' seeding entails seven years' weeding"—and not only seven but many more years. Weeds make a great addition to the manure heap, if gathered before perfecting their seeds; but if the seeds are matured, or nearly so, they must be burned.

Potatoes, if planted early, will have their second earthing given long since, whether in drills or ridges; but no time should now be lost in doing so, where that operation has been neglected.

Mountain or Bog Land, in a state of reclamation, may still be pared and burned, when the ashes should be spread, and either ploughed or dug in, well pulverised with the harrows and roller, and sown with rape—to be eaten off by sheep—cut and carried for house feeding or let stand for a seed crop.

Rape or Cabbage plants sown last month may be planted after the early potatoes are dug, or in land lately occupied with winter vetches, removed too late for sowing turnips.

Cabbages of the dwarf or large York varieties should be sown in rich, well-tilled beds by the middle of the month, for planting out in September and October; they give a large amount of nutritive feeding to sheep or lambs in April and May.

A Digest of the Evidence,

TAKEN BEFORE

THE SELECT COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS,

APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO THE WORKING OF THE NATIONAL SYSTEM OF EDUCATION

IN

WITH ADDENDA AND APPENDIX.

BY THE

REV. WILLIAM LE POER TRENCH, D.D.,

Rector of Killercran, Diocese of Tuam, and one of the Honorary Secretaries of the Church Education Society for Ireland.

"Dr. Trench has extracted the Substance of the Evidence, on the subject of Public Education in Ireland, and has produced it in a concise and systematic form. His 'Digest' is intended to enable persons interested in the Educational movement in progress in Ireland, to understand, at a glance, the results of the inquiry alluded to."—Athenæum.

"The invaluable 'Digest of the Evidence,' by Dr. Trench, has placed the substance of the 'Blue Book' in a clear, comprehensive form before all those who are interested in this great question. It was a work of great labour, of no ordinary patience, and requiring the utmost discrimination. But the result has been eminently successful. The plan of the 'Digest' is admirable; and the subjects so well classified, that immediate reference can be made to the most important evidence on every branch of the inquiry. It is a volume which will never lose its interest, so long as there is a friend of Scriptural Education to be encouraged, and an advocate of a godless expediency to be put to shame."—Christian Examiner.

Important Work on Controversy.

In the Press, and will be ready shortly,

THE "CONTROVERSIAL CORRESPONDENCE,"

Between R. W. KENNARD, Esq., London, and the Rev. PAUL MACLACHLAN, Roman Catholic Priest, Falkirk.

In Demy 8vo., price 5s. to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY.

This correspondence, conducted with great ability on both sides, has, at length, terminated by the withdrawal of the Rev. Mr. Maclachlan from the contest, who has republished the whole of his letters, WITHOUT THOSE OF MR. KENNARD! As such a proceeding is evidently unfair, it is intended that the entire correspondence, consisting of about 70 letters, shall be published, so as that the nature of the Controversy may be thoroughly understood by all parties.

Dr. Irving writes—"This is a remarkable publication. Mr. Maclachlan is sufficiently skilled in the Romish arts of controversy; but in logical dexterity, and even in theological learning, the priest is no match for the Protestant layman."

The Rev. John Evans writes—"This correspondence furnishes decidedly the best Handbook of the Romish Controversy yet extant."

The Venerable Dr. Croly says of Mr. Kennard's letters—"I sincerely admire their learning, reasoning, and spirit of Christianity; and I know of no production fitter to produce a more ample assurance in the mind of any man open to rational conviction." It has also been characterized as the "most important controversy that has taken place since the days of Stillingfleet."

The Controversy embraces the modern arguments of Romanists, having reference more particularly to History than Doctrine; and the Book will form an excellent companion to Dr. Cumming's Controversy with Mr. French, known as the Hammersmith Discussion, which is exclusively Doctrinal.

The Work is now publishing in one Volume, Demy 8vo, and will contain above 700 pages, with a copious and useful Index. Price 5s. to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY.

The names of Subscribers are requested to be sent as early as possible to WILLIAM CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

WHAT GUIDE SHALL WE FOLLOW?

MANY years since, we happened to spend a few days, in company with a friend, in exploring the magnificent scenery of the Savoy Alps. One fine morning we crossed the pass of the St. Gothard, which leads from the valley of Andermatt, in Switzerland, to the pretty Italian village of Airolo. At this village we parted company, as our friend wished to return by another route, in order to see a waterfall in the mountains; but we agreed to meet for supper at Andermatt. Hours passed away, but our companion never appeared; and we did not meet again for several days. It seems that he had engaged a guide at Airolo, to conduct him to the waterfall, who professed to be well acquainted with all the passes of the mountains, but who, in point of fact, was utterly ignorant. Darkness came on; and, after much wandering, they found themselves on the brink of a tremendous precipice, at the bottom of which they could hear the roar of a wild mountain torrent. The false guide was seized with terror; he threw himself on his knees, and exclaimed, in all the agony of despair, "O signor, siamo perduti!"—"We are lost, sir; we are lost!"

The above anecdote affords us a good example of the obvious rule, which travellers are sometimes apt to forget, that we ought not to take a guide merely upon trust; but that we ought to have some guarantee for his knowledge of the road, before we submit ourselves to his guidance. And we desire, in connection with it, to call the attention of our readers to a point of great practical importance, which we have more than once discussed in this journal—namely, what guide has God provided for us in our journey heavenward?

It is acknowledged on all hands, that man needs a guide in religion. Natural reason is, of itself, unable to instruct him what he is to believe and what he is to practise. In order to make up for its deficiencies, God has been graciously pleased to give mankind a revelation of His will, which is contained in the Holy Scriptures. Roman Catholics and Protestants both acknowledge that the Bible is the Word of God; and that it is the duty of Christians to believe the doctrines which it teaches, and to perform the duties which it enjoins, if they desire to attain to eternal salvation.

So far all professing Christians are agreed. But here Roman Catholic divines go a step further. The Bible alone, say they, is an unsafe guide, for a man may misunderstand what it says; and it is an insufficient guide, for it does not tell him all that he wants to know. There must be a living, infallible guide, which can speak with authority, and save a man from all risk of danger and error; and this guide is the Church.

Now, it has always appeared to us, that the Roman Catholic system, when reduced to practice, is open to the obvious objection, that it increases the danger against which it professes to guard. A man who trusts to his Bible is, at least, sure of this, that he has in his hands the very Word of God. If he opens the Gospels, he finds there the very words in which our blessed Lord instructed his disciples, while he was upon earth. If he opens the Epistles, he finds there the very words in which St. Peter and St. Paul instructed the Churches which they founded and established in the world. It is possible, doubtless, that he may not understand their full meaning; but he is, at least, sure of this, that, so far as he does understand them, he hears in them the very voice of God, speaking to his heart and conscience, and making known to him the truths that concern his everlasting peace.

Let us now take the case of a sincere, devout Roman Catholic, who seeks to learn the way of salvation. He has, we will suppose, the Douay Bible in his hands; he believes it to be the Word of God, and he knows that it will certainly guide him right, if he can understand it. He is told, however, that it is a very dangerous thing for him to rely upon his private judgment; and, therefore, he lays his Bible aside, and consults his priest. But is it not plain, that, by doing so, he gives up a certain, to follow an uncertain, guide? Even if we should grant, for the sake of argument, that the Pope and a general council are infallible, yet nobody ever believed or asserted, that every individual parish priest is infallible. For all practical purposes, a Roman Catholic who gives up his Bible, makes his priest infallible, and places him in the stead of God. But we all know that priests are fallible, mortal men, apt to err in judgment and conduct like other men. If a priest gives way to anger or intemperance, if his life should happen to be stained by faults or vices, why should a Roman Catholic conclude, that he will always prove an infallible guide to every member of his flock? Is it not possible, to say the least, that such a priest may be, like the Italian guide of whom we have spoken, ignorant of the true path himself, and, therefore, unable to direct others unto it?

Again, let us suppose the priest to be a grave, decorous, and well-informed man; grant him to possess all these and other good qualities; still, he is not infallible. He may tell his flock to believe something that they ought not to believe, or to do something which they ought not to do. Is it not safer, in such a case, to go to the unerring Word of God for advice and instruction? "Yes," a Roman Catholic may reply, "I grant it is safer to do so, if I could only understand it; but, then, the Bible is so very dark and obscure. Now, I can always understand what the priest tells me; and, therefore, I think it better to follow his instructions." But, surely, it is obvious to common sense, that a path is not necessarily safe because it is easy. Some books of Holy Scripture are, indeed, hard to be understood, as must always be the case when the finite mind of man seeks to comprehend the infinite. Is not the greater part of the Bible, however, written in such a plain and simple style, that even a child can understand it? Are we to believe that the Almighty cannot speak in such a manner in His Word, as to be intelligible to all devout readers? The greater part of the Gospel history contains an account of the discourses which were addressed by our blessed Lord to his disciples and to the Jews. It is plain that in these discourses He must have spoken in such a manner as to be understood by those to whom he spoke. And if his first hearers were able to comprehend the meaning of the "gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth," surely we, who read these very same words, as they are written in the New Testament under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, ought to be able to understand and to profit by them now.

And this brings us to the point which we wish especially to impress upon the minds of our readers in connection with this important subject. It is plain that religious teaching, like every other kind of instruction, may repose upon one or other of two principles, reason or authority. Protestants, who refer everything to the Word of God, appeal to the former. Roman Catholics, who rely upon the infallibility of the Church, take their stand on the latter. Now, the Gospel narrative places in the hands of every Roman Catholic a simple and satisfactory test for judging which of these two methods of instruction God intended us to follow. All Christians are agreed, that, if ever there was an infallible teacher in the world, that teacher was our Lord Jesus Christ. He who was "God over all, blessed for ever," who had created man, and who knew what was in man, came down from the bosom of the Father to teach men the way of salvation. He might have claimed implicit submission to his words, as the Sovereign Lord and Ruler of the universe. He might have said to his hearers—"Distrust your own reason: it will lead you astray. Look not to any former revelation made by Moses or the prophets: they are dark and obscure, and you cannot understand them; but listen to me. Do not ask for any confirmation of the truths which I teach you; let it be sufficient for you that it is I who speak them; any demand for further proof is wrong."

Such might have been the method of teaching pursued by our blessed Lord—a course founded on authority, and on authority alone. Such is the course now commonly pursued by the authorized teachers of the Church of Rome. They say—"Listen to the truths we teach: we speak in the Church's name, and by her authority. If you attend to what we say, you will be safe. If you ask for proof of our doctrines, you show a want of proper submission and teachableness of spirit. A true son of the Church is content with our authority. None but heretics ever appeal to reason."

But, what plan of instruction did our Lord actually take? Let us open the pages of the New Testament, and we shall find, beyond all contradiction, that he put the very highest honour upon the Word of God. He brought it forward upon every occasion; he derived from its teaching his arguments, his warnings, his precepts. In fact, we may confidently assert, that, so far as we can gather from the Gospel history, no inspired teacher ever made so much use of Holy Scripture as did our Lord, who might, had he thought fit, have dispensed with it altogether. He might have spoken to the Jewish multitudes with the voice of authority alone; he might have avoided all appeals either to reason or Scripture, and called upon his hearers, as they valued their eternal welfare, to obey his words, without further inquiry. And such is, in point of fact, the course which the Church of Rome always adopts whenever she possess the power to do so. But such was not the method of teaching pursued by Him who "spake as never man spake." His object was not to overbear the reason of his hearers by the language of authority, but to lead and convince them. And, as one of the chief instruments in this work—nay, as the very first and most effectual weapon—he deliberately chose "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God"—Ephes. vi. 17. We now proceed to furnish our readers with some examples of the fact we have alleged: if we were to bring forward all the passages which our Lord cited from the Old Testament, we should transcribe a considerable part of the Gospel history.

We are told, that, on one occasion (Luke x. 35), a Jew came to our Lord, with the inquiry, "Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" We can easily conceive the answer which the Church of Rome would give to such an inquiry. But what said our blessed Lord? He referred his inquirer to the written Word of God—"He said unto him, What is written in the law? how readest thou? And he answering, said, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself. And he said unto him, Thou hast answered right: this do, and thou shalt live." Our Lord plainly took for granted, that the man who came to him with this solemn question, was familiar with the revelation which God had already given; and that, if he searched aright, he would find in this Word an answer to all his inquiries.

Again, on another occasion (Matt. xix. 3), the Pharisees came to him, to know whether it was lawful for a man to put away his wife. Our Lord's reply, as before, was founded on Holy Scripture—"And he answered, and said unto them, Have ye not read, that he which made them at the beginning, made them male and female." At a time when books were scarce, and reading must have been attended with far greater difficulties than at present, the knowledge of the Word of God seems to have been diffused so widely among the Jews, that our Lord might, and did, safely appeal to their own familiar knowledge of its contents, as supplying them with a safe guide in the concerns of every-day life.

At another time, we read that the Sadducees, a sect of the Jews who did not believe in the resurrection, put a question to Christ, founded upon one of the laws of Moses, from which they attempted to draw a conclusion favourable to their own erroneous views.—Matt. xxii. 23, &c. And how did our Lord expose their error? He traces it up to their ignorance of the Word of God. "Jesus answered, and said unto them, Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures." We request our readers to study well these emphatic words, spoken by Him who was truth itself. Ignorance of the Word of God is the fruitful parent of error in religion, according to our blessed Lord; whereas, according to the teaching and practice of the Church of Rome, it is a dangerous thing for a man to read the Bible, lest it should lead him into error. All our readers, we doubt not, are sincerely anxious to be preserved from religious error. We ask them, are they prepared to use the means which our Lord has pointed out as the best and surest preservative from this danger?

Many charges were brought against our Lord by his enemies during the time of his ministry, and on almost all these occasions he defended his conduct by a reference to Scripture. At one time (Matt. ix. 11) the Pharisees censured him for eating and drinking with publicans and sinners. His reply was taken from the Prophet Hosea. "Go ye," saith he, "and learn what that meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice." On another occasion (Matt. xii. 3) he was reproached with a breach of the Sabbath, and, as before, he justified himself by examples from Scripture history. "Have ye not read what David did, when he was an hungered, and they that were with him? or have ye not read in the law, how that on the Sabbath days the priests in the temple profane the Sabbath, and are blameless?" Thus we see, that, at all times and circumstances, an appeal to the Word of God was the chief instrument used by our blessed Lord to convince the minds of his hearers, and to remove their prejudices against the truth.

The same course was adopted by him in the instruction of his own immediate followers. When he met his two disciples, for example, on the road to Emmaus, after his resurrection (Luke xxiv. 27). what was the subject of his discourse? We are told, that, "beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." In fact, there are few books of the Old Testament, from Genesis to Malachi, that our Lord did not quote or refer to, at some time or other, during the course of his ministry. And, in order to show that the reading of the Word of God was a duty incumbent upon all men, we need only refer, in conclusion, to his own emphatic words—"Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life; and they are they which testify of me."—John v. 39.

It is perfectly plain, therefore, that when a Protestant goes to the Bible, in order to learn the will of God, he can plead the express command and direction of our blessed Lord himself. But may not a Roman Catholic say, that he, too, has the sanction of Scripture for consulting his priest, and believing what he tells him? Thus, for instance, we find the following passage in a modern Romish Controversial Catechism*:—"In Malachi ii. 7, the people are commanded to seek the law from the lips of the priesthood. Now, surely, these commands to obey the pastors, or teachers, in the Jewish Church, evidently suppose that body to be infallible; for a good God could not command his people, under pain of death, to obey men who might lead them into error."

It is really marvellous to see a learned and acute writer advance an argument which is so obviously untenable. We ask Mr. Keenan, who were the persons most active in condemning our Lord to death? Why, the chief priests of the Jews—the very pastors and teachers who, according to Mr. Keenan, are evidently infallible! Pilate's words to our Lord were these—"Thine own nation and the chief priests have delivered thee unto me" (John xviii. 35); and St. Mark tells us, that "the chief priests, with the elders and scribes, and the whole council, bound Jesus, and delivered him to Pilate.—Mark xv. 1. The whole body of the pastors and teachers in the Jewish Church were the most active agents, therefore, in crucifying the Son of God, and bringing down on the whole nation the curse of innocent blood. And yet, Mr. Keenan has the assurance to state, that it was impossible for them to lead the people into error!!

In truth, if there be one fact more obvious than another throughout the whole of the Gospel history, it is this, that our blessed Lord, instead of commanding his disciples implicitly to obey the priests and pastors of the Jewish Church, and to submit to their authority without further inquiry, gave them the very opposite directions. He told them to "beware of the Scribes and Pharisees."—Luke xii. 1; xx. 46. He calls them "blind guides."—Matt. xxiii. 16. He charges them with hindering, rather than promoting, God's truth in the world, and denounces a seven-fold woe against them in consequence.—"Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites; for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in." —Matth. xxiii. 13. Yet, these men, whom our Lord, who was Truth itself, stigmatizes as "blind guides and hypocrites," Mr. Keenan, with admirable assurance, asserts to be "evidently infallible!!" We greatly fear, that, if this be his real opinion, he can be little better than a "blind guide" himself.

Our conclusion, then, is briefly this—A man who is in earnest about his soul's salvation, and is sincerely desirous to learn the truth, has two courses open before him. He may either have recourse to the Word of God, of which David, writing under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, declares—"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path" (Psalm cxix. 105); or he may neglect the Bible altogether, and give himself up into the hands of his parish priest, who may prove a "blind guide," like the infallible Jewish priests of old. We ask our readers, in all sincerity, as men in earnest for their souls' welfare—What guide shall we follow?

POPE PIUS IV. AND THE GENERAL COUNCILS.

THE ancient Catholic creed consisted of twelve articles.

There were two forms of that creed; one called "The Apostles' Creed," which is the simplest; the other called "the Nicene Creed," because it was professed in the first general council of the Church, held at Nice, in the year 325. This form is fuller in explanation, but contains the same twelve articles.

These twelve articles of faith were found to serve all the purposes of the Catholic Church for FIFTEEN HUNDRED YEARS. In the year 1546 the Council of Trent itself, at its first meeting, recited the Nicene Creed, declaring this creed to be "that summary in which all who profess the faith of Christ do necessarily agree, and that firm and ONLY foundation against which the gates of hell shall not prevail."*

Yet the Council of Trent was no sooner over than Pope Pius IV. published a new creed, adding TWELVE new articles of faith, which had never before been found in any Catholic creed; and this Pope Pius pronounces to be "the true Catholic faith, without which no one can be saved."†

One of the new articles is as follows:—"I likewise, undoubtingly, receive AND PROFESS all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons and general councils, and particularly by the Holy Council of Trent."‡

We showed in our number for October, 1853, p. 116, that no Roman Catholic has any means of knowing with certainty how many general councils there are, and that the Church of Rome herself has never been able to tell.

None of our Roman Catholic correspondents, clever and acute as they are, have ever attempted to deny this. If Roman Catholics cannot know what councils are general, and what are not, they cannot know what things have been defined by general councils; and in that case to make them "PROFESS ALL THINGS delivered, defined, and declared by the general councils," is to make them profess they know not what, and the Church cannot tell what. So the Catholic faith, without which no one can be saved, contains things of which no one—not even the Church—can say what they are! Yet to profess these things, is necessary to salvation.

This is a difficulty in the Roman Catholic creed that can never be got over, until the Church of Rome can succeed in telling what councils are general, and what are not.

But though the Church of Rome cannot give a list of the general councils, she ventures to say of some that they are general.

All Roman Catholics are agreed that these four councils are general councils—the Council of Nice, held A.D. 325; Constantinople, A.D. 381; Ephesus, A.D. 431; Chalcedon, A.D. 451.

Here, at least, we can know PART of what general councils have decreed, and our readers would, doubtless, like to know some, at least, of the things "delivered, defined, and declared" by the general councils.

The General Council of Nice, in its sixth canon, thus decreed:—"Let the ancient CUSTOMS prevail, that the Bishop of Alexandria should have power over all those who are in Egypt, Lybia, and Pentapolis—since that is the custom of the Bishop of Rome also; and in like manner in Antioch, and the other provinces, let their privileges be preserved to the Churches."§

In the library of the Vatican at Rome there is an ancient Latin translation of this sixth canon of Nice, which translation was made for the use of the Church of Rome, not very long after the Council of Nice was held. This translation is somewhat different from the one we have given above, it is as follows:—"It is an ancient CUSTOM that the Bishop of the City of Rome should have dominion, so as to govern by his own care the suburbicary places, and all the province; but that the Bishop of Alexandria should have the care of all places which are in Egypt; and in like manner concerning Antioch, and in the other provinces, let their own privileges be preserved to the metropolitan Churches."‖

The "suburbicary places" were the districts subject to the civil governor of the city of Rome, and included all places within a hundred miles of the city. Within these places were many bishops, and these were subject to the Bishop of Rome.

Thus the sixth canon of the Council of Nice "defined and declared" that the power of the Bishop of Rome over the bishops subject to him was "of ancient custom"—not of divine right. That canon of Nice also defined and declared that by the same "ancient custom" the Bishops of Alexandria and Antioch had the same charge and power in their provinces that the Bishop of Rome had in his.

These things are "delivered, defined, and declared" by the sacred canons and general councils. Therefore, let Roman Catholics remember that they are bound by the creed of Pope Pius IV. "undoubtingly to receive and profess" that the Bishop of Rome has the charge and government only of a limited district, which did not include Ireland, and that only by ancient custom; and let them not give heed to the Bishop of Rome when he claims to have the care of all the churches, as committed to him by divine right.

The fourth canon of the Council of Nice declares that bishops are to be constituted by the bishops of the province, and that the confirmation of all that is done by them is to belong to the metropolitan. Not a word about the Pope, who had then no power to interfere in the appointment of bishops except in the province of which he was metropolitan.

The Pope now claims the whole power of appointing bishops for himself; and at the same time requires every one "to receive and profess" what "the sacred canons and general councils" have delivered on the subject; which seems to us to be a mistake as respects his own claim, and hardly fair to others who are thus required both to receive and to reject the "sacred canon" on this subject.

The 13th canon of Nice provides "that the ancient and canonical law shall be observed, that they who are departing this life shall by no means be deprived of the rites of the Church."*

Every priest in Ireland has sworn "to receive and profess" this law: and, now that it is known, we trust that at the next general election no priest in Ireland will threaten to violate it.

The second canon of the General Council of Constantinople is as follows:—"Let those bishops who are over a province not meddle with the churches situated beyond their boundaries, nor confound the churches."†

The creed of Pope Pius IV. requires every one to receive and profess what is here delivered by the General Council of Constantinople; yet the Bishop of Rome is by no means willing to observe it himself.

This General Council of Constantinople wrote a synodical epistle to Damasus, Bishop of Rome, in which they "declare" that "the Church of Jerusalem is the mother of all other churches."‡ The creed of Pope Pius IV., therefore, requires all Roman Catholics "to receive and profess" that Jerusalem is the mother of all other churches; yet this same creed of Pope Pius IV. requires all Roman Catholics to acknowledge that the Church of Rome is the mother of all churches.

The seventh canon of the General Council of Ephesus is as follows:—"The holy synod has decreed that it shall not be lawful for any one to bring in, or to write, or to compose another faith, besides that which was defined by the holy Fathers assembled at Nice through the Holy Spirit. But whoever shall dare to compose or bring in another faith, or to offer it to those who wish to return to the knowledge of the truth from paganism, or Judaism, or from whatever heresy, if they are bishops or clergy, let them be deposed from being bishops or clergy; but if they be laity, let them be anathema."§

Pope Pius himself "composed another faith besides that defined at Nice," by adding TWELVE new articles to the Nicene Creed.

The Church of Rome now offers that creed to all who return from what she calls heresy, and requires them to profess it.

Yet this very creed of Pope Pius IV. requires every Roman Catholic to receive and profess this seventh canon of the General Council of Ephesus, which "defines and declares" that all who should compose, or offer such a creed, shall be condemned.

The eighth canon of the General Council of Chalcedon is as follows:—"Let the clergy of the hospitals, and of the monasteries, and of the martyries, remain under the power of the bishops who are in each city, according to the tradition of the Holy Fathers, nor let them presumptuously withdraw from their own bishop. But those who dare, by any means, to overthrow this constitution, nor subject themselves to their own bishop, if they be clergy, let them be subject to canonical punishment; but if they be monks or laity, let them be excommunicated."*

The Pope has since everywhere exempted the clergy of the monasteries from the authority of their bishops, in order that those clergy might be wholly dependent on the Pope himself; and the clergy of the monasteries have everywhere accepted that exemption from the authority of their bishops, in violation of this constitution, and of the "tradition of the Fathers." Yet the creed of Pope Pius IV. requires the clergy of the monasteries, and all other Roman Catholics, to "receive and profess" what this general council has delivered and declared—that the clergy of the monasteries should remain subject to their own bishops.

The twenty-eighth canon of the Council of Chalcedon says—"THE FATHERS by right gave privileges to the See of old Rome, BECAUSE it was the imperial city; and the hundred and fifty bishops most beloved by God (the General Council of Constantinople), moved by the same consideration, gave equal privileges to the most holy See of new Rome;† rightly judging that the city which is honoured with the empire and the senate, and which enjoys equal privileges with the old royal Rome, should, even in matters ecclesiastical, be exalted and magnified no otherwise than it, being the next to it."‡

Here we have the real nature and origin of the authority and privileges of the Bishop of Rome. THE FATHERS conferred those privileges on him (limited to his own province, as we have seen), because Rome was the imperial city. And for the same reason the Fathers at Constantinople and Chalcedon conferred EQUAL privileges on Constantinople when it became the imperial city.

"The general councils and sacred canons" have thus "delivered, defined, and declared" the real nature and extent of the privileges and authority of the Bishop of Rome; and these things all who receive the creed of Pope Pius IV. are bound "to receive and profess."

Probably our readers are now tempted to exclaim, "what could have possessed Pope Pius IV. when he was composing his new creed, to require Roman Catholics 'to receive and profess all things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons and general councils,' when he must have known that the canons and general councils delivered and declared such things as these?" We can understand their surprise; but still we think that Pope Pius IV. acted wisely in putting that in his creed—"for the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light."

It sounded very fine to have it in his creed that people should profess all that the sacred canons and general councils defined and declared; and Pope Pius might hope that Roman Catholics would never find out what things were really in the canons, but that they would go on supposing that the sacred canons and general councils had delivered that the whole Church was committed to the Pope by divine right.

And this has really been the case. For nearly 300 years, perhaps, of all the Roman Catholics who have professed the creed of Pope Pius IV., not one in ten thousand has known that the "sacred canons and general councils" have delivered and declared that the authority of the Bishop of Rome extends only to a part of the Church, and that that authority was given to him by the Fathers, only because Rome was the imperial city.

Thus it is that Roman Catholics have been hoodwinked, being taught to think that they were holding the things declared in the ancient canons, when, in fact, they were holding the very reverse; whereas we, who want people really to hold what the sacred canons and general councils delivered, are only anxious to show them what those canons contain.

We shall return to this subject, and show them something more out of the laws which the general councils made for the ancient Church.

THE YOUNG CONVERT.

SOME years since a Roman Catholic family emigrated to America. They were the relics of an old family once possessed of considerable influence and property; but, owing to a change of circumstances, the last representative—a man of much energy and good sense—became irretrievably embarrassed, and, having many children, resolved upon emigration. He took with him all his family except one little daughter, aged between five and six years, whom he committed to the care of an aunt—a lady of some property—who was attached to the child, and who promised to provide for her. This lady, a strict Roman Catholic, brought up the child truly, religiously, and affectionately, to the best of her judgment. When the girl was about seventeen years old, the Protestant clergyman of the parish—who was in the habit of holding evening lectures in his parish school-room—observed her on one or two occasions amongst the persons in attendance; and on inquiry he learned that she had been induced by one of her young companions to read the Scriptures; that she had been strongly affected in reading them; that she had been led to attend several of the lectures, and had, at length, become, in all but the name, a Protestant.

She was a person of very prepossessing appearance—gentle, timid, and retiring, but an universal favourite amongst her equals in station—that is, amongst the class of inferior shopkeepers in a small town. The outline of her subsequent history is thus described by the clergyman:—

"One evening, as I visited one of my sick people, I observed her enter and seat herself to listen to me as I prayed and read the Scriptures.

"The subject led me to speak of the love of the Saviour as shown in his leaving the heavens, dwelling among fallen men, suffering death for us on earth, and now (as our High Priest in the heavens) interceding for us. In speaking of the institution of the Lord's Supper, I pressed upon my hearers that the graces and blessings for the communicants were not through the mere elements or material things, but through the faith developed in the tone and spirit of their souls when thus engaged. While thus expressing myself, I was asked by an elderly man who sat beside me to explain the words, 'this is my body,' and 'this is my blood.' He added that Roman Catholics understood these words strictly and literally, and that all the graces and blessings were, in their view, derived to us through the consecrated and transubstantiated elements, and did not depend on the belief or unbelief of the communicant. He said that he asked the explanation for the sake of others present as well as for himself.

"I stated, in reply, that we Protestants understood that our Lord designed the sacrament to be a commemoration of his death on the cross. On giving the bread he said, 'Do this in remembrance of me;' so that we have his own words for believing this sacrament to be a commemoration or memorial of his death on the cross. When he said—'Take, eat, this is my body,' he meant to convey that we were to partake of that sacrament, receiving the bread as the memorial of his body that was broken on the cross; and when he said—'Drink ye all of this, for this is my blood,' he meant that we were to partake of that wine as the memorial of his blood that was shed on the cross. This is the true and natural interpretation of the words, involving no contradictions, conformable to the usages of language, and in accordance with the customs of the Jews. Nothing is more common than the habit of calling the memorial or representation of a thing by the name of the thing itself. Thus, if we enter St. Paul's cathedral, or Westminster Abbey, we look on a statue, and say, 'This is Nelson;' on another, and we say, 'This is Marlborough;' and so, when we look at the pictures in a gallery of paintings, we are told that one is 'Wellington,' another the 'Queen;' and we never suppose our informant means to tell us these lifeless pictures are really the Duke or the Queen. And if Roman Catholics point out to us the images or pictures of Mary, of Peter, or of our Lord, using the words—'This is the Blessed Virgin,' 'This is St. Peter,' 'This is Christ,' they mean to convey nothing more than that these images or pictures are the representations of those persons they name, not the persons themselves.

"This mode of expression is also of frequent occurrence in the works of the sacred writers. In the history of Abraham we read—'This is my covenant, which ye shall keep, between me and you and thy seed after thee; every man child among you shall be circumcised. And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; and it shall be a token of the covenant betwixt me and you.'—Gen. xvii. 10, 11. Circumcision is here in one verse called a covenant; and in the next a token of a covenant. This form of expression is so constantly used in every part of the sacred volume, that the difficulty is in making a selection. 'These bones are the whole house of Israel.'—Ezek. xxxvii. 11. 'The rough goat is the King of Grecia.'—Dan. viii. 21. It is evident that these bones were not the reality, but the emblem of the house of Israel; and that this goat was not substantially, but only in the way of representation, the King of Greece. So when our Lord says—'I am the door,' and 'I am the vine, ye are the branches,' it is self evident that he did not mean that he was literally, truly, substantially changed, or transubstantiated into a door or vine; or that his people were transubstantiated into the branches of a vine. The same remark applies to the passages where it is said—'That rock was Christ,' and 'This Hagar is Mount Sinai.' We, therefore, argue that when our Lord gave the bread to his disciples, and expressly desired them to eat it in remembrance of him, he used the words—'This is my body,' intending to convey that it was to be a memorial or emblem of his body broken on the cross; and used the words—'This is my blood,' as meaning to convey that the wine was the memorial of that blood which was shed on the cross; and that every Christian, in partaking of these, should show his belief in the atonement and propitiation wrought in the death on Calvary, and should testify that he looked to it and relied on it for redemption, forgiveness, and salvation.

"My aged friend seemed to be satisfied with this explanation, but said there was a question often asked by his Roman Catholic neighbours, and as some of them were present, he would wish me, for their sakes, to resolve it. The question was, whether our Lord had not given to the clergy of his Church a power to turn the bread and wine into the body and blood, and soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ? To this I replied, that so extraordinary a thing, so great a miracle as turning bread into God—one that, if true, is the greatest miracle the world has ever seen—ought to be provable by evidence more clear and decisive than a mere expression capable of a figurative interpretation, as all must admit was the case with the words of our Lord. But even if we adopted, with Roman Catholics, the literal interpretation of our Lord's words, and adopted the notion that our Lord did truly, literally, change the bread into his own 'body and blood, and soul and divinity, and bones and nerves,' yet it would by no means follow, that because Christ, being God, was able to perform the miracle, every priest of the Church should also be able to perform the same miracle. He walked on the waters, stilled the waves and winds, multiplied the loaves and fishes so as to feed thousands, healed the sick, the blind, the deaf, the maimed, the leprous, and he raised the dead; it does not follow that the priests of the Church of Rome, or any other Church, can work any of these miracles. His having been able to perform, and having actually wrought those miracles, is no proof that priests can now perform miracles of a similar nature, or any miracles at all. Therefore, even if we suppose, for the sake of argument, that our Lord did work a miraculous transubstantiation on the occasion in question, this exercise, by him, of the Divine power is no proof that any being upon earth possesses now a similar power.

"A Roman Catholic who was present, here suggested that when our Lord said, 'Do this in remembrance of me,' he commanded them to do the same thing that he himself did, and, of course, must be supposed to have given them power to do it. Therefore, if he transubstantiated the bread and wine into his own body and blood, and soul and divinity, as the Church believes, then, he must have given the apostles power to do the same in remembrance of him.

"I replied that this expression of our Lord appeared to me simply to mean, that as he and his apostles were then solemnly sitting and eating together in holy communion, love, and brotherhood, so, in after ages, they should still meet together, and eat and drink together, in holy love and fellowship, in remembrance of his love in dying for them, in remembrance of his sufferings and death for their salvation; and that these words have no distinctly doctrinal or controversial intention, but simply desire all his loving and believing people to hold such holy and brotherly communion together in remembrance of him. I availed myself of the opportunity afforded me by this, to express myself on the importance of Christians cultivating a tone of mind and a habit of feeling, characterised by kindness, charity, and love, each of us showing, upon all occasions, and however engaged, our remembrance of Him who loved us and gave himself for us.

"On my way home I learned, what, indeed, I had suspected, that the young person already referred to was the one at whose desire the question was proposed to me as to the meaning of our Lord's words. It was the first time she had heard anything from me on a controversial subject. It led to much communication afterwards, and, at length, she openly avowed herself a Protestant, and became a regular attendant at my lectures in the school-room; though, in deference to her aunt's wishes, she did not attend the services of the Church.

"Her sufferings for the truth's sake soon commenced. Her aunt threatened, and her priest argued. She bore the threats of one she dearly loved with a sweetness and meekness and, at the same time, with a depth of affection that was a knife in her very heart; but she replied to the arguments of the priest always with some appropriate passage of the Scriptures, and ever with a quiet and gentle spirit. Indeed, it was not in her nature to do otherwise. The result was a system of slow but ceaseless persecution, originating, no doubt, in the best intentions, but not the less bitter and unrelenting. She was at first compelled to long fasts; she was then deprived of her shoes and necklaces, to prevent her attending the lectures; and, at length, her aunt turned her out of doors, and refused any longer to support her.

"Her condition now can more easily be imagined than described. Separated from her parents, brothers, and sisters, by the broad Atlantic, left wholly destitute, she could but at first sit down and weep bitterly. After a while she calmed her heart and turned to Him who desired her to cast all her care on Him, knowing that He careth for us. She remembered the words of the Psalmist—'I have been young and now am old, yet never saw I the righteous forsaken or his seed begging bread.' These words, she told me afterwards, were like the tree in a sunny evening after a day of rain; the breath of evening shakes the leaves, and all becomes a shower of sparkling diamonds. She felt assured that God would raise up some means of deliverance. As she comforted herself with these thoughts, one of my poor people, very poor, took her to her own home, and told her she should have a home with her own three daughters as long as she needed it.

"All this was immediately communicated to me. Every effort was made to soften the feelings of her aunt, but she refused to give way, unless upon the condition of the young girl's return to the Church of Rome. I made arrangements, unknown to the girl, that her maintenance should be no additional expense to the Christian family who sheltered her; but I felt it was not advisable to do more than was barely necessary for her subsistence till she could amply prove to the world the sincerity of her profession by suffering for it. She now regularly attended the parish church, and the evening lectures in my schoolroom; but such was the disgraceful state of the country, and such the supineness of the authorities, that every evening, as my little congregation issued from the schoolroom, a double line of men and women, ranged outside the doorway, assailed her with yelling, hooting, jeering, and opprobious names and epithets; and nothing would have saved her from personal violence but the steadiness and determination of some of the men of my congregation. This system continued many weeks, till the people got tired of persecuting her, when they saw it produced no effect, and when the priest gave up all hope of reclaiming her.

"I now began to consider what was best to be done for the ultimate provision of one who had proved the sincerity of her profession, and had thus withstood all means and all efforts to induce her to abandon her adopted faith. While I was thinking over her case, in the midst of doubt, and misgiving, and perplexity, an unseen hand was interposing in a mysterious way for her deliverance.

"One morning, as I sat in my study, a man was announced, and entered. After a pause, and a rather rough salutation, he sat down, and I had time to examine him. He had the appearance of a skipper of a merchantman, with a free, frank, and rough manner; but I could see there was something at his heart; for, with all his free manner, there was something like a tear starting to his eyes. I felt disposed to like him, and I asked him his name and business.

"'My name,' he said, 'is ———, from the State of Ohio.'

"I instantly recognised the name, and asked if he was not the person who had emigrated from that parish many years before, and had left one daughter behind.

"He said he was the very man. He had lost his wife, and was now come back to the old country to recover his child and bring her to America to keep house for him, his other children being all married and settled in that country.

"The God of love and mercy had himself opened out the best and fittest provision for the young creature. Her father had come for her!

"He told me he had arrived that morning and had gone at once to see his child at her aunt's. He expressed himself shocked and indignant at the conduct of her aunt in turning her out, and exposing her to poverty, and destitution, and temptation, for no misconduct, no crime, but merely because she had changed her religion. He turned to me and, with emotion, with a fearfulness of manner, as if afraid of my answer, and yet with the yearning of a father's heart, asked me about his child's character, and what had become of her? I told him in a few words. Never will I forget the effect produced by them. The strong, rough man was subdued, melted into tears, and sobbed like a child. I felt now that I had a duty to perform to the child as well as the father. I hoped, in his then state of feeling, to exact from him a promise not to interfere with the religion of his daughter. He smiled good-humouredly, and told me I need be under no apprehension; that in America no man interfered with the religion of another; that there, every man was free, and that, indeed, so many Roman Catholics read the Scriptures, and attend Protestant worship and preaching, that it would be impossible to interfere with them. He further, in answer to my inquiries, told me that where he had settled there was no regular Church, but clergymen of different Churches made periodical visits to the district. One week a Church of England clergyman came to the house of one settler, and all the other settlers attended there for worship; the next week a Presbyterian or a Wesleyan minister came to another house, and all met there for another form of worship. He stated that he and his family never wished or cared to see a Roman Catholic priest, but that they acted like all the other settlers, and went wherever they had the preaching; feeling that every one of the pastors who visited them was a good earnest man; and he added, 'my little girl shall always go with us to meeting if you have no objection, for all my children always do so.'

"The meeting of the father and child was a happy one for both parties. Within a few days he had his daughter well dressed, and they caused no small sensation in the place. In faith, and hope, and charity, as well as in prayer, we soon parted, and he returned with his now happy child to the land of his adoption."

ROMAN CATHOLIC MORAL THEOLOGY.

WE promised last month to return to the subject of equivocation and mental reservation, as taught by St. Liguori, and we proceed to fulfil our engagement. We do not think it necessary to add to the examples given in our last article, or we could give many other instances (some of them grotesque enough) of equivocations which St. Liguori pronounces to be perfectly innocent. But our readers will remember that the general drift of his teaching is, that provided there be a sense in which our words are true, it is no matter how false an impression we may leave (and intend to leave) upon the mind of the person with whom we are conversing. We beg it to be distinctly understood, however, that Romish doctors do not permit equivocation to be used on all occasions. We are bound, they tell us, to speak truth sometimes, and to some people. Thus, if we are interrogated by a person who has a "right to demand the truth" from us, we are bound to tell it. The Rambler, in his defence of Liguori, is careful to remind us that "the relation of a parent to a child, of a master to his servant, of a judge to a witness, of a physician to a voluntary patient, even (say) of a bankrupt's creditors to a bankrupt, is quite different to that of persons who are in a condition of perfect equality, and who are bound by no peculiar engagement to one another. St. Alphonsus all along presupposes that the person whom we have a design to mislead, is one who has no kind of right over us, and who, therefore, ought to be prepared for equivocal replies, and to be content to be thrown on his own wits for discovering the precise truth."

We, therefore, beg our readers to put out of the question, for the present, those cases, where the one party has some special right to information from the other; what we are now discussing is, what is right and allowable in the ordinary intercourse of society between persons who meet on a footing of perfect equality, and who are bound by no peculiar engagement to each other. In this case we have it even plainer from Liguori's defenders than from Liguori himself, that it is allowable to "design to mislead" each other—that we ought to be prepared for equivocal replies, and be content to be thrown on our own wits for discovering the precise truth. Such is the pleasant state to which the intercourse of society is reduced where the teaching of Liguori is received. And this teaching does not always remain mere theory, but is carried into practice; and very necessary it is that any persons who have occasion to converse with disciples of Liguori should know what they have to expect, and how they are to exercise their own wits to elicit the truth from the statements made to them.

As an illustration of the practical application of Liguori's maxims, we can cite no more instructive example than the case of Cardinal Wiseman and Mr. Taylor, which we had occasion to notice for another purpose.—Vol. ii., p. 42. The history is as follows:—Mr. Taylor, of Weybridge, had a family of two sons and three daughters, and had made a will dividing his property among his children, as was natural. However, when in his eighty-first year, after a protracted illness of twelve months, and but three months before his death, he altered his will, giving his children only a life interest in his property, the ultimate reversion being given to the Vicar Apostolic of the London District. During the excitement consequent on the Papal aggression, in the year 1850, the circumstances of the case began to be whispered abroad. It was said that five children of an aged father had been disinherited, and that Cardinal Wiseman and his Church were to reap the benefit. Upon this, an English dissenter, a Mr. John Dean, who had heard the rumour, took the straightforward course of writing to the cardinal, mentioning the report, and saying that he would be glad to be put in a position to contradict it. To this application the cardinal replied in a letter, from which we gave the following extract:—

"DEAR SIR—I am much obliged for your manly and straightforward application to me. I never in my life saw, nor spoke to, nor corresponded with the late Mr. Taylor. I am not named in his will. Since coming to London I have had the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Mr. Taylor's excellent family. I am on terms of perfect good understanding with Mr. James Taylor, the supposed disinherited son, who, with his sisters, enjoys every farthing of his father's property."

We are bound to believe that Cardinal Wiseman had no intention to deceive Mr. Dean, but only to permit him to deceive himself, as that gentleman forthwith proceeded to do. He inferred from the cardinal's letter that the story of Mr. Taylor's property being given to the Church of Rome was a mere fabrication; and he sent his letter to a dissenting journal, The British Banner, which published it, with observations denouncing the report in question as a malignant lie. And yet, all the time, the story was substantially true. Dr. Wiseman, no doubt, was not named in the will, but yet Mr. Taylor's bequest was vested in him as the Vicar Apostolic of the London District, which office Dr. Wiseman then held. And though Mr. Taylor's children were, at the moment, in possession of their father's property, they held it but for their lives; and if, at the moment the cardinal wrote, the property had been sold and divided between the tenants for life, and those entitled in remainder, two thirds of the proceeds would have gone into the cardinal's pocket.

Mr. James Taylor, the son, published a letter, from which we gave the following extract:—

"The will contains no power enabling me to make any provision whatever in favour of a wife or children; but, on the contrary, my life estate is coupled with very stringent provisions against any attempt at incumbrance or alienation. Such a will appears to me to create, not a supposed, but a real and effectual disinheritance, and such I have always felt it to be. I should add, that the will was executed by a most kind and affectionate parent, after he had attained the age of eighty years and upwards, and when his mind was affected by severe illness, and in immediate contemplation of that great change, the approach of which renders the strongest and best prepared wholly unable to resist any influence which may be brought to assume the sanction of religion."

Now, we do not mention this story because it appears to us to be discreditable to Cardinal Wiseman. It is contrary to our principles to assail the character of individuals, nor would it advance our cause in the least, were we to resort to such a line of argument. Could we bring instances by the dozen of distinguished Roman Catholic ecclesiastics who had been guilty of gross crimes, a Roman Catholic might very justly reply—'There are bad men in all communions; but all this proves nothing against the truth of our religion; there was even a Judas numbered among the apostles.' If, then, Cardinal Wiseman had done anything which he knew to be wrong, and which his Church condemned as wrong, we should not have said anything about it. But the case is very different when Roman Catholic divines teach that to be innocent which we know to be wrong—when they teach it to others and practise it themselves. It is the system then that is in fault, and not the man. When Protestant writers look into Liguori and such like books, they are met by Roman Catholic divines with the assertion, that Protestants do not rightly understand Roman Catholic works of theology, and that they put wrong interpretations on them. It is, then, an excellent plan to compare the theoretical instructions of the theological books with the practical conduct of those whose business it is to explain them; and when we find the two agree, we cannot doubt that we have the right interpretation of the former.

We shall not insult the moral sense of our readers by formally proving to them that such an answer as that given by Cardinal Wiseman was wrong—that it is wrong to compliment a man for his manliness and straightforwardness in putting a question to you, and then to proceed by your answer to lead him astray as far as you can. But, according to St. Liguori, such conduct was perfectly innocent and justifiable; nor do we think that Cardinal Wiseman would have acted as he did, had he not thought so too. And, we say with confidence, that Cardinal Wiseman's confessor was not entitled (according to the rules of his Church) to censure him for a breach of truth in what he said, although, no doubt, he might find fault with his want of prudence in not ascertaining that Mr. Taylor would be silent before he committed himself by his letter to Mr. Dean. Mr. Dean was neither the cardinal's parent, nor his judge, nor his confessor, &c., but a mere equal, who, on Liguori's principles, had no right to truth, and who could not complain if he met with equivocation. We challenge, then, the defenders of Liguori, in place of wasting their time in fictitious examples, to say whether this real example is to be approved or condemned on Liguori's principles; and if they are forced to defend it (as they must), then we conclude that the morality taught by Roman Catholic divines, and practised by their prelates, is far below that which is practised by English gentlemen whom they call heretics.

But, in the ordinary intercourse of society, it is not merely equivocations which meet with indulgent treatment from Roman Catholic moralists. Lying itself is but a venial sin. It is true that there are some lies which are mortal sins; for instance, a malicious lie told to injure our neighbour, would be a mortal sin; but then it is the malice and the intention to do injury which changes the character of the act. A mere lie is only a venial sin, unless there is some special reason to the contrary. Now, Protestants are not all acquainted with the essential difference between mortal and venial sins in Roman Catholic teaching. "A mortal sin puts a man out of the grace of God; on account of its grave importance, destroys favour and friendship with God, and deserves eternal punishment; a venial sin, on account of its insignificant importance, does not take away favour or friendship, though it diminishes our fervour of charity, and deserves temporal punishment." A mortal sin takes away the principle of spiritual life; a venial sin is so light a thing that it need not even be confessed. Supposing that we admit, for the present, the justice of this distinction, in which class should we expect lying to be found? Surely no reader of Scripture can suppose a sin to be merely deserving of temporal punishment which he knows to be threatened by God in such words as these—"All liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." "There shall in nowise enter into [the heavenly city] anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie." "Without are murderers, and idolators, and whatsoever loveth and maketh a lie." Such is the language of the Bible concerning lying; and how comes it that Roman Catholic divines treat it so much more tenderly? We have done our best to find their reasons, and will give our readers the result of our inquiries. We first give an extract from a work of Father Faber, just published, called "The Blessed Sacrament," of which we hope to give a more detailed account before long. Father Faber's own language on the subject of truthfulness is quite satisfactory, and more in accordance with the teaching of the Church in which he was brought up than of that into which he has now betaken himself. But in the course of his disquisitions on the subject, he makes use of the following words, which have quite puzzled us, and which we submit to the ingenuity of our readers:—

"I think it is St. Augustine who says, somewhere, that the devil so envied God the possession of his beloved Word, that he strove to mimic the eternal generation of the Son, and to produce a word himself, which should be, as far as was in his power, consubstantial with himself, and that he straightway begot a lie; so that a lie is the devil's word—a daring, foul, and loathsome image of the ever-glorious and only-begotten Son of God. This explains the intensity of God's hatred of a lie. And then the saint, or the old Italian commentator, where I found it long ago, goes on to say, that God made lying to be but a venial sin, in order to destroy its empire and degrade its power, and because of the facility of the sin and the pressure of the temptation, and in contempt of Satan's craft. This is an exposition of our Lord's name for the devil—the father of lies."—Blessed Sacrament, p. 233.

Did any one ever see such a conclusion drawn from such a beginning? The beginning of the extract seemed intended to show (in a manner as to the good taste of which we shall raise no question) how abominable a lie is in its origin, and how intensely it is hated by God. And then he goes on to say that for all this God made lying to be but a venial sin—that is to say, that it does not take away God's favour and friendship to those who are guilty of what he so intensely hates! We think Mr. Faber guilty of an attempt to bring the Fathers into disrepute when he puts forward poor St. Augustine as the possible author of such an exposition.

Not being able to see the force of the reasons given by Mr. Faber, we turn to the Dublin Review, and we there find a concise account enough of the matter. "According to Catholic theology, a mere falsehood, which does no great harm to any one, is a venial sin; because it is not a great offence against charity." We could not have a better guide to the views of Roman Catholic moralists than this writer in the Dublin Review, of whose article we gave some account in our last number; for he seems to have absolutely no moral sense of his own; but whenever a question is proposed as to the lawfulness of an action, he turns to his schoolmen and tries to find out from them whether it is right or wrong; and, if so, why? Thus, he proposes the question wherein the sinfulness of lying consists; and very much puzzled he is to give any satisfactory account of the matter. We cannot forbear giving an extract of his lucid reasonings, that our readers may feel properly grateful to us for what we go through for their sakes.

"The word truth is used to imply either a habit or a fact—used in the latter sense, it means the agreement or conformity of terms; and according as the agreement is dependent on human mind, it is called subjective or objective, formal or material truth. Thus it is either the agreement or conformity existing between the understanding and its object, or between the external sign and that which it is intended to signify, between the object and its idea as existing in the divine mind. Here, then, we have three kinds of truth or agreement. 1st—Between objects and their ideas, reflected in the human mind. 2ndly—Between ideas and their representative signs. 3rdly—Between objects and ideas as reflected in the divine mind. Truthas a habit, or, as it is more usually termed, truthfulness, in its generic character, may have truth for its object matter in any of the above forms, but the virtue we are concerned with is that special one, the distinct province of which is to see that thoughts and words harmonize. But if we look to the formal object from which it derives character as a virtue, we shall find it to be none other than a certain debt due to human society, and founded upon the natural exigencies of the same, which requires, that men if they make use of language at all, shall do so in such a way, that the end for which it was instituted be not perverted. From this double nature of its object matter—viz., that it is concerned with the fulfilment of a duty to society, and that it looks to equalization—truthfulness has been reckoned by St. Thomas as a species of universal justice; it differs, however, from justice proper, inasmuch as the debt it has to supply does not depend upon legal, but upon a moral obligation."

And so he goes on, and by the time that he has got his readers fairly out of their depth, and ready to submit to any terms he may choose to impose on them, he is able to draw triumphantly his conclusion that equivocation is not lying.

"Discoverable equivocations and non-pure mental reservations cannot be said to be the material objects forbidden by the precept against lying; for the material objects which this precept forbids, have already been shown to be words or representative signs, determined either in themselves or by circumstances to a false meaning; such, by the force of the terms, discoverable equivocations and mental reservations, cannot be considered."

We have given these extracts, not as doing justice to the writer's arguments (which we are not now considering), but merely as specimens of his style. The style, however, is not a bad one for its purpose. When a sophist wishes to persuade his hearers to accept wrong conclusions on a very plain subject, there is no better plan than to muddy the waters a little, and so, under cover of obscurity, arrive at the desired end. But what we consulted the Dublin Review for at present, was, in order to discover why lying was made but a venial sin. And it would seem, as far as we can see, that the reason is, that in the moral systems of the schools it was found difficult to deduce the obligation to truthfulness from other obligations. The best plan seemed to be to class truth under justice, and so it turned out that when a lie involved no great injustice and no great injury to a neighbour, it came to be reckoned scarcely a sin at all. We should be very much disposed to burst through the cobwebs of the schools, whenever we found them interfere with our following the dictates of conscience and the plain statements of Scripture. If there is any difficulty in making out lying to be a sin, when truth is classed under other virtues, why, then, let veracity set up for itself, as a virtue on its own account. This is, if we remember right, the course adopted by Bishop Butler in his ethical works.

It is remarkable, however, how soon an error committed in theory finds its way into practice, and how soon the mistakes of the moral teachers of a people will affect their character and lower their moral tone. And there is no better example of this than the different light in which a lie is regarded in Protestant and Roman Catholic countries. We do not require our readers to take the fact on our assertion. It appears plainly enough from the attempts of the defenders of Liguori to represent (as the Christian Remembrancer has it) uprightness and truthfulness to be a curious national peculiarity, like red hair or an aquiline nose, instead of a Christian virtue. They take pains to remind us that the tone of feeling, with regard to truthfulness, is quite different in England from which it is on the Continent, and they tell us that it is not fair to judge of one nation according to the standard of another. Thus says the Dublin reviewer, "The society for which St. Alphonsus wrote is Italian, and his theology is, consequently, to a great extent, shaped to suit the moral exigencies of that people, and presupposes all their customs and conventionalities. It is scarcely possible to imagine two characters more widely different than the Italian and English, nor any two less capable of judging one another." And he fairly acknowledges that the Italian is naturally less truthful than the Englishman."

Father Faber, too, in the passage from which we have made an extract before, suggests that the doctrine of equivocation, however good in itself, is not adapted for use in England.

"Some of the best writers say that when equivocations and mental reserves, even when we seem in strictness to have a right to use them, are so against the custom and genius of a country that they would have the effect of a direct untruth, and would weaken the foundations of public faith, we are at not at liberty to use them. How far, it may be suggested, does not this render the whole teaching about them inapplicable to the country in which we are living, and to that virtue of truth which, like hope in Pandora's box, seems to many persons (truly or not) to have remained when all else that was godly made wings to itself and flew away."—Page 235.

We think, then, that there can be no doubt, even on the confession of our adversaries, as to the matter of fact that there is a very different tone of feeling on the subject of truth in Roman Catholic countries from that which exists in Protestant England. And the question arises, whose fault is this?

We think the matter is easy enough to account for. We believe the cause to be, that in England men follow the teaching of the Bible, while, in Roman Catholic countries, men give up their consciences to be formed by such directors as St. Liguori. And the Dublin reviewer fairly acknowledges that this is a difference for which his Church is responsible. He undertakes to answer the following objection:—

"I am willing to grant that the Italian may be actually less truthful than the Englishman; but how does this excuse your Church? You have said, truly enough, that the usual progress of a nation is in proportion to the standard of excellence instilled into it by education. Now, from whence does the Italian get his education except from the Church? Is it not in her power to make truthfulness so much the standard of excellence as to counteract the natural tendencies of the people? Why, then, is so little prominence given to this virtue in the works of your theologians?"

The answer of the Dublin reviewer to this question is principally borrowed from a passage in Dr. Newman's "Lectures on Anglican Difficulties," which we have elsewhere quoted at length.—See vol. iii., p. 21. The substance of his defence is as follows:—"There are some which may be called natural virtues, and others supernatural; the former are those about which the world is solicitous; the latter those upon which the Church sets especial value. And, again, sins are of unequal gravity; and though all are offensive to God, and incur their measure of punishment, the Church's great object is to discriminate between sin and sin, and to secure in individuals that renunciation of evil which is implied in the idea of substantial and unfeigned conversion. She has neither warrant nor encouragement to enforce upon men in general more than those habits of virtue, the absence of which would be tantamount to their separation from God; and she thinks she has done a great deal, and exults in her success, does she proceed so far; and she bears, as she may, what remains still to be done, in the conviction that, did she attempt more, she would lose all. There are sins which are incompatible with contrition and absolution under any circumstances; there are others which are disorders and disfigurements of the soul. She exhorts men against the second; she directs her efforts against the first."

Now, it will be observed that this whole defence turns on that distinction between mortal and venial sin, of which we spoke before. A mortal sin creates a separation between God and the soul; a venial sin is only a disfigurement of the soul. The Church must exhort all men to abstain from the former; to abstain from the latter, is a counsel of perfection only absolutely necessary for those who are aiming at being saints. And it is quietly assumed that lying belongs to this latter class of sins; and we are given to understand that the reason that the Church of Rome does not take more pains to deter her people from it is, because she has deliberately judged it to belong to that class of sins which are a mere disorder of the soul, and do not produce any separation between the soul and God!

For any who have the Scriptures in their hands, a formal refutation of such doctrine is unnecessary; and we are sure that there are many of our Roman Catholic friends who are "wiser than their teachers," and who are persuaded (notwithstanding all they may learn to the contrary) that lying lips are an abomination to the Lord. And we beg of our sincere and honest Roman Catholic brethren to consider whether it is likely a Church can be infallible whose moral teaching is so different from the morality of the Bible.

We have a great deal more to say on the subject of St. Liguori, and his defenders; and if we find our readers are not tired of the subject, they shall hear from us again.

DIALOGUE BETWEEN FATHER D—— AND WILLIAM ——, ON TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

Father D.—I am glad to meet you, William, and I hope you will allow me to call to your mind the subject of our last conversation.

William.—Oh, yes, sir; that conversation on the subjects of debate between the two Churches has occupied my mind, since very much.

D.—There is only one way to free your mind from all doubt; and that is, to "hear the Church," and to believe, without hesitation, ever after what the Church teaches.

W.—I assure you, sir, I am sincerely desirous to find out what Christ taught, and what his true Church teaches.

D.—Well, then, try the Catholic Church, which cannot err.

W.—You mean your own. I have considered what your Church teaches; and I frankly tell you, that there is one thing in your doctrine which I cannot believe nor receive; if you make that plain to me, I will be more disposed to listen to all you have to say in favour of the Roman Catholic Church.

D.—What is that? I will be most glad to remove your objections, and to explain what you may fairly demand that I should explain.

W.—If I became a Roman Catholic, I must profess and believe "that the body and blood of Christ, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, are truly, really, and substantially in the sacrament of the Eucharist, and that a change is made of the whole substance of the bread into the body, and the whole substance of the wine into the blood—a change which is called Transubstantiation." All this I read in Pope Pius's Creed.

D.—If God has said it, we ought to believe it, although the consecrated elements seem, to our senses, to have undergone no change.

W.—I will, then, endeavour to persuade myself to believe this hard saying, provided you bring me as clear proof that God has said that such a change is really made, as I have that the consecrated bread is still bread, and the consecrated wine is still wine.

D.—Here is the proof. The Lord Jesus Christ said, when he took the bread and brake it, "This is my body." This was when he instituted the sacrament. We stand, then, on the precise words of Christ. To do so should be enough for all Christians.

W.—But did not our Blessed Lord speak in parables often?—Mark iv. 33, 34. Surely, also, he mixed figures very commonly in his discourse.

D.—But can you show any figure as bold as you must take this to be, if you reject Transubstantiation?

W.—Yes; several—as when Christ said "I am the way," "I am the door" (John x. 9); "I am the vine."—xv. 1. No one dreams of anything miraculous in these things; but that Jesus is as a door, because men enter into the kingdom of God through him; that he is as a way, because it is by faith on Him that we come to the Father (John xiv. 6); and that He is like a vine-stock in giving life, support, and fruitfulness to the members of His body—i.e., to all true Christians.

D.—A figure is not to be supposed without necessity, especially in the institution of a sacrament.

W.—But, to my humble judgment, that appears exactly the occasion in which a figure is most natural. For is not a sacrament "a sensible sign of an invisible grace?"—Rom. Cat. It may be very natural, then, to call the sign by the name of what it signifies.

D.—Still I insist on the word "is." "This is" (not signifies) "my body."

W.—That is, simply, you deny that there is a figure. But which is easier, to allow a natural figure, or to believe that Jesus Christ held his own body in his hands—that when it was broken, every part was his entire body, and every one present ate the body of Christ, while they beheld him sitting alive before them? Now, to take the words figuratively, will prevent this incomprehensible difficulty.

D.—You will never believe as you ought, if you try to satisfy your reason thus in everything.

W.—But, it appears to me, that even the Roman Church allows a figurative expression in the institution of this very sacrament.

D.—I do not admit that. We are for the literal sense.

W.—Let us see. I refer to St. Luke's account of the institution (xxii. 20)—"This is the chalice of the New Testament in my blood which shall be shed for you."—(Douay Bible.) Do you think that the chalice is literally a testament? How could a cup be a will or covenant, but by being the sign of it? So may the bread be the body of Christ by being the sign of it.

D.—Is it not more plainly given in the Gospel of St. Matthew? Where is the figure there?—Matt. xxvi. 27.

W.—There is a figure even there; for Christ, taking the chalice, gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of this.—(Douay Bible.) Now, "this" is the chalice; for no other substantive comes before it. It is plain, then, that the cup is put for what was then in the cup, although substances quite different.

D.—I would advise you, my young friend, not to trust to your own reason so much, but hear the interpretation which the Church gives of mysteries like the sacrament. But, if you require Scriptural proof, you will find it in John vi. 54—"Amen, Amen, I say unto you, except you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you."

W.—But here there is no doubt at all that our Lord spake in the manner of a parable.

D.—Why so? I do not see any sufficient reason for believing that he did not mean what he said clearly and solemnly.

W.—We have our Lord's explanation in the 64th verse—"It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing. The words that I have spoken unto you are spirit and life." By which Christ taught his disciples that it was the living on him by faith which gave life everlasting; and that it was the indwelling of his spirit, and not the partaking of his flesh and blood, which quickens the soul and gives the pledge of heavenly life.

D.—Your explanation may be subtle, but it is not convincing to me.

W.—What, if I show you that you must yourself use a figure in interpreting part of this very chapter?

D.—What instance can you give? For it seems to me that I take literally all that Christ said about his flesh and his blood.

W.—At the 51st verse, Jesus says, "I am the living bread which came down from heaven." Now, explain that literally, as you do the rest.

D.—The bread in the sacrament is Christ; but Christ came down from heaven.

W.—But the bread of the sacrament did not come from heaven. If it be Christ, by consecration, then it is no longer bread; so, though Christ came from heaven, the bread has not come from heaven.

D.—Yes; but he calls it the living bread.

W.—Precisely so. There is the figure. By your doctrine of Transubstantiation there is no living bread; for before consecration it is bread, and not living; and, after consecration, it is living Christ, but not living bread.

D.—I must allow a slight figure here.

W.—Well, then, why not allow a figure where so surprising an idea occurs as eating the flesh and drinking the blood of Christ, when the very notion of drinking blood, to the Jews, was abominable?

D.—But why should our Lord use so strange a figure?

W.—His design was to try the faith of those who crowded after him for the loaves and fishes; and so he spake darkly to them. This, one may surmise, by the result which our Blessed Lord foresaw.

D.—If you were as well disposed to listen to the teaching of the Church as you are to search for reasons to justify opinions which are not Catholic, I would not despair of your finding the true Church.

W.—But I have tried to believe Transubstantiation, and failed, not only because my reason is not satisfied, but because that bread should be a living body, and, at the same time, bread, to all appearance and in all qualities, contradicts my senses.

D.—I would advise you not to look for evidence of the senses in things divine and miraculous.

W.—Will you inform me what proof Jesus Christ gave to the Jews of his divine mission and authority? Did he not appeal to his miracles (John xv. 24), and give, as the surest sign of his resurrection, that, as Jonas was three days in the belly of the whale, so the Son of Man should be three days in the earth, and then should be restored to life?—Matt xii. 39-40.

D.—Well?

W.—Let me ask you, then, sir, have we as clear evidence that Christ rose from the dead as we have that the bread after consecration is still bread?

D.—There is satisfactory proof that the apostles saw, and heard, and felt Jesus Christ after his resurrection. St. John xxiv. 39—"See my hands and my feet that it is I myself." Handle and see, said our Saviour to the disciples, for their further conviction, "for a spirit hath not flesh or bones, as ye see me have."

W.—Then I say that the apostles themselves had not stronger evidence of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus than I have that a consecrated wafer is still a wafer, or a piece of bread, and not the whole body of Jesus Christ; for I see, and taste, and smell it to be bread; I know by the touch that it is not a human body. Here is the joint testimony of four senses out of the five against Transubstantiation.

D.—The greater the difficulty of believing God's Word, the greater is the merit; besides, the senses often err.

W.—If one sense errs another corrects it; or the experience of the man corrects his first wrong inferences from impressions made on some of the senses. But you must yourself admit that the senses are competent judges of a miracle. All Christianity, in fact, hinges on their capability to appreciate a matter of fact.

D.—But once that I am satisfied of revelation, then I stagger not through unbelief at the great miracle of Transubstantiation.

W.—But now, as the senses can judge of a miracle, such as the resurrection of Lazarus, the reality of Christ's risen body, &c., they must equally be relied on when they testify that the consecrated bread is bread. You cannot assume that to be a miracle which contradicts the evidence of all miracles, and of revelation itself.

D.—How is it that you object to Transubstantiation when you admit the mystery of the Trinity, which contradicts your reason and your senses.

W.—See now how dangerous a course you are driving on, for sooner than allow that our Lord speaks figuratively when he said, "This is my body," you venture to shake the very foundations of Christianity.

D.—I am only showing that you admit Scripture against reason and the senses.

W.—I do not admit any such thing; for, if so, how could I give a reason of the hope that is in me? How could I or any one give a reason for things directly contrary to reason?

D.—But the doctrine of the Trinity is against reason and sense—namely, that three should be one.

W.—God forbid that it should be against either, though it is not within the province of either. If it were said that three Gods were one God, or three persons were one person, there would be a contradiction; but there is no contradiction, nor anything contrary to reason, when the terms are as different as "Person" and "God." I see nothing whatever inconsistent in saying that three persons are one God.

D.—You don't see that there is such a contradiction, but others do.

W.—Unless you can prove it, I am not concerned in what others think of the matter. Now, I say that, by believing or affecting to believe things clearly contrary to reason, the Roman Church overturns the proof, not only of Christianity, but of Theism itself. If reason determines falsely in so plain a conclusion as that the body of Jesus cannot be in ten thousand places at one moment, nor in ten thousand fractions, every one of which is the whole body, then reason is not capable of attaining certainty on any subject.

D.—I rest on revelation, written and unwritten, not on reason.

W.—You believe in the truth of revelation, because it comes from God; don't you?

D.—I do, and because God cannot deceive nor be deceived.

W.—How do you know this? This must be settled before you argue from His Word as infallible.

D.—We have an instinctive sense of the infinite perfections of God, and our reason confirms it.

W.—How can revealed religion, then, afterwards contradict our instinct, and spurn at reason as useless or dangerous?

D.—Simple faith becomes a being like man.

W.—But if you cannot give a reason for your faith (and no reason can be given for a faith contrary to reason), how are you more likely to be right than a Mahometan, who has undoubted faith in the Koran. He says, too, he is for simple faith. So is the Hindoo in his Brahmin and his Shasters.

D.—But having found the true religion, we are not after that to dispute against the nature of the things clearly contained therein.

W.—But if, as in the case before us, two interpretations of Scripture are offered, one of which supposes a result contrary to the conclusions of reason and the evidence of our senses, while the other does no violence either to reason or the senses, and only supposes an easy figure as used by Christ, who spoke much in figures and parables—which are we to choose?

D.—The Church has always interpreted literally the words, "This is my body."

W.—So far as I have been able to learn, the most ancient Fathers of the Church did not.

D.—I can bring you a "cloud of witnesses."

W.—I have heard Fathers quoted against Fathers, and even against themselves; doctors, uninspired, differed then as they do now. But it is idle to refer to authority for a doctrine contradictory to sense and reason.

D.—But is it so clear that Transubstantiation contradicts reason? Cannot the substance be changed while the qualities (as taste, colour, &c.) remain?

W.—Do you think that the Lord Jesus had a real, substantial body?

D.—I do.

W.—One of the properties inseparable from bodies is extension; and figure is a property of all living bodies.

D.—I cannot deny that. But what do you mean to infer?

W.—Why this; that the extended substance of Christ's body, and one possessed of a certain figure, could not exist under the form of a wafer, or a crumb; and, further, that the body of Jesus Christ, like other real bodies, occupies a certain space, and that only, at any given instant. Now, Transubstantiation is altogether opposed to these clear inferences of reason.

D.—It is enough for me to believe that nothing is too hard for the Almighty, not even Transubstantiation, which I allow is a miracle and a mystery.

W.—No miracle is too hard for God; but Transubstantiation is not a miracle, which is a fact, though a preternatural one. Transubstantiation is an absurdity not of God's making; for it represents God as making a thing to be and not to be at the same time. This is either a juggle or an impossibility by the very terms.

D.—This is a bold assertion, which cannot be received without clear proof.

W.—They who teach that Transubstantiation is a work of God, represent God as making a visible substance to have all the properties of bread, and yet to have all the properties of a living human body at the same time; so that the same thing is figured in a particular manner, and is not so figured at the same instant; it is as small as a crumb, and yet full-sized as the body of a man; it is destitute of the characters of a living body, and yet it possesses them, and so on; for I need not go further with this chain of contradictions. A contradiction in terms is an absurdity; so that God Almighty's power is not derogated from by supposing that he does not work an absurdity.

D.—We cannot tell how far Christ's body may be altered so as not to be subject to the ordinary condition of human bodies.

W.—Was Christ's body so altered before his crucifixion?

D.—Evidently not.

W.—I argue, then, that whatever change is made now by the words, "This is my body," must have taken place when the same words were used by our Lord at the Last Supper. Therefore, your Church teaches that, at that time, the natural body of Christ, like in all respects to ours (sin excepted), was seen at the table distributing the portions of the consecrated bread; and, at the same time, it was wholly present in each of these portions, and, in fact, was the substance of them!

D.—It is, nevertheless, dangerous to doubt God's power to work the most incomprehensible wonder.

W.—But, I repeat, to make a thing to be and not to be the same, at the same instant, is, in fact, to do nothing but in pretence or imagination.

D.—After all, why do you make so much difficulty about the doctrine of the Catholic Church, if you hold all the time a real presence in some sense or other?

W.—I do hold Christ to be really present, but in a spiritual manner. Your objection may be pointed against Lutherans, but not against those whose profession of faith agree with the articles of the Church of England.

D.—Well, then, you hold at least, a spiritual presence, and in eating of the body of Christ after a spiritual manner. What so great matter if you were to hold also that Christ's body is there concealed under the qualities of bread?

W.—The adoration of the Host makes it a very great matter; for the Roman Church requires all in her communion to worship with the highest adoration the consecrated elements.

D.—But cannot one direct the act of worship to God the Son under the appearance of bread?

W.—The second commandment* forbids me to worship even God himself under the likeness of anything in heaven or earth, and, therefore, under the semblance of bread, as much as under the guise of a golden calf. For the Israelites pretended that they adored the god who brought them out of Egypt, while they worshipped their new idol. In fact, all manner of idolatry may be defended in that way, so long as the worshipper pretends to adore the true God under some material object which may be conceived to represent the presence of the Deity.

D.—We reject with abhorrence the calumny that we worship a breaden god. You may see in one of our books a curse pronounced against any one who does so?

W.—Because you believe that is no longer bread when you adore it. Therefore, you are not in your conscience worshipping a god of bread; but if no change take place, through defect of intention in the sacrificing priest, or by reason of some other defects which vitiate the consecration according to the rubrics of the Missal, what are ye then directing your most solemn worship to?

D.—To God always in intention.

W.—If you make a mistake it is an awful one; for idolatry is a fearful sin, whatever excuses may be made for it.

* In the "Abridgement of Christian Doctrine" the second commandment of the two tables is either omitted—as in the smaller catechisms for the use of the poor—or it is recited as part of the first while the number, ten, is preserved by the division of the tenth as it stands in Exodus.

D.—I regret to find, my young friend, that you are still unwilling to submit your own judgment to the infallible interpretation of the Church?

W.—I said at the beginning, sir, that I would hear Christ's teaching in his Church. But holy Scripture, my reason, and my senses, all assure me that Transubstantiation is not the doctrine of the true Church of Christ. Therefore, I cannot conclude that Transubstantiation is true, because the Church of Rome imposes it as a matter necessary to be believed; but rather, being convinced that it is false, I am persuaded that the Church of Rome teaches not as Christ does in this matter.

D.—You refer to the Holy Scripture; but I have not heard you bring forward any argument from it against Transubstantiation.

W.—May I ask you what are the sacramental elements after consecration by the priest?

D.—The bread is changed into the body of Christ; the wine is changed into the blood of Christ, really and substantially.

W.—Can they be afterwards strictly called bread and wine?

D.—Undoubtedly not.

W.—But our Lord Jesus Christ calls the wine after consecration the fruit of the vine (Matt. xxvi. 29)—i.e., wine still. It is plain, then, that he did not know of the change which is called Transubstantiation. Nor did St. Paul; for that apostle calls the consecrated bread simply "this bread."—1 Cor. xi. 26. What Roman Catholic priest now would speak of the consecrated host as bread? If so, he adored bread when he consecrated it, which you repudiate.

D.—St. Paul, and even our Blessed Lord, may have spoken so in accommodation to the senses and common perception.

W.—That is, you allow a figure when the bread of the sacrament is called bread, or the wine, wine; but no figure at all when the bread is called the body of Christ, and the wine or the cup the blood of Christ?

D.—Always remember, William, that we have the unwritten word as our further guide. You are too confident in interpreting the written word by your private judgment.

W.—In this case, I have not only the words of Holy Scripture to satisfy me that the consecrated bread is still bread, and the wine, wine; but my senses also combine to assure me of the same; and, lastly, reason satisfies me with the clearest evidence that the contrary is impossible.

D.—I have not leisure at present to follow up this argument further. Good morning to you. When you are less confident in your own opinion, I shall be glad to talk further with you.

W.—Good morning, sir, I assure you I am quite open to conviction, if you will only satisfy me that your doctrine is that taught by Jesus Christ and his apostles. If you cannot do that, I rest upon what my reason and senses, as well as God's revealed Word, join in teaching me. Farewell.

TALK OF THE ROAD.—NO. XXX.

"Jem, it beats all this time," said Pat, when they next met on the road lately.

"What's in it now, Pat?" said Jem.

"Well, if the Pope is anything at all, he's a greater man than ever I thought he was," said Pat.

"What's his greatness now, Pat," said Jem.

"Sure, Jem," said Pat, "the Pope has got the Blessed Virgin Mary under his thumb (that's if it's true), and just orders her about, and lays out the work for her wherever he pleases, just as the bishop would with a curate."

"Why, how can that be, Pat," said Jem; "isn't she the Queen of Heaven? and wasn't a new crown put on her in heaven last December, when it was found out, at last, that she was conceived without sin? and, if she is greater now in heaven than she ever was afore, won't the Pope have to take his orders from her, instead of going to use her like a young curate just out of Maynooth."

"Well, Jem, I wonder you are that innocent," said Pat; "sure, wasn't it the Pope that put the new honour on her, and put the new crown on her head; and, if he could do that to her, why wouldn't she have to serve him better, and work for him more nor ever she did?"

"Well, Pat, there's reason in that sure enough," said Jem; "but what has the Pope put on her now?"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "sure I got the loan of the Tablet newspaper,* and there's the whole story, how the Bishop of Meath had a meeting of a hundred of his clergy, on Saturday, the 21st of July, to tell them the news; and sure here's the paper for yourself, just to read what he told them."

So Pat pulled out the paper out of his pocket, and Jem read—

"His lordship called the attention of the clergy to a communication, under date the 11th of February of the present year, which he had had the honour of receiving from the Holy See, and in which the Holy Father was graciously pleased, in compliance with his lordship's humble supplication, to declare the Blessed Virgin Mary sub titulo immaculatæ conceptionis" (Jem had to spell this part of it), "to be henceforth A SPECIAL PATRONESS for the Diocese of Meath. His lordship, therefore, instructed the clergy to make known to their flocks the benign condescension of the Holy Father in conferring this high privilege on the diocese to which they belonged, and also to excite the ardour of their devotion to the Blessed Virgin, under the illustrious title of the immaculate conception."

"Well, what do you think of that, Jem?" said Pat.

So Jem looked back at it again, and considered; and Jem said, "The Bishop of Meath got the start of them, anyway; sure it was about Christmas we heard it was found out that the Blessed Virgin was conceived without sin; and on the 11th of February the job was done, and the Blessed Virgin, conceived without sin, was set down for the Diocese of Meath; that was looking sharp, anyway," said Jem.

"Quick work, sure enough," said Pat; "but the bishop was in no hurry to tell the news, when he kept the letter five months in his pocket afore ever he said a word about it."

"How come he to be the first?" said Jem, considering.

"Well, he took the notion afore any other bishop," said Pat; "and mighty sharp it was."

"Wait a minute, Pat," said Jem; "I wonder is St. Patrick in heaven."

"Well, if he isn't, who is?" said Pat.

"And why but he asked first, when he had the start, and was on the spot?" said Jem; "and wouldn't he ask for his own old Diocese of Armagh? I wonder, now, does the saints in heaven intercede for the like of them things? But I'm thinking, now, maybe St. Patrick is at the back of the hills in heaven; for sure the Protestants say he was a Protestant, and maybe knew nothing about the immaculate conception; 'cause why, it wasn't found out in his time; and then how would he get the start about 'the illustrious title of the immaculate conception?' Wouldn't he be just ashamed to go to ask the Blessed Virgin any favour about it, and he knowing that he never said one word for it, good or bad, in all his life? And sure I often think it's little we hear of St. Patrick now, and that little getting less every day; why, the Catholics seem to think they have got beyond him entirely; so maybe it wouldn't be any good his asking now."

"Why, man alive," said Pat, "don't you see the job wasn't done in heaven at all, but only at Rome?"

"Well, that makes it plainer," said Jem; "sure the bishop would get the start there afore St. Patrick. But I wonder is the Queen of Heaven under orders at Rome? Sure that isn't like being the Queen of Heaven at all! Wouldn't they have to take their orders from her?"

"Aye; but if it was the Pope that made her the Queen of Heaven!" said Pat.

"Well, that doesn't stand to reason," said Jem; "sure only God himself could make her the Queen of Heaven. And if He made her queen, would she be under the Pope's orders to run here and there whenever he bid her, to do whatever work he would lay out for her? Maybe it's to Botany Bay he will be sending her next. But what if it isn't the Pope that's setting her to mind Meath at all! What if it is herself, and that the Pope only tells what she is going to do herself? Sure that would be the great thing for the Diocese of Meath entirely."

"It would be the fine thing for them that lets lodgings," said Pat; "sure the lodging money should be higher nor at the salt water itself; why, wouldn't all Ireland be coming into Meath, the way they would have the Blessed Virgin herself to look after them. But it is my opinion, Jem, that the never a word was said to the Blessed Virgin about it, neither 'by your leave, nor with your leave.'"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "sure the Pope couldn't have the face to go to put the Blessed Virgin to watch one diocese more nor another, without saying one word to herself about it. Sure doesn't the scapular say that the Blessed Virgin appeared to Simon Stock? And isn't there stories about her appearing to the Pope? And who knows but she come to the Pope, or the Pope went and axed her, and she said she was going to mind the Diocese of Meath herself."

"Not a bit of it, Jem," said Pat; "sure if Popes could talk to the Blessed Virgin that way, wouldn't she have told some of them, afore this, that she was conceived without sin? And more foreby, Jem, it's plain the Pope didn't say not one word to her afore he put the Diocese of Meath on her."

"And how is that plain, Pat," said Jem.

"Why isn't it here, in this newspaper," said Pat; "doesn't the bishop say that it was THE HOLY FATHER that conferred this privilege on the Diocese of Meath? And the bishop didn't say, nor the Pope didn't say to him, that the Blessed Virgin said it herself; and if she said one word to them about it herself, sure it's not that they would forget to tell."

"Well, but Pat," said Jem, "sure they might say the Blessed Virgin said it herself, whether she did or not."

"True for you, Jem," said Pat, "they might say that, as well as a deal more they do say; but then they didn't think of saying it. Sure if they went to do the job themselves, without ever axing the Blessed Virgin a word about it, or without a notion in their heads to ax her, why then they might never think of saying that she said it herself; but if she had come to say it herself, that couldn't be forgot, and they would be sure enough to tell it. So now you see Jem how it is; the bishop and the Pope just got it up between themselves; and they didn't think one bit about the Blessed Virgin that same time, not even enough to see that it would be only decent to tell a lie about her; that's what it is, Jem; and it was the great mistake entirely for them to make."

"But maybe, Pat," said Jem, "when the Pope has made the Blessed Virgin the special patroness of the Diocese of Meath, maybe she just hasn't one hand's turn to do for it more than she had afore; and then sure the Pope wouldn't have to go to ask her at all afore he put it on her, for it wouldn't make any difference to her, and so the Pope might do what he liked."

"And isn't that the pretty humbug to put on the Diocese of Meath," said Pat; "cooking them up with a fine name as empty as a sucked egg. And if people aren't one bit the better for having the Blessed Virgin for their SPECIAL patroness, how do they know but it's all talk, and no better, about her being a patroness at all? And sure it's only the Pope's word we have for that, when it's not in the Bible. If the Blessed Virgin is not a bit more of a patroness, and hasn't a hand's turn more to do for her clients, when she is made special patroness, sure it's all humbug the Pope writing over to make her special patroness. And if she has more to do for them, when the Pope has put it on her, who's the fool to believe that the Queen of Heaven, if she be the Queen of Heaven, could be ordered about, and have more work put on her by the Pope, without so much as a 'by your leave'? It's making too free with her entirely, so it is, if the Pope believes only the half of what he says about her. It's enough to make us see the way we are made fools of, in trusting to the Pope's word, and his letters, about patrons."

"But, Pat," said Jem, "tell me this, anyway; what will the people in all the other dioceses say when they see the march that was stole on them, and how the Meath people was up early enough to get the Blessed Virgin, conceived without sin, to themselves, before another could get a chance at her."

"Why, then, Jem," said Pat, "if they have any sense, isn't it proud they will be, that the Pope didn't go for to make fools of them, when he was up to his work."

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "it will be the proud day for Ireland when the people can't be made fools of, with things that no man with sense can believe, in what concerns their souls. But when will that day come at all?"

"When every man has his own Bible in his own hand, Jem," said Pat; "that's the day, and none other."

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, AUGUST 16, 1855.

We have so frequently alluded in our pages to the works of St. Alphonsus Liguori as a fair specimen of the views of modern Romanism, that we are not sorry to be able to corroborate our views by giving our readers the following extract from the Tablet of 11th August instant, which satisfactorily proves that we have not exaggerated or misrepresented the true position of St. Liguori among the saints of Rome:—

"A correspondent enables us to give an outline of the Rev. H. Marshall's sermon at Clapham on the Feast of St. Alphonsus. That in the morning was preached by the Bishop of Southwark. Mr. Marshall's discourse was divided into three parts. In the first he dwelt on the mercies of God, showing for what purposes saints were sent into the world, and that each had his own peculiar work allotted him. After panegyrising other great saints he came to St. Alphonsus, who, he said, was emphatically The Saint of modern times. He spoke of him as the founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, and replied to the arguments of those who preferred the active to the contemplative orders. They know not (said the Rev. preacher) from whence many of the graces we continually receive come to us; they think not of the pains in purgatory, which are shortened by the prayers of these holy contemplatives, and by the indulgences which they obtain from the mercy of God. He showed how closely St. Alphonsus followed his Divine Master by seeking out the sinner and restoring him, by his preaching and his other charitable labours, to the grace which he had forfeited. Our Blessed Lord (said the preacher) shed one drop of His sacred blood upon His Holy Mother when standing at the foot of His cross, and another upon the beloved disciple; but upon the sinner, the penitent Magdalene, He poured forth a deluge as she embraced His feet. In the second part of his discourse he spoke of the writings of St. Alphonsus, the sweet effusions on which he seemed to have poured forth his whole soul and which embraced every subject of Christian meditation and practice. Thus we were instructed on the necessity of prayer and the Sacraments; on devotion to the Sacred Passion, the Holy Eucharist, and the Blessed Virgin, whose praises he preached and published during a long and laborious life, and who rewarded him with many wonderful favours. Your readers are probably aware that a new and much-improved English edition of the works of Saint Alphonsus is in course of publication by one of the Redemptorist Fathers—a work for which the Bishop of Southwark has obtained the especial blessing of the Holy See. A new translation of the "Glories of Mary" was lately published by Mgr. Weld, a beautiful Litany and Hymn (indulgenced by the Bishop of Southwark) in honour of St. Alphonsus were used on his feast, and the greatest devotion was manifested on the occasion. The Cardinal Archbishop has frequently preached at Clapham on this feast, and he observed on one occasion that there was not a confessional in England which was not more or less under the influence of the saint's mild theology. The new translation of the "Glories of Mary" (which may be had of Mr. Wallwork, Great Marlborough-street, Regent-street) is put forth with the Archbishop's approbation, who strongly recommends it to Catholics."

We have also before us at this moment a copy of the "Glories of Mary," published by Dolman, New Bond-street, and Dunigan, New York (1852), under the imprimatur of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of New York, in page 783 of which occur the following passages, some of which exceed (if possible) anything we have yet published as proofs of the fervour of devotion inculcated towards the Virgin by the modern Church of Rome:—

"The most holy Mary revealed to a soul devoted to her that it pleased her much to be honoured by her servants with the following devotions:—

"I thank Thee, oh Eternal Father, for the power given to Mary, thy daughter. Our Father; Hail Mary; Glory be to God.

"I thank Thee, oh Eternal Son, for the wisdom given to Mary, thy mother. Our Father; Hail Mary; Glory be to God.

"I thank Thee, oh Eternal Spirit, for the love given to Mary, thy spouse. Our Father; Hail Mary; Glory be to God.

"To thee we cry, oh Queen of Mercy, turn towards us, and let us behold thee dispensing favours, bestowing remedies, giving strength. Show us thy compassionate countenance, and we shall be safe.

"Oh mistress of all things—saint of saints—our strength and refuge—God, as it were, of the world—glory of heaven—accept those who love thee; hear us; for thy Son honours thee, and denies thee nothing.

"Come, hasten, oh lady, and aid with thy mercy thy most sinful servant, who invokes thee; and deliver him from the hands of the enemy. Who will not sigh to thee? With love and grief we sigh. How, then, shall we not sigh to thee, oh solace of the miserable, refuge of outcasts, deliverer of captives? We are secure that if thou dost see our miseries, thy compassion will not be slow to relieve us.

"Oh our lady and our advocate recommend us to thy Son. Obtain, oh blessed one, by the grace thou hast merited, that he who did condescend, with thy mediation, to become a participator of our infirmity and misery, may, also, by thy intercession make us to share in his blessedness and glory.

"In thee I have placed the hope of my whole heart. It is not possible, oh lady, that thou shouldst abandon him who places his hope in thee. If thou dost only wish for our salvation, it will be impossible that we should not be saved. Hail, daughter of God the Father; hail, mother of God the Son; hail, spouse of God the Holy Ghost; hail, temple of the whole Trinity.

"Oh Virgin, how beautiful art thou!

"Mother of my God, my heart is enamoured with thy goodness.

"Thanks be to God and to Mary.

"May all things be to the eternal glory of the Most Holy Trinity, and of the immaculate Mary.

"Live always, Jesus our love, and Mary our hope, with Joseph and Theresa our advocates."

We beg our readers to remember that the above effusion, not inferior, we think, even to the Psalter of Bonaventura in daring adulation, is taken, not merely from the undisputed works of a canonized saint, but of, emphatically, THE Saint of Modern Times, a work, too, for which (if we are to believe the Rev. H. Marshall, and the Tablet) the Bishop of Southwark has obtained the especial blessing of the Holy See!

We can scarcely trust ourselves to make any comments upon it, but we ask any of our readers whether they can either believe that the language we have quoted was revealed, or safely address to any creature, however honoured or exalted, the attributes, and even the name of God himself?

We read in the 46th Psalm—"God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble;" but, according to St. Liguori, Mary is to be prayed to as "our strength and refuge; God, as it were, of the world, and the glory of heaven."

We do not deny that there are passages in the above effusion which show that the Virgin is appealed to as an intercessor with her Divine Son, as well as the dispenser of favours, the bestower of remedies, the giver of strength, just as our blessed Lord himself is addressed by us as our intercessor with God the Father, and the mediator between God and man, though he is Himself one of the persons of the Ever-blessed Trinity; but let any man of ordinary understanding and straightforward principles say, whether even the most ingenious refinement can interpret all this to mean a mere invocation of the Virgin Mary to pray for the person who uses such devotions, or for his fellow-creatures. Is it not rather the language of one who was resolved, at all hazards, to exalt the Virgin to an equality with the Almighty, and to lead others to honour her as God? What effect must the circulation of such a book have on the large mass of persons to whom it is recommended by the highest sanction of the Church of Rome?

We solemnly think, not merely that the direct and practical tendency of such worship is to derogate from the honour due to the Ever-blessed Trinity, but that it has an inevitable tendency to render the Almighty himself an object of fear, and the Virgin an object of love: to invest Him, who is the father of mercy, and God of all comfort, with unapproachable majesty and awe, and the terrors of eternal justice; and then in direct and striking contrast, to array Mary with mercy and benignity, and compassionate tenderness and omnipotence in her love.

We find, in page 279 of the same volume, the following passage, strongly corroborative of what we have just said:—

"In the Franciscan chronicles it is related of Brother Leo, that he once saw a red ladder, upon which Jesus Christ was standing, and a white one upon which stood his holy mother. He saw persons attempting to ascend the red ladder; they ascended a few steps and then fell; they ascended again, and again fell. Then they were exhorted to ascend the white ladder, and on that he saw them succeed, for the Blessed Virgin offered them her hand, and they arrived in that manner safe in paradise."

"Mary is, in a word," as Richard of St. Laurence says, "the mistress of paradise, since she commands according to her pleasure, and introduces into it whom she will." Therefore, applying to her the words of Ecclesiasticus, he adds, "My power is in Jerusalem; I command what I will, I introduce whom I will. And as she is the mother of the Lord of paradise, she is, with reason, also," says Rupert, "the Lady of paradise. She possesses, by right, the whole kingdom of her Son."—Page 280.

We have always held that even to offer prayers to God in the name and through the mediation and intercession of the Virgin Mary—much more prayers to her for her intercession—was a departure from the ancient doctrine and practice of the primitive Church, and, in fact, one of the devices superadded to the original truths of salvation, which was directly repugnant both to the written Word of God and to the faith and practice of the primitive Church. Here, however, we have a doctrine and practice which leaves prayer to the Holy Virgin for her intercession with God far behind, and teaches a species of worship more suitable to the "glories" of a goddess than to the reverence due to the most exalted of women.

We hope our readers will bear us witness that we have never spoken disparagingly or irreverently of the Blessed Virgin Mary, or acted as if we thought that the cause of the Son of God is to be promoted, or his mediatorship or honour to be exalted, by decrying the worth and dignity of his mother. We trust that we, in common with every enlightened member of the reformed Church of England, shall never forget that she was "highly favoured," and "blessed among women." The Church of England, in her liturgy, her homilies, her articles, and in the works of her standard divines and most approved teachers, ever speaks of the Blessed Virgin Mary in the language of reverence, affection, and gratitude. But when we are exhorted by the saints of the Church of Rome to address supplications to the Virgin Mary, such as those we have above transcribed, and have no alternative but either to do so, or to protest against the errors of our fellow Christians, who, led away by the exaggerations of mistaken piety, consider St. Alphonsus Liguori as emphatically the saint of modern times, and a safe guide to follow, we can have no ground for hesitation—our love of unity must yield to our love of truth. We cannot join in a worship which would exalt a woman to the throne of the universe, and ascribe to her that sovereign power which is the exclusive attribute of God himself.

SHRINES OF JERUSALEM.

The shrines of Jerusalem, which attract crowds of pilgrims from all parts of the Christian world, have been for a long time a subject of dispute between the Latins and the Greeks, and it is well known that the politico-religious complications in which Europe is at present involved have partly, at least, arisen from the claims of Russia relating to those shrines. It will, therefore, we think, be not uninteresting to our readers to see the devout manner in which these shrines are worshipped by the pilgrims of the Græco-Russian Church; and we subjoin the two following accounts of this subject, written at an interval of a century and a half, in order that our readers may be able to judge for themselves whether the progress of civilization during this period has had much influence on the pilgrims alluded to above.

Possibly some of our friends may deduce from the sad narrative useful hints as to how dangerous it is for the priesthood of any religion to commit themselves to practices which will not bear close examination; and how deplorable is the degradation of both priests and people where popular superstitions have been long sanctioned by ecclesiastical authority, and the people are, in consequence, not sufficiently educated and enlightened to shake them off for themselves.

The first of these accounts is an extract from the diary of an English clergyman, the Rev. Henry Maundrell, a Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, and chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo, who visited Jerusalem in the year 1697:—

"Saturday, April 3.—We went about mid-day to see the function of the holy fire. This is a ceremony kept by the Greeks and Armenians, upon a persuasion that every Easter Eve there is a miraculous flame which descends from heaven into the Holy Sepulchre, and kindles all the lamps and candles there, as the sacrifice was burnt at the prayer of Elijah.—1 Kings xviii.

"Coming to the church of the Holy Sepulchre, we found it crowded with a numerous and distracted mob, making a hideous clamour, very unfit for that sacred place, and better becoming bacchanals than Christians. Getting, with some struggle, through this crowd, we went up into the gallery, on that side of the church next the Latin convent, whence we could discern all that passed in this religious frenzy.

"They began their disorders by running round the Holy Sepulchre with all their might and swiftness, crying out as they went, 'Huia!' which signifies 'This is he,' or,

'This is it,' an expression by which they assert the verity of the Christian religion. After they had by their vertiginous circulations and clamours turned their heads, and inflamed their madness, they began to act the most antic tricks and postures, in a thousand shapes of distraction. Sometimes they dragged one another along the floor, all around the sepulchre; sometimes they set one man upright on another's shoulders, and in this posture marched round; sometimes they turned men with their heels upwards, and hurried them about in such an indecent manner as to expose their persons; sometimes they tumbled round the sepulchre, after the manner of tumblers on the stage. In a word, nothing can be imagined more rude or extravagant than what was acted upon this occasion.

"In this tumultuous frantic humour they continued from twelve to four of the clock, the reason of which delay was because of a suit that was then in debate before the cadi betwixt the Greeks and Armenians, the former endeavouring to exclude the latter from having any share in this miracle. Both parties having expended (as I was informed) five thousand dollars between them in this foolish controversy, the cadi at last gave sentence that they should enter the Holy Sepulchre together, as had been usual at former times. Sentence being thus given, at four of the clock both nations went on with their ceremony. The Greeks first set out in a procession round the Holy Sepulchre, and immediately at their heels followed the Armenians. In this order they compassed the Holy Sepulchre thrice, having produced all their gallantry of standards, streamers, crucifixes, and embroidered habits on this occasion.

"Toward the end of this procession, there was a pigeon came fluttering into the cupola over the sepulchre, at the sight of which there was a greater shout and clamour than before. This bird, the Latins told us, was purposely let fly by the Greeks to deceive the people into an opinion that it was a visible descent of the Holy Ghost.

"The procession being over, the suffragan of the Greek patriarch (he being himself at Constantinople), and the principal Armenian bishop, approached to the door of the sepulchre, and cutting the string with which it was fastened and sealed, entered in, shutting the door after them, all the candles and lamps within having been before extinguished in the presence of the Turks and other witnesses. The exclamations were doubled as the miracle drew nearer its accomplishment, and the people pressed with such vehemence towards the door of the Sepulchre that it was not in the power of the Turks set to guard it with the severest checks to keep them off. The cause of their pressing in this manner is the great desire they have to light their candles at the holy flame, as soon as it is first brought out of the Sepulchre, it being esteemed the most sacred and pure, as coming immediately from heaven.

"The two miracle-mongers had not been above a minute in the Holy Sepulchre when the glimmering of the holy fire was seen, or imagined to appear, through some chinks of the door, and certainly Bedlam itself never saw such an unruly transport as was produced in the mob at this sight. Immediately after came out the two priests, with blazing torches in their hands, which they held up at the door of the Sepulchre, while the people thronged about with inexpressible ardour, every one striving to obtain a part of the first and purest flame. The Turks, in the meantime, with huge clubs, laid on them without mercy; but all this could not repel them, the excess of their transport making them insensible of pain. Those that got the fire applied it immediately to their beards, faces, and bosoms, pretending that it would not burn like an earthly flame; but I plainly saw none of them could endure this experiment long enough to make good that pretension.

"So many hands being employed, you may be sure it could not be long before innumerable tapers were lighted. The whole church, galleries and every place, seemed instantly to be in a flame, and with this illumination the ceremony ended.

"It must be owned that those two within the sepulchre performed their part with great quickness and dexterity; but the behaviour of the rabble without very much discredited the miracle. The Latins take a great deal of pains to expose this ceremony as a most shameful imposture, and a scandal to the Christian religion, perhaps out of envy that others should be masters of so gainful a business; but the Greeks and Armenians pin their faith upon it, and make their pilgrimages chiefly upon this motive; and it is the deplorable unhappiness of their priests, that having acted the cheat so long already, they are forced now to stand to it, for fear of endangering the apostasy of their people.

"Going out of the church after the event was over, we saw several people gathered about the stone of unction, who, having got a good store of candles lighted with the holy fire, were employed in daubing pieces of linen with the wicks of them and the melting wax, which pieces of linen were designed for winding sheets; and it is the opinion of these poor people that if they can but have the happiness to be buried in a shroud smutted with this celestial fire, it will certainly secure them from the flames of hell."—P. 127, et seq., eighth edition, 1810.

Many people may, however, believe that scenes of such an outrageous description as that witnessed by Maundrell, might have happened in his time—viz., 1697, but that their repetition is quite impossible in our own enlightened age. The following account of the same scenes by Mr. Calman, whose veracity is attested by a high authority, and who had an opportunity of seeing it only a few years ago, which has been reproduced in a little, and now particularly interesting book, "The Shrines of the Holy Land," may enable our readers to judge of the influence which the boasted march of intellect has produced on the Græco-Russian pilgrims, who assemble every Easter at Jerusalem.

"To notice all that was passing," says Mr. Calman, "within the church of the Holy Sepulchre during the space of twenty-four hours, would be next to impossible, because it was one continuation of shameless madness and rioting, which would have been a disgrace to Greenwich and Smithfield. Only suppose for a moment the mighty edifice crowded to excess with fanatic pilgrims of all the Eastern Churches, who, instead of lifting pure hands to God, without wrath and quarrelling, are led, by the petty jealousy about precedency which they should maintain in the order of their processions, into tumults and fighting, which can only be quelled by the scourge and whip of the followers of the false prophet.

"Suppose, farther, those thousands of devotees running from one extreme to the other, from the extreme of savage irritation to that of savage enjoyment, of mutual revellings and feastings, like Israel of old, who, when they made the golden calf, were eating and drinking, and rising to play. Suppose troops of men stripped half naked, to facilitate their actions, running, trotting, jumping, galloping to and fro the breadth and length of the church, walking on their hands with their feet aloft in the air, mounting on one another's shoulders, some in a riding and some in a standing position, and by the slightest push are all sent to the ground in one confused heap, which made one fear for their safety.

"Suppose, farther, many of the pilgrims dressed in fur caps, like the Polish Jews, whom they feigned to represent, and whom the mob met with all manner of insult, hurrying them through the church as criminals who had been condemned, amid loud execrations and shouts of laughter, which indicated that Israel is still a derision amongst these heathens, by whom they are still counted as sheep for the slaughter.

"About two o'clock on Saturday afternoon, the preparations for the miraculous fire commenced. The multitude who had been hitherto in a state of frenzy and madness, became a little more quiet, but it proved a quiet that precedes a thunderstorm. Bishops and priests, in full canonicals, then issued forth from their respective quarters, with flags and banners, crucifixes and crosses, lighted candles and smoking censers, to join or rather to lead a procession, which moved thrice round the church, invoking every picture, altar, and relic in their way to aid them in obtaining the miraculous fire.

"The procession then returned to the place from whence it started, and two gray-headed bishops, the one of the Greek and the other of the Armenian Church, were hurled by the soldiers through the crowd, into the apartment which communicated with that of the Holy Sepulchre, where they locked themselves in; there the marvellous fire was to make its first appearance, and from thence issue through the small circular windows and the door, for the use of the multitude. The eyes of all—men, women, and children—were now directed towards the Holy Sepulchre with an anxious expression, awaiting the issue of their expectation. The mixed multitude, each in his or her own language, were pouring forth their clamorous prayers to the Virgin and the saints to intercede for them on behalf of the object for which they were assembled, and the same were tenfold increased by the fanatic gestures and the waving of the garments by the priests of their respective communions, who were interested in the holy fire, and who were watching by the above-mentioned door and circular windows, with torches in their hands, ready to receive the virgin flame of the heavenly fire, and carry it to their flocks.

"In about twenty minutes from the time the bishops locked themselves in the apartment of the Holy Sepulchre, the miraculous fire made its appearance through the door and the two small windows, as expected. The priests were the first who lighted their torches, and they set out on a gallop in the direction of their lay brethren; but some of these errandless and profitless messengers had the misfortune to be knocked down by the crowd, and had their fire-brands wrested out of their hands, but some were more fortunate, and safely reached their destination, around whom the people flocked like bees, to have their candles lighted. Others, however, were not satisfied at having the holy fire second hand, but rushed furiously towards the Holy Sepulchre, regardless of their own safety, and that of those who obstructed their way, though it has frequently happened that persons have been trampled to death on such occasions.

"Those who were in the galleries let down their candles by cords, and drew them up when they had succeeded in their purpose. In a few minutes thousands of flames were ascending, the smoke and the heat of which rendered the church like the bottomless pit. To satisfy themselves, as well as to convince the Latins, the pilgrims, women as well as men, shamefully exposed their bare bosoms to the action of the flame of their lighted candles, to make their adversaries believe the miraculous fire differs from an ordinary one in being perfectly harmless.

"The two bishops, who a little while before locked themselves in the apartment of the Holy Sepulchre, now sallied forth out of it. When the whole multitude had their candles lighted, the bishops were caught by the crowd, lifted upon their shoulders, and carried to their chapels, amidst loud and triumphant acclamations. They soon, however, reappeared at the head of a similar procession to the one before, as a pretended thanksgiving to the Almighty for the miraculous fire vouchsafed."—P. 121, et seq.

It appears, by comparing these two narratives of one and the same thing, though separated by a distance of a hundred and fifty years, that the only difference which will be found between them is, that in the time of Maundrell, 1697, the miraculous fire was produced in about one minute's time, whilst the performance of the same trick required twenty when it was observed by Mr. Calman. And, indeed, it has been justly observed by both these writers, that the exhibitors of the miraculous fire, having continued so long to practise this imposture, cannot leave it off without ruining their authority and influence over those whom they have thus been cheating for many centuries. This circumstance has been most pointedly expressed by the author of the work from which we have extracted Mr. Calman's description of this pious, or rather impious, fraud, and who says:—

"Had it been an occasional miracle, as time had rolled on, and truth had more and more illuminated the human mind, the practice might have been gradually discontinued. As the priests had grown more honest, and the people more enlightened, they might have mutually consigned these pious frauds to the oblivion of the darker ages; and if the blush of shame had risen up at the memories of the past, the world would have respected them the more for their honesty of purpose.

"But an annual miracle, always of the same specific kind, exhibited on the same spot, and at the same hour—an annual miracle—at what point of time should this be discontinued? and, if discontinued, would it not be manifest either that heaven had forsaken its favourites, or that all the past had been delusion and imposture?"—P. 127, 128.

Few, probably, will have read the foregoing narratives without having been reminded of a somewhat similar, and scarcely more decorous scene, which annually takes place somewhat nearer home than Jerusalem. We allude, of course, to the spectacle of the annual miracle of the liquefying of the blood of St. Januarius, at Naples, which might possibly have long since been discontinued, but for a similar apprehension on the part of the priesthood. We are sure that there are many enlightened Roman Catholics who are heartily ashamed of such exhibitions, and believe in the miracle as little as we do; but any of our readers who have not witnessed the ceremony, may like to see the graphic account given of it by an eye-witness in the present year, published in the Illustrated London News of 23rd June last. It is as follows:—

FESTIVAL AT NAPLES.

"The scene which we here present to our readers is the interior of the Church of Sta. Chiara, in Naples. It has a twofold interest—from its historical associations, and from the fact that the miracle of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius takes place annually in this Church, on the first Saturday in May. It was founded in 1310 by King Robert, who dedicated it to the Host; whilst his wife attached to it a monastery for the Sisters of Sta. Chiara. In this monastery are now educated the daughters of the first families of the kingdom. The Kings of the Two Sicilies are buried in this church; and the body of the first Queen of his present Majesty is not only the subject of a continued miracle, but works miracles—Ipse dixit. We now consider it however, merely as the site where once a year is wrought the noted miracle of the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius. We premise, however, that King Robert commanded that the procession, on occasion of the grand fete of Corpus Domini, should walk from the Cathedral to this church, followed by the Sovereign and the grandees of the kingdom. That custom is still observed.

"On the first Saturday in the past month we went to see the blood of St. Januarius liquefied, and took up our station near the gallery erected for musicians on the right. The body of the church on each side was crowded with curious or devout spectators; on the left side of the altar, in the best reserved seats, were women of the lowest classes, who claim (and have their claims allowed) to be relatives of the saint, who suffered martyrdom A.D. 305. Above the arches, through these grated and highly-ornamented windows, or openings, we could catch a view of the nuns, who were looking down on the scene below. Poor creatures! it was their great field day. The choir performed some fine sacred music, and then at intervals the relations of the saint raised their voices in the loudest and most unearthly shriek, and some said they were praying or saying a rosary. The statue of the saint had been brought to the church in the morning, and now reposed on the high altar. His mitre, which was presented to him by the Council of Naples in 1713, cost 30,000 scudi. It is ornamented with 3328 diamonds, 198 emeralds, and 168 rubies. The pallium is of silver, and was made by Domenico Vinaccia, at an expense of 8,300 scudi. After a long suspense, a general hush announced the approach of the procession from the cathedral. The spectacle was magnificent. One after the other, forty-seven statues of saints (who are the protectors of churches or religious bodies in Naples), followed by their respective orders or devotees, were taken round the church, and then carried back to the cathedral. As each passed the altar, the relatives of St. Januarius yelled or shrieked a prayer. The wealth expended on these statues must be immense; so great, indeed, that, though made at the expense of the several parishes of Naples, they are all kept in the cathedral, and are not permitted to leave it even for the annual fetes performed in their honour at the respective churches, unless a deposit has been made to the full amount of their value. The statue of the Archangel Michael, the special protector of Ferdinand II., was surrounded by the Regal Guard. The procession closed with the ampulla containing the blood of the Saint in a golden shrine, and under a canopy of gold and crimson cloth. It was carried by the Cardinal, and immediately preceded by the Seminaristi, Municipality, gentlemen of Court, and dignitaries of the cathedral, whilst a military band followed, playing several selections from the "Traviata." Prayers were offered on the high altar by the Cardinal, who, taking the ampulla in both hands, worked it round and round. Immediately behind was a light, at which his eminence, stopping every now and then, examined the blood to ascertain if it were liquified. At each disappointment there were murmurs and shrieks, and prayers uttered. The words it was difficult to distinguish; but they generally are as follows:—

Tu sei morto per la Santa Fede,
Impetra a noi la grazia della Santa Fede,
E facci il miracolo.

If the miracle is delayed longer than usual these words are uttered:—"Faccia giallinta, come tu sei dispettosa! Campione di Christo, tu sei un bello santo!" "You yellow-faced fellow, how spiteful you are! Champion of Christ, you are a pretty saint!" A little bell in twenty minutes announced that the miracle was wrought; and from doubt, remonstrance, and despair, everything was changed in a moment to rejoicing. There was a buzz of congratulation through the church. "Thankee, thankee, St. Genuarino," said a man by my side. "We shall be safe from the cholera and make plenty of wine this year," said a young priest. "Last year, sir, it took a long time to liquefy, it became indurated again, and, and—we had the cholera." We have no farther concern with this miracle than as a spectacle, and, therefore, suspend all other observations. The Neapolitan populace, who believe it most profoundly, never think of inquiring about it, and seem to have adopted the maxim of the ancient Germans—"Sanctius ac reverentius de Diis credere quam scire" The King, too, during the following week goes in state with all his court to the cathedral, to kiss the ampulla.

Correspondence.

ST. CYRIL OF JERUSALEM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As you are rather severe in your last number on an eminent Father, whose catechetical lectures have come down to us as a valuable relic of antiquity—St. Cyril of Jerusalem—I think it but fair to call your attention to some passages from his works, which show that he was as great a lover of the Holy Scriptures as you yourself profess to be. As a lover of fair play, I hope you will have no hesitation in inserting them in your next number. I remain, sir,

Your obedient servant,
SCRUTATOR.

EXTRACT FROM ST. CYRIL.

"Embrace and keep," saith this eminent Father, "the faith which is now delivered to you by the Church, TAKEN FROM ALL THE SCRIPTURES; for as all cannot read the Scriptures, but some are prevented by unskilfulness, and others by occupation, lest any soul should perish through ignorance, we comprehend the whole doctrine of faith in a few verses. * * * And this faith I commend you to have as your viaticum through life, and to receive nothing more besides it, not even if we ourselves should change, and speak contrary to those things which we now teach you; nor even if an opposing angel, transformed into an angel of light, should seek to lead you into error. For although we or an angel from heaven should preach unto you another Gospel besides that which you receive, let him be anathema. And what you have taken in words, retain in your memory, and TAKE THE ORIGIN (Gr., σύσταοιν) OF EACH HEAD, at a fitting time, FROM THE DIVINE SCRIPTURES. For the sum of the faith was not composed as it pleased men, but the most important things (Gr., καιριώτατα), SELECTED OUT OF ALL THE SCRIPTURES, complete one doctrine of faith. And even as the mustard seed includes many branches in a little grain, so this faith, in a few words, incloses, as in a bosom, all the knowledge of piety contained as well in the Old as in the New Testament. Behold, therefore, my brethren, and hold fast the traditions which you now receive, and write them in the breadth of your hearts."*

"Who can know the deep things of God, except the Holy Spirit alone, who has dictated the divine Scriptures? And yet the Holy Spirit himself has not spoken in the Scriptures concerning the generation of the Son from the Father. Why, then, should you laboriously inquire into those things which the Holy Spirit has not written in the Scriptures? Why shouldst thou, who knowest not those things which are written, seek to penetrate what is not written? There are many questions in the divine Scriptures: we do not comprehend what is written. Wherefore should we fatigue the mind about what is not written? Let it suffice us to know that God begat his only Son."*

We readily comply with the request of our correspondent, and can assure him we have no wish to keep back any part of the writings of the Fathers, especially those relating to subjects on which all the earlier Fathers are in truth unanimous, such as the passages he has quoted from St. Cyril.

We are obliged to "Scrutator" for calling our attention to those passages, from which we think some important conclusions may be deduced.

The extract given from Cat. 5, p. 78, contains one of the most distinct statements to be found in the writings of the Fathers, that the original creed of the Church was drawn entirely from the Holy Scriptures, and is, in fact, nothing but a brief compendium of what is taught therein, and was not founded on an independent tradition orally delivered. It speaks indeed of traditions, notwithstanding their Scriptural origin, because everything contained in the Holy Scriptures was transmitted or handed down. The word tradition we could easily show is employed by the other Fathers just in the same way. It seems too obvious to require any argument to prove it, that the traditions of faith contained in the creeds, and derived entirely from the Scriptures, do not yield the slightest warrant for that kind of tradition relied on by the Church of Rome, which presumes to add new articles of faith, of which the ancient Church, even in the days of St. Cyril, had no conception, not only without warrant from the Word of God, but even against it. Again, can any one believe that St. Cyril would have spoken of the sonship of Christ as an impenetrable mystery, which no man could safely venture to explain, as he has done in the second passage cited, if he believed that there was vested in the Church a power of developing doctrines not revealed in the Holy Scriptures, as now taught by Mr. Newman, the head of the Roman Catholic University of Ireland.

We are so far from wishing to conceal such passages, or to deny that St. Cyril (with a good deal of superstition and credulity) held, theoretically at least, the same sound views of Scriptural authority as most of the Fathers in early times, that we have pleasure in adding a further passage to those to which "Scrutator" has called our attention, and which, perhaps, is still more striking than either of them. When treating of the Holy Spirit, St. Cyril says:—"Let us speak only those things which are written; if anything be not written, let us not curiously seek to know it. THE HOLY SPIRIT HIMSELF HAS UTTERED THE SCRIPTURES; He has said whatever He chose concerning Himself, and all that we were able to receive. Let us speak, therefore, those things which are dictated by Himself, for what he has not said, we dare not."†

We would entreat our friend Mr. Power, who attaches so much weight to St. Cyril's authority, to weigh well the foregoing passages, and honestly say whether he believes that if St. Cyril had been at Rome on the 8th of last December, he would have dared to promulgate a new doctrine which the Holy Spirit has not uttered in the Scriptures, and which was unknown to the whole Church for, at least, twelve centuries.

LEGENDS OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As you seem desirous of noticing the Roman Catholic literature of the day, allow me to invite your attention to a handsomely got up volume, printed by Charles Dolman, New Bond-street, entitled "Legends of the Blessed Virgin," collected from authentic sources. By J. Collin De Plancey. Translated from the French.

The translator, in his preface, apologizes for the title under which the sacred narratives which compose it are introduced. "Legends," or readings, are pieces of sacred literature (legenda, "to be read" as distinct from things credenda, or agenda, "to be believed or done"), not matters of faith, and, therefore, not of precept; but edifying narratives, which the faithful may read with profit, and which may, by God's blessing, be the means of arresting the attention of others to the marvels of the spiritual world. The volume contains, among other marvellous legends, that of the Holy House of Loretto, which, as you have already so fully examined its pretensions to be placed among the "credenda," or things "to be believed," I shall not occupy your time further with it.

Perhaps, however, you may find space to transcribe the following specimen of the edifying narrations contained in the book, which is taken verbatim from pp. 4-6.

I remain, sir, your obedient servant,
A CONSTANT READER.

THE SPARROW.

"Sancta Maria." "Holy Mary."

Holy Mary! How many charming legends are attached to the sweet name of Mary! Here is one which is generally regarded as a pious tale or parable.—

"In the early ages of Christianity, a pious solitary, great in the sight of God, but little known to men (though St. Bernard twice preached his panegyric, and composed the office for his festival), lived on the borders of the Aube, in a forest of Champagne. The ancient Gauls had here worshipped one of their gloomy divinities, for whom the Romans had substituted Saturn. The spot was thence called Saturniacum, when the solitary, whose name was Victor de Plancey came there, and built a chapel and a small hermitage.

"Numerous miraculous events followed this work. Among the most suprising were conversions, by which souls sold to perdition were redeemed to heaven; and hearts once frozen by egotism, and corrupted by vicious practices, were inflamed with charity, and brought forth such flowers of virtue as even the world is constrained to admire—phenomena which perplex the mind, but are easily explained by faith.

"The saint felt that the hours which he passed alone in his cell were the sweetest of his life. The only living creature near him was a tame sparrow, which he fed and cherished, regarding him as the emblem of solitude. Tenderly devoted to the Blessed Virgin, the holy hermit invoked her incessantly, and the only words he uttered aloud were, Ave Maria!

"Long accustomed to hear these words, and only these words, the sparrow learned to form them; and great (as may be imagined) was the joy of the recluse the first time the bird flew on his shoulder and cried in his ears, Ave Maria!

"At first imagining some holy spirit had come on a divine mission, the saint fell on his knees in reverence; but the bird continuing to chirp Ave Maria! Ave Maria! soon made him aware of the real source of those sweet sounds. The bird, from an innocent distraction, became a friend—almost a brother—a praying creature of God! He redoubled his care of him, and henceforth his solitude was agreeably enlivened.

"The modest bird, to whom the people gave the name of 'the little monk,' seemed on his part to share his master's joy. At the dawn of day his first cry was, Ave Maria! When Victor threw him his crumbs, the little bird sang a grace of Ave Marias; and on the hermit kneeling to his devotions, the bird would perch on his shoulder and softly whisper, Ave Maria!

"Victor cultivated a small garden. Could he for one instant have lost sight of the constant object of his thoughts, the faithful sparrow, on a tree, would have instantly recalled it by his Ave Maria!

"The christians of the country, who came to consult the holy hermit in their troubles and doubts, much esteemed the little bird; and, on saluting them with his little prayer, they could not consider it to be otherwise than a miraculous favour, accorded to the solitary by our Blessed Lady.

"The sparrow, when free, took short flights into the country; and, when the hermit, in his meditative walks, had rambled further than his wont from his cell, he was sure to be reminded by the bird chirping an Ave Maria!

"One day in spring, as Victor lay ill upon his mat, he opened the wicket of his cell, and his little friend flew out, as was his custom. A few minutes afterwards, Victor was alarmed at seeing a sparrow-hawk pursuing his favourite. The bird of prey opened his beak, and spread his talons to seize and devour the poor sparrow, when the little bird, almost feeling the sharp claws of his enemy, screamed out Ave Maria! At this wonder, the hawk, startled and terrified, arrested his course, and the gentle sparrow had time to reach the cell; and, falling on the breast of Victor, faintly chirped an Ave Maria! and died."

[ED.—From what authentic sources Mons. Collin de Plancey derived this pious tale, unless he be a lineal descendant from the holy hermit (whose sirname, we observe, he bears), and has received it by unerring family tradition, from "the early ages of christianity!" we are at a loss to conceive, and should, indeed, almost suspect that the writer was desirous of bringing "Legends of Mary" into ridicule, by commencing with such an unedifying fable, if the very next chapter in his "Legends,' was not one on the Council of Ephesus, in which St. Cyril of Alexandria, presided. We feel obliged to our friend for the volume, which we shall, probably, at a future period mention again.]

PADRE GUILIO ARRIGONI.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

(Translated from the Italian.)

MR. EDITOR—Reading to-day your most interesting journal, I was much delighted with the article, entitled "An Enlightened Roman Catholic Bishop." What your correspondent states as to the nature of his preaching is only the exact truth. He never used to speak of the Virgin or the saints, and when occasionally obliged to make some panegyric on them, he always invited his hearers only to imitate the virtues of Mary and the saints, but not to adore them. His sermons were full of texts from the Scriptures, which, contrary to the usage of the Romish Church, he always cited in Italian. The Archbishop of Florence, the same who now causes those to be put in prison who read the Bible, ordered him to quote the passages from the Scriptures in Latin. Arrigoni obeyed; but after the citation in Latin, he repeated the same text in Italian. I was then a collegian, studying theology, to become, eventually, a priest. His sermons led me to study the Word of God, and I may say they were even one of the means which God made use of to liberate me from the darkness of Romanism, and to lead me, step by step, to the knowledge of Jesus Christ as my only Saviour.

* Cyril Hierosol. Cat. 5. De Fide et Symbolo, p. 78.

* Ib. Cat. 11. De Filio Dei, p. 151.
† Cat. 16. De Spiritu Sancto, p. 244.

I caused to be printed, in Florence, a sonnet in praise of this celebrated orator, which was sold about the streets of the city, and in the neighbourhood of the cathedral.

The following is the sonnet:—

"Dappoi che in Flora il tuo parlar s'udio
Veste un nuovo fulgor l' ALTARE e il TRONO:
E chino a terra, smascherato, il rio
Vizio stramazza di tua voce al suono.

Tuonor tuoi detti, ed in profondo oblio
Gli odii, le risse, e le vendette sono.
Tra preghi e l'ira provocato Iddio
Ferma il vento, la pioggia, il lampo, il tuono.

Mentre dai vite agl' inspirati accenti
Freme l' inferno debellato e vinto
Al vibrar de 'tuoi fulmini eloquenti.

Salve, eccelso orator, di mille onori
Ti ammanti l'arbe, perche il ciel ti ha cinto
La fronte giovenil di eterni allori."

The verse I have underlined compromised me.* I was expelled from the college, and exposed to persecution. This circumstance made me reflect, and from one circumstance to another I was led, finally, to abandon Rome and to embrace the Gospel. It is now, by the grace of God, 14 years that I labour in the vineyard of the Lord—to Him be the glory and the honour.

I remain yours faithfully,
SALVATORE FERRETTI.

* "Since thy preaching was heard in Florence
A new lustre invests the altar and the throne."

WHY ARE THE PRIESTS AGAINST INQUIRY?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

MR. EDITOR—As I was coming from the fair last week, I met Jerry; and, says I, "have you got the Douay Bible yet?" "No," says he; "I searched every shop in Keelovenogue, and never a one could I get for love or money. There were plenty of 'the Glories of Mary' and 'the Garden of the Soul,' and 'the Key of Heaven,' and 'the Path to Paradise,' but the never a Bible; but," says he, "I'll get one before long, if I have to send to Cork for it." "And," says I, "what makes you so eager to get it when your clergy are warning you against it?" "Why," says he, "the life is fairly worn out of me on account of it; for every dirty little spalpeen of a Protestant throws it in my face; 'and,' says he, 'sure it's in your own Bible;' 'and,' says he 'sure your own Bible says so;' 'and,' says he, 'don't you know your own Bible?' and I knowing no more about it than if there wasn't such a book in the world; and besides," says he, "what the minister says is true, 'twill do our religion no harm to examine it;' and it's myself thinks 'twould be a poor religion if it wouldn't stand examination; and," says he, "some things happened lately that have set me on more for examining our religion that ever I was." "What things?" says I. "Why," says he, "the great Father Ignatius was here lately, preaching in the chapel, and two Protestants came to hear him; but Father John wouldn't let them in. So the minister wrote to Father Ignatius next day, asking him to give a public lecture, that Protestants might attend, and offering him the use of a room any evening he wished, but he wouldn't hear of it, and ran out of the town that very day. I thought to myself if the arguments he gave us in the chapel were any good he needn't be afraid to let Protestants hear them; and, when the minister afterwards spoke to us about it, old Dan Hurley defended him by saying, 'that he was in too great a hurry to stop to lecture;' and then the parson began to laugh; 'and,' says he, 'boys, that's the real truth, he was in too great a hurry; and,' says he, 'it's a queer thing that your priests always seem to be in a hurry when we ask them to come forward with the Douay Bible, and prove their religion.'" "Well," says I, "that's a sore cut, and we haven't a word to say against it, for it's too true." "But," says Jerry, "I've worse to tell you yet. A few days since, old Dan met the parson in the street, and began about Henry VIII. being the first Protestant, and about 'Ward's Cantos,' and 'where was your religion before Luther;' and we all gathered to listen to them, and they began about the new doctrine the Pope has put on us; and Dan asked the parson why he wouldn't believe the Immaculate Conception? and the parson said, because he couldn't find it in the Bible; and he asked Dan whether St. Peter knew all about the Virgin? and Dan allowed that, of course he did, seeing that he lived at the same time, and was with her constantly. 'Then,' says the minister, 'isn't it a queer thing that St. Peter doesn't say one word about the Immaculate Conception?' 'But,' says Dan, 'new things are learned every day, and maybe 'tis only now it's discovered.' 'Well,' says the minister, 'I don't think it likely that anything could be found out now about her that wasn't known when the apostles wrote; and,' says he, 'do any of you remember the good old minister that was here some years ago?' 'We do, well,' says several of the boys. 'And do you think,' says the parson, 'that, in 1800 years, any person would be able to give a better description of him than you could now? or do you think that, in 1800 years, anything will be found out about him that isn't known now?' Well, the boys allowed that it would be foolish to suppose such a thing; and, says the minister, 'isn't it just as foolish to suppose that anything could be discovered now about the Virgin Mary that wasn't known to the apostles who lived at the same time with her?'" "What did the boys say to that?" says I. "Why," says Jerry, "we hadn't a word to say against it; but I'm coming to the worst of it now. The parson began to talk about the priests never coming forward, and Dan tried to defend them; for says he, 'they have too much to do, but I'm ready to meet you myself any day you like.' Well, the boys gave a cheer for him, and the minister made him fix the day before them all; so, when the day came near, the parson sent to him, asking what doctrine he would discuss; but Dan had got frightened, and wished to back out; but he had pledged himself before a large crowd, and both Catholics and Protestants were expecting it; so he was ashamed to say plainly that he wouldn't come forward; but what does he do but sends the minister word that he was ready and willing to meet him, but only on condition that no person should be allowed to be present at the discussion; that they two were to go into a room by themselves, and argue, without any person hearing them." "Well, Jerry," says I, "that's the meanest thing I ever heard. If Dan was afraid to meet the parson he should have said so honestly, but that was a dirty way of getting out of it." "True, for you," says Jerry, "and we were all ashamed of it; but, bad as that is, there's worse to come." "What could be worse?" says I. "Why," says he, "when the parson got Dan's message he was mighty vexed; and he wrote down to Father John, telling the whole matter, and asking him to take Dan's place, and defend the doctrines of his Church before an equal number of Catholics and Protestants; but when Father John's servant heard that the letter was from the parson, she wouldn't take it at all; and then the parson printed some papers on it, showing that Father John's servant wouldn't refuse a letter addressed to her master if he hadn't put her up to it." "Jerry," says I, "bad as the rest was, that beats all; sure 'twas true for the minister, the servant wouldn't refuse the letter unless her master had given her orders." "That's the plain truth," says Jerry, "and we can't look a Protestant in the face since; we're clean beat out of the field; we haven't a word left in us." "But," says I, "why didn't you get Humphrey to come forward, for the credit of the Church?" "Well," says he, "there's another bad story about that; Humphrey's gone!" "Gone!" says I; "what made him go?" "I'll tell you," says he; "while Humphrey came forward at the lectures to argue with the parson, all the boys in the town went to listen; they used to be packed as thick in the room as herrings in a barrel; and the minister had five minutes, and then Humphrey five minutes, to argue, and so on, for a couple of hours each night, and all Father John could do he couldn't keep the boys from it." "Did he try?" says I. "He did," says Jerry, "and there was the finest play-acting you ever seen, one Sunday in chapel on the head of it." "What play-acting?" says I. "Why," says he, "Father John made a plan with some of the old people that he would give the boys a fright, by pretending to curse them, and then the old people were to beg them off. So the next Sunday, Father John read out from the altar the names of the boys that were most forward in the business, and let on that he was going to curse them at once, so with that the old people came up and began to beg them off. 'No,' says Father John, 'if St. Patrick himself was to ask me, I wouldn't listen to him.' Well, they begged and besought him to let them off this once. 'By this and by that,' says he, 'if all the saints in the calendar were to intercede for them, I wouldn't let them off.' Well, the old women began to screech, and the children began to bawl, and such a howl you never heard as they set up; at last he began to soften a little, and in the end he let them off for that time." "And," says I, "were the boys much frightened?" "No," says he; "for I was told that one of them overheard the priest making up the plan with his father the night before; so they were only grinning all the time, for they knew how 'twould end." "But," says I, "what has that to say to Humphrey?" "Why," says he, "I'm coming to it as fast as I can; you see," says he, "when this didn't stop the boys going to the lectures, Father John saw that the only plan was to stop Humphrey from coming forward; for as long as he argued, the boys would go to listen." "And," says I, "how did he get Humphrey to stop?" "Well," says he, "I was present when the minister one day asked Humphrey why he had stopped coming. 'Well,' says Humphrey, 'the truth is, I'm under a promise to Father John not to argue any more; he sent for me one day, and, says he, "Humphrey, I beg of you not to argue any more with the minister; and," says he, "I make this request, not for my own sake, but for God's sake;" 'and,' says Humphrey, 'he spoke to me as pitiful as a child," and entreated me to give him a promise; so I had to pledge myself not to argue any more.'" "Well, Jerry," says I, "Father John was brought very low when he had to speak in that way to Humphrey." "True for you," says Jerry; "but he would have gone on his knees to him if it would stop the discussion." "But," says I, "what was he afraid of? sure Humphrey spoke right well, and gave the minister word for word." "Well," says Jerry, "I'm thinking it wasn't the minister Father John was afraid of, but the discussion itself; for the boys were getting such a liking for Bibles and books on controversy; and I heard the minister allow that there were many priests as clever as the Protestant ministers, and as well able to speak, and that 'that's the ministers they're afraid of, but the spirit of inquiry that would rise among the boys." "Well," says I, "there's some truth in that, for the priests are greatly against inquiry; but," says I, "you haven't told me yet about Humphrey leaving the town." "Well," says Jerry, "he stayed very quiet for some time, and never came forward at the lectures; but Father John felt afraid that he would begin again, as he had a great liking for discussion, and, moreover, the boys used to make a good collection for him after each argument; so he sent him off out of the place entirely, and that's how it came to pass that we couldn't get him to argue with the minister." "Well, Jerry," says I, "I've been thinking a deal about why our priests won't meet the ministers; and, I think, what Father John says must be the truth, that such holy men wouldn't be up and down with the likes of them." "Don't believe that," says Jerry; "for I can tell you, though the priests pretend that 'tisn't worth their while to argue with the minister, still they're fairly vexed about it, they're at their wit's end to know what to do; and," says he, "Father Ned, in the next parish, spoke from the altar about it, and had one of the minister's papers in his hand, and he defended the priests for not coming forward, and that doesn't look as if they cared nothing about it." "And what reasons did he give?" says I. "Well," says Jerry, "he said to the people that twasn't afraid of the ministers they were, but that their bishops wouldn't let them enter into discussion." "And," says I, "were the people satisfied?" "Well," says he, "the old people were quite satisfied, but the young people who had some spirit of inquiry weren't satisfied at all; 'for,' says they, 'he doesn't tell us WHY the bishops forbid it;' and," says Jerry, "its fretting me to say that even the Turks and Heathens have something to say for their religion, but we aren't allowed to speak a word for ours; and, if we ask the priest a question, it's only 'heretic,' and 'souper,' and 'jumper,' we get for our pains; and," says he, "I'm sure what the minister says is true, that many of the young priests would be ready and willing to dispute, but the old ones, who have more sense, won't let them; and," says he, "I can't help thinking it a bad sign of a religion to be so much afraid of inquiry; and," says he, "the Protestants aren't afraid of inquiry; they tell us to examine their religion, and try it by the Word of God; but," says he, "it's a bad sign of anything when it won't stand examination; and," says he, "that's why I'm so eager to get the Bible to examine for myself; for," says he, "if there isn't something wrong, why are the priests so much against inquiry; and," says he, "if we're wrong, I'm very sure the priests won't bear our punishment hereafter; and," says he, "I can't get that verse out of my head that we heard at Ned Bryan's—'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his soul?'" Well, Mr. Editor, I wasn't so much against Jerry getting the Douay Bible as I was; for, surely, these things are enough to make us anxious to examine our religion; and, though I wouldn't touch a Bible myself for half Ireland, still I'd like to hear something out of it; and, if Jerry got it, he'd tell me what he found in it, and I wouldn't come under the priest's curse, for he didn't think of forbidding that.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR AUGUST.

HARVESTING the corn crops should almost exclusively engage the farmer's attention this and the succeeding month.

Cabbages are becoming, like the parsnips and carrots, as much a farming crop as it has been hitherto a garden one; it will be, therefore, necessary that sowings of these valuable crops be made as early in the month as possible. Early York, Wellington, nonpareil, Fulham, or Vanack, some for planting out early in October, to come in early; the greater portion should be kept over for planting out in February and March for a general crop. The drumhead, green Savoys, hundred-headed cabbage, and borecole, for planting out during the spring months, for a general late crop.

Laying down with Clover and Grass Seeds.—This month is the best in the year for laying down with permanent grass seeds. There are many chances against spring-sown seeds; but those sown at this season have everything in their favour. The ground should be well pulverised and thoroughly cleaned for their reception. A little rapeseed may be sown amongst grass seeds at this period with advantage—say about 4 lbs. per Irish acre, if the land be rich; if poor, double that quantity may be sown.

Important Work on Controversy.

In the Press, and will be ready shortly,

THE "CONTROVERSIAL CORRESPONDENCE,"

Between R. W. KENNARD, Esq., London, and the Rev. PAUL MACLACHLAN, Roman Catholic Priest, Falkirk.

In Demy 8vo., price 5s. to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY.

This correspondence, conducted with great ability on both sides, has, at length, terminated by the withdrawal of the Rev. Mr. Maclachlan from the contest, who has republished the whole of his letters, WITHOUT THOSE OF MR. KENNARD! As such a proceeding is evidently unfair, it is intended that the entire correspondence, consisting of about 70 letters, shall be published, so as that the nature of the Controversy may be thoroughly understood by all parties.

Dr. Irving writes—"This is a remarkable publication. Mr. Maclachlan is sufficiently skilled in the Romish arts of controversy; but in logical dexterity, and even in theological learning, the priest is no match for the Protestant layman."

The Rev. John Evans writes—"This correspondence furnishes decidedly the best Handbook of the Romish Controversy yet extant."

The Venerable Dr. Croly says of Mr. Kennard's letters—"I sincerely admire their learning, reasoning, and spirit of Christianity; and I know of no production fitter to produce a more ample assurance in the mind of any man open to rational conviction." It has also been characterized as the "most important controversy that has taken place since the days of Stillingfleet."

The Controversy embraces the modern arguments of Romanists, having reference more particularly to History than Doctrine; and the Book will form an excellent companion to Dr. Cumming's Controversy with Mr. French, known as the Hammersmith Discussion, which is exclusively Doctrinal.

The Work is now publishing in one Volume, Demy 8vo, and will contain above 700 pages, with a copious and useful Index. Price 5s. to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY.

The names of Subscribers are requested to be sent as early as possible to WILLIAM CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin.

IN

WITH ADDENDA AND APPENDIX.

BY THE

REV. WILLIAM LE POER TRENCH, D.D.,

Rector of Killcreran, Diocese of Tuam, and one of the Honorary Secretaries of the Church Education Society for Ireland.

"Dr. Trench has extracted the Substance of the Evidence, on the subject of Public Education in Ireland, and has produced it in a concise and systematic form. His 'Digest' is intended to enable persons interested in the Educational movement in progress in Ireland, to understand, at a glance, the results of the inquiry alluded to."—Athenæum.

"The invaluable 'Digest of the Evidence,' by Dr. Trench, has placed the substance of the 'Blue Book' in a clear, comprehensive form before all those who are interested in this great question. It was a work of great labour, of no ordinary patience, and requiring the utmost discrimination. But the result has been eminently successful. The plan of the 'Digest' is admirable; and the subjects so well classified, that immediate reference can be made to the most important evidence on every branch of the inquiry. It is a volume which will never lose its interest, so long as there is a friend of Scriptural Education to be encouraged, and an advocate of a godless expediency to be put to shame."—Christian Examiner.

THE PRIESTS OF ITALY.

WHEN travelling in the north of Italy, many years since, we became acquainted with a Genoese priest, of great simplicity of mind and amiability of manners, who made a very earnest effort to convince us that there was no religion of the heart outside the pale of the Roman Catholic Church, and who did convince us that it was quite possible so to train the mind as not only to contract it to a very narrow view of things, but to make it believe, with the blindest faith, things which, to men of a more enlarged sphere of vision, are self-evident absurdities, unworthy of a moment's serious thought.

It is not our intention to trouble our readers with any narrative of the mediæval legends which this good priest repeated for our edification, and relied on as if they were "demonstration strong as proofs of holy writ" of the truth of the Church to which he belonged. We have no wish to render ridiculous an individual who, though credulous, was earnestly sincere, and represents, we believe, a numerous class among his order in other countries as well as Italy; and we merely refer to the occurrence because we have, ever since, been practically convinced that it is a grievous error, or a gross calumny, for Protestants to represent all Roman Catholic priests as intentional deceivers of the people, though we fear no stretch of Christian charity can exculpate the whole of them from such a charge.

We have been confirmed in the views which we adopted so long ago, from our own personal observation, by the testimony recently given by two unprejudiced Protestant clergymen, who have travelled extensively in Italy, and have published the conclusions to which their own minds had arrived upon the subject, after an extensive acquaintance with Italian society. We allude to the Rev. M. Hobart Seymour, in his "Mornings among the Jesuits at Rome," and the Rev. J. A. Wylie, in his "Pilgrimage from the Alps to the Tiber."

The former eminent writer (p. 269) narrates a conversation which he had at Rome with one of the priests of the Collegio Romano, who was defending the reality of the conversions and the holiness of the American Indians who had been converted by their missionaries, in which he stated, that what he called a most wonderful miracle had occurred when the missionary was administering the holy communion to them. "He was holding," said the priest, "the host in his fingers thus"—my friend suiting the action to the word—"and, as the poor Indian was too far from him, the missionary priest could not place the host in his mouth, the poor, humble, devout Indian knelt so far away that the priest could not reach him"—and here my reverend friend lifted his hands in an attitude of awe, looked devoutly to heaven, and then earnestly and solemnly addressed me—"the host flew out of his fingers, flew over to the poor Indian, and flew into his mouth! Oh," he added, in a tone of the most reverential devotion, "the blessed Lord Jesus so loved that poor savage, that he longed to enter into his heart, and thus miraculously flew into his mouth! How anxious he was to get into him!"

"I could no longer doubt the sincerity of this priest; there was a fervour, an earnestness, a devotion of manner, that showed he fully believed what he thus narrated, and the personal character of the man was such that I had no right to doubt him after so solemn a statement. He narrated it as a miracle wrought by God in behalf of the Church of Rome. He mentioned it as illustrating the blessing of God upon the missions of that Church. He, believing that the age of miracles is not yet passed, but that miracles are still constantly working, imagined that his narrative would be credited by me; but it only proved to my mind that the missionary priest had evidently invented the story to exalt and magnify his own labours, and was now telling it among his brother Jesuits of the Collegio Romano, that such of them as were simple, and credulous, and superstitious enough to believe it, might spread it through the world as a new testimony of God to the Church of Rome. My reverend friend evidently believed it, and expected that I should believe it.

"I shall never forget," adds Mr. Seymour, "this portion of our conversation. It was a practical confutation of those—and, I must confess, I was myself once among the number—who suppose that the Romish priests are all infidels; that the simple, and superstitious, and ignorant may, perhaps, believe what they are taught, but that the talented and educated are infidel as to some of the doctrines which they inculcate. I am fully persuaded that, while this may be true of some, it is not true of many whose acquaintance I was enabled to make during my residence at Rome. They were educated, learned, astute, and talented men, and, yet, they believed things contrary to all experience, reason, and revelation. The reverend Jesuit who made to me the communication respecting these Indians was one of the most polished and educated men at Rome; he was conversant with the entire range of European literature; he spoke English, German, and French with almost the same facility as his native Italian, and was as learned and astute as a man might be expected to be who was selected for a professorship in the principal educational establishments of the order of Jesuits at Rome. He fully believed, and expected me to believe, his narrative. This, certainly, is a phase of mind not very intelligible in England; but when it is considered that these men are brought up from childhood in certain principles, that they are taught to believe implicitly everything which the Church is said to teach; that they never see the holy Scriptures, which might call in question the principles which they are thus taught; that believing that miracles are still as constantly wrought as in the days of the apostles; that looking on every doubt in the mind as a horrid infidelity, to be hated and loathed, and the source of every woe, here and hereafter; that being thus habituated to receive implicitly everything that seems to come in conformity with the Church, their minds are in a different train, and act on a different principle altogether, and they must not be judged by the same rules as might hold among us whose minds are so differently constituted and trained. I am fully convinced that, in supposing all these men—however it may be with some—to be secretly infidels, we do them the greatest injustice. I am satisfied that multitudes among them believe, with the fullest and most implicit faith, the dogmas of their Church; and, therefore, instead of regarding them as the hypocrites, and monsters of deception and wickedness, which such a supposition implies, I regard them as melancholy evidences of the fall of human nature, and sad monuments of the shipwreck of the human judgment, evidencing to the world that no reach of human intellect, and no grasp of mental genius, and no range of this world's learning, can bring the true and saving knowledge of God to the mind or heart of man. The record may be a saddening one, but it is true—'The world by wisdom knew not God.'"

Our readers will probably remember a letter of the ex-Abbé Miel, which we published in our last December number (vol. iii., p. 151), presenting a similar tolerant and charitable view of the characters of the priesthood of his native country (France), and in which he satisfactorily explains the process by which the mind may be—and, in fact, practically is—trained to confide in the merits of an unreasoning assent, and to precipitate itself into the bosom of a faith justly called blind, and which would treat temptations against faith in the same category as temptations against chastity, and make the supreme virtue consist in believing without proof, and almost hating reason.

The Rev. Dr. Wylie, in p. 418, thus deals with the subject:—"The first question that arises is, in what light do the priests in Italy regard their own system? Do they look upon it as an unrivalled compound of imposture and tyranny—a cunning invention for procuring mitres, tiaras, purple robes, and other good things for themselves? or do they regard it as, indeed, founded in truth, and clothed with the sanction of heaven? They are behind the scenes, and have access to see and hear many things which are not meant for the eye and ear of the public. The man who pulls the strings of a winking Madonna can scarce persuade himself, one should think, that the movement that follows is the effect of supernatural power. The priest who liquefies the blood of St. Januarius, by the warmth of his hand, or the warmth of the fire, must know that what he has performed is neither more nor less than a very ordinary juggle. The monk who falls a rummaging in the catacombs, or in any of the old graveyards about Rome, and finds there a parcel of decayed bones, which he passes off as those of St. Theodosia or St. Athanasius, but which are as likely to be the bones of an old pagan, or a Goth, or a brigand, can hardly believe, one should suppose, his own tale. If the Pope believes in his own relics, what conceptions must he have of Peter? What a strange configuration of body must he believe the apostle to have had! Peter must have been a man with several heads, a score of arms, and a hundred fingers or so on each arm; in short, a perfect realization of the old pagan fable of the giant Briareus. The Pope must believe this, or he must believe that he gives his attestation to what is not true. Above all, one can hardly imagine it possible that any man, in whom reason had not been utterly quenched, could believe in the monstrous dogma of transubstantiation. What! can a priest, at any hour he pleases, give existence to Him who exists from eternity? Can he enclose within a little silver box that Almighty One whom the heaven, even the heaven of heavens, cannot contain? Let a man confess, at the bar of any court of justice, that he believes himself to be God, and the court will pronounce that man as insane, and will hold him incompetent to manage his affairs. Seeing, then, the priests are called every day to do things which their senses must tell them are juggles, and to profess their belief in dogmas which their reason must tell them are monstrous and blasphemous absurdities, is it possible, you ask, that the priests in Italy can believe in their own system? I must here say, that I do think the majority of them do believe in it.

"A considerable number, however, of the priests of Italy are Infidels. They no more believe in the Pope than they believe in the pagan Jupiter. But, then, were they to speak out their disbelief, and to say that purgatory is a mere bugbear for frightening men and getting their money, they know that a dungeon would instantly be their lot; and infidelity has little of the martyr spirit in it. These men, like Leo the Tenth—as thorough an infidel as ever lived—hold that it would be the height of folly to quarrel with a fable that brings them so much gain. Others are mere worldly men. They were never at the pains to inquire whether their system is true or false. They sing their Mass in the morning; they pass their afternoons at the café, sipping coffee, and taking a hand at cards; a stoup of wine washes down a substantial dinner; and, after a saunter along the Corso, or an airing on the Pincian, they doff their clerical vestments, and go to sup with the nuns, who have the reputation of being excellent cooks.

"Others there are whose minds are occasionally visited with strong misgivings. The cloud, so to speak, will open for a moment, and reveal to their astonished sight, not the majestic form of truth, but a gigantic and monstrous imposture. A mysterious hand, at times, lifts the veil, and lo! they find themselves in the presence, not of a divinity, but of a demon. They disclose their doubts when they next go to confession. 'My son,' says the father confessor, 'these are the suggestions of the evil one. You must arm yourself against the tempter by fasting and penance.' A hair shirt or an iron girdle is called in to silence the voice of reason and the remonstrances of conscience; and here the matter ends. And there are a few—in every age there have been a few such in the Church of Rome, and at present they are very considerably on the increase—who, in the midst of darkness, by some wondrous means, have seen the light. A tract, a Bible, or some Protestant friend whom Providence had thrown in their way, or some one of the few passages of Scripture inserted in their Breviary, may have taught them a better way than that of Rome. Instead of stopping short at the altar of Mary, or any of the thousand shrines which Rome has erected between the sinner and God, they go at once to the Divine mercy-seat, and pour their supplications direct into the ear of the Great Mediator. You ask, why do these men remain in a Church which they see to be apostate? Fain would they fly, but they know not how or where. They lift their eyes to the Alps on one side—to the ocean on the other. Alas! they may surmount these barriers; but more difficult still than to scale the mountains or to traverse the ocean is it to escape the power of Rome. Woe to the unhappy man who begins to feel his fetters! He awakes to find that he is in a wide prison, with a sentinel posted at every outlet, escape seems hopeless, and the man buries his secret in his breast.

"Some few there are who, more daring by nature, or especially strengthened from above, adventure on the immense hazards of flight. Of these some are caught, thrown into a dungeon, and are heard of no more. Others find their way to England, or some other Protestant state. But here new trials await them. They are ignorant of our language, perhaps. They find themselves among strangers, whose manners seem to them cold and distant. They are without means of living, and, carrying with them too, it may be, some of the stains of their former profession, they encounter difficulties which are the more stumbling that they are unexpected. On these various grounds, the number of priests who leave the Church of Rome has been, and always will be, small, till some great revolution or upbreak takes place in that Church.

"But, making the most ample allowance for all classes—for the men who are atheists and infidels—for the mere worldlings, whose only tie to their Church is the gain it brings them—and for those who are either doubters, or whose doubts have passed into full conviction that the Church of the Pope is not the Church of Jesus Christ—making, I say, full allowance for all these, I have little doubt that the majority of the priests in Italy—it may not be much more than a majority, but still a majority—are sincere believers in their system."

Such is the picture drawn from their own personal observations by eye-witnesses well capable of judging correctly of the characters of the priesthood of Italy—a sad picture indeed, but one that ought to excite our compassion rather than our hostility, and lead us fervently to bless God who has not subjected us to similar difficulties or trials, or, at least, has lightened them by the sympathies of that numerous class among our fellow-countrymen who have imbibed the spirit of true Christianity under the freer atmosphere of Britain, where, thanks be to God for his mercies, a man may follow the dictates of revelation without extinguishing or abandoning his reason, and sincerely feel and fearlessly maintain that the lights of reason and revelation equally emanate from the throne of God.

HISTORY OF PURGATORY.*

The doctrine of purgatory, or a place of expiatory suffering into which the faithful pass at death, nowhere occurs in the writings of the early fathers. Tertullian, in the second century, contended for a sort of negative purgatory, consisting merely in the delay of final complete happiness.† Cyril, too, in the middle of the fourth century, approves of this notion, but adds that MANY, even then, denied that the souls of the departed, whether they quitted this world with sin or without sin, could be at all benefited by the prayer offered up on their behalf over "the holy and most tremendous sacrifice of the eucharist."‡ Ambrose, too, who lived in the last quarter of the fourth century, says that those whose sins have not been expiated in this life, will experience a purgatorial fire during the period which will elapse between the first and the final resurrection; and he adds, that the punishment of some will extend even beyond the final resurrection.§ Augustine, the pupil of Ambrose, speaks more fully on this subject, although his views display considerable hesitation and inconsistency. The passage in which the doctrine of a purgatory is most clearly stated, is the following:—

"By that transitory fire—concerning which the apostle says, 'he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire'—not deadly, but only minute sins are purged. Whoever is conscious that any deadly sin rules within him, that person, unless he shall have worthily reformed himself, and (if space be afforded him) shall have done penance for a long time, and shall have been bountiful in almsgiving, and shall have abstained from sins, that person cannot be purged in the transitory fire of which the apostle speaks, but the eternal fire will torment him without any remedy. . . . But if we neither give thanks to God in tribulation, nor buy off our sins by good works, we must, in that case, remain in the fire of purgatory just so long a time as it may require to burn away our smaller sins, like 'wood and hay and stubble.'"‖

From other passages of his works it is clear that he placed the period of this purgatorial fire at the end of the world.*

It thus appears, that those fathers of the first four centuries who make the slightest reference to any future temporary suffering, differ from each other, not only as to its nature, but, also, as to the period of its occurrence. The Church of Rome, again, differs from all these fathers, and makes purgatory a place of torment into which souls pass at once. Without quoting, then, the numerous testimonies of the early fathers who oppose this notion, it is abundantly evident, from the diversities of opinion already noticed, that the dogma of a purgatorial fire, as now held in the Church of Rome, possessed no place in the creed of Christians during the first four centuries.

It was not until the end of the sixth century that the existence of a place of expiatory suffering, into which men passed at once, was inculcated as the doctrine of the Church. The merit of this discovery belongs, unquestionably, to Gregory the Great. In the fourth book of his Dialogues, he gives several marvellous revelations concerning the world to come, which, as he says, had been made known to men, "now that the end of all things was approaching." It does not appear that Gregory considered that there existed any common receptacle of souls, in or near hell, as is taught by Romanists. On the contrary, he distinctly mentions divers localities in which the souls of men were confined till they were purged from sin. In his book of dialogues, for instance, he relates how the master of a bath, in consequence of his sins, was compelled, after death, to act as servant in the bath, until due satisfaction for him was made. It fortunately happened that a priest became acquainted with the circumstance, and offered mass on his behalf for one week; on which the man at once disappeared (lib. iv.).

The introduction of purgatory into the Latin Church must, then, we think, be assigned to Gregory the Great. It was, however, long before the doctrine was generally received. Its progress was, doubtless, much hastened by the visions invented by crafty monks, in order to promote this superstition.

The earliest vision of purgatory on record is that of Fursey, an Irish saint, who lived in the seventh century. Bede, in his Ecclesiastical History, relates of this saint of the Romish calendar, that once on a time, having fallen sick, three angels appeared to him, and after conveying his soul away from his body, accompanied him into the invisible world. As he proceeded on his way, he heard the howlings and cryings of demons eager to arrest his progress. The bodies of these foul spirits, so far as he could discern them, were deformed, and black, and skinny, with long extended necks and swollen heads. They threw at him fiery darts; but these were warded off by the angels' shields, and the devils at length driven away. One of his angelic attendants then told him to look down upon the world, and when he looked, he saw a dark vale far below them, and in the vale four vast fires burning at some distance from each other. The angel said, "These are the four fires which shall burn the world: the first fire burns the men who have loved falsehood; the second, the souls of those who have been avaricious; the third, those men who have been stirrers up of strife and discord; the fourth, those who have practised fraud and impiety. Fear nothing, for these fires will only burn the souls of sinners." Upon this they approached the fire, and it separated, and left them a path through the midst. In the fire, Fursey saw devils flying about, and fighting terribly, and some came and shot at him, and tried even a second time to molest him, but were always repulsed by the angels who attended him. Shortly afterwards he was taken back by the angels, and restored to his body.†

Another vision, also given in Bede's history, is that of Drithelm. This saint, who dwelt in Northumbria, within the borders of Scotland, had lived a pious life, and in his latter days was favoured, like Fursey, with a journey to the world of spirits. On the return of his soul to his body, he became a monk in the Abbey of Mailross. He told his story to Hæmgils, from whom Bede seems to have learnt it.

When his soul first left his body, he said, he was led in silence by a shining angel in a white garment. They proceeded towards the north-east, and as they walked along, they came to a valley, which was broad and deep, and infinitely long. One side of the valley was filled with roaring flames, the other side was not less intolerably cold, with furious storms of hail and snow driving about in all directions. The whole valley was full of souls, who were tossed continually from one side to the other, and were equally tormented in each by the heat and the cold, as well as by the foul spirits that were everywhere flying about. Drithelm began to think that this must be hell, but his conductor said, "Think not so; we have not yet come there." He afterwards informs him, "This great burning vale is the place in which are punished the souls of those who, neglecting to confess and amend their sins till their last day, have been penitent at the moment of death. All, however, who have confessed and repented, even in death, will come to heaven in the day of doom. But many are helped by the prayers of the living, and by alms and fasts, and, above all, by the sacrifice of the Mass, so that they are delivered before doomsday." On proceeding onwards, they came to a region of extreme darkness, where he could hardly distinguish the form of the angel that accompanied him. Suddenly, he beheld, as it were, globes of dusky flame rising apparently from a great pit, and constantly falling down into it again. When he approached it, his guide suddenly left him in the midst of the darkness, and he now saw that the globes of fire were full of souls, who were thus continually tossed up from the pit, the stench of which filled the country around. And as he stood, terrified, and doubtful which way to turn, he suddenly heard behind him a sound of miserable wailing, mingled with shouts of laughter, like that of persons exulting over captured enemies. Then he saw a crowd of evil spirits dragging along five souls, who were lamenting grievously, whilst the fiends were mocking at them. The pit was hell, whence none who entered ever returned.

When Bede published these visions in the eighth century, the doctrine of purgatory was by no means generally established. It was a subject of speculation amongst the learned whether such a place really existed or not. The influence of these wondrous revelations, added to the arts employed by the monks, rendered this notion popular; and, accordingly, in another century or two purgatory was as much an article of faith as heaven or hell. In the language of Mosheim—

"The fears of purgatory, of that fire which was to destroy the remaining impurities of departed souls, were carried to the greatest height in the tenth century, and exceeded by far the terrifying apprehension of infernal torments; for they hoped to avoid the latter easily, by dying enriched with the prayers of the clergy, or covered with the merits and mediation of the saints, while from the pains of purgatory they knew there was no exemption. The clergy, therefore, finding these superstitious terrors admirably adapted to increase their authority and promote their interest, used every method to augment them, and by the most pathetic discourses, accompanied with monstrous fables and fictitious miracles, they laboured to establish the doctrine of purgatory, and also to make it appear that they had a mighty influence in that formidable region."*

Perhaps the most striking illustration of the popular belief in purgatory during the middle ages, is afforded by the legend of St. Patrick's purgatory, which was commonly an article of faith until the time of Luther.

The original source of our information respecting St. Patrick's purgatory, is Henry of Saltrey, a Benedictine monk, born and educated in Huntingdonshire, and, according to Bale, a man enslaved by superstition from his childhood. This author, indeed, would have us believe, that his story of Patrick's purgatory was nothing but an invention of his own, helped a little by the book of dialogues written by Pope Gregory. It is, however, certain, that Henry was reported to be the dupe of others, one Bishop Florentian, and Gilbert de Suda, a Cistercian abbot.

According to this authority, it would appear, that St. Patrick long preached to his countrymen, and among other doctrines included that of purgatory. They disbelieved in its existence, but offered to embrace its belief if any one would go there and again return to them. Vexed at the obstinacy of his hearers, Patrick prayed that God would enable him to give them a convincing proof, that he was not deceiving them. Accordingly, as he was one day alone in the wilderness, Jesus Christ appeared to the saint, and gave him a book containing the gospels, and a staff, which latter was afterwards called baculus Jhesu, "the staff of Jesus." Christ then led him into the wilderness, and pointed out a secret entrance, saying that whosoever entered therein, and remained there a day and a night, and then returned, would have strange wonders to relate, and should, moreover, be free from all liability to enter purgatory ever again. Our Lord then left him, and St. Patrick soon afterwards built an abbey on the spot, and placed a strong iron-bound door to keep fast the entrance to this wondrous cave. Even in the days of the saint, the legend informs us, many persons ventured into this fearful place. Some perished, while others remained unhurt, and told the wonderful tortures which they had suffered, and of equally wondrous visions of happiness which they had afterwards seen.

Their revelations were, by St. Patrick's own directions, taken down in writing, and preserved in the church. A minute account is also given of the ceremonies prescribed by the saint to be practised whenever an individual presented himself to become a visitor to the cave. A striking resemblance may be traced between these and the ceremonies in use by the ancient Greeks at the cave of Trophonius. Whenever a pilgrim entered this purgatory, the prior immediately made fast the door, and opened it no more till the next morning; when, if the pilgrim was there, he was taken out and conducted with great joy to the church; and after fifteen days' watching and praying, was dismissed. If he was not found when the door was opened, they concluded that he had perished in his pilgrimage through purgatory; the door was again closed, and his name was never again mentioned.

The principal object of Henry of Saltrey, however, is to relate the marvellous adventures of the knight Owain, who, in order to purge out the sins committed during a life of rapine and violence, visited St. Patrick's purgatory in the twelfth century. The account given in Wright's work is taken from an ancient English version made in the fifteenth century.

After relating the ceremonies undergone by Sir Owain, we are told that he was locked up in the cave, and, shortly after, went forth. At first he had a very little light, but this, by degrees, disappeared, and he was obliged to grope his way in utter darkness, till a sort of twilight at length appeared. He first met with fifteen men in white garments, one of whom told Owain all he should have to suffer in this pilgrimage; how he would be attacked by unclean spirits, and by what means he must defend himself. He then encountered, amidst the most fearful lightning and thunder, a troop of devils, who welcomed the knight, and pretended to rejoice that he had not, like other men on earth, waited till the end of his life, but had come beforehand, to suffer the punishment of his sins. Having successfully resisted their attack, by invoking the name of Christ, another party of fiends came up:—

"Then come develes other mony mo,
And badde y° kny with hem to go.
And ladde him into a fowle contreye,
Wher ever was nygth and never day.
For hit was derke and wonther cold,
Yette was there never man so bolde,
Hadde he never so mony clothes on,
But he wolde be colde as ony atone.
Wynde herde he none blowle,
But fast hit frese both hye and lowe.
They browghte hym to a felde full brode,
Overe such another never he yode.*
For of y° lengthe none ende he knewe.
Thereore algate† he most nowe.
As he went he herde a cry,
He wondered what it was and why.
He syg‡ ther men and wymmen also.
That lowde eryed for hem was wo.§
They lyen thykke on every londe;
Feste nayled both fote and honde,
With nayles glowing alle of brasse.

Here¶ face was nayled to y° grownde.
Spare they eryed a lytylle stounde.
The develes wolde hem not spare.
To hem peyne they thowgte yare."††

This was the first field of punishment. In the original Latin legend, the knight was led successively through four such fields. In the second and third the souls suffered much the same kind of torments as in the first, with this only difference in the second, that they were fixed to the ground with their backs downward, and were persecuted by multitudes of fiery serpents and toads. In the fourth, the souls were hung up in fires by the various members which had been most sinful, and some were roasted on spits and basted with molten metals. In the next place they were turned about on a great wheel of fire:—

"Some of y° fendes turned ageyne,
And forthe they ladde Sir Owayne,
Full ferre into another felde.
In such one bare he never shelde.'
Hit was lenger and welle more,
Than that felde was byfure.
And as he loked him besyde
He syg ther pyttus mony and wide;
Thykke they were as they mygth bene;
Onethe‡‡ was ther a fote hem betwene.
And all manner of metaile,
He eyg there yn the pyttus walle.§§
Men and wymmen ther were also,
In y° pyttus abyding wo.
Some were therenne up to ye chinne,
And yet had they oogt bete‖‖ here synne.
And some were yn to shappus;¶¶
And some were op to y° pappus;
And some were yn to y° kne,
They wold full fayne out be."

Owaine was pushed by the devils into one of these pits, and dreadfully scalded. He was afterwards brought into a place where souls were punished in a lake of extreme coldness. He was then dragged to the mouth of hell, and afterwards taken to paradise. Finally, he was obliged to return and spend the remainder of his days on earth.

We have given this celebrated legend of Sir Owaine at some length, from the importance of the subject with which it is connected. It was appealed to in the middle ages as authority on all questions relative to purgatory, and, according to Wright, was, in the original Latin of Henry, spread probably over every country where the Roman faith prevailed. It was also soon translated into the modern languages of Europe. There are still extant three different early French versions—all metrical. There are also two English metrical translations under the title of Owayne Miles. It is certain from the mention of St. Patrick's purgatory in Cesarius, that so early as the commencement of the thirteenth century it had become famous all over Europe. "If any one doubt of purgatory," says he "let him go to Ireland, and enter the purgatory of St. Patrick, and he will no longer have any question of purgatorial torments."* The pilgrimage to this place became a common thing in the thirteenth and following centuries, and even men of rank and wealth visited Ireland for this purpose. In the patent rolls of the Tower of London, under the year 1358, we have an instance of testimonials given by the king (Edward III.) on the same day to two distinguished foreigners—one a noble Hungarian, the other a Lombard, Nicholas de Beccarlis—of their having faithfully performed this pilgrimage; and still later, in 1397, we find Richard II. granted a safe conduct to visit the same place to Raymond, Viscount of Perchlos, Knight of Rhodes, and Chamberlain of the King of France, with twenty men and thirty horses.† Raymond, on his return to his native country, wrote a narrative of what he had seen in the Limousan dialect, of which a Latin version was printed by O'Sullivan in his Historiæ Cathoicæ Ibernie (Lisbon, 1621).‡

In the fifteenth century the numerous copies of the original history by Henry of Saltrey, as well as the various translations, tended greatly to increase the celebrity of St. Patrick's purgatory. At the close of this age, however, it fell into disgrace.

"A monk of Eymstadt, in Holland, who proved either more conscientious, or less credulous than former visitors, undertook the pilgrimage to Lough Derg. When he arrived at the lake, he applied for entrance to the prior, who referred him to the bishop of the diocese, without whose license no visitors were received. The monk then repaired to the residence of the bishop, but as he was 'poor and penniless,' the servants refused to admit him into their master's presence. Having, however, with difficulty obtained an audience, he fell down before the bishop and begged permission to enter St. Patrick's purgatory. The bishop demanded a certain sum of money, which he said was due from every pilgrim who came on this errand. The monk represented his poverty, and, after much urgent solicitation, the bishop granted the necessary license. He then went to the prior, performed the usual ceremonies, and was shut up in the cavern. There he remained all night, trembling with fear, and in constant expectation of a visit from the demons; but when the prior let him out the next morning, he had had no vision of any kind, and dissatisfied with the result of his pilgrimage he hastened to Rome, where he made his complaint to Pope Alexander VI. The Pope acknowledged himself convinced of the imposture, and sent orders for the destruction of the purgatory, which were put into execution with great solemnity on St. Patrick's day, 1497."§

It was not long before the place recovered its ancient reputation. The office of St. Patrick inserted in the Roman Missals of 1522 was almost entirely devoted to the celebration of the purgatory of that saint; and although this office was rejected two years afterwards, the fame of St. Patrick's purgatory continued to increase, and the legend was generally adopted by Roman theologians. During upwards of two centuries its reputation continued to spread through France, Italy, and Spain.‖

Such was the belief of purgatory prevalent in the Romish Church up to the period of the Reformation. The reader will not fail to notice how far the crude notions hinted by Augustine, and afterwards by Gregory, differed from the doctrines taught in after ages. From this obvious variation it is most evident that the dogma, as held in modern times by the Church, was completed only by slow degrees, and after centuries had passed away.

WHY THE CHURCH OF ROME DISCOUNTENANCES THE GENERAL STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

IT is a fact, which needs no proof, that the Church of Rome systematically discountenances the general reading of the Holy Scriptures. Indeed, so far are the advocates of that Church from wishing to deny or extenuate this fact, that they seek to justify the prohibition as wise and salutary. That the Church of Rome is perfectly consistent in acting so, there can be no doubt; nay more, it is not difficult to show, that, if her characteristic doctrines (those doctrines, we mean, which Protestants reject as innovations on the ancient faith of the Church) be true, it is not only her sound policy, but her bounden duty, to restrain the people, as much as possible, from the use of the Bible. A brief consideration of some of these doctrines will set this seeming paradox in a clear light.

1. Let us, then, begin with the worship of the Virgin. We shall not now insist on the recent development which Mariolatry has received by the papal declaration of the Immaculate Conception as an article of faith. We shall content ourselves with the adoration heretofore paid to the Virgin in Roman Catholic countries. We find, then, upon the one hand, that the honour actually paid to her, though theoretically inferior to, is practically far greater than that bestowed on our blessed Saviour himself. We find, on the other hand, no warrant, in the pages of the New Testament, for such adoration. The notices of the Virgin are brief, scanty, and incidental. The recorded addresses of our Lord to her are few in number, and certainly not of a kind calculated to lead his disciples to pay her anything like divine honours. In the Epistles she is never once named, even by that disciple who was specially charged with her care by his dying master.* All this cannot be accidental. We are, therefore, irresistibly forced to conclude, not only that our Lord and the New Testament writers do not recognise the Virgin Mary as an object of adoration, but that they do all in their power to prevent, by anticipation, the superstitious worship which they foresaw would naturally be paid to her. Upon this point, therefore, it is at least politic of the Church of Rome to restrain the people from studying the New Testament; as such study must necessarily give rise to very grave suspicions as to the soundness of the Church's practice. And if the rulers of the Church of Rome really believe that Mariolatry is in accordance with the will of God, it is their bounden duty to be cautious of putting into the hands of the people documents which seem so clearly to disown and prohibit it.

2. As a second instance, in illustration of our position, we may take the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome, as the divinely-appointed successor of St. Peter. To a person taught to believe this as a divine verity, it must cause a very violent shock to find, upon studying the New Testament, that, from beginning to end, no such personage as the Bishop of Rome is ever mentioned; that not the remotest hint is given of any peculiar privileges being attached, either actually or prospectively, to the Church of Rome; that not the slightest allusion is made to St. Peter's having visited that city; while, on the contrary, very strong inferential proof is supplied that he never was there at all; and, finally, that, even admitting he visited Rome and was Bishop of that Church, there is not a shred of proof by which his apostolic prerogatives can be shown to be the perpetual inheritance of his successors in that See. The policy of the Church of Rome necessarily prevents her from exposing the faith of her votaries to so great a shock as discoveries of this kind in the pages of Holy Writ must occasion. And if she believes that her dogma respecting the Pope as the successor of St. Peter and the representative of Christ upon earth is true, it is also her duty to take care that her people are not put in the way of drawing inevitable inferences from Scripture tending to the weakening or the complete overthrow of their faith in the dogma.

3. The worship of images is another case in point. The Church of Rome allows the worship of the images of the Virgin and the saints. The Bible absolutely prohibits the worship of "any graven image." This palpable contradiction is attempted to be removed by subtle scholastic distinctions between various kinds of worship. It is politic to inculcate on the people the danger of reading a book, which, without such refined distinctions, must be misunderstood by the vulgar, to the detriment of the Church's infallible authority. And if the Church of Rome really believes that the worship of images, which was prohibited under the Jewish dispensation, is commanded under the Christian, (notwithstanding the absence of the slightest hint to that effect in the New Testament), then it becomes the duty of her rulers to discountenance the reading of a book so infinitely likely—nay, so necessarily certain—to mislead as the Bible.

4. The same may be said of the invocation of saints, and the efficacy of their intercession. The Bible says, in language which any plain reader would consider clear and unmistakeable enough, that "there is one mediator of God and men, the man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. ii. 5, Douay Bible), and that, "if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the just" (1 John ii. 1, Douay Bible). Any plain reader, we say, would naturally infer, from these and similar passages, that there was only one mediator between God and men, and only one advocate with the Father—viz., the Lord Jesus Christ. The Church of Rome teaches that there are many mediators and many intercessors (the number of whom is increasing with the canonization of every new saint), and that our Blessed Lord sustains these characters not exclusively, but merely in a peculiar sense. The vulgar could never discover this profound distinction from the seemingly unambiguous words of Holy Writ; and, accordingly, policy dictates that they should not be permitted to read a book which common sense is incapable of comprehending. And if the invocation of saints and the efficacy of their intercession be conscientiously held by the Church of Rome, it is the duty of those charged with the spiritual interests of her members to discountenance the general reading of a volume which seems, both negatively and positively, most plainly to contradict the practice of the Church.

5. Take, once more, the case of transubstantiation. The Church of Rome teaches that there is here a stupendous—nay, to human conception, an impossible—miracle constantly performed. In this instance, she insists, contrary to her usual canon of interpretation, on the literal sense of the words of Scripture; and she triumphantly refers her people—vulgar and all—to the sacred Record itself. But, then, they must not go beyond the passages selected for their inspection, because they should find our Lord elsewhere frequently employing language equally strong and explicit, and which must be understood metaphorically; and they should, accordingly, be exposed to the risk of suspecting that, in the case of the eucharist also, a metaphorical meaning was much more probable than the existence of a mystery which it took the Church many centuries to discover—the mystery of transubstantiation. Policy would here, also, dictate the propriety of refusing the people unrestrained access to such dangerous sources of information; and, assuming (which it is very hard to do) that the heads of the Church of Rome really believe this doctrine, we can have no difficulty in admitting that their duty requires them to withhold from the faithful what must, inevitably, lead them to question its truth.

These instances are sufficient for our purpose. The case, then, stands thus: if the characteristic doctrines and practices of the Church of Rome be true, it is at once her policy and her duty to discountenance the general circulation and reading of the Scriptures. These writings, interpreted according to the ordinary rules of criticism, and in the sense which a person of average intelligence and unprejudiced judgment would elicit from them, do not bear out—nay, often directly contradict—the doctrines and practices in question. In order that there may be anything like an agreement between the Word of God and the peculiar dogmas of Romanism, the former must be interpreted in a way which none but the initiated have any idea of, and which utterly transcends the capacities of the vulgar multitude. "Procul, o procul este profani," is, accordingly, the language of the privileged class to whom belongs the unfolding of the mystic pages of Scripture. The Bible, say they in effect and even in express words, is a grand enigma, which no individual Christian can venture to unravel, except at the imminent risk of making shipwreck of his faith. One renowned Romish theologian calls it a "Sibyl's prophecy;" another, "riddles of the Sphynx;" a third, "a leaden rule;" a fourth, "a nose of wax," which may be twisted backwards and forwards, and moulded into any shape; a fifth informs us that, without the sanction of the Church, Scripture could no more claim to be received than the Fables of Æsop; and a sixth asserts that it has no higher internal evidence than the Koran. If all this be true, it is not to be wondered at that the unsophisticated vulgar should be withheld from too close contact with a book so dangerous in its tendency; and the Church only fulfils a plain duty in protecting her children from the perilous consequences that must result from its free study.

But if the Bible contain a revelation of God, designed to make known to the world His will and purposes, so far as He condescends to make them known; if it be written by men supernaturally endowed for the express purpose of conveying the revelation free from all human error and imperfection; if these men wrote, as they manifestly did write, in a way which they conceived to be level to the capacities of the generality of Christians, without mystical subtleties, or enigmatical reserve; if all the ancient Fathers acknowledge the Scriptures to be the plain and unmistakeable rule of faith and practice; and if, notwithstanding, these Scriptures cannot be made to speak the characteristic language of the modern Church of Rome, except by a system of interpretation, which, applied to any other book in the world, would be called forced, unnatural, and inconsistent with itself; then, surely, there is strong reason to suspect that motives of policy alone lie at the foundation of the dislike which the Church of Rome evinces to the general diffusion of the written Word of God; and it may be fairly concluded, that if she is influenced by a feeling of duty, it is a feeling which cannot be referred to God as its author or its object.

ROMAN CATHOLIC MORAL THEOLOGY.

No. V.

WE have some fear lest many of our readers should have had enough of St. Liguori and his crooked ways, and should be rather tired of the subject of equivocation and mental reservation. However, as what we have said did not contain a full exposure of his doctrines, we venture to devote one article more to the subject. It will be remembered that the teaching we have hitherto considered related to the ordinary intercourse of society between persons who are under no peculiar obligation to each other. In such cases we found the moral teachers of Rome holding that we are not bound to speak the truth, and that any equivocation, short of absolute falsehood, was perfectly innocent. They add, besides, that we may not only utter these equivocations, but also confirm them with an oath; for, as they very logically conclude, if it is no sin to say these things, of course it can be no sin to swear them. However, we are promised a stricter morality in the case of persons who hold a special relation to one another. As we quoted from the Rambler, last month, "the relation of a parent to a child, of a master to his servant, of a judge to a witness, of a physician to a voluntary patient, even say of a bankrupt's creditors to a bankrupt, is quite different to that of persons who are in a condition of perfect equality, and who are bound by no peculiar engagement to one another."

Let us, then, inquire into the particulars of some of these picked cases, and see what kind of morality is supplied when the dealers of the Church of Rome offer to furnish the article of superior quality and of the purest description. And the first thing which strikes one as odd in this passage from the Rambler is the curious, doubtful way in which the case of a bankrupt is introduced—"even, say, of a bankrupt to his creditors"—as if the obligation in this case were not so great as in the one mentioned before, that of a physician and a voluntary patient. We are led to suppose that if a patient, in obtaining the advice of a physician, were to keep concealed some of his ailments, it would be a mortal sin; but that if a bankrupt were to keep concealed some of his property from his creditors, the case would not be so clear. Let us shut up the Rambler, and turn to the fountain-head, and see what St. Liguori tells on the subject; and, in fact, we find the saint laying down (iv. 158), that he who wants for his support goods which he has concealed, may answer the judge that he has got none. In like manner, an heir who has concealed goods, without an inventory, if he is not bound to satisfy the creditors out of them, may answer the judge that he has concealed nothing—mentally subjoining, "of the goods out of which he is bound to make satisfaction." And Liguori is not the only Roman Catholic moralist who is thus indulgent to bankrupts.

The great Blaise Pascal, in the eighth of his celebrated Provincial Letters, alludes to some of them, as follows:—

"I have now to say a little," cried the monk, "in regard to those who are in embarrassed circumstances. Our casuists have sought to relieve them according to their condition of life. For, if they have not enough of property for a decent maintenance, and at the same time for paying their debts, they permit them to secure a fortune by making a bankruptcy with their creditors.* This has been decided by Lessius, and confirmed by Escobar as follows:—'May a person who turns bankrupt, with a good conscience, keep back as much of his personal estate as may be necessary to maintain his family in a respectable way—ne indecorè vivat? I hold, with Lessius, that he may, even though he may have acquired his wealth unjustly, and by notorious crimes—ex injustitia et notorio delicto; only, in this case he is not at liberty to retain so large an amount as he otherwise might.'"

"Indeed, father! (says Pascal) what a strange sort of charity is this, to allow property to remain in the hands of the man who has acquired it by rapine, to support him in his extravagance, rather than go into the hands of his creditors, to whom it legitimately belongs!"

"It is impossible to please everybody" replied the father; "and we have made it our particular study to relieve these unfortunate people. This partiality to the poor has induced our great Vasquez, cited by Castro Palao, to say that 'if one saw a thief going to rob a poor man, it would be lawful to divert him from his purpose by pointing out to him some rich individual, whom he might rob in place of the other.' If you have not access to Vasquez or Castro Palao, you will find the same thing in your copy of Escobar; for, as you are aware, his work is little more than a compilation from twenty-four of the most celebrated of our fathers. You will find it in his treatise, entitled 'The Practice of our Society in the matter of Charity towards our Neighbours.'"

"A very singular kind of charity this," I observed, "to save one from suffering loss by inflicting it upon another! But I suppose that to complete the charity, the charitable adviser would be bound in conscience to restore to the rich man the sum which he had made him lose?"

"Not at all, sir," returned the monk; "for he did not rob the man—he only advised the other to do it. From such a mass of evidence you ought to be satisfied now of the futility of your objections; but we are losing sight of our subject. To revert, then, to the succour which our fathers apply to persons in straitened circumstances—Lessius, among others, maintains that it is lawful to steal, not only in a case of extreme necessity, but even where the necessity is grave, though not extreme."

"This is somewhat startling, father," said I. "There are very few people in this world who do not consider their cases of necessity to be grave ones, and to whom, accordingly, you would not give the right of stealing with a good conscience. And though you should restrict the permission to those only who are really and truly in that condition, you open the door to an infinite number of petty larcenies, which the magistrates would punish in spite of your 'grave necessity,' and which you ought to repress on a higher principle—you who are bound by your office to be the conservators, not of justice only, but of charity, between man and man—a grace which this permission would destroy. For after all, now, is it not a violation of the law of charity, and of our duty to our neighbour, to deprive a man of his property, in order to turn it to our own advantage? Such, at least, is the way I have been taught to think hitherto."

"That will not always hold true," replied the monk; "for our great Molina has taught us that 'the rule of charity does not bind us to deprive ourselves of a profit, in order thereby to save our neighbour from a corresponding loss.' He advances this in corroboration of what he has undertaken to prove—'That one is not bound in conscience to restore the goods which another had put into his hands, in order to cheat his creditors.' Lessius holds the same opinion on the same ground."*

Let us, however, come on to examine the general case of a witness in a court of justice. We find it laid down here (iv. 154) that, 'a witness, not legitimately questioned, may swear that he does not know of a crime which he really does know—mentally subjoining, that he does not know of any crime legitimately inquired of; or that he does not know it, so as to give evidence of it. The same is the case if the witness, for some other reason, is not bound to give evidence; for example, if he is himself quite assured that the act committed is without guilt, or if he knows the crime only as a secret, and no ill repute has got abroad. When, however, the witness or defendant is legitimately questioned by the judge, he must not use any equivocation, because he is then bound to obey the rightful precept of his superior. This is the common opinion, and the same must be said about an oath in onerous contracts, because otherwise injury would be done to another. Except in the case of a trial, the crime be altogether concealed, for then a witness may, nay, he is bound to say that the defendant has not committed it; and so may the defendant, if there is not already half full proof. So says Tamburini, with the common opinion, because then the judge does not question legitimately."

It will be seen, then, that it is a very important question—When does a judge inquire legitimately? The Christian Remembrancer gives the following answer to this, from Garnet's "Treatise on Equivocation."† The order of law requires these five things—

"First, that the party who examineth must be a lawful superior. . . . Secondly, he must have authority over the person whom he examineth. . . . Thirdly, the matter itself must be subject to the judge. . . . Fourthly, he must proceed according to a just law, for, whereas a judge is, as Aristotle calls him, a living law, as the law itself is a dumb judge; even as the law, when it is unjust, is no law, so a judge, in the execution of an unjust law, is no judge. Finally, it is very necessary that the judge do not proceed against a man to examine him, or call him into question, but in cases which are public and manifest, or when great suspicions and presumptions, or common reports, do seem to condemn the party, or sufficient testimony convince him."

So likewise St. Liguori, Lib. v. 276:—

"It is certain that a witness is not bound to confess the truth to a judge, when he does not legitimately interrogate; for, then, he may lawfully answer, even with an oath, that he does not know the crime (aside) so as to be bound to declare it unto him. But, it is asked, when does a judge question legitimately? The reply is—when there is already half full proof. When there is this, the crime is no longer said to be secret; and, therefore, the judge has a right that the witness shall declare the truth. So in common, Lessius, Navarrus, and others, with the Salamanca doctors, who observe that no witness is bound to answer in this way, unless repute of the guilt, or half full evidence of it, or clear signs of it be already proved and shown to him by the judge—unless, indeed, it is quite certain that the judge is a good man, and he declares that he is legitimately questioning. . . . . A judge does not legitimately question unless there has previously been notoriety, ill repute, or other half full proof."

And we are told further on that a witness commits a crime in five ways, one of which is—if he discover the truth which he ought to conceal!!!

Let us now test this doctrine of Liguori by a particular example. Many of our readers will remember the trial of Boyle v. Wiseman, which took place last year. The object of the plaintiff was to prove that Cardinal Wiseman was the writer of a certain libellous letter, which had been published with his name; and several witnesses were brought forward, to whom, it was supposed, the Cardinal had confessed his authorship of the letter. The following is a report of part of what occurred:—

"Dr. T. Grant was examined—He said, I am the Roman Catholic Bishop of St. George's, Southwark; I know the defendant, and am on intimate terms with him; I remember going to Paris on the subject of this libel; but I don't remember having had any conversation with the defendant relating to it; I had a conversation with a gentleman belonging to the Univers journal, but he did not give me any MS.; I am quite sure that the defendant never

* The Jesuits exemplified their own maxim in this case by the famous bankruptcy of their College of St. Hermangilda, at Seville. We have a full account of it in the memorial presented to the King of Spain by the luckless creditors. The simple pathos and sincere earnestness of this document preclude all suspicion of the accuracy of its statements. By the advice of their Father Provincial, the Jesuits, in March, 1645, stopped payment, after having borrowed upwards of 450,000 ducats, mostly from poor widows, and friendless girls. This shameful affair was exposed before the courts of justice during a long litigation, in the course of which it was discovered that the Jesuit fathers had been carrying on extensive mercantile transactions, and that, instead of spending the money left them for pious uses—such as ransoming captives, and alms-giving—they had devoted it to purposes of what they termed "our poor little house of profession."

* Molina t. ii., tr. 2, disp. 328, n. 8. Lessius liv. ii., ch. 20, dist. 19, n. 168. Escobar lr. 3, ex. 1, n. 23, lr. 5, ex. 5, n. 53. Pascal adds to this letter that the best editions of Escobar are the Lyons edition, having in the title-page the device of a lamb lying on a book, sealed with seven seals, and the Brussels edition of 1651. There has, however, since Pascal's time, been a new and corrected edition, printed at Paris, by Piget (see Nicole's edition of the Provincial Letters). We may here add, that not one of the charges brought against the Jesuits in this eighth letter, has been met by Father Daniel in his celebrated reply.

† The quotations from Liguori which follow are also taken from the same article in the "Christian Remembrancer," to which we have a ready expressed our obligations in this series of articles. We happe to write at a distance from the greater part of our books, and th volume of Liguori, here cited, is not at hand.

told me that he wrote the letter which is the subject of the present action.

The Rev. George Spencer, known as Father Ignatius, was examined. He said—"I am intimately acquainted with Cardinal Wiseman, but I don't see much of him. I remember reading the article in the Catholic Standard, and I had a few words with the Cardinal on that subject; all I can remember that he said was, that he had reason to know that Boyle had communicated the article that appeared in the Ami de la Religion. He did not say a word of the authorship of the letter." "Did you say to him 'I have read your letter, Cardinal Wiseman?'" "I don't remember." (The witness gave his evidence in such a low tone, and so confusedly, that the jury several times requested him to speak louder and more plainly, as they could not hear what he said.) "I cannot say how the conversation began; the Cardinal did not send me to the plaintiff to try to arrange the matter, but I did go to Mr. Ivors on the subject. I don't remember the words that passed afterwards between me and the Cardinal; I am certain he did not tell me the letter was his, and I did not tell him it was his; I went to Mr. Hoyle of my own accord, and I afterwards communicated with the Cardinal; my object was, to endeavour to settle this action." "Surely, you can tell us what passed between you." "No; I don't remember." "Why, how long is it since this occurred?" "About a month." "And you mean to swear you have no recollection of what occurred?" "I do—I only recollect what I have told you." "What else did the Cardinal say relative to the matter?" "I don't recollect."

Now, as we know nothing of Dr. Grant or of Father Ignatius, it is very possible that these gentlemen may have particularly bad memories; and it is very possible, too, that they have never opened St. Liguori's works; and it is possible, therefore, that we are to attach the same meaning to their denial which we should give to the statement of any other Englishgentlemen. But let us consider, as a hypothetical case, and, in order to illustrate St. Liguori's maxims, what evidence ought Dr. Grant and Mr. Spencer to have given according to the principles of Roman Catholic theology, supposing they had recollected that Cardinal Wiseman had told them that he was the author of the letter signed by his name. They must have done exactly what they did; otherwise they would have sinned by discovering the truth which they ought to have concealed (v. 270). If in a trial the crime is altogether concealed, the witness may, nay, is bound to say, that the defendant has not committed it, (iv. 154). Now, in the present instance, this was just the case. The trial was, in fact, quashed, because the crime of having written the libel was concealed. Therefore, the witnesses were bound, even if they had known the contrary to be true, to say the defendant had not committed it.

Or, again, suppose that, in the judgment of Dr. Grant the act of writing the libel was not criminal at all, then the judge would not legitimately examine, and he might also deny that the defendant had done what he was accused of.

We think this specimen enough of the "best quality" of Liguori's morality in the cases picked by his advocates: and we now go on to consider the defences which have been made for him.

We shall principally refer to the essays of Dr. Murray of Maynooth, one of which is devoted to the subject of equivocation and mental reservation. It is true that it was not written with any special controversial object, still, as being infinitely more readable than the article in the Dublin Review, and as being the source whence the writer in the Ramblet drew almost all his arguments and illustrations, it is the essay on the Roman Catholic side which is best deserving of attention. Dr. Murray's essay does not refer to St. Liguori in particular; it was written in a fit of indignation at hearing the name of the order of the Jesuits identified with fraud of speech and action; he cites, for instance, Webster's Dictionary as defining JESUITISM—canning, deceit, hypocrisy, prevarication, deceptive practices to effect a purpose. Dr. Murray, then, being a chivalrous man, and accustomed to attempt desperate enterprises, sallies forth in defence of the order of Jesuits, and endeavours to prove their doctrines consistent with Gospel morality. And by screwing up the Jesuit teaching as high as he can, and the Gospel morality down as low as he can, he makes something like an attempt to get the two to agree. We will do Dr. Murray the justice to say, at the outset, that he seems to us a much better man than his system; he seems to us to be a plain, outspoken man, with no love for equivocation himself, though in his love for the Jesuits he tries to put the best construction on their doctrines, and exerts the utmost of his ingenuity to put the most presentable of them in a plausible light.

The impatience with which we turned to Dr. Murray's pages for information as to the Jesuit doctrines, was destined to meet with a check; for the learned professor seemed in as little hurry to enter on the subject of his essay as the condemned criminal of old, who

> "Now fitted the halter, now traversed the cart,
> And oft took his leave, but was loath to depart."

The first thirty pages of his essay contain an account of the manner in which theology is taught at Maynooth, but are more particularly devoted to the explanation of the fact (?) that while respectable Roman Catholic theologians always fairly state the Protestant doctrines, Protestant divines constantly misrepresent the Roman Catholic doctrines. The principal explanation of this given by Dr. Murray is, that the Roman Catholic books of divinity are very dry and repulsive, and can only be read with ease, even by their own professors, after some years of teaching, while Protestant divinity is quite easy reading, and is in a much plainer and more popular form. But it seems to us that there is an explanation which will much better account for the matter. When a statement is clear and consistent, it is likely that those who hear it will be able to understand it readily and repeat it correctly; whereas if it is only saved from contradiction and absurdity by subtle distinctions, it is probable that those who try to repeat it will not be able to do so without making its absurdity palpable. A China vase, if sound, may be carried from one place to another without injury; but if it consist of broken pieces carefully put together, with the cracked side turned away from the spectator, then, no doubt, it is likely to fall to pieces at the first touch from one who has not been trained to handle it discreetly.

After long preliminaries, however, Dr. Murray does come to the point at last; and here we soon find what an advantage he enjoys in not being committed to the defence of any particular book. He is at liberty to pass over in silence all the worst part of the Jesuit teaching, and only picks out the most presentable parts, as if they were fair specimens of the rest. We should like to cross-question him a little, and to ask whether he would undertake the defence of those instances of equivocation which we have already cited from Liguori. Would he think it innocent to deny a truth, with the phrase, "I say no," meaning only "I pronounce the word no;" or would he consider it right to deceive his hearers into the notion that some true thing which he had said was false, and without authority by telling them, "I said it out of my head," although, no doubt, the words did come ont of his head. As far as we can guess the answer which Dr. Murray would make to these questions, he would endeavour to escape the painful necessity of condemning St. Liguori by insisting on the difference of usage in different countries. Dr. Murray tells us:—

"The meaning of each language is regulated by its own usage. For example—suppose that in Portugal [I am merely supposing a case; I am ignorant of the Portuguese language] it is customary for a person to disengage himself from a bore in the street, or from any other unpleasant company, by saying 'I have particular business at home.' In Portugal the phrase is by the supposition perfectly intelligible as a courteous way of getting rid of an intolerable social nuisance. Suppose that in Italy or England the words have not, from usage, this second meaning—then to use them in Italy or England with such meaning would clearly be to use an undiscoverable equivocation. . . . Hence it is evident, that equivocations which are discoverable in one language or country, may be undiscoverable in another. Therefore supposing them to be allowable in the former language or country, it does not follow that they are allowable in the latter; and vice versa, supposing them to be unlawful in the latter, it does not follow that they are unlawful in the former; therefore, it does not follow that because a number of Italian and Spanish divines state that certain equivocations are intelligible, and hence (with the restrictions to be named by and bye) allowable in their country; therefore, the same equivocations are intelligible and allowable in ours. Neither does it follow that because such equivocations are unlawful here, they are, therefore, unlawful there. The principles in which all approved theologians agree I hold to be perfectly sound, and these very principles lead me to reject some of the decisions of those theologians on particular cases, so far as these countries are concerned. Whether the decisions are just, even in the circumstances to which they were intended to apply, it comes as little within my province as it comes within my power to determine."

We think this extract, then, pretty well enables us to judge what answer Dr. Murray would give, supposing that he were asked, "Is it lawful to deny something true by answering 'I say no.'" He would reply. "No, this is not allowable in England and Ireland." "Well, then, do you condemn St. Liguori, who considers this answer allowable?" "You must excuse me from passing judgment on this question. I have not lived long in Italy to say whether such an equivocation may not be a discoverable one in that country, and, therefore, there allowable." An ingenious way, no doubt, to escape coming into collision with a canonised saint. But we may appeal to the common sense of our readers whether such a defence will bear examination. No doubt the first Jesuit who devised the ingenious dodge of answering, "I say no," made use of a perfectly undiscoverable equivocation; and, therefore, according to Dr. Murray's principles, was guilty of a sin. But by degrees the device comes to be seen through, and sharp fellows come to know that they must not be satisfied if any one answer them, "I say no," without sifting deeper, and finding out whether he only means to utter the word no, or whether he is giving them a denial. When things have come to this state, according to Dr. Murray's principles the equivocation has become a discoverable one, and, if any one be deceived by it, he has only himself to blame for not having used proper attention. The person who answers, "I say no," does not deceive, but suffers his hearer to deceive himself. According to Dr. Murray's principles, it would be a sin in an upright English gentleman to make use of equivocation, for his hearers would naturally think that he was employing words in their clear obvious sense, and the equivocation would be undiscoverable; but, if a tricky Italian employ equivocation, it is no sin, for if his hearers take his words in their most obvious sense they have only themselves to blame for their unpardonable neglect in supposing that he will not take advantage of any double sense of which his words may be susceptible. And thus Liguori's declaring certain equivocations to be innocent will soon have the effect of making them to be innocent; for, when a man declares himself to be a disciple and admirer of Liguori's, no person of proper attention can think it strange if he employs equivocations which that saint has pronounced to be allowable; and, therefore, such equivocations are discoverable in his mouth though not in that of another. We think it follows as the legitimate consequence of Dr. Murray's principles, that a man may, if he lie often enough, make it impossible for himself to lie at all. As long as you are a miserable half-hearted liar you will be perpetually falling into sin; but lie boldly and establish a character for yourself, and by the time that you have become so thorough-paced a liar that no sensible man will believe you—by the time that any wise man will suspect any assertion you make of containing some equivocation or mental reservation—then what would be lies in another man's mouth would be only discoverable equivocation in yours. This, we think, is the necessary consequence of Dr. Murray's attempt to be friends at once with truth and with St. Liguori, and of his endeavour to make out that what would be a lie in an Englishman would be no lie in an Italian or Spanish disciple of Liguori.

All through his defence Dr. Murray's individual dislike to deceit leads him to substitute a better morality of his own instead of that which he is called on to advocate. For instance, when the case is discussed of a witness in a court of justice, who, it is admitted, is generally bound to tell the truth, one of the first exceptions mentioned by Liguori is the case of a confessor who is questioned concerning a sin which he had heard in confession. We suppose we are not to complain that when God's law—to speak the truth—comes into collision with the church's law—to keep the secret of the confessional—the former is compelled to give way. But we bring forward the subject to show how differently it is treated by Liguori and Dr. Murray. Liguori recommends the confessor to answer flat, that he does not know anything on the subject on which he is questioned, with the mental reservation, that he does not know as a man, but as a minister of Christ. And the reason he says is because the questioner has no right except to communicable knowledge, which that of a confessor is not. Dr. Murray's words, on the other hand, are as follows:—"A confessor cannot, in any conceivable circumstances, reveal what he has heard under the seal of sacramental confession. By doing so directly or indirectly, he would, according to the universally received doctrine, be guilty of a most heinous crime. This is known and always supposed in every Catholic country, and I take it in this country also. If, however, a doubt of this should exist in any case, the matter can be easily settled by the clergyman simply stating the Catholic doctrine before he takes the oath as a witness. The sacredness of the seal of confession is, I believe, respected by our judges. If the contrary should occur, the confessor is bound to suffer death rather than reveal confession." If, then, we understand Dr. Murray right, while St. Liguori recommends the confessor to deny all knowledge of the subject inquired of Dr. Murray advises what would naturally occur to an honest man, that he should refuse to answer, and persist in his refusal to the risk of his life. It may be said that St. Liguori, writing in a Roman Catholic country, only contemplated questions put by judges who would not intend their questions to refer to things known only under the seal of confession. The very next sentence in Liguori disproves the supposition. He says, that the same denial is to be given even if the questioner should ask whether the confessor have heard as minister of Christ; because the confessor is always to be supposed to answer as a man; for as a minister of Christ he cannot speak. It appears, then, that while Liguori recommends the confessor to deny his knowledge, because the questioner has no right to it, and to trust to a mental reservation to make his words true, Dr. Murray recommends the confessor to make sure that the questioner should understand that the denial does not extend to the case of things known under the seal of confession. Again, Dr. Murray is careful to inform us that equivocations are only to be used in cases of urgent necessity. He describes in a passage which we shall quote presently, the mischievious consequences of habitual equivocation on slight occasions. He gives as his examples, the case of a minister of state entrusted with a secret, the disclosure of which would entail some dreadful evils on the commonwealth; or the case of an assassin bent on murder, who should ask the son of his victim to tell him on pain of death where his father was to be found. But even if the reader should be tempted by these examples to admit the lawfulness of equivocation on cases of urgent necessity, is there not still good reason to doubt whether the doctrine defended by Dr. Murray is the same as that advocated by Liguori, who maintains that any honest end for keeping things good for the spirit or useful to the body, is a sufficient cause for equivocation; and who tells us a little farther on, that to swear even with equivocation (except in the case of trials or of contracts) an absolutely grave cause is not required, and that any rational cause is sufficient, such as to free one's self from the troublesome and unjust questions of another.

Many of Dr. Murray's examples, too, would cause very little embarrassment to a person who was ignorant of the doctrine that it is lawful to tell a lie when speaking the truth is inconvenient. In the case just mentioned, if Lord Palmerston or Lord John Russell were questioned as to the progress of negotiation or any other state secret, by one who had no right to put such a question, we fancy they would not find it necessary to resort to falsehood, in order to reduce the questioner to silence; or, in the next case, suppose a lawyer engaged in a case, and entrusted by his client with a weighty secret bearing closely upon it, were to be pumped by a cunning emissary from the other side, we do not think he would, in most cases, find much difficulty in his course of proceeding. Indeed in this case Dr. Murray's education in these countries has suggested to him an answer not to be found in Liguori. He says that it would be best—nay, would be a strict duty—to say in such cases, "Sir, your question is impertinent, and I will not answer it," or words to this effect, or to remain silent, if either line could be taken without serious inconvenience, or if silence were not equivalent to a revelation of the secret. We believe that the course of conduct suggested here would afford the clue to the greater part of Dr. Murray's difficulties.

We must hurry on, or we might touch on another disagreeable case which Dr. Murray propounds. Suppose we had some cash in hands, and were asked for the loan of twenty pounds by a man notorious for not paying his debts, but still whom it would be inexpedient to offend by a flat refusal, Dr. Murray rules that in such a case it would be quite lawful to deny that we have got so much money. The decision is, at least, convenient.

But we wish to give our readers a favourable specimen of Dr. Murray, and shall, therefore, lay before them the passage to which we before alluded, in which he expresses his own dislike to the habit of equivocation—

"It is evident that if such a practice were allowed, no man would trust his neighbour for a single moment. I could not be sure but that every fifth or tenth sentence I hear does not involve an equivocation; and as I know not in what particular sentence the trap is hidden, I know not in which I may be caught, and I suspect all. Social intercourse would resemble a journey on a dark night, over a road full of pitfalls. I am not sure when I may tumble in, but I have no doubt that I shall go down somewhere, and I fall into a state of feverish uneasiness, which continues to the end. In trying to scan the speaker's mind, the understanding loses its uprightness of attitude and directness of movement, and acquires a wriggling, shuffling, uneasy action. It gets a mean and dishonest turn, like a man who accustoms himself to peep round corners and listen at keyholes. Every motion of the equivocator's tongue becomes as much distrusted as the motion of a pickpocket's fingers. . . . . A man who practises equivocation is always in the imminent danger of sheer lying. Lie he most certainly will from time to time; and the probability is, that, in the long run, the habit of equivocation will end in a habit of lying, as the habit of hard drinking often ends in a habit of downright drunkenness. . . . . The habitual equivocator is both mean, despicable, and ten times more hateful than the habitual liar. The latter makes his choice 'for better for worse;' the former woos truth openly, and pays his secret addresses to falsehood, without intending to wed either. To insincerity he adds meanness and hypocrisy, and either of the latter is detestable in every aspect and every relation."

These extracts justify us in saying that Dr. Murray is a better man than his system; but, after all, what is this passage more than an expansion of Mr. Macaulay's assertion, that the world could not exist if men were generally to do what Jesuit divines have taught that with a good conscience they may do. Can a habit of equivocation be a bad thing, and the single acts of equivocation be all innocent? How are people to be taught that they may, with a safe conscience, practise acts of equivocation and yet be prevented from forming the habit. It is pretty plain that if Liguori's doctrines be true they are still not good for common ears, and that the less the public are taught of them the better. This is just Dr. Murray's judgment. He says—"The duty of observing strict veracity, and the sin and odiousness of lying, especially of habitual and deliberate lying, are certainly fit subjects for the pulpit; nor can the Christian preacher too strongly commend the one and repudiate the other. But if he does touch on equivocation he should reprobate it too; his plain and simple teaching should be condemnatory." And Dr. Murray cites, with approbation, the advice of an eminent divine—"To a person asking, is it lawful to use equivocation or mental reservation? the answer should be, it is not lawful." What! when Liguori, and all approved Roman Catholic divines, teach that equivocation for a just cause is perfectly innocent, and when Dr. Murray has written a long essay to justify the doctrine, will he still tell an inquirer simply that equivocation is not lawful? The force of equivocation can no farther go. With this equivocation on equivocation we take our leave for the present.

THE SUCCESSION OF THE POPES.

ONE of the marks of the true Church which eminent Roman Catholic writers lay down is "apostolicity;" a very good mark in itself, and one which we heartily wish all Roman Catholics rightly to understand.

Bishop Milner thus defines the mark "apostolical"—"An uninterrupted series of successors of the apostles in every age since their time—that is to say, successors to their doctrine, to their jurisdiction, to their orders, and to their mission. Hence it follows, that no religious society whatever which cannot trace its succession in these FOUR points up to the apostles has any claim to the characteristical title APOSTOLICAL."—End of Controversy, Letter xxviii.

It would seem that in applying this we must FIRST know what the apostles' doctrine was, before we can learn what Church is apostolical by tracing its succession in doctrine. This appears to us to be very sound and agreeable to reason; but we are bound to say that it is not exactly what Bishop Milner meant.

But, independent of the truth of doctrine, there may be a difficulty in tracing the succession of doctrine. For instance, it would be difficult to trace a succession of Popes holding the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception; because the present Pope is the first who has established that doctrine; so it would be unreasonable to expect in that point a succession in doctrine.

But there cannot be a succession in doctrine, or in anything else, unless there has been a succession of men. We propose, therefore, to begin at the beginning, and examine the succession of the Popes to each other.

We do not write either to under-rate or to exaggerate the importance of a succession of ministers in the Church wherever it can be shown (as it can in the Church of Ireland); we value and prize such an external manifestation and evidence of the perpetuity of the Church on earth. But where such an external manifestation is wanting, we do not therefore conclude that the continuity of the Church itself must have been broken, being entirely of the opinion of the learned Roman Catholic divine, Father Paul Sarpi, that Christ would have had a Church on earth, "although there should never more have been a Pope."—Treatise of Ecclesiastical Benefices, chap. 19.

It is, therefore, for the satisfaction of others, rather than for our own, that we undertake to trace the "succession of the Popes." Those Roman Catholics who are ready to stake the truth of the claims of their Church on the clearness of the succession of her Popes, may fairly expect to find the succession so clear that no Christian in any age could ever have had room to doubt who was the actual and lawful successor of St. Peter. If it should appear, as we proceed, that it has many times been a most puzzling question to find out the true successors, the fault is not in us, but in our materials; for we take our succession from the learned Jesuits, Labbe and Cossart, in their great work on the Councils of the Church.

We pass over for the present the question, who succeeded St. Peter as Pope. Roman Catholic writers are fond of telling us that several ancient writers—Eusebius, Irenæus, Optatus, Tertullian, &c.—have given lists of the early Popes. But those Roman Catholic writers seldom quote the lists they speak of. The reason is, because the ancient lists differ from each other, and Roman Catholics do not know which list to choose.

It seems to us that if God had thought the succession of the Popes essential to the Church, he would have provided that we should know which list to rely on. If any Roman Catholic will give us a list of the first six Popes after St. Peter, we will discuss this subject further.

In the meantime, we proceed to consider the succession in after ages.

We know nothing which gives a better general view of the history of the Papacy, than the list of the Popes published by Labbe and Cossart in the "Concilia Generalia," vol. xvi., col. 130.

It is a simple list, stating the year in which each succeeded to the Papacy, and the time of his death.

Here and there a line is introduced, stating when two persons, or sometimes three or four persons, were claiming at the same time to be the successors of St. Peter.

We shall give each of these lines, prefixing the date preceding the schism.

A.D. 251. "The first Antipope, Novatian, the Heretic."
A.D. 366. "Felix II., so called by some."
A.D. 367. "The second Antipope, Ursicinus."
A.D. 418. "The third Antipope, Eulalius, the Archdeacon."
A.D. 498. "The fourth Antipope, Laurentius, the Archdeacon."
A.D. 530. "The fifth Antipope, Dioscorus."
A.D. 686. "A schism, Peter and Theodore being elected."
A.D. 687. "A schism, Theodore and Paschal being elected."
A.D. 757. "A schism, on account of Theophylact, the Archpresbyter."
A.D. 768. "Constantine, Antipope, brother of Toto, Duke of Nepi. (Here the Jesuits got tired of counting the Antipopes.)
A.D. 824. "Zinzimus gave occasion to a schism."
A.D. 844. "John, the Deacon, raised tumults against Sergius."
A.D. 847. "Here the POPESS Joan is absurdly inserted by some." (Note—The story of the woman Pope is told by Roman Catholic historians, not by Protestants.)
A.D. 890. "Sergius and Boniface VI. created tumults."
A.D. 896. "Romanus, the Galesian, intruded by force."
A.D. 963. "Leo VIII, the Antipope, put in by Otto."

A.D. 1059. "John Mincius, called Benedict X., Antipope."
A.D. 1061. "Cadolaus, the Antipope, called Honorius II."
A.D. 1080. "Clement III., Guibert of Ravenna, Antipope."
A.D. 1099. "Guibert being dead, THREE Antipopes in a short time."
A.D. 1118. "Mauricius Burdinus, Archbishop of Braca, Antipope."
A.D. 1124. "Callistus II., Theobald, yielded to Honorius."
A.D. 1130. "Peter Leonis, Anacletus II., Antipope. Gregory, called Victor III., Antipope."
A.D. 1159. "Octavian, called Victor IV., Antipope Guido Cremensis, called Paschal III., Antipope. John the Abbot, called Callistus III., Antipope."
(THREE Antipopes at one time was too much.)
A.D. 1268. "The See was vacant two years, six months, two days."
A.D. 1291. "The See was vacant two years, three months, two days."
A.D. 1313. "The See was vacant two years, three months, seventeen days."
A.D. 1378. "Robert of Geneva, called Clement VII., Antipope."
A.D. 1394. "Benedict XIII., Peter de Luna, Antipope."
A.D. 1415. "The Roman See was vacant two years, five months, ten days."
A.D. 1424. Ægidius, Antipope, called Clement VIII."
A.D. 1439. "Amadeus, Duke of Savoy, Felix V., Antipope."

The above is a plain story, from the highest Roman Catholic authorities, and needs few comments.

ANTIPOPE means "opposition Pope."

Our readers can count for themselves how often there have been "opposition Popes;" and how many "opposition Popes" there have been at a time.

If any one should suppose that it MUST have been always easy to see who was the true Pope, and who was the "opposition Pope," if he look carefully at the above list he will see his mistake.

Let him look to the year 890, in the above list, and he will see "Boniface VI." as a false Pope. Boniface VII. is set down as a false Pope in the year 974.

Boniface V. succeeded, in the year 617; Boniface VIII. in the year 1294.

There is no Pope Boniface VI. or Boniface VII., between them in the list of the Popes given in Bishop Milner's "End of Controversy."

How came this?

It could only happen in this way—Historians, writers, and people in general, reckoned Boniface VI. and Boniface VII. to be Popes; and, therefore, when another Boniface arose everybody called him Boniface VIII. This shows how commonly Boniface VI. and Boniface VII. were taken to be Popes.

If our readers will look over the list above given they will find that no less than eighteen of those who are now set down as "Antipopes" have numbers attached to their names.

There are NO Popes of similar name and number in what is now counted the true list of the Popes.

For instance, there is a Pope John the 19th in the list of true Popes of the Church of Rome, and a Pope John the 21st; but there is no Pope John the 20th!

He who was counted Pope John the 20th while he was living, was put out of the list long after he was dead.

And so of all the other false Popes who have numbers to their names. They were counted Popes by multitudes while they were living, and were put out of the list long after they were dead, to try and make the list such as Roman Catholics would now wish it to have been.

The list, even now, might well be weeded a little more. There are worse weeds in it still than were ever cast out. But such weeding out in later times does little good to the multitudes who, in almost every age, were deceived by false Popes in their own day. The correction of such errors comes too late in after ages. If it be necessary to know the true Pope, men ought to know who he is while they are alive. There is no repentance nor knowledge in the grave.

Nor does there seem to be much hope in purgatory for those who were deceived by false Popes on earth. It does seem a case in which some mercy might be hoped for because when two men were fighting for the Papacy, it was really hard to know at the time which Pope was the true successor, until it was seen which Pope beat the other; and some excuse, therefore, might be made for those who did not know the true Pope, until victory and the lapse of time had settled the list. Yet, we never heard of any victorious Pope doing anything for the souls of the followers of the conquered Pope, to get them out of purgatory.

It might have seemed a graceful and a generous act in a successful Pope, to grant an indulgence to all dead followers of his defeated enemy, by passing a Bull to let them all out of purgatory. But somehow it never was done. We can only account for it by supposing that the followers of all false Popes go direct to hell; and, therefore, nothing can be done for them in purgatory.

But this makes it more than ever necessary that every man while alive should know which is the true Pope—that is, if there be really any great difference between them, besides success and failure in the object of their ambition.

But those very awkward-looking gaps, in all modern lists, of Popes of the same name, afford conclusive proof that while the so-called "Antipopes" were living, men took them for true Popes, and called them Pope so long that it was hopeless in after times to alter the numbering of the list.

There must have been a total confusion in the public mind about those now called true Popes, and false Popes, at the time when it was most essential that the difference (if there really was such a difference) should be clearly understood.

It is quite evident that there was not any practical way of deciding at the time which of the rival claimants (if either) was the true successor of the apostle.

If our readers could know the crimes, the bloodshed, the confusion, and the misery to mankind, and the shame and disgrace to the Church of God, which have arisen from all the various disputes that have happened by reason of the rival claims to the Bishopric of Rome, they would feel more ashamed of "the succession of the Popes" than, perhaps, of anything else connected with the Church of Rome; they would see that the Papacy has not been a source of unity to the Church, but of war and bloodshed to Christendom.

We may give some of these sad histories hereafter. We have said enough now to put it to the consciences of religious Roman Catholics to consider whether the succession of the Popes has been such that they can with confidence point to it as a proof of the APOSTOLICITY of the modern Church of Rome?

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XXXI.

"Jem," said Pat, "I wonder did God Almighty mean that the priests was to govern the country?"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "it isn't likely; for didn't Jesus Christ say his kingdom was not of this world?* and if the priests are only the ministers of Christ, what business would they have governing the country? But what set you thinking of that, Pat?"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "I got another loan of the Tablet newspaper, and it's the greatest paper at all for telling a thumping bit of truth betimes. Maybe a man couldn't make out a newspaper if he hadn't a good bit of truth in his pocket, with a fine bag of lies beside it."

"Well, and what's in the Tablet now, Pat?" said Jem.

So Pat pulled out of his pocket the Tablet of August 25th, and they fell to reading the great article in it; and Pat read out:—

"This country of ours is a Catholic country; the real constituents of it are the bishops and the priests; we take this for granted, and we do not see how it can be questioned. There are, of course, exceptions—places where lay influence predominates; but, on the whole, the Irish representation is the work of the priesthood. The Irish members are in Parliament because the priests have sent them there; they know it perfectly well, and the Protestants are not ignorant of it."

"Well, that's true anyway," said Jem; "sure it's the priest makes the member, and no mistake; but why does the people get the worst of it? What call have the people to it at all? Isn't it the poor case for them that has votes to be ordered one way by the agent and the tother by the priest? And where's the differ, only that no one gets beat at a fair or a market for voting again the agent? But wouldn't it be the fine thing if parliament would make a law that the priests would just send their own members without bothering the people at all, and getting them into trouble? I wonder is that what the Tablet's after? it would be the fine thing for the people anyway; sure its the greatest of peace they would get."

"Well, it would be peace anyway," said Pat; "but that isn't what the Tablet set me a-thinking. Did God Almighty mean that the priests was to return the members?"

"Well," said Jem, "if the kingdom of Christ isn't of this world, what business would the priests have, only with the kingdom of heaven?"

"Well, it will be the great day anyway," said Pat, "when the clergy thinks of nothing only of getting the people to the kingdom of heaven, without harrassing about elections. Maybe it is what Jesus Christ would like after all."

"Well, now," said Jem, "I'm thinking the clergy ought to keep to the kingdom of heaven. But I wonder how it is in foreign parts, and in America? Is it always the priests that returns the members?"

"Well, man alive," said Pat, "isn't that the very thing the Tablet tells us? Sure here it is;" and so Pat read out of the newspaper—

"The Irish priests are also the ONLY priests in EUROPE or AMERICA who have such powers. . . . . They can do in Ireland what the priests CANNOT DO in France, Belgium, or Piedmont.'"

"Well, if that isn't something to know," said Jem; "and what call have they to it in Ireland, if they havn't it in any other part of the world? Sure it can't be no part of the religion of the Church of Rome at all!"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "it's little I'm caring now for what's part of the religion of the Church of Rome. Sure I want to get the religion of Christ. And did Jesus Christ mean that the priests was to have the power of returning the members of Parliament, and governing the country their own way?"

"Well, that's clear anyway," said Jem, "that he didn't mean that at all, when he said his kingdom wasn't of this world. But if the clergy could get us good members, what would stop them doing it?"

"Well, Jem, you omadhaun," said Pat, "sure isn't that what the Tablet is all about; just showing that the members the priests returns is the greatest set of villians and cheaters in all the Parliament! Sure here it is, that the members the priests sends to Parliament thinks of nothing but asking the government for 'judgeships, clerkships, and other favours.' And doesn't the Tablet 'beg to ask them whether they have not sacrificed not only the material interests, but even the spiritual welfare, of the poor Irishman, to their own political and personal convenience.' And now, Jem, isn't that enough to show that the priests is the worst at all to return the members for the country, when them they sends thinks of nothing but what they can get out of it for themselves, and cares nothing at all about the people?"

"Well, sure enough that's fit for the people to think about," said Jem. "But what's 'material interests,' anyway.

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "sure that's the praties or the meal we eat, and the bit of thatch on the roof that want's the new straw, or the rotten sticks that's breaking under it in every cabin you go into, and the stool that has lost the leg, and the old pot that's cracked, and the sod of turf that can't be got, and the window with the old hat that's stuck in it, and the door that won't keep out the cowld, and for the ould blanket and the bed, we'll say nothing of them; them's the 'material interests,' Jem," said Pat.

"Oh, then, sure enough its little the priest's member ever did for the 'material interests,'" said Jem. "Sure the Rev. Mr. Owens did more for that, anyway, when he gave me the blankets that's over the children. But what does the TABLET mean about the spiritual welfare of the poor Irishman? What did the priests' members do with that at all?"

"Well, then, Jem," said Pat, "I'm not quite clear about what they done with that; but, sure, here's what the Tablet lays the blame on them for;" and so Pat read out of the paper—

"Ireland is not only losing her population, but the Church is losing that population in other lands. It is not merely that Irishmen emigrate bodily, but it is that Irishmen emigrate SPIRITUALLY. This is the question for the constituents."

"Them constituents, you know, is the priests', Jem," said Pat.

"Oh, then, I know what that means anyway," said Jem, "though I don't see what the members has to do with it; but I know what emigrating spiritually means well; sure isn't that what Father Mullin said in his letter,* that the Irish all turns Protestants in America?"

And with that Jem turned round on Pat, and got a grip of his arm, and, says Jem, "why wouldn't we both go to America, Pat, like so many of the boys that wants to turn?"

"Oh, Jem," said Pat, "don't talk about that; sure that's what's killing me. Sure I could go to America, and not be ashamed of Christ there, if the wife and childer would beg till I send for them; but why would I be afraid to confess Christ IN IRELAND, and maybe have him ashamed of me; and don't talk of what's killing me, now anyway," said Pat.

So Jem allowed he wouldn't talk about it then.

"But if the priests' members is that bad," said Jem, "as the TABLET allows they are, does God Almighty mean that the priests is to return the members, and to govern the country?"

"Well, if the priests' members is the worst of all," said Pat, "sure that shows that God Almighty meant the priests to mind the kingdom of heaven, and let the people get the best members they could. But I'll tell you what, Jem," said Pat, "we'll have to talk about going to America, or speaking out like men in Ireland."

And if they do, we shall have to tell it.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER 15, 1855.

IT is ever with a solemn sense of responsibility that we endeavour to convince our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, that many of their most cherished religious opinions are erroneous.

We are sensible that men who begin to doubt what they have long believed, may be in danger of allowing doubt to transgress its due limits; and believing an assured and settled faith to be of all things most precious to man, we feel the responsibility of any course that brings it into question.

At the same time we feel that no faith can be settled or secure which is not founded on the promise of God. Credulity has always ended in unbelief. Those who see, as many Roman Catholics cannot but see, that there are many impostures in their religion, must be ever in danger of taking religion itself for an imposture, especially if they observe that priests would rather countenance some manifest impostures, than submit the evidence of religion to examination.

We believe that in the long run faith will be preserved in the world by those who have sufficient faith in truth to be fearless in assaulting error. We, therefore, do not fear to urge our fellow-countrymen to reject whatever has no warrant from God, and no proof from reason; but, at the same time, we earnestly desire that they should keep before their eyes those great truths which all the efforts of Satan and his servants have never been able to shake.

"THE FOOL hath said in his heart, there is no God."—Psalm xiv. 1.

If there be found upon a road the simplest and rudest instrument which bears the marks of contrivance to answer a purpose, none but a fool will believe that the contrivance had no intellectual Being for its author.

He who looks upon the heavens by night, or the earth by day—upon the greatest or the least of the works and operations of nature—and does not see the evidence and handwriting of the Creator of all, is a fool past all reasoning with.

Yet this is the smallest part of the witness for God. HE bears witness to HIMSELF. God is in the voice of conscience; in the sense of sin and fear, He makes His own Being FELT in the heart of man.

ALL men HAVE felt, that which no man would feel, if he could, the sense of SIN and GUILT. Man cannot hinder God from making His Being known in the heart of man.

That we have SOULS is proved by the mere fact that we are capable of a sense of sin and guilt. Mere animals have no such sense, and are not capable of it.

The immortality of the soul, and the reality of a life to come, is proved by the very fact, that man is a being capable of forming ideas, and of feeling hopes and fears respecting it. Man is capable of longings and desires which this world is NOT capable of satisfying. All nature proves that whatever desires God has made any living creature capable of forming. God has also provided somewhat capable of satisfying those desires.

Man cannot help looking forward beyond the grave; and cannot, if he would, divest his mind of fear of what may follow.

Thus, God compels us to feel, respecting a life to come.

The sense of sin and guilt is God's own handwriting upon our souls within, that He has appointed a day, in which he will judge the world.

And with respect to His own goodness, "He left not Himself without witness, in that He did good, and gave us rain from Heaven, filling our hearts with food and gladness."—Acts xiv. 17. And mankind has acknowledged that witness.

A great society of people, called His "Church," has existed for 1800 years. That Church has preserved and handed down to us a BOOK which claims to have come from God. We can trace that society, and THAT BOOK, in every age. WE KNOW that we have that Book, just as it was written, some of it 1800 years ago, some of it 3,300 years ago.

TWO THOUSAND FOUR HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS AGO, when Egypt was the mightiest kingdom of the earth—ruling over the nations, and bidding fair to rule over them for ever—executing works and buildings which remain to this day as the wonder of the world—works that never have been, and never will be equalled in the world—THAT BOOK declared of Egypt, "It shall be the basest of the kingdoms; neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations: for I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule over the nations. . . . . There shall be NO MORE a Prince of the land of Egypt."—Ezekiel xxix. 15; xxx. 13.

For TWO THOUSAND FOUR HUNDRED years, up to this present day, Egypt, that once mighty kingdom, has been in subjection to all the nations round in turn; and has never had an independent government or Prince of its own!

BABYLON was the greatest imperial city the world has ever seen; and while it was at the height of its greatness, THAT BOOK declared of it, "The wild beasts of the desert shall dwell there, and the owls shall dwell therein; and it shall be no more inhabited for ever: neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation."—Jeremiah l. 39.

For TWO THOUSAND years, Babylon, that mighty city, has been a desert—a howling wilderness. It is so at this day. It will be so for ever, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

EIGHTEEN HUNDRED YEARS ago our Saviour said—"Jerusalem shall be trodden down by the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled."—Luke xxi. 24.

TWO THOUSAND FOUR HUNDRED years ago, THE BOOK had said—"Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar; the Lord of Hosts is his name: IF those ordinances depart from before me, saith the LORD, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before me for ever."—Jeremiah xxxi. 35, 36.

It would seem impossible, according to all human experience, that those TWO prophecies should BOTH come true; that a country should be trodden down by its enemies for so many ages, and yet, that the people of that country should never cease to be a nation! No such thing has ever happened in the history of the world.

Yet, BOTH these prophecies have been fulfilled. FOR EIGHTEEN HUNDRED years, Jerusalem has been trodden down by the Gentile nations; yet, the Jews, the seed of Israel, though driven out of their own country, and scattered throughout every nation under heaven, have no more ceased to be a nation than the sun, or the moon, or the stars have ceased to shine.

Upon that prophecy of our Saviour, the truth of God and the powers of Satan have been fairly tried.

About the year 361 there arose an emperor of Rome—JULIAN, THE APOSTATE. Of him, in respect of his political wisdom and power, it has been truly said by Montesquieu that, "since his day, there has not been a prince more worthy to govern mankind." A Christian he had been—an infidel he became. He made it the object of his reign and empire to extinguish Christianity, by proving Christ an impostor. He fixed upon that prophecy about Jerusalem, and undertook to falsify it, by rebuilding the Temple at Jerusalem and restoring the Jews. A Christian Bishop of Jerusalem, St. Cyril, like the prophet on Mount Carmel, called on the world to witness and abide by the result.—Socrates, Eccl. Hist. lib. iii., c. 20.

All the power of this world was at command to accomplish what Christ had said should not be done. The workmen commenced their labours. The earth quaked under their feet: the flames burst forth from the foundations they had opened. The work was abandoned before the hand of God!

And then that Christian bishop stood forth before his congregation on Mount Zion: with uplifted hand he pointed to the Temple, and exclaimed—"Behold the Temple of the Jews: God hath destroyed it; have men been able to rebuild it?" And, pointing then to his hearers, the living stones of a spiritual Temple, he exclaimed—"Behold the Church of Christ: God hath established her; have men been able to destroy her?"

Since that day FIFTEEN centuries have rolled away. Jerusalem is still trodden down of the Gentiles, yet the seed of Israel has not ceased to be a nation.

The historian Gibbon, the most learned historian the world has produced—himself an infidel—who wrote his history to make a mock at God—has acknowledged the failure of the Emperor Julian; and has declared that the proofs of the miracle "should satisfy a believing, and must astonish an incredulous mind."—History of the Decline and Fall, chap. 23.

Even the infidelity of man has borne witness to God.

Let the world now judge between those who would falsify the words of Christ, and those who put their trust in them.

The proofs of the truth of THAT BOOK, are more than we can number. ONE there is greater and more precious than any we have given—its power to reveal to man his inmost thoughts; the approval it exacts from his noblest feelings; its capability of supplying every want and aspiration which an immortal spirit is capable of entertaining. We may return hereafter to this best and noblest proof. We must be satisfied for the present to rest upon what St. Peter calls "the sure word of prophecy" (2 Peter i. 19) in proof that THE BOOK is indeed given by the inspiration of HIM who holds in his hand all the kingdoms of the earth, and ruleth all things after the counsel of his own will.

THAT BOOK is the source and foundation of our faith; and it is the object of all our labours that it should be a sure and firm foundation for the faith of all our fellow-countrymen.

This is the Book of which some Roman Catholics do tell us, that we could never have known whether it were truly the Word of God or no, unless the Pope of Rome had been pleased to tell us so!

But we say of the Pope of Rome, and of every living man to whom the Word of God has come, that the Word which God has spoken, THAT WORD shall judge him at the last day.—John xii. 48.

Let none of our readers now suppose or fear that our arguments against the superstitions or inventions of men are designed, or are likely, to shake or to unsettle their faith. Our object and our work is for this alone—that every imposture, every superstition, every invention of man, should fall before the truth of God, in order that the Word of Him who cannot lie may stand, and be established, for ever and ever.

CAMPAGNA DI ROMA.

SUCH of our readers as have not had the advantage of visiting the Eternal City themselves, will, we think, read with interest the following extracts from the Rev. J. A. Wylie's recent work, entitled "Pilgrimage from the Alps to the Tiber,"* a volume well worthy of the serious attention of all who desire to know the results of Romanism on the political and social condition of those who live under its sway:—

"Rome, like all other great capitals, is placed on a site worthy of her greatness and renown. No one needs to be told that the seat of that city which, for so many ages, held the sceptre of the world, is the Campagna di Roma.

"I need not dwell on the magnificence of that truly imperial plain, to which nature has given, in a country of hills, dimensions so goodly. From the foot of the Apennines it runs on and on for upwards of a hundred miles, till it meets the Neapolitan frontier at Terracina. Its breadth from the Volscian hills to the sea cannot be less than forty miles. Towards the head of this great plain lies Rome, than which a finer site could nowhere have been found. By nature it is most fertile; its climate is delicious. A boundary of glorious hills encloses it on all sides save the south-west. On the south-east are the gentle Volscians, clothed with flourishing woods, and sparkling with villas. Running up along the plain, and lying due east of Rome, are the Sabine hills, of a deep azure colour, with a fine mottling of light and shade upon their sides. Shutting in the plain on the north, and sweeping round in a magnificent bend towards the west, are the craggy and romantic Appennines. Such was the stage on which sat invincible, eternal Rome. This plain was traversed, moreover, by thirty-three highways, which connected the city with every quarter of the habitable globe. Its surface exhibited the richest cultivation. From side to side it was covered with gardens and vineyards, in the verdure and blossoms of an eternal spring; amid which rose the temples of the gods of Rome, the trophies of her warriors, the tombs and monuments of her legislators and orators, and the villas and rural retreats of her senators and merchants. Indeed this plain would seem, in imperial times, to have been one vast city, stretching out from the white strand of the Mediterranean to the summit of the Volscian hills."

What is its state now?

"I had seated myself in front of the vehicle, in the hope of catching the first glimpse of St. Peter's, as its dome should emerge above the plain; but so wretched were our cattle that, though we started at mid-day, and had only fifty miles of road, night fell long before we reached the gates of the Eternal City. I saw the country well, however, so long as daylight lasted. We kept in sight of the shore for twenty-five miles, and glad I was of it; for the waves, with their crest of snow, and voice of thunder, seemed old friends, and I shuddered to think of plunging into that black silent wilderness on the left. At the gates of Civita Vecchia the desolation begins; and such desolation! I had often read that the Campagna was desolate—I had come there expecting to find it desolate—but when I saw that desolation I was confounded. I cannot describe it; it must be seen to be conceived of. It is not that it is silent; the Highlands of Scotland are so. It is not that it is barren; the sands of Arabia are so. They are as they were, and should be. But not so the Campagna. There is something unnatural about its desolation. A statue is as still, as silent, and as cold as the corpse; but, then, it never had life; and while you gaze on the one, the other chills you to the heart. So is it with the Campagna. While the sands of the desert exhilarate you, and the silence of the Swiss or Scottish Highlands are felt to be sublime, the desolation of the Campagna is felt to be unnatural; it overawes and terrifies you. Such a void in the heart of Europe, and that, too, in a land which was the home of art—where war accumulated her spoils, and wealth her treasures—and which gave letters and laws to the surrounding world—is unspeakably confounding. One's faith is staggered in the past history of the country. The first glance of the blackened bosom of the Campagna makes one feel as if he had retrograded to the barbarous ages, or had been carried thousands and thousands of miles from home and set down in a savage country, where the arts had not yet been invented or civilization dawned. Its surface is rough and uneven, as if it had been tumbled about at some former period; it is dotted with wild bushes, and here and there lonely mounds rise to diversify it. There are no houses on it, save the post-houses, which are square, tower-like buildings, having the stables below, and the dwellings above. It has its patches of grass, on which herds depasture, followed by men clothed in sheepskins and goatskins, and looking as savage almost as the animals they tend. It is, in short, a wilderness, and more frightful than the other wildernesses of the earth, because the traveller feels that here is the hand of doom. The land lies scathed and blackened under the curse of the Almighty. As the night grew late, the inquiries became more frequent—'Are we not yet at Rome?' We were not yet at Rome; but we did all that men could with four, and sometimes six, half-starved animals, bestrode by drowsy postilions, to reach it. Now we were labouring in deep roads, now fording impetuous torrents, and now getting along on the hard pavement of the Via Aurelia. By the glimpses of the moon we could see the milestones by the roadside, with ROME upon them. Seldom has writing thrilled me so. To find a name which fills history, and which for thirty centuries has extorted the homage of the world, and still awes it, written thus upon a common milestone, and standing there amid the tempest on the roadside, had in it something of the sublime. Was it, then, a reality, and not a dream? and should I, in a very short time, be in Rome itself—that city which had been the theatre of so many events of world-wide influence, and which, for so many ages, had borne sway over all the kings and kingdoms of the earth?'

We cannot at present find room to give our readers any idea of what our author saw in "the Eternal City," for we are only treating of the country surrounding it—the CAMPAGNA DI ROMA. That the state of Rome is not one of surpassing prosperity, may, however, be collected from what follows:—

"The commerce of Italy is extinct. The Italians produce nothing for export. There are no factories, no mining operations, no ship-building, no public works, no printing-presses, no tools of trade. They make nothing but a few articles of vertù, and even in those arts, foreigners excel them. The best sculptors and painters at Rome are Englishmen. As regards their soil, which might send its wheat, and wine, and olives, all delicious naturally, to every part of the world, its harvests are now able but to feed the few men who live in the country. The wide waste of the Campagna di Roma is of the richest soil, and, spread out beneath the warm sun, might mingle on its surface the fruits of the torrid with those of the temperate zone. As to imposts, the Pontiff has enclosed his territory with a triple wall of protective duties and monopolies, to keep out the foreign merchant; and thus not only are the Romans forbidden to labour for themselves, but they are prevented profiting by the labour of others. There is a monopoly of sugar-refining, a monopoly of salt-making, and, in short, of everything which the Romans most need. These monopolies are held by the favourites of the government; and though generally the houses that hold them are either unwilling or unable to make more than a tenth part of what the Romans would require, no other establishment can produce these articles, and they cannot be imported but at a ruinous duty.

"In the absence of trade there is a proportionate amount of idleness; and that idleness, in its turn, breeds beggary, vagabondism, and crime. The French Prefect, Mr. Whiteside tells us, published a statistical account of Rome; and how many paupers, does he say, there are in it? Why, not fewer than thirty thousand. Thirty thousand paupers in one city, and that city, in its usual state of but about a hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants! Subtract the priests, the English residents, and the French soldiers, and every third man is a beggar.

"I was fortunate enough, one evening, to meet in a certain shop in Rome, an intelligent Roman, willing to talk to me on the state of the country. The shopkeeper, as soon as he found the turn the conversation had taken, discreetly stepped out, and left it all to ourselves. 'I never, in all my life,' I remarked, 'saw a city in which I found so many beggars. The people seem to have nothing to do, and nothing to eat. There are here some hundred thousand of you cooped up within these old walls, and one half the population do nothing all day long but whine at the heels of the English travellers, or hang on at the doors of the convents, waiting their one meal a day. Why is this? Outside the walls is a magnificent plain, which, were it cultivated, would feed ten Romes, instead of one. Why don't you take picks, or spades, or ploughs—anything you can lay hands on—and go out to that plain, and dig it, and plant it, and sow it, and reap it, and eat and drink, and be merry?' 'Ah! so we would,' said he. 'Then, why don't you?' 'We dare not,' he replied. 'Dare not! Dare not till the earth God has given you?' 'It is the Church's,' he said. 'But, come now,' said he, 'and I will explain how it comes to be so.' He went on to say, that one portion of the Campagna was gifted to the convents in Rome, another portion was gifted to the nunneries, another to the hospitals, and another to the pontifical families—that is, to the sons and daughters, or, as they more politely speak in Rome, the nephews and nieces of the popes. These were the owners of the great Roman plain, and in their hands almost every acre of it was locked up, inaccessible to the plough, and inaccessible to the people. Even in our country it is found that corporations make the worst possible landlords, and that lands, in the possession of such bodies, are less productive than estates managed in the ordinary way. But what sort of farming are we to expect from such corporations as we find in the city of Rome? What skill or capital have a brotherhood of lazy monks to enable them to cultivate their lands? What enterprise or interest have a sisterhood of nuns to farm their property? They know they shall have their lifetime of it, and that is all they care for. Accordingly, they let their lands for grazing, on payment of a mere trifle of annual rent, and so the Campagna lies unploughed and unsown. A tract of land, extending from Civita Vecchia to well nigh the gates of Rome—which would make a Scotch dukedom, or a German principality—belonging to the San Spirito, does little more, I was told, than pay its working. The land labours under an eternal entail, which binds it over to perpetual sterility. It is God's—i.e., it is the Church's—and no one—no, not even the Pope—dare alienate a single acre of it. No Pope would set his face to such a piece of reformation, well knowing that every brotherhood and sisterhood in Rome would rise in arms against him. And even though he should screw his courage to such an encounter, he is met by the canon law. The Pope who shall dare to secularize a foot-breadth of land, which has been gifted to the Church, is by that law accursed. Here, then, is the price which the Romans pay for the Papacy. Outside the walls of the city lie the estates of the Church, depastured, at certain seasons, by a few herds, tended by men clad in skins, and looking as savage as the animals they tend; while inside the walls are some hundred thousand Romans, enduring from one year to another all the miseries of a partial famine. Nor is there the least hope that matters will mend. While the Papacy lasts, the Campagna, once so populous and rich, will be what it now is—a desert.

"All have heard of the Pontine marshes—a chain of swamps which run along the foot of the Volscian mountains, and are the birthplace of the malaria, a white vapour which creeps snake-like over the country, and smites, with deadly fever, whoever is so foolhardy as to sleep on the Campagna during its continuance. These marshes, I understand, are increasing; and the malaria is increasing in consequence. That fatal vapour now comes every summer to the gates of Rome; it covers a certain quarter of the city, which, I was told, is uninhabited during its continuance; and if nothing be done to lessen the malaria at its source, it will, some century or half century after this, envelope in its pestilential folds the whole of the Eternal City, and the travellers will gaze with awe on the blackened ruins of Rome, as he does on those of Babylon on the plain of Chaldea; so, I say, will he see the heaps of Rome on the wasted bosom of the Campagna deserted by man, and become the dwelling-place of the dragons and satyrs of the wilderness. But matters are not come to this yet. An English company (for every attempted improvement in Rome has originated with English skill and capital) was formed some years ago to drain the Pontine marshes. They went to the Vatican; and Sir Humphrey Davy being then in Rome, they induced him to accompany them, in the hope that his high scientific authority would have some weight with the Pontiff. They stated their object, which was to drain the Pontine marshes. They assured the Pontiff, Gregory XVI., that it was practicable to a very large extent; and they pointed out its manifold advantages, as regarded the health of the country and other things.

"'Drain the Pontine marshes!' exclaimed Pope Gregory, in a tone of surprise and horror at this new project of these everlasting scheming English heretics. 'Drain the Pontine marshes! God made the Pontine marshes; and if He had intended them to be drained, He would have drained them Himself.' Pope Gregory would not allow even an iron bridge to be thrown across the Tiber. The Romans solicited this, to get rid of a ferry-boat by which the Tiber is crossed at the point in question. But no; an iron bridge there could not be. And why? 'Ah!' said Gregory,' if we have an iron bridge in Rome, we shall next have an iron road; and if we have an iron road, "adio," the Papacy will take its departure, and that by steam.'

"But the Pope had another reason for withholding his sanction from the iron bridge; and as that reason shows how some wretched crotchet, springing from their miserable system, is sure to start upon all occasions and defeat the most needed improvement, I shall here state what it was. At the point where it was wished to have the bridge erected, the Tiber flows between two populous regions of the city. There is, in consequence, a considerable concourse, and the passengers are carried over, as I have said, in a ferry-boat, for which a couple of baiocchi is paid by each person to the ferryman. The money thus collected forms part of the revenues of a certain church in Rome, where the priests who receive it sing masses for the souls in purgatory. If you abolish the ferry boat, it was argued, you will abolish the penny; and if you abolish the penny, what is to become of the poor souls in purgatory? And for the sake of the souls, the living were forced to do without the bridge."

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

KIND SIR—I wrote a letter to you about four weeks ago, describing my situation in life, and containing several remarks on your fine-printed paper, and concerning your crying down the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, and requiring of you to be so kind and charitable as to tell us poor benighted Papists, as we are called by several of our brethren, which of the sects that call themselves Christians is the Holy Catholic Church, the communion of saints, which you (I suppose) and we truly and surely profess to believe and obey; which of them is our Saviour's holy spouse, his love, his dove, his undefiled; which of them did be* sanctify, cleansing it by the laver of water in the Word of Life, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish; which of them, kind sir, is the pillar and ground of truth; which of them is that great city compared to a great city on the top of a mountain, so visible that the people of all nations are more or less flowing into her from her foundation to this present day; which of them is that great city on whose walls there are strong towers full of watchmen that hold not their peace day nor night, but crying out to their flocks to be aware of the wolves and tigers that surround them; which of them is that visible Church in all ages that men and women that refuse to hear and obey her precepts, are compared to a heathen or a publican; in a word, sir, which of them have the visible succession of head pastor from our Saviour's time to the present day? Let there not one link of the golden chain be broken; it makes no odds to us if some of them were loose in their morals, or whether they chopped or changed discipline as often as the laws, or customs, or clime required it, as long as they did not change the articles of our faith, which they could not do under God's eternal promise, that the gates of hell should not prevail against his Church; nor it makes no odds to us if some of them were turned out for their faults, and others elected in their place; nor it makes no odds, too, whether they resided in Italy, France, England, Germany, or Spain; wherever they reside they are still the heads of the Church, according to our Saviour's promise, who said, "And other sheep I have that are not of this fold, them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd."—St. John x. 16. It would be good for all the sectaries if they would ponder well on this tenth chapter of St. John; if they did they would not be so apt to separate from the guidance of God's visible shepherd. See also St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians; our Redeemer prayed to his Heavenly Father to have all his followers one, as he and his Heavenly Father were one. So you see, kind sir, there is no room left by our Saviour nor St. Paul for Christians to be divided into sects or parties, but that they should be all one, under one head shepherd, called and consecrated, and elected in due succession from our Saviour's time down to the present day.

Now, sir, if you can, prove that the Romans lost this succession; be pleased to prove to us (according to common sense and reason, for we know no other) which of the sects that call themselves Christians have them signs I described to you. So you see there is but one only to have them according to our Saviour, St. Paul, and the apostles' traditional creed—ninth article of said creed. Mind, kind sir, if you do not prove to us that your favourite Church have the signs I mentioned—that is, unity, holiness, and catholicity—do it in your next CATHOLIC LAYMAN, or never again send us one of them; for we will consider them antiscatholic. Excuse my blunders, for I know no grammar.

Sir, your most obedient humble servant,
JOHN MILLER.

We received John Miller's former letter, but from press of matter were unable then to attend to it, as the importance of the question contained in it deserved.

As the letter which we now print contains all that was important in the former letter, repeated in the same words, it is now unnecessary to print that former letter.

John Miller asks us "Which of the sects, that call themselves Christians, is that Catholic Church, the communion of saints? which of them is our Saviour's holy spouse, his love, his dove, his undefiled one? which of them did be sanctify, cleansing it by the laver of water in the Word of Life, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish?"—Ephesians v. 26 & 27.

To this we answer—

FIRST.—Since the way of life is narrow, and there be few who find it, the Church of the saved cannot be the LARGEST visible society of professing Christians.

SECOND.—EVERY MEMBER of that Church which is the spouse of Christ, shall be with Christ in glory for ever; for Isaiah says, "ALL thy children shall be taught of the

* Epistle of St. Paul to the Ephesians, chap. v. verses 26, 27.

Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children."—Isaiah ch. liv. 13. Therefore, ALL the children of that Church, of which the prophet speaks, shall be saved.

But multitudes of the members of the Church of Rome, who are liars, drunkards, fornicators, thieves, or such like, "shall not inherit the kingdom of God."—Galatians v. 19-21. Whoever is a member of that Church, which is the spouse of Christ, will be saved, simply because he is a member of that Church. But no man will be saved simply because he is a member of the Church of Rome, Therefore, the Church of Rome cannot claim to be that Church which is the spouse of Christ.

THIRD.—That glorious Church which Christ has cleansed, that he might present it to himself, is holy and without blemish. The Church of Rome is not without blemish—not even in her head. Therefore, the Church of Rome is not that spouse of Christ which is without blemish.

When Pope Sergius III. was "a robber, an apostate"—when Pope Lando kept a harlot, who made her lovers archbishops—when John X. was made Pope by his harlot—when Pope John XI. had a Pope for his father, a harlot for his mother, and was himself "a monster"—when Pope John XII., who had lived in adultery, was killed in the act of adultery—when Pope Boniface VII. was a murderer—when "a three headed beast, rising from the gates of hell, most miserably infested the most holy chair of Peter—THEN the Church of Rome was not without blemish.* John Miller must certainly feel that an adulterous Pope is a blemish in the Church of Rome.

We go farther: we say that every wicked man is a blemish in the Church to which he belongs

We say that NO Church which contains in it a multitude—perhaps a majority—of wretched men, children of the devil, can be the "spouse of Christ," the GLORIOUS Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but holy and without blemish.

When John Miller asks us WHICH community of professing Christians on earth IS this Church, glorious and without blemish, we say that none is; for we can find no Church on earth which is not grievously blemished with wicked members.

If he will find us a Church on earth which is without such blemishes, we will acknowledge that to be the glorious Church which is, indeed, the "spouse of Christ."

But if no such Church or fellowship is visible on earth, then John Miller ought to agree with us, that the "spouse of Christ" is that "general assembly and Church of the first-born which are written in heaven."—Hebrews xii. 23. No wicked men are written in heaven. Therefore, the list which is "written in heaven," is not the list of the members of any Church on earth.

Many members of the "Church of the first-born" are now on earth; but they are not distinguished from evil men by belonging to any outward or visible fellowship or society.

"If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of Christ's."—Romans viii. 9.

There are many members of every visible Church on earth, who have not the spirit of Christ. These are not written in heaven.

The Church, of which glorious things are written—the Church which shall be glorious with Christ at the latter day—is the "general assembly" of those in whose hearts Christ now reigns, by his spirit dwelling in them; whose names are written in heaven.

Who these are, does not now appear outwardly to men, but "the Lord knoweth them that are His."—2 Tim. ii. 19; and THIS Church shall be made visible to the universe, when it shall be presented to Christ, "glorious, holy, and without blemish."

If John Miller think that these are Protestant and heretical notions, then he must confess that the great St. Augustine, who lived in the fourth century, was a Protestant. For it was St. Augustine who taught us these notions about the Church. We have shown this in our number for October, 1853, p. 113.

This error of applying to the visible Church of Rome, the things said in Scripture of the Church which is written in heaven, runs through all John Miller's letter; and we do solemnly entreat him to consider the fearful blasphemy into which it has betrayed him.

He quotes our Saviour's words—"Other sheep I have that are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one fold, and one shepherd" (St. John, chap. 10, verse 16); and then he goes on—"It would be good for all the sectaries if they would ponder well on this tenth chapter of St. John. If they did they would not be so apt to separate from the guidance of God's VISIBLE SHEPHERD."

John Miller first mistakes the "one fold" for the Church of Rome. Having made this mistake, he then naturally goes on, and mistakes the Pope for the "one shepherd;" for, of course, it is the Pope that he means by "God's visible shepherd," whom he thinks all Christians ought to learn of from the tenth chapter of St. John.

But in that very place that John Miller has quoted, Jesus Christ himself explained who the shepherd is: "I AM the good SHEPHERD;" and then Jesus Christ applies it, "Them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one fold and one SHEPHERD;" where it is as clear as the sun that the "one shepherd" is Jesus Christ himself. Yet John Miller takes it to be a "visible shepherd," who, of course, must be the Pope.

We ask John Miller to look over again that list of popes which we have given above, and to consider, was each of these popes, in his day, the ONE SHEPHERD of the ONE FOLD, spoken of in the tenth chapter of St. John's Gospel?

Surely the Protestants are right, who say that the "one shepherd," in the tenth chapter of St. John's Gospel, is JESUS CHRIST HIMSELF, yesterday, to day, and for ever!

We do warn John Miller, and all our readers, against those false notions of the Church which lead men to put MAN into the place of GOD.

But while we thus apply to the spiritual and heavenly Church the things which Scripture has spoken about IT, we do also acknowledge that Christ and his apostles have established a visible Church on earth; a visible society and fellowship of men, with a ministry instituted by the apostles and continued to this day. We hold that it was the will of Christ that this visible society should be ONE; and that His apostles have left rules in Scripture for preserving its unity; and that all Christians are bound, as they will answer to Christ at the great day, to adhere to the rules of unity, which the apostles have left us in Scripture.

We excuse none who have violated those rules. We object to the Church of Rome that more than any other, she has violated those rules, and given occasion to men to violate them.

To those rules of unity we adhere, as we do to all other rules we find in Scripture. We desire to show those rules to all our readers.

If John Miller had asked us the plain, practical question—"To what society of Christians in this country ought we to join ourselves, in order to obey the rules of unity which the apostles gave to the Church?" We should have been ready to answer him.

He has NOT asked us this question, and yet we will answer it. We will perform this promise in our next.

For all these facts, as stated by Roman Catholics themselves, the reader is referred to our number of February, 1855, pages 15 and 16.

HOW POOR IRISHMEN GET BIBLES.

MR. EDITOR—They say that "a long threatening comes at last," and signs on—Jerry has got one of our own Testaments after being these three months hunting for it; but the queer part entirely is, that 'twas from a Protestant he got it, and by the same token there's more where that came from, and I'm thinking that many of the boys will be looking for Douay Testaments now that they're so easily got. But I must tell your honour how it all came to pass. You see, sir, myself and a lot of the boys were cutting turf for the master, and after the day's work we sat down in Jerry's house that's convenient to the bog, and while we were talking, who should come in but a decent-looking man, and, says he, "Good evening to ye, boys." "Good evening kindly," says we; so down he sat forenent us. After a while, Jerry says to him, "I think, sir, you're a stranger in these parts?" "Well," says he, "I'm not long in this part of the country." "And what's your trade?" says Jerry, "if I may make so bold." "Why," says he, "my trade is reading the Bible for all who will listen to it." Well, sir, we all knew what he was then, and the boys began at him; and, says Mick Flynn, "I suppose you're a jumper?" "Well," says he, if you tell me what you mean by a jumper, I'll tell you whether I'm one or not." "Why," says Mick, "a jumper is a turncoat; one that changes his religion." "Well," says the reader, "at that rate I am a jumper; and," says he, "I'm not ashamed of being one; for," says he, "St. Paul was a jumper, and so was St. Peter, and so were all the apostles." Well, sir, when he said this, you never heard such a row as the boys kicked up; "and," says Mick, "you slandering villain, how dare you say such a thing of the holy apostles?" Says he, "I'm only saying what's true, and if you give me fair play I'll prove it;" and with that he pulls two Bibles out of his pocket; "and," says he, "I'm ready to give you the proof either out of the Protestant Bible, or the Douay Bible." "Give them to us out of the Douay," says all the boys. "Well," says he, "I'm content; for though I consider the Protestant Bible much more correct than yours, still I can prove my religion out of the Douay Bible, and I can prove out of it that the apostles were jumpers like myself." So he read for us how our blessed Lord found Peter and Andrew fishing, and how he called them to be his apostles;* "and," says he, "what religion was St. Peter when Christ met him?" "He was of the Jewish religion, of course," says Mick. "And what religion was he when he preached to the people about Christ, and told them that there was 'no other name under heaven given to men whereby they must be saved?"† "He was a Christian, then," says Mick. "Very good," says the reader, "that's all I want. St. Peter changed his religion; so, according to your own words, he was a jumper; and now," says he, "I'll prove that St. Paul was a jumper;" so he read about his consenting to Stephen's death, and his persecution of the Christians; and how he dragged men, women, and children to prison because they believed on Christ;‡ "and," says he, "what religion was St. Paul then?" "He belonged to the Jewish religion," says Mick. "And what religion was he," says the reader, "when he preached Jesus in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God."§ Well, Mick had to allow that he was then a Christian. So the reader turned to us, and, says he, "boys, haven't I proved my words that the holy apostles were jumpers; and," says he, "I'm not ashamed of the name while I've them to keep me company—

> 'I rejoice to acknowledge, when jumper you name me,
> That I've jumped out of darkness, and now I can see.
> I may well jump for joy, though you foolishly blame me
> For choosing with Peter and Paul to be free.'

"Well, Mick," says one of the boys, "I think the reader has the best of the argument; and," says he, "I'll never abuse a jumper again, seeing that the holy apostles were jumpers themselves." Well, the reader had the crow entirely; and, says he, "boys, if you read your own Douay Bible you'd have known that all the apostles changed their religion; "and," says he, "'tis what's ruining you entirely, is the want of God's Word. Sure," says he, "your souls are worth as much as the Protestants' souls—and you've as good brains as the Protestants—and you'd be as well able to understand the Bible as they are—and it's a thousand pities that you don't get the Word of God, to know what He's saying to you in it." "But," says Mick, "how could the likes of us understand it? Sure it's only those who go through college that could understand the Bible." "Well," says the reader, "I'm thinking it can't be so difficult as all that; for, surely, when God provided a book for our instruction, he didn't make it so dark that we couldn't understand it; for," says he, "what would be the use of giving it to us at all at that rate?" "Sure," says he, "if the master wrote one of you a letter about something on the farm, he'd take care to write it so plain that you could understand it; and do you mean to tell me," says he, "that God couldn't write it plain too." "Well," says Jerry, "that's common sense; and," says he, "there's the 'Talk of the Road' in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, written by a man like ourselves, and still it's put so plain that we can all understand it; and would any of you say that the Great God, who knows all things, couldn't write plain enough for his creatures to understand him? Sure," says he, "what use would the book be at all if we couldn't understand it?" "True for you," says the reader; "there may be some parts that are difficult; but, that don't hinder our understanding the easy parts; and," says he, "the more you read it, the more you'd understand it; and," says he, "it's so easy, that even the children can understand it; for St. Paul says to Timothy, 'from thy infancy thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which can instruct thee to salvation, by the faith which is in Christ Jesus;'‖ and," says he, "they couldn't have been very hard, when a child could know them; and," says he, "see what a knowledge of the Scriptures did for him—it instructed him unto salvation; and," says he, "boys, what more do any of us want than to be instructed unto salvation?" "Troth, then, that's true for you," says Jerry, "that's all we want, and I suppose 'twould instruct us, as well as it did Timothy." "Never doubt it," says the reader; "for," says he, "that's what God intended it for." "But," says Mick, "Father John tells us that it's only intended for the clergy." "Well," says the reader, "that's what Father John says; but now listen to what God says—'These words which I command thee this day, shall be in thy heart, and thou shalt tell them to thy children.'¶ Now, boys," says he, "you know that your clergy have no children to tell them to, so the command must be to all, and not to the clergy only; and," says he, "the fathers and mothers must read God's words, to be able to tell them to their children." "But," says Mick, "if that's the case, why is it that the priests are so much against the Bible?" "Well," says the reader, "I'll answer that question by asking another." "Tell me," says he, "why is Tim Donovan, the poacher, always against the game laws?" "That's easily answered," says Mick; "he's against them, because they're against him." "Why, then, I'm thinking," says the reader, "that the priests are against the Bible for the very same reason—because the Bible is against them." Well, sir, the boys began to abuse him; "and," says they, "you turncoat villain, how dare you say such a thing? and," says they, "who'd take your word against the priest's word?" "And," says Mick, "it's easy for you to say it, but you couldn't prove it." "I could," says the reader, "if you'd only give me fair play;" and with that he pulls the Douay Bible out of his pocket. "Don't listen to him at all," says some of the boys; and when Jerry wanted them to hear him, they all cried out at him for allowing the jumper to stay any longer in the house, and he abusing the clergy. "Well, boys," says the reader, "I see that you won't let me prove it, and with that he put the Douay Bible back into his pocket; "but, says" he, "without going into any proofs at all, isn't it as plain as the nose on your face that the priests are afraid of the Bible; and," says he, "why would they be afraid of it if it was for them? and," says he, "if the priests thought that you'd pick Romish doctrines out of the Bible they'd be eager to give it to you; they'd give it out as freely as they do 'The glories of Mary,' or 'The Garden of the Soul;' but," says he, "when you hear them ordering the people not to read the Bible, isn't it a plain proof that the Bible is against them? and," says he, "if the Bible was against the Protestants they'd be as much afraid of it as the priests are; but, "says he, "you see them giving them out to men, women, and children; and, therefore, it must be that the Bible is for them; and now, boys," says he, "without going into any other proofs, isn't it plain from this, that the Bible must be for the Protestants and against the priests?" Well, the boys were quite silenced, and hadn't a word in their mouths; for what the reader said was plain common sense that they could all understand; so, at last, Jerry says to him, "It's the honest truth you've told us; and," says he, "it's myself is looking for a Douay Bible these three months, and not one can I get for love or money." "Well," says the reader, "I think I'll be able to help you; for," says he, "I'm ordered to sell Douay Testaments at half price to any one who can't afford more; and," says he, "my clergy had to give tenpence each for them, but they'll give them to you for fivepence; for," says he, "they're so anxious that you should have the Word of God, that they're willing to lose five-pence on each; for though they consider the Protestant Bible by far the best, still they'd rather you should have the Douay Bible than none at all." "Well," says Mick Flyn, "that beats all I ever heard; and," says he, "I can't doubt any longer that the Douay Testament is for the Protestants, and against the priests." "And," says the reader, "we'd be willing to give the whole Douay Bible if we could, but they're too dear, and we couldn't afford to give them for half price; but," says he, "the New Testament contains most of the points of difference between us; and," says he, "I'll lend the whole Bible to any of you that wish to compare it." Well, sir, Jerry pulled out the pence and got the Testament; "and," says Mick, "I'd buy one too, if I could get the priest's leave; but," says he, "I know he wouldn't let me, and I'd be afraid to get it against his orders." "Well," says the reader, "if a Pope gave you leave to read it, would you care for the priest forbidding you?" "Of course I wouldn't," says Mick; "for a Pope's word is greater than a priest's word." "Well," says the reader, "here's the Douay Bible, and read out for us what Pope Pius the Sixth says about it." Well, Mick took the Bible, and first he looked to see whether it was the real Douay Bible; and when he saw the index at the end of it, showing the texts that prove "purgatory" and "extreme unction," and all the other doctrines of our holy Church, he was satisfied that it was our own Bible. So with that he turned to the first page and began to read, and here is what he read—

‡ Acts vii. 57, viii. 3. § Acts ix. 20. ‖ 2. Tim. iii. 15

"The following letter of his Holiness Pius the Sixth, to the Most Reverend Anthony Martini, Archbishop of Florence, on his translation of the Holy Bible into Italian, shows the benefit which the faithful may reap from their having the Holy Scriptures in the vulgar tongue.

POPE PIUS THE SIXTH.

Beloved son, health and apostolical benediction! At a time that a vast number of bad books, which grossly attack the Catholic religion, are circulated even among the unlearned, to the great destruction of souls, you judge exceedingly well that the faithful should be excited to the reading of the Holy Scriptures, for these are the most abundant sources, which ought to be left open to every one, to draw from them purity of morals and of doctrine, to eradicate the errors which are so widely disseminated in those corrupt times. This you have seasonably effected, as you declare, by publishing the sacred writings in the language of your country, suitable to every one's capacity, especially when you show and set forth that you have added explanatory notes, which, being extracted from the Holy Fathers, preclude every possible danger of abuse."†

"Now," says the reader, "haven't you the Pope's leave to read the Bible? Doesn't he say that the faithful should be excited to the reading of the Scriptures? and doesn't he say that they should be left open to every one? and," says he, "which is right—the Pope or the priest? and," says he, "look to the bottom of the same page, where Bishop Denvir approves of it, and says, 'I hereby sanction its circulation among the faithful;' and," says he, "look to the first page of the Testament§ and you will find Bishop Murray's approval. He says, 'This new edition of the English version of the New Testament, printed, with our permission, by James Duffy, we, by our authority, approve; and we declare that the same may be used by the faithful with great spiritual profit, provided it be read with due reverence, and with the proper dispositions.'" "Well," says Mick, "that beats all that ever I heard; and," says he, "I'll buy a Testament myself, if Father John was to curse till he got black in the face." Well, sir, with that three more of the boys got Testaments; "and," says they, "if Father John says against it, we can tell him that we have the Pope's leave, and Bishop Denvir's leave, and Bishop Murray's leave to read them." "And, what's more," says the reader, "we've leave from one that's greater than Pope or bishop." "Why, then, who's greater than the Pope?" says Mick. "Jesus Christ is greater," says the reader, "and we have his leave to read God's Word. He said to the Jews, 'Search the Scriptures'; ‖ and sure if it was right for the Jews to search them, it's right for us to do the same; and," says he, "the Evangelist praises the Bereans for searching the Scriptures, and he says that 'these were more noble than those in Thessalonica, because they received the word with all eagerness, daily searching the Scriptures whether these things were so;' * and," says he, "look at the note to this verse in the Douay Testament, where your Church praises those Bereans for searching the Scriptures, and then, boys," says he, "tell me why do the priests curse the people for doing the very same thing that the Bereans were praised for? and now," says he, "I must be going; but before I go I would urge you to read your Bible, for God commands you to do so; read it, for the Evangelist praises those who did so; read it, for it is so plain that it can make even a child wise unto salvation; read it, because you yourselves will be judged by it at the last day." So with that he left the house; but if ever he comes again I'll let your honour know.

Your humble servant to command,

DAN. CARTHY.

CHRIST AND HIS PEOPLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—It has often occurred to me that, if the Roman Catholic doctrine of purgatory be true, Christ must be there now; for Christ and his people are united—they are one. St. Paul says, "We are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones;" and again, "He is the head of the body" (the Church); so that all things which Christ has suffered, has been for his people, and as their representative. Thus in his death, St Paul says, that "We are crucified with Christ;" and again, "We are buried with him by baptism into death." The thief on the cross was, no doubt, one of Christ's people, and we may take him as a type of the whole body of believers dying with Christ; and Christ's words to him were, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise." This shows that where Christ is, his people are also. But Roman Catholics hold that when the faithful die, the great majority of them, at least, go direct to purgatory. St. Paul says, that nothing shall separate us from Christ, not even death. If, therefore, there is such a place as purgatory, and that the members of Christ's body go there, why Christ himself, who is the "head of the body," must be there also.

Perhaps some Roman Catholic will explain whether Christ is in purgatory now, or not; and if he is not, why it is that the "members" are separated from the "body" of Christ, and go to purgatory.

Your obt. servant,

JOHN WILLIAM ROBERTS.

ON THE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I lately overheard the following conversation between a Romanist and a Protestant, both, I believe, sincerely attached to their different creeds:—

P.—Did I understand you correctly, Mr. S., when you said the Church of Rome has never added to or taken from the apostles' creed?

R.—Most certainly you understood me correctly.

P.—If I mistake not, a Romanist could be saved without his believing in the Immaculate Conception before the issuing of the Bull on that subject a short time ago.

R.—He could certainly be saved then without believing it, as it was not decided upon by the Church as a dogma.

P.—Can a Romanist be saved now if he refuses to believe in the Immaculate Conception?

R.—He certainly cannot.

P.—Then, to be consistent, you must admit your Church has made a new article of faith.

R.—I do not admit it.

Now, will any kind-hearted Roman Catholic condescend to explain how it is that before the issuing of the Bull a man might be saved who refused to entertain the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, but since the issuing of the Bull, if he dares to refuse the dogma, he must be counted as a heretic, and lost, and yet at the same time to insist it is not a new article of faith.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

H. C. O.

DOES THE CHURCH APPROVE OF MR. DUFFY'S "YOUNG CHRISTIANS' LIBRARY?"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—When in town a few days ago I searched several of the Roman Catholic book shops for some of Mr. Duffy's "sweet little books," without being able to procure them. One of the booksellers, Mr. Grace, of Capel-street, gave me as a reason for this, that these books were not approved of now. I wonder, Mr. Editor, have you heard of it? or has your article on St. Rose of Lima had anything to do with it? I shall add, Mr. G. mistook me for an alumnus of Maynooth or All-Hallow, and, perhaps, spoke more freely than he would had he known at first that I was

A PROTESTANT READER OF THE LAYMAN.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

HARVESTING OPERATIONS.

THE weather during the past fortnight has been of a very unsettled character, causing much inconvenience to both farmer and labourer in harvesting operations; but though much rain has fallen, and in many districts the crops have been much laid, still the intervals of rain have been so alternated with bristling winds, that the corn has speedily dried again, and little or no damage has yet been done, except from shedding where they have been over ripe, which cannot be much, as the farmers have been more vigilantly on the alert this season than usual, taking advantage of every dry moment for cutting down and stooking the corn as it has become fit. In such uncertain weather, reaping, binding, and stooking, should follow in rapid succession on the heels of each, and heading or capping the stooks as corn should not be neglected. Stooks in boisterous weather being so liable to be knocked about and the grain shed, some care should be taken to set them up firmly, and of sufficient size to prevent it; or if the straw be well ripened, dry, and free from weeds, making small hand-stacks, loose to let the air through, but well capped to exclude the rain, will be by far the best mode; both straw and grain will season under every disadvantage, and be fit to draw home to the stack-yard, from time to time, as the weather permits.

Stacking.—When fit to be carried, make the stacks with long shanks and short heads, taking care that they are well ventilated, by carrying up one or more chimnies from the bottom to discharge into horizontal flues placed to open out immediately under the eavings; and so soon as finished, let the stack be thatched without delay.

Sowing Wheat.—Where the system of summer fallowing is followed, about the middle of this month it should get its final harrowing, the seed-furrow raised, and then sown, provided sufficient rain has fallen to give the land the necessary degree of consistency; but in case it be too dry, and loose, it will be necessary to wait for rain.

Winter Vetches.—A large breadth of winter vetches should be sown this month; the land should get a liberal dressing of manure, and evenly spread; then plough into eight or ten feet wide ridges; harrow the land lightly; sow the seed broadcast, and harrow it in well; and finish by scouring out the furrows with the shovel, to allow a free escape for water. Mixing the vetches with three or four stones of rye or winter oats, will be of much service in keeping the vetches off the land, and prevent their rotting; and three or four lbs. of rape will add greatly to the bulk of spring fodder.

Rye may also be sown alone as a soiling crop, or for giving an early bite to ewes and lambs, of which it yields a large quantity, on stubble land lightly ploughed up, sown thickly, and harrowed in.

Italian Rye-grass should be sown early in the month, on rich, well-prepared soil, such as that from which potatoes have been dug; it is an early soiling crop, and yields several cuttings during the season, if dressed with liquid manure or rich composts, after each cutting.

Grass Seeds and Clover.—During the present month will be a suitable time to lay down stubble, or other land in good condition, with grass and clover, either permanently or for soiling crops. The grass and clover seeds would be the better of being of the present season's produce, as they will vegetate much more rapidly than last season's seeds, and a week's starting will be sensibly felt, or observable in the strength of growth, before the cold weather sets in.

Winter or Russian Beans should be sown between this and the middle of next month. They are a most productive variety. The land should be well manured, and the seed may be either sown broadcast, and harrowed in, or in drills two and a half to three feet apart, to allow of thorough pulverising between by the drill grubbers and horse-hoes. There is no better preparatory crop for wheat than beans.

Rape, sown in June last in nursery-beds, should be transplanted as soon as possible in the stubble land. A dressing of manure, if it can be spared, will be well repaid in the luxuriant growth and bulk of food produced. The manure may be dropped in regular rows; and, as the ploughing is being performed, a boy lays in the plants in every third furrow, a foot apart; a man then puts in the manure on the root, and the next turn of the plough covers it up; or the land may be prepared as if for turnips in drills, and the plants dibbled in at the top of the drill.

Rape may still be sown in rich, warm land, in early climates; but, in cold, backward ones, it seldom comes to profit when sown so late.

Cabbages.—Early cabbages, sown by the middle of July last, will be ready to plant out where to remain sometime in this or early next month; the land should be well manured and deeply tilled, and then planted in rows two feet apart by twelve to fourteen inches plant from plant in the rows. In field culture they may be put in as directed for rape planting; and we have seen as early and as fine crops produced in this way as by the most careful hand culture. Cabbages are an expensive crop to get in, and anything saved, by substituting horse for manual labour, will be so much gained.

Clover Leas intended for wheat should now be ploughed up, first eating them down or mowing them closely. The land-presser will be particularly serviceable in closing and consolidating the furrow slices. A liberal dressing of lime will materially benefit the crop.

Odds and Ends.—Keep the teams well employed; if not at plough, keep them under the cart, drawing dry bog-stuff if within any reasonable distance; scourings of ditches, road-scrapings, &c., to the compost heaps.

Important Work on Controversy.

In the Press, and will be ready immediately.

THE "CONTROVERSIAL CORRESPONDENCE,"

Between R. W. KENNARD, Esq., late Sheriff of London, and the Rev. PAUL MACLACHLAN, Roman Catholic Priest, Falkirk. In Demy 8vo., price 5s. to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY.

This correspondence, conducted with great ability on both sides, has, at length, terminated by the withdrawal of the Rev. Mr. Maclachlan from the contest, who has republished the whole of his letters, WITHOUT THOSE OF MR. KENNARD! As such a proceeding is evidently unfair, it is intended that the entire correspondence, consisting of about 70 letters, shall be published, so that the nature of the Controversy may be thoroughly understood by all parties.

Dr. Irving writes—"This is a remarkable publication. Mr. Maclachlan is sufficiently skilled in the Romish arts of controversy; but in logical dexterity, and even in theological learning, the priest is no match for the Protestant layman."

The Rev. John Evans writes—"This correspondence furnishes decidedly the best Handbook of the Romish Controversy yet extant."

The Venerable Dr. Croly says of Mr. Kennard's letters—"I sincerely admire their learning, reasoning, and spirit of Christianity; and I know of no production fitter to produce a more ample assurance in the mind of any man open to rational conviction." It has also been characterized as the "most important controversy that has taken place since the days of Stillingfleet."

The Controversy embraces the modern arguments of Romanists, having reference more particularly to History than Doctrine; and the Book will form an excellent companion to Dr. Cumming's Controversy with Mr. French, known as the Hammersmith Discussion, which is exclusively Doctrinal.

The Work is now publishing in one Volume, Demy 8vo, and will contain above 700 pages, with a copious and useful Index. Price 5s. to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY.

As the Subscription List will close very shortly, intending Subscribers are requested to transmit their names to WILLIAM CURRY and COMPANY, 9, Upper Sackville-street, Dublin, without delay, as, after publication, the book will be raised in price.

ST. WENEFRIDE'S WELL.

HOLYWELL may be considered at present as the principal town in North Wales. Its population, its wealth, its commerce, and its manufactures entitle it to that station. Its situation is highly propitious for trade. The powerful current of the far-famed fountain of St. Wenefride propels the machinery of several large factories in its short course of about a mile to the sea. The expansion of the Dee is ready at hand, to bear on its bosom the produce of its industry; and its inhabitants are both wealthy and public-spirited. The town is spacious, healthy, and agreeable, pleasantly embossed in encircling hills. The houses in general are good, and their tenants of the female sex, in many instances, handsome and accomplished. It altogether bears an air of considerable opulence, and has of late been brilliantly lighted with gas. To those who require the use of a cold-bath, few places are more proper; for, besides the excellence of the waters, exceeding good medical assistance, and comfortable accommodations may be found here; and the mind entertained and the body exercised in a variety of beautiful rides and walks. An admirer of the works of art may, at this place, find his taste amply gratified by viewing the numerous works of lead, calamine, copper, brass, and cotton. Its population amounts to 8,000 inhabitants, and the number of houses 2,000.

At the foot of this town is that remarkable spring from which it received its name, and which has excited so much surprise and curiosity.

The spring is the finest in these kingdoms; it never freezes, and scarcely varies in the quantity of water in droughts, nor after the greatest rains. After a violent fall of rain it becomes rather discoloured. It boils up with vast impetuosity out of a rock, and is formed into a beautiful polygon well, covered with a rich arch, supported by pillars. The roof is exquisitely carved in stone. Immediately over the fountain is the legend of St. Wenefride, on a pendant projection, with the arms of England at the bottom: a number of fine ribs secure the arch, whose intersections are coupled with sculpture. It exhibits a remarkable spectacle, and is one of the most wonderful works of nature. The water rises with such force, and in such vast quantities, that, although but a mile from the sea, it instantly forms a river, and constantly supplies several mills and manufactories.

The accommodation for bathers is exceedingly convenient; every person has the immediate benefit of the water as it springs up, and need be under no apprehension of receiving the ill effects of former bathers, as the water which each person bathes in is immediately carried away by its vast impetuosity.

Such is the description given of St. Wenefride's Well, in vol. x. of Mr. Duffy's Weekly Volume of Catholic Divinity, entitled, "The Life and Miracles of St. Wenefride, Patroness of Wales,"* a publication which, we think, deserves some little attention at the present moment, when his Eminence Cardinal Wiseman has just returned from a pilgrimage to this surprising spring, in which he is said to have bathed for cure of rheumatism.

We presume his Eminence was attracted thither by the following passages in St. Wenefride's life, which must be very attractive to every true believer in either hagiology or hydropathy:—

"The historians of her life, St. Elerius and Robert of Shrewsbury, concluded, that it would be an undertaking to swell volumes if they registered all wonders done at her shrine and fountain; they thought it sufficient to acquaint the reader, that the blind, lepers, and other diseased persons, were perfectly cured by drinking the water, or bathing themselves in the holy well. This became so famous, that tender mothers made no difficulty of casting their sickly children into the stream, which was a speedy cure. Such as lived at a great distance, and were tormented with agues, or hot burning fevers, caused the water to be brought to them, and drank of it as a certain remedy to relieve them in their maladies. Those in very remote places used to put one of the bloody stones which was taken out of the well into other spring water, and they were cured. It is said that the virgin martyr herself prescribed the first use of this last remedy, who, soon after her second death, appearing to many, who in dangerous distempers devoutly called upon her, she directed them, for their speedy recovery, to apply the water and stones of the well in the aforesaid manner. Such as had swellings or old sores bathed the part affected and they found present relief.

"At this wonderful spring almost daily miracles were wrought, according to a petition St. Wenefride made to God before she left Finhon, that he would vouchsafe to bless corporally, and sanctify spiritually, all those who in future ages should devoutly visit her fountain, and there acknowledge the many benefits with which He had favoured her. Frequent miracles were likewise wrought at her tomb. Multitudes of diseased persons became perfectly cured by praying and kissing the earth where her sacred remains were deposited.

"The holy author of St Wenefride's life and death was not satisfied with a general relation of miraculous cures: he descends to particulars, that unbelieving posterity might be induced to allow credit to what he had recorded as to daily wonders." p. 25.

That the eminent Cardinal "devoutly visited the fountain," we cannot doubt; and as "almost daily miracles are wrought at this wonderful spring," we can scarcely suppose that his Eminence has not been perfectly cured of his rheumatism, and take for granted that he will, in due time (as in duty bound), acknowledge publicly the "benefits" with which he has been favoured on his visit to Holywell. This may be the more necessary, as we observe some of our unbelieving contemporaries have scoffingly insinuated that his Eminence's sufferings have not been materially alleviated, much less cured, by his devotions at Holywell. Can it be possible that the application failed because the Cardinal did not sincerely believe in the whole of the picturesque history of the life of this eminent saint? If so, he, of course, has only himself to thank, and has no right to blame St. Wenefride for it.

We present our readers with a slight abridgment of Mr. Duffy's reprint, which will give them an outline at least of what all should believe, who would devoutly visit the miraculous fountain with a fair prospect of being partakers of its "benefits:"—

"In the seventh age, after man's redemption, flourished many saints of both sexes. I shall only mention those chiefly concerned in this short history. St. Beuno, the glorious instrument of St. Wenefride's second life and sanctity, was born of noble parents in Montgomeryshire, at the fall of the river Rhyw into the Severn, therefore called Aberhyw. His father, Binsi, descended lineally from Cadell, prince of Glesiwig, and his mother derived her pedigree from Anna (who was married to the king of Picts), sister to the mighty and renowned king Arthur, who departed happily this life, and was interred at Glastenbury, in the year 542. His grandfather was Saint Gundeleius, and he was near related to several eminent saints; amongst the rest, he was cousin german to Saint Kentigern*, Bishop of Glasgow, who, forced from Scotland, founded the bishopric of Saint Asaph, from his disciple of that name, whom he left to govern that church.

"This zealous monk, having finished his monastery at Clynog Vawr, in Carnarvonshire, found himself powerfully inspired to visit his relations in Flintshire. It is true, he had long before bid adieu to all ties of flesh and blood, but he understood this call as a voice from heaven. A rich and potent lord, in that part of North Wales where now the holy well is, had married the virtuous and noble lady Wenlo, sister to St. Beuno. His name was Thewith —some write him Trebwith; but a manuscript now before me of one of the most learned antiquaries of the last age says his name was Tyvid.

"St. Wenefride, the glory of West Britain, was born in the troublesome reign of king Cadwallawn; and St. Beuno made his visit to his brother in-law's house, in the reign of king Elnith, the second of that name.

"It was her parent's intention to marry her to some nobleman of the country, and to bestow on her a most plentiful fortune; but her ever blessed Redeemer, in those tender years, was disposing her sweetly for his service. By St. Beuno's frequent discourses, she understood how great, how good, and how glorious the heavenly spouse was; that voluntary virgins are like angels upon earth; that they follow the Lamb wherever he goes—(Apoc. xiv.); that the honours of the world are vain, and its pleasures short lived; so that the very thought of an earthly husband became hateful unto her.

"The implacable enemy of mankind, suspecting that such high beginnings of perfection in tender years might prove a powerful invitation to other noble virgins of despising themselves and the world, employed one of his incarnate emissaries to defeat the design of the Holy Ghost. What hell cannot effect by its own immediate suggestions, it too frequently brings about by the insinuating arguments of lewd mortals. Cradocus, King Alen's son, became sottishly enamoured with the charms of her person, not casting an eye on the beauty of her virtues; so waited for an opportunity to gratify his brutish passion, which thus happened:—One Sunday, Saint Wenefride's parents being gone to church before her, and she for a short space detained at home on a charitable account, soon to follow after; the prince having intelligence, entered the house, under pretence of business with the Lord Thewith. At first, the holy maid, not at all suspecting his insincerity or design, received him very courteously, with an humble apology for her unworthiness to entertain one of his royal birth: "But, if you please," added she, "to repose yourself in a more convenient room till divine service is ended, my father will be at liberty to serve you." To this candid and obliging answer of the bashful virgin, Cradocus, now more than ever inflamed with sinful desires, replied in the greatest disorder, that nothing could be more agreeable than to stay in her company, since it was then solely in her power to make him happy. If she complied with the ardent desires of a passionate lover, she might expect all the happiness his power and quality was capable of bestowing upon her.

"Although the virgin blushed and trembled at the immodesty of this wicked proposal, yet being perfectly present to herself, in the dangerous occasion, and fortified with divine grace and light from heaven, she answered, that there was not the least doubt to be made of enjoying honours, wealth, and worldly happiness, by being espoused to so noble a prince; that she was in great confusion to be so suddenly surprised in such mean attire, not becoming his presence: 'Wherefore, permit me (said she) to enter my chamber adjoining to this, to better my dress.' Cradocus, in the heat of his passion, unwillingly gave ear to the virgin's petition, yet could not refuse a request accompanied with so much modesty and seeming deference to his quality. She no sooner got clear of so impudent a guest, but, slipping out privately by another door, she immediately ran towards the church, sure of meeting with protection there from so villainous an attempt. Meantime, the prince, impatient of so long a delay, and but without some suspicion of what had happened, rushed into the room to which she retired; not finding her there, he pursued her so eagerly that he overtook her on the descent of the hill before she could gain the church. There, with a drawn sword in his hand, and with fury in his face, he threatens to separate her head from her body, unless she quickly consented to his will.

* Published by James Duffy, 23, Anglesea-street, Dublin, 1845. It was originally printed in 1712, and, as the preface informs us, was translated from the Life of St. Wenefride, written in Latin by Robert of Shrewsbury (Robertus Salopiensis). It has since appeared in various forms. Mr. Duffy's edition seems to be reprinted verbatim from one printed in London by W. E. Andrews in 1817.

"St. Wenefride had two sorts of death waiting for an answer—a separation of the soul from the body, or a separation of the soul from God; she did not balance upon the matter, but undauntedly and heroically replied, 'that by her parents' approbation, she was holily espoused to the Son of God, who infinitely exceeds all power and beauty upon earth; that she would be faithful and constant in her pure affections, and rather lose her life than admit any rival. Neither shall your menaces and terrors (said she) draw me from the sweetness of his love, nor so overawe me as to make me recede from executing what I have promised. As it happens sometimes, that despised carnal love turns into rage, so it fared with barbarous Cradocus, who, seeing himself scorned (as he thought), gave such a deadly blow to the virgin's neck that the first stroke severed the head from the body, which, falling upon the descent of the hill, rolled down to the church, where the congregation were kneeling before the altar. As they were terrified with the bloody object of her head, so they were astonished to behold a clear and rapid spring gushing out of that spot of ground her head had first fallen upon; which, to this very day, is visited from all parts by devout pilgrims.* The place of her martyrdom had, before her death, the name of the Dry Valley, or Barren Bottom, which was changed into the title of Finhon, which, in old Welch, signifies a fountain or well. It was also observed that the stones of the well were tinctured, as it were, with blood, to perpetuate the memory of what she had shed for the love of Christ; and in process of time it was taken notice of, that the moss growing round the well had a very fragrant smell! as an emblem of the odour of her angelical virtues (p. 9).

"To close the last act of this inhuman tragedy, and to relate the dreadful stroke of Divine justice on the cruel tyrant, we are to premise, with brevity, that the just grief of the holy virgin's parents is not to be expressed, seeing their dear child so villainously butchered, almost before their eyes. St. Beuno's virtue was also put to the test, to bear with true resignation the loss of so devout a creature. Tears came trickling down his cheeks at the sight of the horrid murder. The afflicted people, with united voices, called upon Heaven for speedy execution against him who had committed that heinous outrage. Indignation accompanied compassion, when they beheld the unrelenting assassin wiping his bloody sword upon the grass, and glorying in the detestable fact, without any fear of God or man. St. Benno was preparing to offer the unbloody sacrifice of our redemption; but being inspired by Him who declared, 'Revenge to me, and I will repay it' (Deut. xxxii. 35.), he left the altar, and taking the blessed martyr's head in his trembling hands, he mounted the ascent towards Cradocus.

"Being come up to him, he said: 'Thou wicked man! who, without regard to innocence or beauty, has massacred a princely virgin, no less nobly born than thyself. Nor dost thou repent, or seem sorry as thou oughtest to do, for this horrible sacrilege. I here beseech my heavenly Lord, that, for an example to others, he will please to execute his divine judgment against thee, who has murdered his spouse, troubled his people, violated his Sabbath, and besprinkled this holy house with blood, which I consecrated to his service.' As the earth swallowed up rebellious and perverse Corah, so some affirm, that at St. Beuno's last words, Cradocus not only dropped down dead, but also that the earth opened to give passage to the luxurious body to sink towards his monstrous soul, or the master whom he had served, the devil, carried it off; for it is certain, that the carcase of the cruel murderer never after appeared.

"St. Benno earnestly exhorted the parents and people to turn from lamentations, and to address the Creator of souls, raiser up of dead bodies, that as he commanded back Lazarus to life, rotting in his monument, so to his greater honour and glory, and for the comfort of the sorrowful parents, who had so generously dedicated this darling child to his service, he would graciously vouchsafe to restore her to life. He then joined the sacred head to the pale body, covering both with his cloak; after which he offered up the holy sacrifice of our salvation.

"After mass was ended, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and prayed that she might be restored to life. The pious people, drowned in tears, having, with sighs and moving sobs, answered devoutly, Amen, the virgin arose, as newly awaked from sleep. She wiped her eyes and face to clear away that glorious dust which had settled on her lovely head when it tumbled towards her dear St. Beuno. The decollation of St. Wenefride is celebrated on the 22nd of June (p. 10).

"One particular in this surprising resuscitation is very remarkable, viz.: When her parents and others fixed their eyes upon her neck, they observed a pure white circle, no larger than a small thread, quite round it, denoting the place where the separation had been made, which always after remained. From this, the great veneration of the people for her changed her name, which was Brewa, into that of Wenefride. Wen, in the old British tongue, signifies white, and other letters were, by an alteration, added to this syllable, to render more agreeable the sound of the new name. In the many apparitions after her second death, when she showed herself to her devout clients, they always took special notice of the aforesaid white circle, which intimated to them the indelible mark of her spouse's affection for suffering that mortal wound so courageously for his sake (p. 11).

"When the ancients of Ephesus had heard St. Paul declare unto them, that they should see no more his face (Acts, xx. 25.), they fell upon his neck, and there was great weeping. In like manner, when St. Wenefride was acquainted by her admired master, that she should not see him any more in this world, a lawful grief seemed to overwhelm her. To comfort her in such deep affliction, St. Beuno took her by the hand, and led her to the crystalline fountain, the place of her martyrdom, where they sat on a stone, bearing to this day the name of St. Beuno's stone, and which lieth now in the outward well; 'You see (said he) the monument here of your sufferings. Behold also the stones, as tinctured with your blood, which was shed for the glory of your heavenly spouse. Be you therefore attentive, and mindful of what I do foretell you, concerning three special favours, whereby your glorious spouse, Jesus Christ, will hereafter honour yourself, and by your prayers benefit others. The first is, that these bloody spots shall never be washed off from the said stones, but ever remain as triumphant signs of your blood spilt in defence of your chastity. The second is, that any person who shall devoutly ask temporal blessings, or freedom from spiritual or corporal distresses, to be obtained by your merits and intercession, the same shall compass his request, if it be to the honour and glory of God, by paying their devotion three times at this well. If what he petitions for be not for the advantage of his soul, and therefore is not granted, at his death, by your prayers he shall reap more ample fruit, and in the next world everlasting blessings. The third, that after my departure into a more remote part of this island God will give me a cell near upon the sea shore; so that whenever you send any letters or tokens to me, as I entreat you to do at least once every year, only cast them into the stream of this fountain, and they will come safe unto me. Which wonders will be gloriously divulged of you to the end of the world.'

"St. Wenefride had a most grateful soul; she honoured St. Beuno as an eminent servant of God; she loved him as a father; she respected him as a master; and could never sufficiently acknowledge her duty to her greatest benefactor, after him who had made her.

"To make some small return, she sent him every year a token, after the manner he had prescribed. In the beginning of May, almost a year after his departure, with the help of her religious sisters, she finished a curious embroidered vestment; and wrapping the same in a woollen cloth, she went down with her religious and others to the well side, and casting the bundle into the water, she said, 'Holy father, according to your command and my promise, I send unto you this small token of my love.' To the great astonishment of numerous beholders, it passed down the stream into the river, then into the sea, and it landed near the monastery where St. Beuno then dwelt, many miles distant from the holy fountain.

"The holy man was then walking on the sea shore, and wondered what that bundle should be; but on opening it he remembered the charge he had given to St. Wenefride, and that, as he had foretold, it came miraculously to him, without the least sign of wet or moisture. This vestment he preserved with great care in the church, for the celebration of holy mass.

"The virgin never intermitted to send him a yearly present, till his most happy death was revealed unto her, and the glorious reward he was crowned with in heaven. This last passage may appear to incredulous persons the most surprising of all others in the history of St. Wenefride's life, therefore, Divine Providence thought fit to authenticate the memory of it to this very day, and after this manner: in Carnarvonshire, eight miles distant from the town of Carnarvon, there is a little creek where the sea runs up, called in Welsh, Porthy Casseg (corruptedly, as I could instance in other appellations), for Porthy Cassuel, or the Port of the Vestment. Here the first present of our Saint miraculously landed; and the place retains the name to this day. Near unto this inlet there stands a large parish church, called Clynog, in which St. Beuno was buried, his tomb is yet extant, and is held in great veneration by the inhabitants. The history of St. Wenefride's life was curiously represented in the glass windows of Clynog church; but has been so defaced that little now appears. What can be more persuasive to obtain credit to this miracle than so ancient and so certain a tradition, even to those who use their utmost efforts to destroy the memory of miracles?* The Port of the Vestment solves the objection from the year 660 to this of 1838. As apostolical tradition is the unwritten word of God, and by it we receive the scriptures, and the secret interpretations and true sense of them, as what regards infant baptism, &c., let it be lawful for me to say, that as to human faith, uninterrupted tradition from father to son for so many centuries is a clearer attestation of fact than if it had been recorded in written history" (p. 17).

Who can doubt the truth of such persuasive arguments? Can it be possible that fathers could be so wicked as to deceive their children? Did they who saw St. Wenefride's head rolling down the hill, and afterwards saw it joined to her shoulders again, and listened to her admonitions for years afterwards, know the truth of what they saw? Would they not speak truth to their children? How, then, could there be any clearer attestation of fact?—especially where so many similar wonders are equally well authenticated. One would really think that there had been something strange or uncommon in people being able to live after their heads were cut off, whereas nothing was, in fact, more common in the good old times (unless certain tradition is to be set at nought by modern scepticism) than people living, and moving, and talking after their heads were cut off!! That our well-disposed readers may not suppose that we are speaking without book in such a matter, we would crave their serious attention to a few examples, taken from works of the gravest authority and antiquity, and which, we are certain, are quite as well founded as that of St. Wenefride.

The first instance we shall give is that of St. Maxentia, whose life, as given by the learned Augustine, John Capgrave, appears to have been nearly a counterpart of that of St. Wenefride. She consecrated herself to a life of celibacy, and was cruelly beheaded by a disappointed lover, in a fit of rage at his rejection. "No sooner," says Capgrave, "had this servant of Satan retired, than the body of the sacred virgin (as is related by the faithful, who received it from their fathers by a truthful narrative), arising from the ground, took her own head in her hands, and carried it with drooping arms from the place of her martyrdom to that in which she now rests by the will of God."*

The same venerable writer tells us (fol. 259, 2) of St. Paternus, that on one occasion his servant, who was wandering in the woods of the monastery, fell among robbers, and was killed and beheaded by them. St. Paternus, having heard of it, went into the wood, and called his servant by his proper name, saying, "Answer to your master." Then the head, which had been torn from the body, answered, "Here I am, Sir." Guided by the voice, the Saint arrived at the place from which it came; and seeing the servant's head cut off from the body, raised his eyes to heaven and blessed the corpse; whereupon the head suddenly becoming joined to the body, rose up alive.†

The story goes on to say how a noble lord of that province, whose servants the robbers were, came and begged pardon of the Saint, and granted him a part of his lands in compensation for their misconduct—a not uncommon result, we opine, of saintly miracles in those ages.

Our next example we shall take from a more recent writer, Father Cressy, of the holy order of St. Benedict, who wrote an elaborate Church History of Britain, published in a large folio volume in 1668. (Permissu superiorum et approbatione Doctorum). He narrates of St. Edmund as follows:—

"After the Danes had cut off the head of this holy martyr (King Edmund), their rage and malicious fury did not cease, but casting out his body despitefully, they kept the head to revenge themselves yet further on the tongue which had so constantly sounded forth the name of Christ. And after they had used all manner of contemptuous scorn upon it, they cast it into a secret place in a thicket of the wood adjoining, lest the Christians should venerate it, and decently bury it with the body. There it remained a whole year's space: after which the pagans retiring out of the country, the first care of the Christians was to honour their holy king and martyr. Assembling themselves, therefore, together out of their lurking places, they devoutly took his body out of the

* There is a similar story related of a French saint. Perhaps the one story is a mere echo of the other; though which was the original we cannot pretend to determine. "A holy woman, named Reine, suffered martyrdom about Alise, a little village near Flavigny. When she was beheaded, at the very place where the head lighted on the ground, a spring bubbled up at that very instant, for a perpetual miracle, in witness of God's approbation of the confession of faith made by his handmaid." This spring is also remarkable for its healing qualities. The monks of St. Francis have a chapel beside it, as St. Wenefride had for ages at her holy well. (Frauds of Romish Monks and Priests, vol. i, p. 4).

* A gentleman at Preston, we learn from the Tablet of 25th August last, has just opened a chapel in Frenchwood-street, under the title of "Our Lady of Salette," the window over the altar in which is fitted with stained glass representing the apparition of Our Lady to the two children, Melanie and Maximin, on the mountain of La Salette, in honour of which the chapel was founded. What a persuasive proof this window will be, 500 years hence, of the "stupendous event!" The Right Rev. Dr. Goss, coadjutor of Bishop Brown, of Liverpool, attended the ceremony, and delivered a discourse on the occasion; we hope he did not forget to render due homage to Mademoiselle Constance Lamerliere, whose history we lately published from the "La Salette devant le Pape" of the Abbé Déléon.—See CATHOLIC LAYMAN, Vol. iv., pp. 64-76.

* "Recedente autem ministro Satane corpus sacræ virginis (pront a fidelibus qui hoc a suis patribus relatu fideli acceperunt) a terra consurgens caput proprium in manibus sumpsit et a loco martirii ad eum in quo nunc dei voluntate quiescit pendulis brachiis deportavit."

Legenda Angliæ Johannis Capgrave, printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1516—fol. 228—1.

John Capgrave died in 1484, and was no obscure writer, but a learned Doctor of Theology at Oxford, the Provincial of the order of the Augustines, and the most learned Augustine who was ever in England. "A man (says Pitseus) of such excellent parts, that he had scarce any equal, none superior in England in his time."—Johannes Pitseus de illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus.—Paris, 1619—p. 671.

† "Quodam enim tempore Sancto Paterno adhuc superstite dum quidam ejus minister monasterii silvas visitaret, incidens in latrones occisus est. Quo audito Paternus silvam adiit, et ministrum proprio nomine vocavit dicens, Respondeas magistro tuo. Tunc caput a cadavere revulsum respondit. Hic adsum domine. Cum qua voce pervenit. Episcopus ad locum responsionis et videns caput ministri a corpore sectum elevatis in cælum oculis cadaver benedixit et capite subito corpori conjuncto viveus surrexit."—Capgrave, fol. 259—2. De Sancto Paterno.

nucleon place where it had been cast, and then with all diligence sought for the head. And whilst every one of them with equal affection searched each corner of the wood, there happened a wonder not heard of in any age before.* For whilst they dispersed themselves in all parts, and each one demanded of his companions, where it was that the Danes had cast the head, the same head answered them aloud in their own tongue "here, here, here!" Neither did it cease to cry out in the same words, till it had brought them to the place. And to add to the wonder, there they found a mighty and fierce wolf, which, with its fore-feet held the head, as if appointed to watch and defend it from other beasts; when they were come, the wolf quietly resigned it to them. So, with joyful hymns to God, they carried and joined it to the body; the wolf in the meantime following them to the place where they buried it; after which the beast returned into the wood, in all which time neither did the wolf hurt any one, neither did any one show the least intention to hurt the wolf. This I find received and attested by all the ancient authors, without exception, particularly by William of Malmesbury who holds the prime place amongst all our most ancient historians, both for the fidelity of his narrative, and maturity of his judgment."†

The same story may be found in Capgrave, of which we give an extract in the original Latin, in the note‡:—

After this we need not feel any surprise at St. Justinian the Martyr, whose death (as the same faithworthy historian tells us) was succeeded by wonderful miracles. We think it best to give the narrative in his own words:—

"When the Devil saw himself every way vanquished by the holy man, he infused the poison of his malice into the hearts of the holy man's servants. Insomuch as they having been reproved by him for their idleness and misspending their time, they were inflamed with fury against him, insomuch as rushing upon him, they threw him to the ground, and most cruelly cut off his head. But in the place where the sacred head fell to the ground, a fonntain of pure water presently flowed, by drinking of which, in following times, many were miraculously restored to health. But miracles greater than those immediately succeeded his death, for the body of the blessed martyr presently rose, and taking the head between his two arms, went down to the sea shore, and walking thence on the sea, passed over to the port called by his name; and being arrived in the place where a church is now built to his memory, it fell down and was there buried by St. David. His commemoration is on the three-and-twentieth of August."§

The case of St. Ositha, called by William of Malmesbury Osgitha, is even less remarkable, because she had assistance of two angels at least, if not more.

Cressy's account of the matter is as follows:—

"As soon as her head was cut off, her body presently rose, and taking up the head in her hands, by the conduct of angels walked firmly the straight way to the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul, about a quarter of a mile distant from the place of her suffering; and when it was come there, it knocked at the door with the bloody hands, as desiring that it might be opened, and therein left marks of blood. Having done this, it fell then to the ground."‖—

St. Clarus had also like assistance of angels, as Cressy¶ relates the story:—"Whose head being cut off, presently after arose, and with his hands taking up his head, by the assistance of angels, carried it to a fountain not far distant, into which he cast it: and then carried the same back to the oratory of his cell, and going on a little further to a village seated near the river Epta, he there consummated his course, and transmitted his blessed soul to heaven."

We do not quite approve of the rough way that St. Clarus treated his head on this occasion (though being his own, perhaps he had, in strictness, a right to do what he pleased with it), and we think the proceeding of St. Decumanus was more humane and decorous, of whom Cressy states††: "That when his head was cut off from his body, the trunk, raising itself up, took the head, which it carried from the place where he was slain to a spring not far off, which flowed with a most crystalline water, in which, with the hands it washed the blood away."

After all these equally well-authenticated stories, it seems scarcely worth while noticing what Cressy tells us of St. Juthwara;‡‡ and we are almost afraid of wearying our readers with what may to many of them appear like so many reverberations or echoes of the same story or at best the same tune with variations; but here it is.

"Immediately after this, the holy virgin with her own hands took up her head, being cut off, and, to the astonishment of all (as we may easily imagine, if unbelievers, otherwise it was no great wonder after all), carried it back steadily to the church. And moreover, for a further proof of the holy virgin's sanctity, Almighty God caused a fountain to burst forth out of the place where the head fell, and over the fountain as miraculously a tree began to grow!"

That a tree should grow near a fountain seems to us somewhat less miraculous than that a beheaded saint should steadily carry her head afterwards! St. Cadocus's case is, however, more worthy of note: for the subject of it was an Irishman who was ill-treated by his Saxon fellow-workmen, which must (in Ireland, at least) naturally carry our belief in the certain tradition to a demonstrative height.

Capgrave relates it as follows:—

"There came a certain Irishman to the place where St. Cadocus was building his oratory, who surpassed (as of course was natural in an Irishman) all the workmen of the saint as a skilful artificer. The others, through envy, wickedly killed him, and having cut off his head and tied a large stone to the body, cast it into a deep pool. Cadocus, having heard the lamentations of the sons of the deceased, spent the night with his clergy in vigils and prayer, that the Lord would deign to reveal what was done. But when the morning came, the beheaded artificer, with his head in his bosom, and the great stone on his back, presented himself all bloody, with a horrid appearance, to the holy man, and the amputated head uttered the following words:—'O servant of God, fix me on my neck in the same state I was before, and I will tell you all about it.' St. Cadocus having done so, he divulged to him the wickedness of the workmen, and how, led by envy, they had flagitiously murdered him. The saint then said, 'Choose which you wish, either henceforward to live with us in this world, or return to eternal life, there to reign for ever with God.' To which he replied, 'Master, let my soul return to eternal rest;' and having said this, he expired."*

While talking of workmen, we may as well tell our readers of another Irishman, whose history is recorded by Father Colgan, in his life of St. Ita, which may be found in his costly folio Latin volume, called Acta Sanctorum.†

A good workman, named Beoanus, undertook to build a house for St. Ita, who gave him in return some land, and her sister as a wife. It happened, in those troubled times, that poor Beoanus, in a war between two chieftains, took the field, and was killed, by having his head cut off. This displeased St. Ita very much, for she had promised Beoanus that he should have a son, whereas, his wife had up to that time been sterile. When she came where the truncated body of Beoanus lay, and could not find his head, she prayed that he would show her the head, and the head, by Divine power, flew through the air, and stood where the body was before the Saint, and the Lord, at the instance of his servant, caused the head to adhere to the body, as strongly as if it had never been cut off, and only the scar of a wound remained. In about an hour afterwards he rose up alive and well, and saluted St. Ita, and gave thanks to God; after which Beoanus, according to St. Ita's promise, had a son by his sterile wife, who was called Pulcherius,‡ and became the most holy abbot of Liathmore, in the King's County.

St. Denis's story is well known, and, perhaps, will appear after this tame, but as it is related in the Breviary, (Para Autumnalis, p. 398. 9 Oct. Lectio vi.), and perhaps is the longest walk of a dead man on record, we shall give it in the very words of the Breviary itself—"He took up his head after it was cut off, and carried it in his hands for two thousand paces."

Have any of our Roman Catholic readers courage to ask their parish priest, whether this is not in his Breviary, and whether, he believes it to be true? Our copy of the Breviary, is the Breviarium Romanum, printed by Richard Coyne, Dublin, 1815. §

Our next instance shall be in honour of our Lady of Loretto, taken from the history of Loretto by the learned Jesuit Tursellinus, and, in a somewhat abbreviated form, is as follows:—

"A Sicilian girl, of better form than fame, fled at Venice for many years earned a disgraceful livelihood as a courtesan. Having made her fortune, she was seized with a longing for home, and determined to return there. When she had arrived at the wood of Recanati, she was attacked by her own servant, who desperately wounded her in many places, and finally cut her throat. She, swimming in her blood, and just about to expire, commended herself to the Blessed Virgin, who immediately appeared in a white robe, shining with celestial light, took her in her lap, and with a touch healed her wounds, admonished her to lead a chaste life, and then vanished from her sight. The woman, as if awaking from sleep, saw the scars of her recent wounds already drawn together, and feeling with her hand, found the wound in her throat already completely healed. When she came to Ancona, to prove what had happened, she showed the recent scars of the deadly wound in her throat, and there was added a manifest and divine proof of so great a miracle, for around her neck there was a golden circle, like a necklace, so that one might easily know that it was the divine hand of the blessed Mary that had touched and healed the wound."*

Of all the acts of kindness, however, of which we have read, we think the following decidedly the most remarkable, as recorded by Capgrave in his life of St. Meleras. St. Meleras was a young prince of Cornwall, of seven years old, and was murdered by one Cerialtanus, instigated thereto by Rinaldus, a tyrannous uncle of the saint, who had usurped the dukedom, and was afraid that if the boy came to man's estate he would deprive him of the principality.

Cerialtanus, it appears, while carrying the head (which he had cut off) to Rinaldus, was so much heated by running that he was almost fainting with thirst, and cried out "Oh miserable man that I am, and worthy of all punishment and torture, what shall I do to avoid dying of thirst? This he repeated very often, when the head of the boy thus addressed him:—"Cerialtanus, thrust the staff which you carry in your hand into the ground, and you will see a fountain suddenly arise from the earth, by drinking plentifully of which you will escape your imminent danger from thirst."—And when he had fixed his staff into the ground, it immediately struck its roots into the earth and became a most beautiful tree, and produced branches and leaves, and from its roots a never failing fountain began to flow, and Cerialtanus having refreshed himself with drinking of it, brought the head to Rinaldus, who received it with great joy."†

Not to weary our readers, we shall only mention one case more; it is that of St. Kentigern, which perhaps goes as low, or as high, in the scale of saintly miracles as any we have met with in the course of our researches.

St. Kentigern (who it will be remembered, from the above history of St. Wenefride, was cousin-german to St. Beuno), indeed seems to have treated such feats as mere child's play; for when one of his schoolfellows had pulled off a robin redbreast's‖ head, he took the head and put it to the body§ and by his prayers and the sign of the cross, raised the bird to life again, as not only Capgrave but Bollandus¶ relates the story. Whether there remained a ring round the bird's neck afterwards, however, does not appear, or, if so, what colour it was.

Here, then, we have no less than seventeen stories (including this instructive case of the robin redbreast) in which decapitation either wholly failed in destroying life, or at least effected only a qualified or temporary separation between the head and shoulders; and all of the cases authenticated by the same uninterrupted tradition for 1000 years at least, which, according to the historian of St. Wenefride, is "a clearer attestation of fact, than if they had been recorded in written history!"

---

* In this the learned Benedictine was in error, for St. Pancras's decapitated servant did just the same thing, as we have already shown.

‡ Quendam avisulum ob ruborem corporculi rubiculum vocitant.

¶ The crimson used by the saints on such occasions (which, unfortunately for our brave warriors in the East, appears to have been lost in modern times) seems, it will be remarked, to have been of various colours: St. Wenefride's was white, the Sicilian courtesan's golden, and St. Edmund's red, as we collect from Capgrave:—

"Cum autem postea corpus beatissimi Edmundi martyris transferri deberet, invenerunt vestimenta et [illegible] corpus, et caput corpori reintegratum nullisque omnino vulneris aut cicatrix conspicua. Tantum enim in ejus cervice ob nimium sanguinis [illegible] rubet erat tenuissima rugæ in modum fili circumeat, erant tantum erat nullus quantum devota femina Osgytha—fol. cviii, cviii.

" But when, at a subsequent time, the body of this most holy martyr, Edmund, was about to be translated, it was found incorrupt, and uncorrupt, and the head rejoined to the body. No appearance of a wound or a cicatrix appeared. Only on his neck, as a token of his martyrdom, appeared a very slender red seam, like a crimson thread, as the devout Osgytha was accustomed to say."

That the crimson answered as well for ornament as colour, appears from the case of Walter, Earl of Northumberland, who was beheaded for rebellion against William the Conqueror, and was in every other way dead, but found with his head fastened to his body, and only a bloody red about his neck, where it was cut off.

‖ Capgrave, fol. cevIII., 2. Bollandus Acta Sanctorum Tom I. p. 918. Antwerp, 19th Jan., Vita Kentigerni Episcopi Glasguen. c 2, n. 7.

We may as well state for the information of our unlearned readers, that the Acta Sanctorum of Bollandus and the fathers consist of more than 50 folio volumes in Latin, and are not yet complete. The last volume we have seen was that printed at Brussels as lately as the year 1850. Whether such costly and elaborate volumes were designed for the credulous vulgar, or for the learned and intelligent classes, our readers will judge.

We have no doubt that if we had had time to dive more deeply into the pages of Father Cressy, Father Colgan, William of Malmesbury, Johannes Capgrave, and the Acta Sanctorum, we might have added greatly to the list; but of those we have given—if there can be any choice among such edifying histories—we venture to state that the most satisfactory of all were the cases of St. Wenefride, the Venetian courtesan, St. Ita's workman Beoanus, St. Paternus's servant, and the robin redbreast, as they were fully restored to life, which poor St. Edmund and the rest were not. We think the cases of St. Edmund and Count Wallen were altogether unsatisfactory ones, as, after the cementing process was gone through, the beheaded bodies unfortunately remained as dead as before. The cases of St. Denis, St. Decimanus, and the rest, who merely carried their heads to their places of burial, with or without the assistance of angels, we confess we never liked much, and have always wondered what the angels were about in not carrying the miracle a little further, unless, indeed, Angels have less supernatural power than Saints, and are only able to lead dead men, and not to cure them!

Will our readers allow us to ask one serious question before, in sober sadness, we close this article. If they do not believe in these traditions (as we are sure a great many intelligent Roman Catholics do not), but think them merely anile fables, unworthy of a moment's serious thought, what do they think of a Church which permits and encourages the circulation of such palpable falsehoods, and even records some of them in her authorised prayer-book, the Breviary, which every Roman Catholic priest is compelled to read daily; while it discourages, if it does not prohibit, the reading of the inspired records of unerring truth?

RELIGIOUS TOLERATION AT ROME.

By the kindness of a friend, we have been provided with a copy of the "Theses on Religion of P. F. Joseph Palermo, of the Order of Eremites of St. Augustine," printed and published at Rome, A.D. 1823, in order to a public discussion.

We do not know whether any account of the discussion was published. We fear not; but if any of our friends could tell us anything about it, we should be grateful to them.

In the meantime, we publish some extracts from the "Theses." We shall then consider briefly what degree of importance is to be attached to the publication of such a work at Rome, so late as the year 1823.

We take Joseph Palermo's notions of "Religious Toleration" as a specimen of the doctrines which he published at Rome, and undertook publicly to defend.

In page 17, after some discussion about religious toleration, he lays down this conclusion, "Let it fall headlong into hell, from whence it broke forth, with its snake-haired forehead, that most impious and most insane religious toleration!"*

Joseph Palermo then goes on to show the application and the grounds of his doctrine about religious toleration, as follows:—

"Therefore, let the public exercise of religions opposed to the Catholic (he means the Roman) be forbidden by Catholic Princes, UNLESS CHRISTIAN PRUDENCE HINDER IT; for, indeed, each ought to do to others what he ought REASONABLY to wish to be done to himself by others; but princes, if they were subjects, ought to wish that princes, by every better method which Christian prudence would teach them, would employ themselves to drive away every cause of their eternal misery, if it were only a probable cause of it; therefore, the princes themselves are bound to fulfil this for their subjects."†

This appears to us a good instance of the power of argument which some Roman Catholics possess. Our Saviour says, "All things, therefore, whatsoever you would that men should do to you, do you also to them" (Matthew vii., 12.) "There, you see! (says Joseph Palermo) princes ought to punish every one who differs from them, for worshipping God according to his own conscience!"

We ask our Roman Catholic readers to consider what they would think of this argument, if the Protestant government of England were to act towards them on the reasoning of Joseph Palermo?

But "heretics" are unreasonable beasts: they ought to be persecuted, and they wont wish it!

But Joseph Palermo proceeds, a little farther on—"Wherefore, unless that condition exist (Christian prudence hindering it), it is very gravely unlawful to tolerate the public exercise of the religion of the Mahomedans, Jews, Calvinists, Lutherans, and of all others opposed to ours, especially of Atheists."‡

We never before heard of ATHEISTS' having public worship: we suppose they are put into the list of "public worshippers" only to try to throw disgrace on "all others opposed to ours"—that is, on Christian churches not subject to Rome.

What a glorious day it would be for the Church of Rome, if she could effectually prohibit every man throughout the whole world to worship God except as the Pope may now please—or as he may hereafter please, according to doctrines not yet promulgated or invented!

But what is the meaning of "that condition," i.e. "unless Christian prudence hinder it?"

The Waldenses were exterminated in the 13th century. The Protestants were massacred in France on St. Bartholomew's Day. In England, in Queen Mary's reign, all who dared to worship God according to their conscience were burnt alive. Three or four years ago, the present Pope entered into a "concordat" with Spain (now happily set aside by Espartero), that any Spaniard who worshipped God otherwise than as a Romanist should be consigned to a dungeon.

"Christian prudence" forbad none of these things; because the sufferers were weak, and the power of arms was against them. But at the present day, Joseph Palermo would not enforce such laws in England, or France, or America, because the thing could not be done; and "Christian prudence" forbids the Church of Rome to attempt such things where she would certainly be beat; just as "Christian prudence" admonished the Russians to march out of Sebastopol when they could stay in it no longer.

But what if Joseph Palermo did print and publish these persecuting doctrines at Rome? Is the Church of Rome answerable for that? So Roman Catholics in this country may ask, and they are entitled to an answer.

We reply, that at Rome no person is allowed to print any book until he first gets the sanction and authority of the Church of Rome for doing so. This is a law of the Church of Rome, made by a Pope and General Council, in the year 1515.

"We appoint and ordain that for all future times no one shall priot, or cause to be printed, in our city (Rome) any book or other writing, of whatever kind, unless they be first diligently examined in this city by our Vicar and Master of the Sacred Palace, and APPROVED by subscription of their own hand."*

This law was made by Pope Leo X., in the Fifth General Council of Lateran, A.D. 1515.

This law is still in force at Rome, and under this law Joseph Palermo's book, which undertakes to defend these outrageous notions about religious toleration, was actually approved for publication. For thus we find it printed at the end of the book:

IMPRIMATUR

Si vid. Rev. Patri Mag. Sac. Pal. Apost. J. Della Porta Patriarcha Constantinopol. Pro-Vic.

IMPRIMATUR

F. Philippus Anfossi. Sac. Pal. Ap. Mag.

Thus, this book of Joseph Palermo's was formally sanctioned at Rome, in the year 1823, by the two officials—the Pope's Vicar, and the Master of the Sacred Palace—who were specially appointed by the Pope and a General Council to examine and approve of books before they can be printed.

It certainly appears that the teaching and defending of such doctrines as Joseph Palermo's does not meet any discouragement at Rome; and it is fortunate that the Joseph Palermos of the Church of Rome have the "Christian prudence" not to attempt putting their doctrines in practice where people are able to resist them.

Since the above was written, we have found reason to think that Joseph Palermo's doctrine about religious toleration has found great encouragement at Rome.

We find in the Tablet of August 25, p. 532, the following announcement:—"The most Rev. Father Paul Micallef, a native of Malta, has been appointed by the Pope General of the Order of St. Augustine. He succeeds the late General, the most Rev. Father JOSEPH PALERMO, who has resigned, by reason of his promotion to the Episcopacy and office of Sacristan and Confessor in Ordinary to his Holiness."

We suppose this is the Joseph Palermo who wrote the Theses on religious toleration. His opinions, it seems, are not an obstacle, but rather a recommendation for promotion. The fact of his being made Confessor to the Pope, and director of the Pope's conscience, is a significant circumstance, in the present state of Spain, Sardinia, &c., and of Rome itself.

If Joseph Palermo had written a book in favour of "religious toleration," and had undertaken to prove that princes ought not to persecute any man for worshipping God according to his own conscience, would he have got leave to publish his book at Rome, and would he have been made CONFESSOR TO THE POPE?

THE SUCCESSION OF THE ARCHBISHOPS OF DUBLIN.

IN our number for August, 1854, we published an article "On the Succession of the Irish Bishops."

In that article we quoted the following passage from the "Historia Catholica" of Philip O'Sullivan Bear:—"There are four archbishoprics in Ireland, and a great many bishopries, and ALL of them, at this day, are possessed by the leaders of Heresy; and on account of that, Catholic Prelates ARE NOT APPOINTED to the Titles of them, EXCEPT ON RARE OCCASIONS."*

This was published in 1621—EIGHTY-SIX years after the beginning of the Reformation in Ireland.

This evidence, from a Roman Catholic historian, is decisive against the common boast of Roman Catholic priests, that the Church of Rome has kept up an unbroken succession from the ancient Bishops of Ireland, in all the Irish Sees.

In our number for October, 1854, we published "The Succession of St. Patrick," showing an uninterrupted succession up to Lord John Beresford, the present Primate of Ireland.

We then called on "all Roman Catholic archbishops in Ireland (especially Dr. Dixon), on all Roman Catholic bishops, priests, and laymen, to send us a list of Roman Catholic archbishops (of Armagh) in succession from Primate Cromer, with the dates of the vacancies and appointments, and the proofs of each."

We did NOT expect that such a list would be sent to us, because we know well that no list can be given of a Roman Catholic succession at Armagh, which could stand examination for one moment.

A YEAR has now elapsed; and no Roman Catholic has ever ventured to send us such a list!

We now call on all Roman Catholics to mark this striking fact; and we ask them again, are they willing to let it thus appear to the world that they have NO SUCCESSION FROM ST. PATRICK?

Will any Roman Catholic now send us such a list?

We now proceed to give "the succession of the Archbishops of Dublin." We give this succession in a different form from that of Armagh. No Roman Catholic author that we know of, has published the Roman succession of Armagh; we therefore gave only the succession of the Irish Church in the See of Armagh, leaving it to Roman Catholics to furnish the Roman succession. But Mr. D'Alton, an Irish Roman Catholic barrister, and a learned Irish historian, has published a valuable history of the Archbishops of Dublin. At the end of this work (page 370, to the end), he has given the Roman archbishops of Dublin. Here, therefore, we are able to give the Roman succession, as stated by a learned Roman Catholic. We, therefore, give BOTH successions in the See of Dublin; and we ask our readers to consider which of them is really A SUCCESSION. We give the succession of archbishops of the Irish Church, from Harris's edition of Ware's Irish Bishops, down to John Hoadley, who was archbishop of Dublin in the year 1739, when that work was published; and we complete the account from a list made from the Registers themselves. The succession is acknowledged on both sides down to John Allen, who was murdered by the Fitzgeralds in the year 1534. We therefore begin with his successor, George Browne, who was Provincial of Augustine Friars in England, and who, while he held that office, "advised the people to make their applications to Christ alone; for which doctrine he was much taken notice of." As archbishop of Dublin, he never acknowledged any subjection to the bishop of Rome, but exerted himself to the utmost to have all things ordered in the Irish Church according to the Word of God.

We take up the Roman succession where Mr. D'Alton enables us to do so.

John Troy, from 1786 to 1823.
Daniel Murray, from 1823 to 1852.
Paul Cullen, from 1852 to present time.

From the above table it appears, first, that there was always a succession of archbishops in the See of Dublin, in which succession the present Archbishop Whately now stands. Second, that there was no Romanist archbishop of Dublin for 76 years (from 1535 to 1611), with the exception of three years (from 1555 to 1558; for Hugh Curwen renounced obedience to the pope in 1559). Therefore, it is the Irish Church, and not the Roman Church, which has succession in the See of Dublin.

Matthew de Oviedo, who was nominated by the Pope in 1600, was not a bishop. He was a political agent of the King of Spain, sent over by him to carry on war against the Queen of England; and the Pope, to give credit to his mission, gave him the title only of archbishop of Dublin, by naming him as the person to be appointed to that See; but Oviedo was not consecrated. This appears from the fact that Peter Lalor was "Vicar General of the Apostolic See," in the Diocese of Dublin, in 1606, and had been so for many years*—showing that while Oviedo was living, the Pope had only a vicar-general, and not an archbishop, in the See of Dublin. The fact was, that if Ireland had been conquered by the King of Spain, Oviedo was to have been made the Pope's archbishop in Dublin. But as Ireland was not conquered, he never was consecrated; and he never set foot in Dublin. Our readers may see another case of the same kind in our article "On the Succession of the Irish Bishops," in our number for August, 1854.

Thus, for SEVENTY-SIX years (that is, from 1535 to 1611, omitting the three first years of Hugh Curwen), the Pope never had an archbishop in the See of Dublin.

It is, therefore, mere ignorance now to boast of a succession of Roman Catholic archbishops in the See of Dublin.

When Eugene Matthews was appointed by the bishop of Rome in 1611, Thomas Jones, a Catholic prelate, holding the Catholic creeds, and canonically consecrated, was in legitimate possession of the See of Dublin. The appointment of Eugene Matthews to a See which was then canonically filled, was unlawful and void. By the laws of the Catholic Church, there can be but one bishop in a See; and a second bishop appointed to a See in which there is a bishop already, is NO BISHOP.

Eugene Matthews, and all his successors, labour under this sentence. By the laws of the Catholic Church, none of them are bishops.

We ask, will any Roman Catholic lawyer have the boldness to discuss this question in our pages?

We further affirm, that no law or canon of the Catholic Church has given to the Bishop of Rome a power to nominate or appoint the other bishops of Christendom.

If any such law or canon can be produced, let it be sent to us, and we will publish it.

How long will Roman Catholics fail to answer every such challenge of ours?

They cannot answer, until truth shall change sides. There lies the rub!

* Davis' Reports; Premunire Case.

THE RESURRECTION OF THE BODY.

WE have ever held it to be one of the heaviest charges against the Church of Rome, that she has made additions to the articles of the Christian Faith, as handed down in the Catholic creed.

Twelve new articles, added to the creed fifteen hundred years after the time of Christ, can have no claim to be "the faith once delivered to the saints."

Roman Catholics, however, do not easily see the greatness of this offence. Their priests are naturally more anxious about upholding the new articles than the old ones; partly because the old are able to stand alone, and the new are not; and partly because those who study the Scriptures do not attack the old articles, and do attack the new ones. Thus Roman Catholics hear much about the importance of the new articles and but little, perhaps, about the old ones.

If Roman Catholics really understood the importance of "the articles of the Christian faith"—if they knew how those articles do meet the wants of men's souls, and appeal to the affections of their hearts—they would be more jealous of the inventions and additions of men.

Such an understanding of the Creed, as containing the great truths proposed by God himself to occupy our minds and engage our hearts, is also a strong confirmation of our faith, in addition to the great argument of prophecy which we stated in our last number.

We wish, therefore, to call attention to the articles of the ancient Creed.

We designedly begin with that article of the creed which, perhaps, our readers may have the most overlooked—"the resurrection of the body."

Mankind have always been anxious and uneasy about their future destiny after death; for of all creatures in this world, God has made man alone capable of looking beyond the grave.

The heathen nations always believed in the immortality of the soul. Some small sects among them denied it, as the Sadducees did among the Jews; but the mass of the heathen, not being led by the false philosophy of the few, always believed in the immortality of the soul and a future existence.

The Latin poet, Virgil, who lived not long before the birth of Christ, has left us an account of the popular belief about that future existence, with its rewards and punishments.

He has succeeded well in describing the torments of the damned, and well, too, in describing the process by which the heathen believed that souls were gradually purged of the stains of sin—a description which has been largely adopted into the debased Christianity of later ages.*

But his description of heaven, though he did his best to make it attractive, is such as NO LIVING MAN could wish to obtain in exchange for this life.

In his description, the whole state of the dead appears cold and dreary in the extreme—

> "Regions void of light,
> Through the vast empire of eternal night."

And every attempt to ascribe happiness to the dead only makes the unreality of the scene the more painful—

> "But reach your hand, oh parent shade, nor shun
> The dear embraces of your longing son!
> He said, and falling tears his face bedew,
> Then thrice around his neck his arms he threw,
> And thrice the flitting shadow slipt away,
> Like winds, or empty dreams that fly the day."
> (Dryden's Virgil, Book vi., 918.)

Existence like a dream can never be an object of desire to man.

If Virgil's heaven contains one object of desire, it arises from the doctrine of the transmigration of souls—

> "Those happy spirits which, ordained by fate,
> For future beings and NEW BODIES wait."

Yet what an object of desire!—

> "That, unremembering of its former pain,
> The soul may suffer mortal flesh again."

Yet, doubtless, such an offer would have been gladly embraced by any shade in Virgil's heaven.

So cold and dreary was the brightest conception that a heathen could form of happiness in a life to come.

There must have been—and there was—a reason for this failure.

God created the first man, Adam, a being composed of body and soul; Adam, so created, was immortal; he was always to have body and soul united. But when Adam sinned, the sentence went forth that he must die: and so death passed upon all men (Romans v. 12).

"Death" did not mean that his soul should cease to exist; it meant the destruction of the body and the separation of the soul.

The state of a disembodied spirit, is, therefore, the state of death.

Virgil, knowing the immortality of the soul, but being ignorant of the resurrection of the body, could only describe the state of the dead; and, do what he would to make that state seem happy, the inmost feeling of mankind, more true than man's philosophy, turns, and will ever turn, with instinctive aversion from the hateful picture. The "rising from the dead" (Mark ix. 10) can alone be the hope of immortality.

Alas, that many Christians should have no higher notion of the life to come than the heathen had!

Their minds are turned away from the articles of the Christian faith, and fixed on the inventions of men. The doctrine of the heathen poet and the Council of Trent, that "there is a purgatory," is ever before their eyes; the CHRISTIAN doctrine of "the resurrection of the body," never! and, consequently, their great concern about the life to come, is how they may escape from the torments of purgatory—not how they may "attain unto the resurrection of the dead" (Phillipians iii. 11).

Most of our readers are probably conscious, that their notions of HEAVEN are so cold and gloomy that to them it is hardly an object of desire. If they must die, they would rather go there than to hell or purgatory; but if they could choose for themselves, they would rather stay in this world than do either.

This feeling does not altogether proceed from a fear of the judgment of God; it proceeds in part from not being fit for the enjoyments of heaven; but it proceeds in great part, too, from not understanding the state of existence we shall have in the life to come—from not believing and understanding the resurrection of the dead.

For, independent of the sense of guilt and the fear of judgment, the idea of being a mere disembodied spirit is repulsive to the nature of man; because that is not the state of existence for which God created man, nor is it the state to which God designs to restore him; and the marriage of man's nature can be satisfied by that alone for which God created man. Therefore, the notion of being a mere spirit, stript of the body, must ever produce in the soul a sense of shrinking and shivering, like that which going naked would produce in the body.

But if the body shall be raised out of the grave, and body and soul again become a living man, then man triumphs over death; and if the body, risen from the grave, shall be freed from all the sickness, pain, and weakness, which it now suffers in consequence of sin—if it rise glorious and incorruptible, as Adam's body was before he fell—then every desire of immortality which man is naturally capable of forming, is fulfilled in the life to come. All this, and more, the scripture promises.

St. Paul acknowledges the nakedness of a disembodied spirit, and promises something better; when speaking of the present body, he says—"In this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house that is from heaven; if so be that being clothed, we shall not be found naked. For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened: not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life" (2 Cor. v. 2-4).

The Corinthians erred (not like the Sadducees, by denying the existence of spirits), but by doubting the resurrection of the body; and to them the apostle says—"Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first fruits of them that slept. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive" (1 Cor. xv. 20, 21). And God who giveth a new body to the seed which rots under the earth, can raise up again that body which death has consigned to the worms and the dust.

That very body shall be raised, but how changed! "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in incorruption: it is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory: it is sown in weakness; it is raised in power: it is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body" (1 Cor. xv. 42-44).

It is true that "Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," any more than corruption can inherit incorruption (verse 50); but there are celestial (or heavenly) bodies, as well as terrestrial (or earthly) bodies (verse 40): there is also a "spiritual body," as well as a "natural body" (verse 44).

The "natural body" is that which we now have; the "spiritual body" is that which Christ now has. And as we have borne the image of fallen Adam by having a body like his, so shall we bear the image of Christ by having A BODY like his (1 Cor. xv. 49).

For Christ "shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body" (Phil. iii. 21).

What that "glorious body" is, he showed at his transfiguration on the Mount, when "his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light" (Matthew xvii. 2).

Christ was then—and he is now—in his glorious body; and he has promised to "change our vile bodies that they may be like to his glorious body."

And then, "when this corruptible body shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal body shall have put on immortality, THEN shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, DEATH IS SWALLOWED UP IN VICTORY" (1 Cor. xv. 54).

Who has not stood by the grave of a parent or a child, a wife or a husband, or some one who was dear, and felt the reign of death? Who does not shudder at the thought of lying down like them in the grave? Who does not long that "Death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed?" (1 Cor. xv. 26).

There was a grave once by which Jesus stood and called, "Lazarus, come forth. And he that was dead came forth" (John xi. 43, 44).

Lazarus came back into a world of woe: yet was there joy at his rising from the dead.

But "the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the grave shall hear his voice, and shall come forth" (John v. 28). They that are his, with glorious incorruptible bodies, to "new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (2 Peter iii. 13).

Until that victory over death be won, we "wait for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our BODY" (Rom. viii. 23). And, therefore, it is placed among "the articles of the Christian faith," as that which can animate all our hopes, and give an object to all our desires, "I believe in the resurrection of the body."

All this, we know too well, is nothing to all those whose hearts are yet possessed with the natural enmity of fallen man to holiness and to God (Rom. viii. 7). But to those who are seeking for Christ's salvation—whose minds are in any degree conformed to Christ—to them, we believe, there is no greater encouragement and help than to know that "the things which God has prepared for them that love him," are indeed the things that are able to supply all the desires which their nature is capable of forming.

If such should desire to learn more of "the articles of the Christian faith," we will endeavour to meet such desires.

In the meantime, we ask them to consider that it is not without reason that we "earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints" (Jude 3); and that we are so jealous lest that faith should be overborne by the inventions and corruptions of men!

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XXXII.

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "it is stuck in me at last; and there's no use talking—I'll have to do something."

"Is that in regard of what you were saying the last day, Pat?" said Jem.

"That's it, Jem," said Pat. "I'll have to do what's right."

"And why would you have to do more than you have done these two years back?" said Jem. "Arn't you reading the Bible, and won't that do?"

"Well then, Jem, it won't; without we do what is in the Bible," said Pat.

"And what's in the Bible?" said Jem.

"Do you mind what we were talking of once," said Pat, "that them that is ashamed of Christ and his words, Christ will be ashamed of them?"*

"Them words isn't easy forgot," said Jem.

"Them words stuck in me all along," said Pat; "and I couldn't quit thinking wasn't I ashamed of Christ and his words, and would not he be ashamed of me. Well, I was reading a while ago in the Douay Bible, and I came on this, 'If thou confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe in thine heart that God hath raised him up from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart we believe unto justice, but with the mouth confession is made unto salvation."†

"And what would that mean?" said Jem. "It isn't like confessing to the priest anyway."

"People doesn't go to the priest to confess Jesus Christ, but only to confess their sins," said Pat.

"And what does confessing Jesus Christ with the mouth mean?" said Jem.

"Well, I suppose," said Pat, "when the heathens believed in Jesus Christ, they had to say it out, and go to church like men, instead of pretending they didn't believe on Him."

"Well, that's plain anyway," said Jem; "they wouldn't get salvation by Christ, if they didn't acknowledge Him; but what has that to do with us? or how have we to confess Christ with our mouths?"

"Jem," said Pat, "don't we know that we must believe in Jesus Christ only, and follow His words alone, and nothing else?"

"We know that surely," said Jem.

"And if we say that out, that is making confession with the mouth," said Pat.

"It is," said Jem; "there is no use saying against that."

So Pat turned round on Jem, and said, "Why don't we do it, Jemmy Brannan? Speak the truth, like a man."

"Why, then, because we're afraid; that's the truth," said Jem.

"We are just afraid of men, and so we are ashamed of Christ and of his words, and we durst not confess him with our mouths," said Pat.

"Pat, we would be killed entirely if we did it," said Jem; "and get no work neither, and the childer starve or else go to the poorhouse. Wouldn't that be the quiet plan for them that turn?"

"Jem, we'll have to come back on the words of Christ," said Pat; "them words won't let us alone." So Pat read out of the Douay Bible: "Fear ye not them that kill the body, and are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear Him that can destroy both soul and body into hell." (Matthew x. 28.) "Now, Jem," said Pat, "will we stand that, sooner than make confession with the mouth unto salvation?"

"How can we do it at all?" said Jem. "Couldn't we confess Jesus Christ and his words, and still not leave the Church of Rome at all?"

"We can't, Jem," said Pat. "Sure we will have to confess that we believe in Jesus Christ only, and follow his words only. And sure that is clean contrary to the religion of the Church of Rome. Sure Father John himself will tell you, that them that says that, is flying in the face of the Church of Rome. And how can we stick to both? Sure there is no use in imposing on God and on the priest too."

"I wish we could do what's right in the Church of Rome," said Jem.

"WE CAN'T," said Pat; "and there is no use talking of it. I tell you, Jem," said Pat, "we'll have to go out of BABYLON to deliver our own souls."

"And is the Church of Rome Babylon?" said Jem.

"Enough, to make us go out of her;" said Pat.

"Is there anything about it in the Bible?" said Jem.

"Plenty," said Pat, "and in the Douay Bible too."

So they fell to searching the Douay Bible; and they found it easy, for Pat had the places marked. So they read this out of the Prophet Jeremiah, chapter li., verses 6 and 7: "Flee ye from the midst of Babylon, and let every one save his own life; be not silent upon her iniquity; for it is the time of revenge from the Lord, he will render unto her what she hath deserved. Babylon hath been a golden cup in the hand of the Lord, that made all the earth drunk: the nations have drunk of her wine, and therefore they have staggered." "And here's a great one," said Pat, reading verse 9; "We would have cured Babylon, but she is not healed; let us forsake her, and let us go every man to his own land."

"Well, now, Pat," said Jem, "didn't the Prophet Jeremiah live a long time before Jesus Christ?"

"He did, surely," said Pat, "for it's in the Old Testament it is."

"Well, there wasn't a Church of Rome then," said Jem.

"There couldn't be," said Pat.

"Well then, Jeremiah be to be talking of something else," said Jem; "wasn't there a great city then called Babylon?"

"There was," said Pat; "for I read about it in the last CATHOLIC LAYMAN."

"It be to be that he was talking about, Pat," said Jem.

"Well, the CATHOLIC LAYMAN allows it was that city he was talking about," said Pat; "but if he was a prophet, why wouldn't there be another meaning in it too?"

"And what right would we have to put another meaning on it?" said Jem.

"Stop a bit," said Pat, "there's more. Didn't the Prophet Jeremiah say that the old city of Babylon would be destroyed? Sure here it is—'It shall be no more inhabited for ever, neither shall it be built up from generation to generation' (chap. l., verse 39). And doesn't the CATHOLIC LAYMAN say that it was destroyed 2000 years ago? and isn't that before Jesus Christ came? and that it never was built; and no one ever lived in it since? Well now, Jem," said Pat, "if the Bible said anything more about Babylen AFTER that, doesn't it stand to reason that it be to have another meaning?"

"That stands to reason, Pat," said Jem; "but does the Bible say any more of Babylon after that?"

So Pat found out the 18th chapter of the Book of Apocalypse or Revelation. "And now mind, Jem," said Pat; "St. John the Apostle wrote this after Jesus Christ came, and after the city of Babylon was destroyed and never built again; and for all that he speaks of Babylon going to be destroyed; for only listen to this:" and Pat read verse 21—"And a mighty angel took up a stone, as it were a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, with such violence as this, shall Babylon that great city be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all." "Now, Jem," said Pat, "wouldn't that be the quare thing to say of a city that was dead and gone long before, if it hadn't another meaning?"

"It be to have," said Jem; "but what more does it say of Babylon?"

"Here's what St. John says of it," said Pat; and he read out of that same 18th chapter of the Book of Revelation, verses 1, 2, 3—"And after these things I saw another angel come down from Heaven, having great power; and the earth was enlightened with his glory. And he cried out with a strong voice, saying: Babylon the great is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every unclean spirit, and the hold of every unclean and hateful bird; because all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication."

"Them's terrible words," said Jem.

"Mighty like what Jeremiah said of the old city of Babylon," said Pat, "sure here's what he said, 'therefore, shall dragons dwell there, with the fig-fauns, and ostriches shall dwell therein'* (ch. 50. 39); only St. John makes the words harder still," said Pat, "and that's may be because he explains the meaning."

"Well, but did it all happen while St. John was living?" said Jem, "for sure if it did it's all past and gone."

"It didn't," said Pat, "for St. John only saw it, like as you would see it in a show-box. And before he saw it, the voice out of heaven said to him, 'I will show you the things that must be done hereafter' (Revelation iv. verse 1.) So you see, Jem, it was all a prophecy, and St. John just took the words about Babylon to show it; so you see, Jem, Babylon be to have another meaning."

"Well, it be to have, Pat," said Jem, "but still the Revelation is the hardest book of all, and may be we ought to read the rest of the Bible, and not come to that."

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "there's more things in that part of the Bible that I can't come up to, than in any other; but there's one thing in the Book of Revelation plainer nor in any other, and here it is for you, Jem." So Pat read chapter i. verse 3: "Blessed is he that readeth and heareth the words of this prophecy."

So Jem allowed it ought to be read after that.

"Well, wait till I read you what St. John says of it all," said Pat; so Pat read chapter xviii. verse 4, "And I heard another voice from Heaven saying, go out from her, my people, that you be not partakers of her sins." "Now," said Pat, "didn't he take the words of Jeremiah† and fit them on to what he was speaking about? And if the voice from Heaven bids us go out, won't we go?"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "there's one thing I want yet. St. John wasn't talking of the city of Babylon that was destroyed for ever before he was born, that's plain any way. And he was talking about something that was to come, and fitting on the words about Babylon to it. But what was it at all? Was it the Church of Rome he meant? That's what we havn't got at yet."

"It's coming, Jem," said Pat; "it'll be got, that same. So Pat turned to the 1st Epistle of St. Peter, chapter v., verse 13, in the Douay Bible, and he read—"The church that is in BABYLON, elected together with you, saluteth you."

"Sure there wouldn't be a church in a city that was destroyed, and no man living in it," said Jem.

"Well, in course there wouldn't," said Pat; "but the Douay Bible explains that for us." So Pat turned to the preface printed before the Epistle of St. Peter, in the Douay Bible; and he read—"He wrote it at Rome, which figuratively he calls BABYLON." And then said Pat. "If the Douay Bible itself allows that St. Peter himself called Rome BABYLON, why wouldn't we do it too?"

"Well, that beats all," said Jem; "Rome is Babylon surely."

"Jem," said Pat, "do you mind all our talk these two years and more? Isn't it the Church of Rome that sets up other mediators? and tells us to worship Mary and Joseph? and bids us trust in the scapular and blessed medals? and that cuts out God's commandments, for fear we would learn to obey Him and not her? And, more nor all, isn't it the Church of Rome that says the word of God will set us astray? and doesn't that show her gone clean against the word of God? and isn't it the Church of Rome that taught that same to all the world? and what would make her Babylon, if going against God himself wouldn't?"

"Oh, Pat," said Jem, "how could we turn at all? sure it's killed we would be entirely."

"Jemmy Brannan," said Pat, "wasn't it you put me on the reading, when I was more loath nor you were, and will I go out of Babylon afore you?"

"What will we do to get out, Pat?" said Jem: "will we go to America?"

"We won't, Jem," said Pat, "mind you this, Jem," said Pat, "it isn't only about getting out: it's about not being ashamed of Christ and of his words; and it's about confessing him before men; and will I sneak out of old Ireland, only because I'm ashamed of Christ? And besides the children is too many, and will I leave them and Biddy behind me? And more foreby, Jem, America isn't the place it was: it's getting worse every year on them that goes there, and old Ireland getting better, and the wages good."

"Well, that's what the priests is preaching everywhere," said Jem, "for the people to not go to America, any more."

"Well, I wouldn't blame them, if it was only the good of people they were thinking of," said Pat; "but sure you know, Jem, the priests have no country only Rome; and it's Rome they're still thinking of, and not old Ireland; and it's Rome they're thinking of, and neither Ireland nor America, when they tell the people to stay at home."

"Well, I'm thinking that betimes," said Jem, "but I don't know a'most why."

"I'll tell you why to think it, Jem," said Pat: "sure I got another loan of the Tablet, and here's a letter from Father Reardon* in America to a priest in Ireland, and here's what he says:" so Pat read out of the letter:

"'I solemnly believe that if the vessels which bring them over were suddenly to founder, and carry every creature on board into the depths of the ocean, they would have a better chance of salvation than they have after they have lived for some time in this country.'"

"Oh, Pat! stop a bit," said Jem, "isn't that the awful thing to think of; of a ship full of creatures, may be five hundred men, women, and little children, God save us, and the men holding their wives, as I have read in letters, and the poor mothers hugging their little babies on their poor breasts, and all them going down, screeching, at once into the roaring sea to death! and isn't it the cruel thing to hear a priest speaking as if he would like that ship to sink! Oh, mercy on us!" said Jem, "sure that's the poor thing."

"Well, sure Father Reardon can have no wife or children of his own," said Pat, "and he mightn't understand our feelings; and why would he stop at that, to save souls in his own fashion? but that isn't the part of his letter I want now," said Pat; so Pat read on.

"'So entirely convinced am I of the fearful havoc of souls which is the result of coming here, that were Almighty God to give me the power of building A WALL OF FIRE round Ireland, to prevent its people from leaving it, it should be built before the ink with which I write this line would dry. For the love of Jesus, try to keep your people at home. For every individual you keep, you snatch a soul from hell.'"

"Well, that's mighty fine," said Jem, "if every one that staid in Ireland would go to Heaven. But it's another thing he was thinking of: them that go to America leaves the Church of Rome, and them that stays in it is afeared to leave it; and that's all as one with him as the differ of going to Heaven or Hell: but I am afeared there's a deal of good Catholics in Ireland that won't get to Heaven."

"But what do you say of the wall of fire round Ireland to keep us in?" said Pat.

"Isn't the fires of Purgatory enough for them to govern us with?" said Jem.

"Deed and it's not then," said Pat; "the people is getting to think little of Purgatory, and that won't keep them in now; and it's the wall of fire the priests wants now."

"And if they had the wall of fire round Ireland, to keep in them that snap their fingers at the priests when they get to America," said Jem, "wouldn't they have a good bit of fire in the middle of Ireland too, for the boys that won't mind the priests at home?"

"Well it's a nice Patrick's Purgatory it would be, more nor even St. Patrick thought of," said Pat, "if Father John, and Father Reardon got their way. But it's not come to that yet anyway."

"I'm in dread it's too hot for them, that will turn," said Jem.

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "it will be worse yet for them that is ashamed of Christ, and that won't confess him with the mouth. Anyway that is stuck in me, and I can't be without some church; and I'll have to find one that will let me confess Christ and his words: that's the church for me, Jem, and maybe I'll find it better here nor in America. My mind's made up anyway, and if I'm beat, sure I can go to America then as well as now; and not feel then that I'm skulking out of it, like a man that is ashamed of Christ."

So if we should hear anything more of poor Pat's future history, our readers may like to know it, as well as we. For there are clear heads, and some brave hearts too, among the poor people of Ireland; and the humblest of them is worth caring about. Such men may be scarce in Ireland before long: and it concerns us all, that Ireland should not be too hot for them to stay in.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, OCTOBER 17, 1855.

Every period of the world's history has its own peculiar marks and characteristics; and it may be said, without fear of contradiction, that our's is pre-eminently an age of inquiry. There is scarcely any question, physical or moral, which is not, from time to time, brought under investigation; and, to any person who is sincerely anxious for the promotion of truth, it is a subject of the deepest interest to mark the growth of enlightened views, and the dying-out of antiquated prejudices, both at home and abroad. And this interest must be obviously increased, in proportion to the intrinsic importance of the question which gives rise to such gratifying results.

Our readers, we trust, scarcely need to be reminded that, from the commencement of this Journal, we have always laboured, to the best of our ability, to impress upon our fellow-countrymen the paramount duty which devolved upon them, as intelligent men and as Christians, to seek out truth, and especially religious truth, for themselves. We have urged them to disregard the impediments and restrictions with which interested persons, whether priests or laymen, would seek to surround them; and we have called upon them to assert and practice the right of free inquiry upon the most important of all subjects which could concern them as immortal beings. We felt thoroughly persuaded that, in the end, the cause of religious truth could never suffer from such investigation, conducted in a fair and candid spirit. It is falsehood, and falsehood alone, which has any cause to shun the light.

It is not now our purpose to dwell on the success which has attended our efforts—a success, we are rejoiced to say, in many instances far beyond our expectations. We merely advert to the subject, for the purpose of drawing the attention of our readers to the striking confirmation of the soundness of our views, which has lately been presented in a quarter where it might have been least expected—namely, in the Cortes, or Parliament of Spain.

Spain, as our readers are aware, is a thoroughly Roman Catholic country; perhaps, in some respects more thoroughly Romanist than even Italy itself. It was for many centuries the chosen seat of the Inquisition; and the fearful cruelties perpetrated on all persons who were even suspected of heresy have often been detailed in all their hideous enormity. The animosity of the priests and inquisitors extended even beyond the grave. If a person not of the Romish communion died in Spain, no funeral rites could be performed over his remains. His family were obliged to convey the body privately and by stealth to the place of interment, and deposit it in the ground without prayer or ceremony of any kind. A remarkable instance of this intolerant bigotry occurred some few years ago, and drew forth a spirited remonstrance from Lord Howden, the English ambassador, addressed to the Spanish Government: and it was said in the newspapers at that time, that if the Duke of Wellington, who had rescued Spain from French domination, had had the misfortune to die in the country which he delivered, his body, according to law, would have been treated worse than that of a common malefactor, and buried in the ground like a dog.

In such a country, where all the power and influence of the Government were directed to the promotion and support of the Roman Catholic faith, the obstacles to enlightened discussion might, at first sight, appear almost insurmountable. We might expect that scarcely any person would have the boldness, in the face of so much intolerance, to raise his voice in defence of free inquiry and religious liberty. Such an event has happened, however (as we learn from the public papers), in the course of the last few months*; and the cry has been raised, not in an obscure corner of the country, but in Madrid itself, in the highest deliberative assembly of Spain. How true it is, that all the efforts of priestly domination can never permanently succeed in stifling the earnest longing of the human mind for truth and freedom! The Romish clergy may keep a country in darkness and bondage for centuries; but sooner or later, in spite of all their precautions, some rays of light will break in.

The man who had the courage and resolution to act as we have described was the deputy from Barcelona, Don Raphael Degollado. A motion had been made in the Cortes, to the effect that any person who, from religious conviction, had ceased to belong to the Roman Catholic Church in Spain, might be at liberty to embrace another creed. This measure, the very first step in the path of religious toleration, was, as might be expected, violently opposed by the priestly party and their advocates; and it was in answer to them that Don Raphael Degollado delivered the bold and manly speech to which we have adverted. We request the attention of our Roman Catholic readers to the arguments which he employed. They have been frequently advanced in our pages; but, perhaps, they may come home with more force to some minds, from the recollection of the fact that the speaker is, and has been, a sincere member of the Roman Catholic Church. In reading the accounts of the bitter persecution to which our own poor countrymen are often exposed, who have had the courage to follow the dictates of their conscience, and leave the Church of Rome, we often felt that it would be well if all Romanists in Ireland acted on the fair and honest principles which the deputy from Barcelona so truthfully describes:—

"I come here," said he, "to defend toleration upon strictly religious grounds. Intolerance and exclusiveness are directly contrary to the Christian religion. If the gates of hell are not to prevail against the Word of God, why this puerile, this impious fear that injury could be done by another religion to the religion of Christ? This insulting fear is a negative—at the least, a doubt—of the truth of prophecy; and from doubt to infidelity is but one step. He who uses constraint, whether physical or moral, to secure the fulfilment of prophecy, can have no faith in it. The partisans of intolerance ignore the force of truth.—'Truth has in itself an irresistible force, it is as the light; our lips cannot deny its presence when our eyes behold it.'"

He defends himself ably from the charge of being influenced by indifference or hostility to religion, in advocating the cause of religious toleration:—

"My conscience could never know peace were I to refrain from telling you all I feel, all I think on this momentous subject. Let it not be thought, either within these walls or outside of them, that when I come here to defend religious liberty, I do so as an infidel, or a sceptic, or an indifferent. All these I have formerly been. I have been even a fanatic—a violent fanatic; but, by the grace of God, I have been enabled to escape those dangerous quicksands, where mere human reason too often makes shipwreck. And it is because I observe in this country the rapid progress of incredulity, hypocrisy, and a revolting cynicism, that I so ardently desire the triumph of religious liberty, which alone can arrest this fatal progress."

We pause in our extracts for a moment, in order to call attention to the picture of the state of morals and religion in Spain, drawn by an unimpeachable witness, the chosen representative of the important town of Barcelona. He, a Spanish gentleman, was addressing an assembly of Spaniards upon a question of momentous social importance; and he would have exposed himself to instant contradiction if his sentiments and statements were false or exaggerated. And in what terms does he describe the social condition of his countrymen? The picture is indeed a gloomy one. "There is," he declares, "a rapid and fatal progress of incredulity, hypocrisy, and revolting cynicism;" which latter word may be taken to imply a kind of savage, unsocial selfishness of character. This, then, is the state to which the teaching of the Church of Rome has reduced one of the finest countries in Europe. Romanism can throw the blame on no other quarter. For several centuries she has had the entire teaching of the Spaniards in her own hands. Not only religious liberty, but even the most trifling toleration, was sternly refused to any other persons or teachers, save her own. Have we not a right, then, to judge of the truth of her system by its fruits? She has made the Spaniards unbelievers and hypocrites; she set before them, under the garb of Christianity, a tissue of doctrines which they could not believe, and then compelled them, by persecution, to conceal their unbelief under the mask of hypocrisy. We greatly fear that there are many other Roman Catholic countries to which such a melancholy description would too truly apply.

To return, however, to the speech of the deputy from Barcelona. He argues, in forcible terms, against the superstitious dread of toleration which some sincere Romanists might possibly entertain:—

"Of all religions," he asks, "which is that which must appear to us to have the firmest faith in the truth of her dogmas?—that which shuts herself up, as it were, in an impenetrable enclosure, discusses nothing, tolerates nothing, and persecutes all outside her pale? Or is it that religion which discusses and which tolerates the free exercise of other forms of worship? Is it Catholic Spain, which stifles in her bosom, by every possible means, religious liberty? or Protestant Norway, who opens her doors to Jews and Catholics, whom she had for so long a period repulsed? Or Protestant England, who extends her toleration even to permitting the establishment of colleges of Jesuits, the most implacable enemies of the Reformation?"

We may observe, in passing, that the policy adopted by the Church of Rome nearer home appears to resemble very closely that which characterises her conduct in Spain. She shuts herself up, as far as she can, in an impenetrable enclosure. She steadily sets her face against discussion of any kind. She stifles religious liberty by every possible means; and we are constrained to add, that in those parts of Ireland where the balance of numbers is on her side, the lawless violence of the mob is not unfrequently employed, in order to check, by terror and intimidation, the progress of Scriptural inquiry, which the Romish priests are unwilling openly to oppose.

The Spanish orator next brings forward a moral argument for free discussion, which we have frequently urged ourselves, but which we are glad once more to reproduce, in the words of an enlightened Roman Catholic:—

"If," argues the Catalonian deputy, "persons belonging to other communions are in error, instead of repulsing them, ought we not rather to draw them towards us by tenderness and love? Can they regard us with a favourable eye when we persecute them—when we calumniate them? If souls are led astray by error, permit discussion. Truth will triumph, sooner or later. Those whom we shall be unable to convince by our words, let us attract by our works, by example, by the practice of evangelical virtues—the most effectual, the most rare of all propagandas."

Our readers may well ask, can this be a voice from Spain, the land of the stake and the rack, the country of the Inquisition and the auto da fé? We will not now stop to inquire into the causes which have produced this revolution of feeling in the Spanish mind; but we cannot avoid calling attention to the simple but pregnant words in which Don Raphael Degollado has advocated the freedom of religious inquiry. "If souls are led astray by error, permit discussion. Truth will triumph, sooner or later." This is the principle which we ourselves put forward, in one of the early numbers of this Journal, as the guide and motive of our labours; and it affords us unfeigned pleasure to find it re-echoed from the midst of the parliament of Spain. We may be permitted to add, that those persons, whosoever they are, who believe their countrymen to be in religious error, and yet endeavour to stifle free inquiry, exhibit a sad want of Christian love for the souls whom they believe to be led astray.

We can afford space but for one or two extracts more. The Spanish orator proceeds to notice and to refute the common objection, that religious unity would be endangered if free religious discussion were permitted:—

"Religious unity, so earnestly called for by all, is by myself as anxiously desired as by any; but my wish is, that it should be real, not counterfeit, like that which we already seem to possess. If by unity we are to understand external unity in worship and observances, that unity already exists, since we are not permitted to observe any form of worship save that alone of the Catholic Church. But if we are to understand true unity to be that of doctrines and creeds, then the commission must be perfectly aware that such unity has no existence. It knows, also, that there are not wanting Spaniards who long to profess a different religion; that infidelity and indifferentism have their partisans; that from their very pulpits the clergy loudly complain of this; and that numbers of Catholics are as far removed from gospel truth as a Mahometan could possibly be;—so that to maintain that religious unity exists is willingly to perpetuate a lie, which deceives no one."

These remarkable words, we must remind our readers, are not ours, but those of a Roman Catholic—the chosen deputy of one of the most important towns in Spain. The unity of the Church, we must remember, is the cardinal doctrine of the Romish Church. In order to preserve this cherished dogma, every person must surrender his private judgment; every individual opinion must give way, it is said, to the voice of the universal Church. Well, the Church of Rome has, for many centuries, had her own way in Spain. We have often been told that Spain is the chosen seat of Catholicity. The very title of the Spanish Monarch is "Sua Majesta Catolica"—"Her Catholic Majesty." And, now, what is the result? Let us hear the account given by a most competent and unexceptionable witness. He tells us that "it is not a real, but a counterfeit unity;" that "the true unity of doctrines and creeds has no existence;" that "there are not wanting Spaniards who long to profess a different religion, and that numbers of Catholics are as far removed from gospel truth as a Mahometan could possibly be!" After this avowal, we trust we shall hear no more from Romish Controversialists of differences of opinion in the Protestant Church. Protestants in general are at least free from the charge of professing a religion which they do not believe. In the midst of much outward disagreement, we rejoice to think that there exists among Protestant Churches a real inward unity of doctrine and belief of the great fundamental truths of the gospel, without which all external professions of unity are but vain and nugatory.

In the Church of Rome, on the other hand, the substance is sacrificed to the shadow; the inward reality to the outward form. She has crushed the right of private judgment so long, that at last, thinking men are obliged to take refuge in hypocrisy and infidelity. In order to secure the semblance of an external unity, she prohibits all free discussion wherever she has the power; and she at length flatters herself that she has gained her object, when, in truth, the only unity which exists in her communion resembles the sameness and uniformity of colour which takes place everywhere at night, when light is entirely withdrawn. The rising of the morning sun brings the real state of things into view.

We shall add but one extract more:—

"The question of liberty of conscience has been for nearly half a century knocking at our gates, and offering itself to every serious mind for solution, which in every other civilized nation it has found. But what is the point in discussion? Is it to constrain Catholics to abjure their faith, in order to embrace another? Certainly not; but that we should come to the decision, that when any one ceases here in Spain, as elsewhere, to have faith in the Catholic religion, such person should have power to embrace another. If more than this be demanded, it is not to uphold religion, but the theocracy—a theocracy not the government of men by God, but man taking advantage of his fellow man, and that by no honest means."

This is the liberty which we demand for our fellow-countrymen at home. All we ask is, that when any Irishman ceases to have faith in the Roman Catholic religion, he should be left at liberty to embrace another, undeterred by the threat of popular violence or priestly intimidation. This liberty we shall continue to advocate temperately but firmly; and if any persons set themselves to oppose this freedom of action on the part of their neighbours, we will only say of them, in the words of the Spanish orator, that they are "men taking advantage of their fellow men, and that by no honest means."

THE RULES OF CHURCH UNITY.

ANSWER TO JOHN MILLER.

(Coutinued from our last number.)

WE published, in our last number, a letter from John Miller, in which he tried to prove that the spouse of Christ, the Church which is without spot or blemish, needs must be the Church of Rome.

John Miller rightly thinks that no other Church on earth is without spot or blemish, and therefore he jumped to the conclusion that the Church of Rome must be so.

But as evil members were SPOTS in the Church in the days of St. Jude (Jude, verse 12), so they must be now in the Church of Rome.

And since there is, therefore, no Church on earth without spot, that heavenly spouse must be "the Church of the firstborn which are written in heaven." (Hebrew, xii. 23.)

All the firstborn among the Jews belonged especially to God (Numbers, viii. 17). "The Church of the firstborn" is, therefore, composed only of those who are indeed the children of God, whose names are written in heaven.

This only is the Church without spot or blemish.

But Christ has also constituted his Church as a visible society in the world; this Church is so far from being "without spot" that it is compared to a net cast into the sea, which gathered both good fish and bad: and so it shall be to the end of the world (Matthew, xiii. 47—49.)

For the Church so spotted and blemished in this present state, Christ and his apostles have given rules in Scripture, which all faithful Christians are bound to observe.

We promised to point out those rules in this number, and we now proceed to do so.

Our Saviour has declared HIS WILL, that his Church should be one unbroken and undivided body.

He has declared this in the most solemn manner, by praying to His Father that it might be ONE.

"Neither pray I for these alone (the apostles), but for them also which shall believe in me through their word, THAT THEY ALL MAY BE ONE, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in Thee, that THEY also may be ONE in us" (John, xvii. 20, 21).

We believe that this prayer was especially intended of the VISIBLE communion of Christ's people on earth; because our Lord goes on immediately to declare why He desired and prayed for this unity; "That THE WORLD may believe that Thou hast sent me." It was, therefore, a unity which "THE WORLD" could SEE—that is, a VISIBLE unity—which Christ prayed for.

It is true such a unity has been but partially accomplished.

Our Lord prayed for the apostles—"I pray for them" (verse 9), yet Judas fell.

Our Lord prayed "for them also which should believe on him through their word" (verse 20), yet St. Paul writing "unto the Church of God which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints" (1 Cor. i, 2), says he hears that there are divisions or schisms among them (Ch. i. 10 and 11, xi. 18.)

And in most ages since, there have been divisions.

"It must needs be that offences come, but woe to that man by whom the offence cometh" (Matthew xviii. 7.)

So also there must needs be divisions; yet Christians should strive to be clear of the sin of division.

The apostles of Christ have left rules in the Church which, if observed, would accomplish that visible unity for which Christ prayed.

St. Paul has left this rule—"Now, I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned; and avoid them (Rom. xvi. 17.)

He does not say "those who separate themselves," but "those who cause separations" (διχοστασίας ποιοῦντας); it is those who cause the division, who are guilty of the offence.

St. Paul says also to the Church at Corinth, "I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you." And he forbids any one to say, "I am of Paul," or "I of Apollos," or "I of Cephas" (that is, of St. Peter), because these things lead to divisions (1 Cor. i. 10, 12.)

To the Hebrews—that is, the converted Jews—St. Paul says (Hebrews xiii.)—"Remember your rulers who have spoken unto you the word of God, whose faith imitate, considering the ending of the life they led.* (verse 7.)

And to this he adds (verses 8, 9) "Jesus Christ (is) the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever. Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines."

At the seventeenth verse he says to them "obey your rulers and submit yourselves, for they watch for your souls as they that must give account."

Verse seven exhorts them to remember St. James, their first bishop, and others who had lately suffered martyrdom with him, and to imitate their faith so gloriously proved.

Verses eight and nine remind them that as Jesus Christ can never change, no new or strange doctrine besides what St. James taught could ever be admitted into the Church.

Verse seventeen exhorts them to be obedient to Symeon, who succeeded St. James, and those who were then labouring with him, because the watching for their souls was committed to them. But this does not mean that if Symeon or his successors should bring in a new doctrine the people were bound to receive it, for the same St. Paul says, "If ANY MAN preach any other Gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed" (Gal. i., 9.).—And St. Jude exhorts all Christians that they "should earnestly contend for the faith once delivered to the saints" (verse 3.)

The faith itself, "ONCE DELIVERED," is therefore the great thing. The succession of prelates and priests, the very Church itself, was instituted to support that faith once delivered. If Prelates or Churches set themselves to alter or corrupt that faith, they betray the very object for which they were created; they so far forfeit the authority of their office; for the authority which God gives, is no authority when turned against Him; and no man is to follow or obey them in such a course.

The unchangeability of the faith lies at the root of all unity. For men cannot be united for an object, unless the object itself be fixed and settled. If the faith itself be a shifting thing which men can change, then change itself will be a source of dissention. Therefore, one unchangeable faith is the first rule, as well as the great end, of Church Unity.

One more principle the Scripture gives us. We must obey God rather than man. So said Peter and the other Apostles to the Prelates of the Jewish church. (Acts iv., 19; v. 29).

And therefore if any church require us to do what God has forbidden, as terms of communion with her, we are bound to refuse; and the guilt of that separation lies on those who require such terms of communion, and not on those who reject them.

These, therefore, are the rules which we have from the Apostles for preserving the unity of the church, according to the will of Christ.

RULES OF CHURCH UNITY.

I.—To follow the faith once delivered by the Apostles; and to reject any new doctrine, by whomsoever introduced.

II.—To obey God rather than man, and to admit no terms of communion contrary to what God commands.

III.—Not to make causeless divisions by separating from others.

IV.—To mark those that make such divisions, and to avoid them.

V.—To show all due submission to the rulers of the church in each country, provided they teach no other Gospel than what Christ and his Apostles preached; and require nothing contrary to what they commanded.

VI.—Not to call ourselves the followers of any human teacher, or even of any Apostle.

But the Apostles did not lay down a rule, that all christians must be subject to the Bishop of Rome.

The rules which the apostles gave are sufficient for the purpose for which they were given; for if these rules had been observed always and by all christians, the visible Church would have continued one undivided body to this day; "Rules" can do no more.

These rules have not always been observed, and, therefore, there have been divisions, as St. Paul foretold there would be.

But these rules are sufficient to preserve from guilt all who will adhere to them.

We desire to follow these rules ourselves, and to hold up these rules to all others.

But the church of Rome first violates all these rules, and then pronounces anathemas on us, because we will not forsake those rules, to follow other rules of her own invention, which were never given by Christ or his apostles.

(1) The Church of Rome has violated the first rule, by adding twelve new articles to the faith in 1564, and a thirteenth—the immaculate conception—in December last.

This calls our attention to a passage in John Miller's letter, as follows: "It makes no odds to us if some of them (the Popes) were LOOSE IN THEIR MORALS (that is, were adulterers, murderers, fornicators, &c.*) or whether they chopped or changed discipline as often as the laws or customs or clime required it, as long as they DID NOT CHANGE THE ARTICLES of our faith."

What is the main question between us and Rome, as respects faith? Is it not this? WE say that as respects articles of faith, it is sufficient for salvation to believe and profess the ancient Catholic creeds: the Church of Rome says that all who believe only the Catholic creed shall be damned, unless they will also believe whatever the Church of Rome has pleased, or may hereafter please, to add to it. Is it no changing of the ancient faith to say that the ancient faith can only lead to damnation without the modern additions?

We say, therefore, that the Church of Rome has changed the ancient faith, and has violated the essential object for which the Church ought to be united; and this is the chief cause of the existing divisions of the Church.

(2) The Church of Rome requires us to obey the traditions of men in opposition to the commands of God.

The Lord has said, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve;" or, as it is in the Douay Bible, "The Lord thy God shalt thou ADORE, and Him only shalt thou serve" (Matthew iv. 10.)

The Church of Rome requires us to worship and to adore consecrated bread and wine, which is NOT GOD.

"Let all the faithful of Christ, according to the custom always received in the Catholic Church, render to this most holy sacrament the worship of LATRIA, which is due to the true God; nor is it, therefore, the less to be ADORED because it was instituted by Christ the Lord to be eaten."—Council of Trent, session xii. c. 5.† And she separates from all who will not commit this idolatry.

Therefore she, and not they, is guilty of the separation thus made; for we must obey God and not men.

3. The Church of Rome is guilty of making divisions, for she has formally and wilfully separated from all who hold the ancient Catholic creeds alone; and who refuse to give to consecrated bread and wine that worship which belongs to the true God.

The Church of England and Ireland always was, and now is, willing to communicate with the Church of Rome, on the terms laid down by the apostles; but the Church of Rome will not communicate with the Church of England and Ireland on those terms.

Therefore the making of division, and the guilt of it, lies on the Church of Rome, and not on the Church of England and Ireland.

4. The Church of Rome does not avoid those that make divisions, but encourages and joins with them.

All Christians in England and Ireland worshipped in the parish Churches, according to the purely reformed worship, for many years after the Reformation. The Church of Rome then encouraged some to separate, and joined with them; so the Church of Rome was guilty of joining with those who made the division, instead of avoiding them.

5. The Church of Rome teaches men to violate the fifth rule also; for whereas there were bishops in England and Ireland, deriving their authority by lawful succession from the ancient bishops of England and Ireland, the Church of Rome did all she could to persuade all Christians in England and Ireland to refuse all submission and obedience to those bishops, and even sent over to these countries persons as bishops and priests, whose ordination was unlawful and invalid, to withdraw the English and Irish from obedience to their own lawful bishops.

6. The Church of Rome violates the sixth rule also. She says—the Pope is the successor of Peter; on the strength of that invention, she exclaims, "I am of Peter (Cephas); the See of Peter; the Church founded on Peter; I am of Peter." And it is by virtue of shouting out what the scripture has expressly forbidden and condemned, that she thinks herself entitled to violate all the rules of Church unity which the Apostles have laid down in scripture!

Thus she makes void the commandments of God, by her own traditions (Mark vii. 9, 13).

We ask our readers to consider well a principle which lies at the root of this whole question.

The Apostles established Churches at Jerusalem, Antioch, Corinth, Philippi, Rome, Ephesus, and many other places. And many of these Churches were older than the Church of Rome.

Did the Apostles appoint that the Church of Rome should govern and swallow up all other Churches?

Did the Apostles give authority to the Church of Rome, to impose new articles of faith on other Churches, and to violate all the rules of Scripture for the unity of the Church?

If the Apostles did give such power, then of course, the Church of Rome is right, and all other Churches must submit.

But if the Apostles gave her no such authority, then the Church of Rome is the great usurper of the liberties of the Church, the great disturber of the Church's peace, the great violater of the Apostolic rules for the unity of the Church.

WE KNOW that the Apostles gave no such authority to the Church of Rome; for—

First—We find no such thing in their writings!

Second—We find that the church of Rome had no such authority over other churches for many centuries.

For 300 years, at least, the authority of the Bishop of Rome was confined to the "Loca suburbicaria—" that is, to a circuit of 100 miles round the walls of Rome—and the freedom of all other churches was secured by canons of a much later date.

We put it to Roman Catholics this way—let them shew in our pages, if they can, that the Church of Rome had the supremacy over all other churches, during the first 300 years.

If they cannot, let them confess that any separation between the church of Rome and any other church, then or now, must be judged of by enquiring which party was guilty of violating the rules of church unity as laid down by the apostles in scripture.

We, for our part, are content to be judged by these rules, and to submit to them.

If the Church of Rome had been content to abide by these rules, the Church would have been ONE to this day.

We have not put "the succession of pastors" among the rules, because we do not find it expressly commanded in Scripture; yet the rules given in Scripture do provide for it—for no man may take this office on himself; and the ministers of the Church must be ordained by those who were ministers before.

The succession of doctrine is of more importance than the succession of men; and hence, perhaps, the one is expressly commanded, the other only provided for. Yet we do not underrate the succession of pastors: where it goes along with the succession of doctrine, it makes evident, that a Church has not arisen from division; and it is, therefore, a good mark of the unity of the Church.

On this ground, too, we are ready to meet the Romanists in these countries. The bishops of the Church of England and Ireland have succession from the ancient bishops of England and Ireland. The Roman Bishops in this country have not.*

As for the succession of the Bishops of Rome, we think it open to objections, from which the succession of the English and Irish bishops is free.

On this subject we have been much struck with an expression in the letter of John Miller, which has given rise to this paper; he says of the bishops of Rome—"Let there not one link of the golden chain be broken." Let him look to his chain, and he will find it very bad brass, with many a link left out!

For instance, in the list given by Bishop Milner ("End of Controversy," letter xxvii.), how comes it that there is a Pope Felix III., but no Felix II.; Pope Stephen V., but no Stephen IV.; Boniface VIII., but no Boniface VI. or VII.; John XVIII., but no John XVI., or XVII.; Benedict XI., but no Benedict X.; Leo IX., but no Leo VIII.?

Will any one explain to us how there COULD be a NINTH Pope Leo, without an EIGHTH Pope Leo?

We could give more such vacancies, but in the above it appears that EIGHT links at least of the "golden chain" are wanting.

We now say to John Miller—"Let there not one link of the golden chain be broken!"

Let him search through Bishop Milner's list of popes for these EIGHT links; if he can find them, let him write us a letter to say so, and we will publish it; if he cannot find the eight links, let him say no more of his "golden chain."

While protesting as we do against the offences of the Church of Rome, it is far from our intention to justify any Protestants for anything they have done amiss.

Those Protestants who are separated from the prelates in their own countries, only because they will not profess falsehood, or do what Christ forbids, are simply following the course of Christian duty; and are, therefore, sound members of the visible Church on earth; as well as members of the "Church of the firstborn, written in Heaven," if they indeed follow Christ.

Those who have separated without such cause, are answerable to their own Master for violating his rules. It is not our place either to judge or excuse them. We do not suppose that a violation of His rules about Church unity does separate from the visible Church, any more than a violation of his law against other evil actions. Yet all violation of his precepts is sin; he alone can tell how far a sinner is excusable by ignorance and sincerity, so as to be justified by Christ. WE cannot justify anything which is contrary to His Word. Such separations have given great cause of offence to Roman Catholics, and great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme (2 Sam., xii 14.)

At the same time, it was indeed the Church of Rome that gave the handle for all these causeless separations; for her Popes and councils, through ambition and lust of dominion, were content to force a large part of Christendom into just and necessary separation, sooner than sacrifice their own usurpation and gain. And, when separation is once begun, even on necessary grounds, the majority of men will not distinguish nicely.

But these questions about other Protestants are beside our present purpose. For we invite our fellow-countrymen to join the Church of England and Ireland, in which all the scriptural rules of unity are observed.

Those who follow these rules must be right as respects the visible unity of the Church. And, by being united to Christ their Head, they are in union with "the Church of the first-born who are written in Heaven."

MYTHS AND MIRACLES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Though you have given your readers various specimens of modern miracles in your paper, I do not think you have ever noticed a distinction taken by Roman Catholic writers on the subject, which it seems to me absolutely necessary to bear in mind, in order to give fair play to your antagonists, and avoid misrepresenting their opinions. I think it can scarcely be unknown to you, that, whatever ignorant and superstitious Roman Catholics may believe upon the subject of saintly miraculous stories, the educated classes, whether clergy or laity, consider them as mere pious legends, written for the purpose of edifying the people, as many modern writers compose acknowledged works of fiction of a religious character, which no one that is not very simple ever supposes to have actually occurred, exactly as it is narrated. Mr. Newman, in his sermon on Development, preached before the University of Oxford, before he became reconciled to the Church of Rome, explains, better than I am able to do, this important matter.

"Mythical representations, at least in their better form, may be considered facts and narratives, untrue, but like the truth, intended to bring out the action of some principal point of character, and the like. For instance, the tradition that St. Ignatius was the child whom our Lord took in his arms, may be unfounded; but it realizes to us his special relation to Christ and His apostles, with a keenness peculiar to itself. The same remark may be made upon certain narratives of martyrdom, or of the details of such narratives, or of certain alleged miracles, or heroic acts, or speeches, all of which are the spontaneous produce of religious feeling under imperfect knowledge. If the alleged facts did not occur, they ought to have occurred (if I may so speak); they are such as might have occurred, and would have occurred under circumstances; and they belong to the parties to whom they are attributed, potentially, if not actually; or the like of them did occur; or occurred to others similarly circumstanced, though not to those very persons."

You see, therefore, sir, that all intelligent Roman Catholics do not treat as matters of faith, but as myths or legends invented by pious writers to edify men of imperfect knowledge, many of the wonderful narratives handed down to us by our mediæval ancestors; and that it would be very uncandid to assert, that every one who embraces the faith of Rome must necessarily credit every myth or legend which pious ingenuity has composed for the edification of the more ignorant classes, who are, perhaps, incapable of appreciating more solid reasoning or historical evidence. As you seem to pique yourself on giving fair play to both sides, I hope you will not refuse to insert this letter.

Yours, &c.,
A LOVER OF FAIR PLAY.

We are always sincerely anxious not to misrepresent our opponents, or to attribute to them a belief of anything which they repudiate; and we readily, therefore, insert, in our paper, the foregoing letter.

We doubt, however, very much whether Father Newman's defence of "mythical representations," or "alleged miracles," is such, as our correspondent can safely rely on as one approved of or sanctioned by the Roman Catholic Church.

We are aware that Mr. Newman has written what our correspondent has quoted; and in the preface to the "Lives of the English Saints," published under his sanction, and which preface is, we believe, written by himself, and signed with his initials, we find a similar doctrine thus expressed—

"The question will naturally suggest itself to the reader, whether the miracles recorded in these narratives, especially those contained in the life of St. Walburga, are to be received as matters of fact; and, in this day, and under our present circumstances, we can only reply, that there is no reason why they should not be. They are the kind of facts proper to ecclesiastical history, just as instances of sagacity and daring, personal prowess or crime are the facts proper to secular history."

Thus, if we are to believe Mr. Newman, it is lawful to ascribe miracles to the saints, on any the slightest foundation, or on none whatever, merely because "they are the kind of facts proper to ecclesiastical history;" and if they did not occur, yet they ought to have occurred, "and belong to the parties to whom they are attributed, potentially, if not actually"—propositions which we boldly assert to be as destructive to piety and religion, as incompatible with correct notions of truth.

We think we cannot too strongly protest against such an attempt to escape from the difficulties of Protestant objections, by a mode of argument which, if permitted, would allow fictions and historical facts to be propagated indiscriminately, at the pleasure of the inventor.

Were we to deal with solemnly-told miraculous stories, not as facts, but as merely mythic legends, and admit it to be a lawful exercise of imagination to invent, in the absence of history, and to relate, as facts, anything which, according to the writer's notions of fitness or congruity, might, or could, or should have happened, we should consider ourselves tampering with truth, in a manner which could not fail to tend to the most disastrous consequences.

To assent to Mr. Newman's doctrine that "miracles" are among the matters which may be lawfully ascribed to the hero of a legend, though they had no foundation in fact, because, "if the alleged facts did not occur they ought to have occurred," would be nothing less than to recognise the principle, that falsehood may be innocently used to propagate religion—a doctrine which would undermine all belief in any religious truth based on human testimony.

We can see no similarity, whatever, between writers of acknowledged fiction and of such pseudo-histories, which ought to be kept as distinct from one another as the region of serious history is from that of poetical romance. The latter never claims our belief, or misleads any one. The pleasure it affords is simply as a work of fiction and imagination. The pleasure of history solely consists in its truth. Let any one find it stated at the close of a saintly legend that none of the miraculous stories therein related really occurred, but that they were mere imaginary descriptions of what might or ought to have occurred, but, in point of fact, never did occur, and the reader would at once throw down the book in disgust, and not, perhaps, without a feeling of anger at having been thus trifled with. The whole charm, in fact, of such stories consists in their real or supposed truth. The moment the cheat is discovered the mind revolts at the profaneness of the story. How can one say a miracle ought to have occurred without implying that the Almighty ought to have worked it? and who shall dare to say what the Almighty ought or ought not to do? To relate a miracle as a matter of fact, merely to embellish a narrative or give dignity to a hero, is neither more nor less than to assert that the Almighty has done a certain act (an act which no other person could do) without having any reason for believing that He has done it; a degree of profaneness, which none, we think, can be guilty of without the risk of undermining his own belief and the belief of others in the whole Gospel history.

If it were harmless in modern writers to invent fictitious miracles in a credulous age, to give sanctity to superstition, how are we to know that good men may not also have imposed a false revelation on the world?

We cannot help questioning whether men, who, like Mr. Newman, would sanction such absurd figments as calculated to promote piety, do really believe the evangelical history a whit more firmly than they believe those legends?

To those who believe, and teach it as a part of their system, that one is at liberty to give a colour and sacredness to their mythic legends by fictitious imitations of the miracles of the Holy Scriptures, we can easily understand that it might appear to be a high and saint-like exercise of Christian piety and devotion, to allow the imagination a similar license with regard to the life, and actions, and miracles of the Lord himself, and to use the facts recorded in the Gospel as the basis of a legend and a myth. It is but one step further in this natural progress of error and disregard of truth, to represent the Gospel history itself as nothing more than a myth or legend. For men who think at all, must perceive that, if it be lawful to take such liberties with truth now, it was just as lawful eighteen hundred years ago. If men may construct a myth now, it was as competent for the apostles and primitive Christians to do so then. There is, in fact, but one step, and a very brief one, between such teaching and the worst species of German Neologianism.§ Mr. Newman and others may stop at the point of error they have already reached; but if such positions and maxims be allowed to take root and spread, their disciples will, in all human probability, become Neologians, if not infidels.

CHRIST AND HIS PEOPLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—In your number for September, page 107, there is an article with the above heading, and signed by a Mr. Roberts, calling upon any Roman Catholic "to explain whether Christ is in purgatory now or not; and if He is not, why it is that 'the members' are separated from 'the body' of Christ, and go to purgatory?"

Were it not that the letter is now before the public, it would be difficult to imagine that any man possessing common sense would put forth such as argument; but that it is looked upon as argument I may assume from the fact of its receiving insertion in THE LAYMAN, and shall, therefore, crave space in your paper for a few remarks upon it. His first argument is—"Christ and His people are united: they are one;" and his fertile imagination draws a conclusion, that if His people are in purgatory, Christ must be there also. Does Mr. R. believe that Christ's people are on earth? if so, according to his own logic, Christ is on earth, and people need not protest so loudly against transubstantiation. But if Christ's people be not separated from Him by being on earth; and if Christ, though in heaven, be united to His people here, why may not His people in purgatory be united to Him. If the space between earth and heaven does not prevent such union, no more does the space between purgatory and heaven. Again—"The thief on the cross was, no doubt, one of Christ's people, and we may take him as a type of the whole body of believers dying with Christ; and Christ's words show that where He is His people are also." What authority, I ask, has Mr. Roberts for taking the thief as a type of Christ's people? On the contrary, his repentance and death were under very peculiar circumstances—at a moment when the sins of the world were cancelled by the Saviour's blood, and before there was time for his falling again into transgression; so that, suppose the words of Christ to prove that the thief went to heaven on that day (which cannot be shown, inasmuch as Christ himself did not go to heaven on that day, as appears from John xx. 17, where He says, "touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father)"—suppose this to be the case, it does not follow that all Christ's people go there immediately after death. One can hardly repress a smile at Mr. Roberts' paraphrase of the passage in the 8th of Romans—"Nothing shall separate us from Christ, not even death." Mr. Roberts should have seen that it is not separation from Christ, but a separation from the love of Christ, which is spoken of. The meaning of the Apostle is, that none of those things which he enumerates in verses 35, 38, 39, should prevent his loving Christ; and to this truth every Roman Catholic subscribes; and, I might add, that not even purgatory, frightful though it may appear to Mr. Roberts, will hinder the Roman Catholic loving Christ.

From the above remarks, I think it plain that the question, "whether Christ be in purgatory because His people are there," is simply absurd.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
CATHOLIC.

Nothing gives us greater satisfaction than to receive proof, from time to time, that Roman Catholics are carefully watching our Journal, to lay hold on anything which they can answer; because this shows that Roman Catholics must feel the force of what they do not answer.

On considering the contents of our last number, we think there were many things in it which the intelligent writer of the above letter would have thought it better worth his while to answer if he could have done so. We trust he feels the force of the arguments which he does not answer.

Considering the nature of the letters which we publish from time to time, we think it must be evident to every reader that the conductors of this Journal are not responsible for the opinions and arguments contained in the letters which they publish.

Our object is to promote discussion. We open our pages to all sides. Any letter which leads to discussion has a fair claim to a place in our pages. We are always slow to reject a letter, especially if it be short.

We think Mr. Roberts' letter raised a fair question for discussion as to the relation which exists between Christ and His people in purgatory—supposing them to be there. With that view we published it; and we think it is not sufficiently answered by saying that his question is "simply absurd."

Our Saviour's prayers for His disciples contained these words, "Father, I will that they also, whom Thou hast given me, be with me where I am"—(John xvii, 24). We think it quite fair to ask, how is this performed to those in purgatory, if Christ be not in purgatory? and we would suggest to the writer of the above letter to try and give it some better answer.

We trust our correspondent will not suppose that by publishing his letter we become responsible for the arguments contained in it; even for those that we do not refute or discuss. His letter promotes discussion, and we therefore publish it; and we hope this will induce him to write to us again.

THE PROTESTANT'S PURGATORY.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.)

MR. EDITOR—As we were going home last night after the day's work, who should we meet but the Reader that I told you about in my last letter. As soon as we met him the boys began to argue with him, and says Jerry, "Don't you, Protestants, say that you'll believe anything that we can bring Scripture for?" "Yes," says the Reader, "we'll believe whatever can be proved out of Scripture." "Well, then," says Jerry, "why don't you believe in a Purgatory for cleansing the soul and taking away the stains of sin?" "Why," says the Reader, "I do believe in a Purgatory for cleansing sin, but I don't know whether it's the same as your Purgatory." "Well," says the boys, "tell us what kind is your Purgatory." "I will," says the Reader, and with that he pulled out the Douay Testament, and read for us these verses—"God, who at sundry times and in divers manners, spoke in times past to the fathers by the prophets, last of all in these days hath spoken to us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the world, who being the brightness of his glory, and the figure of his substance, and upholding all things by the word of his power, making purgation of sins, sitteth on the right hand of the Majesty on high."* "Now," says the Reader, "this tells us that it's our Lord Jesus Christ that maketh purgation of sins, that is (as the note in the Douay explains it) purges away our sins by his passion; and," says he, "here's another text—'So also Christ was offered once to exhaust the sins of many.'† And," says he, "listen to the note your Church puts to this verse—'To exhaust, that is to empty or draw out to the very bottom by a plentiful and perfect redemption.' And," says he, "I'll give you one more text—'If we walk in the light as he also is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.'‡ Now," says he, "there's the Protestant's Purgatory; there's what we trust to for cleansing our sins; we believe that our blessed Lord purges away his people's sins; we believe that he was offered on the cross to exhaust the sins of many; we believe that his precious blood cleanseth from all sin, and we find this in the Roman Catholic Bible as well as in the Protestant Bible. And," says he, "boys, I think you must allow that mine is a good purgatory for cleansing away sins; and now," says he, "tell me what kind is yours." "Well," says Jerry, "I can't deny that yours sounds very well, but," says he, "our Purgatory is very different; it's a place or state of punishment in the other life where some souls suffer for a time before they can go to Heaven.'"§ "Well," says the Reader, "I don't like that Purgatory at all; for," says he, "I thought that our Lord Jesus Christ suffered the punishment on the cross that was due to sin, and I thought that his people would be let off of the punishment, because he took their place and suffered in their stead; and," says he, "isn't this what the Douay Bible says—'He was wounded for our iniquities, he was bruised for our sins, the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and by his bruises we are healed.'‖ And," says the Reader, "do you think that God would come down on us and punish us, after our blessed Lord had borne the punishment in our place? Sure," says he, "if a friend paid your rent, the master wouldn't come down on you and ask for the rent a second time; and," says he, "Christ paid the debt that was due on account of our sins, and God won't ask it a second time from any of Christ's people. But," says he, "tell us something more about this Purgatory of yours; who are them that go there?" "Well," says Jerry, "since it's a place of punishment, of course it's the bad people go there?" "Arra, hold your tongue," says Andy Kelly, the priest's schoolmaster, "sure," says he, "you're going against the doctrines of our Church entirely; for," says he, "'tisn't the bad people go there at all, they go straight to Hell; but," says he, "the Catechism of the Council of Trent tells us that, 'tis the souls of the pious people that go there."* "Why, then," says the Reader, "'tis the queer place to send the pious people; and," says he, "I thought the pious people went to Heaven; for," says he, "I thought their sins were blotted out by the blood of Christ." "Well," says Andy, "their mortal sins are blotted out, but their venial sins are left to be worked out in Purgatory." "Well," says the Reader, "that's the most curious thing I ever heard; for," says he, "I thought 'twould be harder to get rid of the mortal sins than the venial ones; and still," says he, "you tell me that although the blood of Christ will get out the mortal sins, it can't get out the venial ones at all; and," says he, "I don't know how to believe that; and," says he, again, "isn't your Purgatory good for any but venial sins?" "Well, never that I heard of," says Andy. "And," says the Reader, "isn't it any good for the mortal sins?" "No," says he; "for those who die in mortal sin go to Hell for all eternity." "Why then," says the Reader, "I don't think your Purgatory is good for much; for," says he, "even by your own account 'tis only good for venial sins; now," says he, "my Purgatory is good for mortal as well as venial sins; for," says he, "it cleanseth from all sin; every sin," says he, "both big and little can be cleansed by the blood of Christ; and," says he, "unless you have something more to say for your Purgatory, I'll stick to my own." "Well," says Jerry, "it seems you don't like ours; but," says he, "may be you'll go farther and fare worse!" Well, the boys had a great laugh at the Reader, and indeed he took it very good-humoured. "Aud," says he, "at all events let us hear something more about it, what's the punishment," says he, "that the pious souls suffer there?" "Well," says Jerry, "Father John told us that in his sermon last Sunday. He was warning us to lose no time in seeing after the souls of all belonging to us, and says he, boys, won't you do anything for the souls of your decent parents, to try and have them out by Christmas day at least, and says he, remember the place they're in—in the middle of a terrible fire, as hot as Tom Hurley's big oven." "And so it ought," says the Reader, "for it's there he makes his bread!" Well, sir, the boys then turned the laugh on Jerry, but Andy came to his help, and says he, "Father John didn't say a word about an oven, he only said that 'twas a terrible big fire." "Troth then," says the Reader, "that's the fire that makes his pot boil!" Well, the Reader had the laugh against Andy entirely, more by token as Andy had paid Father John £2 the week before for the souls of some of his people. So Andy got a little vexed, and says he, "joking won't prove anything." "And moreover," says Jerry, "there's too much truth in them jokes to be pleasant." "But to stop all joking," says Andy, "I can prove our Purgatory out of the Bible." "Do so," says the Reader, "and I'll believe it myself." Well, Andy took the Douay Bible, and read for us these words. "Be at agreement with thy adversary betimes, whilst thou art in the way with him, lest perhaps the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Amen, I say to thee, thou shalt not go out from thence till thou repay the last farthing."† "Well," says the Reader, "where's Purgatory in that verse?" "Why," says Andy, "the prison is Purgatory." "Well," says the Reader, "you must be badly off for texts when you bring that forward, for," says he, "can't the word 'prison' ever mean anything but Purgatory? You remind me," says he, "of one evening that the minister was lecturing on Purgatory, and before he began he read some prayers, and among the rest that part of the Litany where we ask God to 'have pity upon all prisoners and captives.' And when we came out after the lecture, a Romanist came up to me, and says he, 'in spite of all the minister said against Purgatory, he believes in it, for,' says he, 'if he didn't believe in it, why did he pray for the souls in Purgatory.' 'He didn't do any such thing,' says I. 'He did,' says he, 'sure I heard him with my own ears pray for all prisoners and captives,' and says he, 'who could they be but the souls in Purgatory?' And I'm thinking," says the Reader, "that you're of his opinion, that there can be no prisoners but the poor souls in Purgatory. But at all events," says he, "there's not a word in the text about fire, nor a word about souls, nor a word about venial sins. And," says he, "I'll engage Father John didn't give you that text as a proof of Purgatory." "Well, he didn't," says Andy, "but why wouldn't he give it if he thought of it?" "Because," says the Reader, "'twould ruin his trade entirely." "How so?" says Andy. "Why," says the Reader, "how does Father John tell you the souls are to be got out?" "By masses," says Andy. "And who says the masses?" says the Reader. "The priest of course," says Andy. "Then," says the Reader, "it's the priest that gets out the souls." "To be sure it is," says Andy. "Well," says the Reader, "read your text again, and see who it is that gets the soul out." Well, Andy read again, "Amen, I say to thee, thou shalt not go out from thence till thou repay the last farthing." "Well," says the Reader, "who is 'thou'? Is it the priest?" Well, sir, Andy seemed as if he was stunned, and not a word out of his lips; but the Reader stuck to him, until he had to allow that "thou" meant the soul himself, and not the priest at all. Well, the boys were greatly astonished, and says Jerry, "often as I read that verse I never seen before that 'tis the soul himself must work out its own sins." "Well, you see now," says the Reader, "that if that text proves Purgatory, it proves that neither masses, nor priests, nor money, can get out a soul; but that he must suffer there until he has worked out the last farthing." "And," says Jerry, "if that's the way, we're fools to be spending our hard-earned money in masses, when they can't do a bit of good for the poor souls; and," says he, "it's true for the Reader, Father John wouldn't give us that text, for 'twould spoil his own market." With that, the boys began counting up all the money they had paid for masses, and says they, "we're sold entirely if that text means Purgatory." And, says Mike Flinn, "I pawned the blankets from under the children to pay Father John for getting out my mother's soul, and," says he, "I didn't grudge the money, for it's she was the good mother to me, and," says he, "it's good reason I had to spend the last penny I could raise if it would give her peace and rest; but," says he, "'tis what frets me entirely is to think, that may be she's in Purgatory still, burning away until she works out the last farthing; and," says he, "if that's the case, I might as well have left the poor children the blankets, and the cold winter coming on." "Well," says Andy, "perhaps after all, that text doesn't mean Purgatory; more by token, as Father John didn't mention it in his sermon, but says he, "I've other texts that will do as well." "Let us hear them," says the Reader. So with that Andy read out the text in St. Peter's epistle "Because Christ also died once for our sins, the just for the unjust, that he might offer us to God, being put to death indeed in the flesh, but enlivened in the spirit, in which also coming, he preached to those spirits that were in prison, which had been some time incredulous, when they waited for the patience of God in the days of Noe, when the ark was a-building."‡ "Well," says the Reader, "there's the prison certainly, if that will do anything for you, but there isn't a word about the big fire, nor about masses getting them out." "Never mind that," says Andy, "for so sure as three angles of a triangle are together equal to two right angles, so surely I'll prove that these three verses are equal to Purgatory." "Stop a minute," says Jerry, "I've got Dr. Butler's catechism that the children learn out of, and he doesn't bring that text to prove Purgatory at all, but to prove Limbo."§ "Arra, hold your tongue, you omadawn," says Andy, "sure Keenan's catechism says that this text proves Purgatory."‖ "I don't care what it says," says Jerry, "I'll hold by Dr. Butler, who was a greater man than ever Keenan was, and his catechism is recommended by the four Roman Catholic archbishops of Ireland;" and, boys," says he, "do you think it likely that they'd be wrong?" Well the boys allowed that Butler's catechism must be the right one, seeing that it was backed by the four archbishops. But Andy wouldn't give in a peg, and says he, "I've the four bishops of Scotland to back Keenan, and here's their names in the first page," and says he, "do you think they're wrong?" Well, sir, we didn't know what to say after that, for Butler had the four Irish bishops, and Keenan had the four Scotch bishops, and one said the text meant Limbo, and the other said it meant Purgatory, so we were in a regular fix; and worse than all, the Reader was laughing at us, and says he, "Take it easy, boys, don't get into a passion about it, 'fair play for ever,'" and he grinning at us all the time. But at length Mick starts up, "And," says he, "boys, may be it's all about nothing you're disputing, for perhaps," says he, "Limbo and Purgatory are all one. May be Limbo is the Latin for Purgatory." Well the boys were greatly pleased at this, but the Reader turns to Jerry, and says he, "What sort of a place does the catechism say that Purgatory is?" "A place or state of punishment,"† says Jerry. "And what kind of a place does it say that Limbo is?" "A place or state of rest,"‡ says Jerry. "Well," says he, "they can't both be the same place, seeing that one is a place of punishment, and the other a place of rest." Well, the boys were fairly puzzled to know what to make of it, and the Reader turned to us, and says he, "I think you ought to settle it between yourselves before you bring it to Protestants, for," says he "it looks very queer to have four bishops on one side, and four on the other, and," says he, "some of them must be wrong." "Troth then," says Jerry, "I wouldn't wonder if they were all wrong, and," says he, "may be it doesn't mean either Limbo or Purgatory." "I'm thinking you're not far out," says the Reader, "and," says he, "you must bring some better texts if you wish to prove your Purgatory." Well, Andy was regularly choppfallen, the stuffening was quite taken out of him, and says he, "I can't stay any longer to-night, but the next time we meet I'll have other texts for you," and with that he left us. The Reader then turned to us, and says he, "Boys, I'll stick to the Protestant Purgatory, and if you'd take my advice you'd do the same, at all events until you find a better. Remember," says he, "that even if your Purgatory were true, 'twould only cleanse you from venial sins, while my Purgatory," says he, "the precious blood of Christ, cleanseth from all sin, mortal and venial, big and little, all are washed out in his blood. What does the Douay Bible say? 'If your sins be as scarlet, they shall be made as white as snow, and if they be red as crimson, they shall be white as wool.'" So with that he wished us good night, and turned up the boreen that leads to his house.

Your humble servant to command,

Dan Carthy.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR OCTOBER.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

The very fine weather we are at present enjoying, and the dry state of the land, should induce our farmers to exertion, in thoroughly cleaning their stubble land, particularly that intended for green crops next season, for large holders, with abundance of horse-power to work it effectively, we do not know a better implement than the improved Bentall's broadshare; it completely cuts the weeds at any distance, at pleasure, from 3 to 9 or 10 inches under the surface, without disturbing it; on the application of the harrows the weeds are brought to the surface, which are then readily gathered by the horse rake, and left in rows to be carried off. For small occupants, a very suitable implement is a sort of plough with a broad share, armed with upright cutters, invented by the late Rev. T. D. La Touche, and exhibited at several of our shows, of which a model has been presented to the Royal Dublin Society, and may be seen now in their Agricultural Museum, as also that of a novel and suitable harrow to follow it.

Wheat sowing should be concluded this month on land that has been fallowed, or after clover, peas, beans, summer vetches, or potatoes. Much care should be taken in the selection of the seed, which should be got at some distance from home, and thoroughly cleansed of any seeds of weeds found mixed with it; and, as a precaution against smut, steeped in some of the steeps mentioned in our last impression.

Winter Beans should be sown by the middle of the month, in well cleaned, deeply ploughed, and well manured land; they may be sown broadcast in ridges, or in drills, 2½ feet apart, if the land be free from wet during the winter; sown at this time they come early to harvest, and are an excellent preparatory crop for wheat the ensuing season.

Winter Vetches, to be able to withstand the winter wet and frosts, should be sown early in the month 4 bushels, mixed with 3 or 4 stones of winter oats or rye, are sufficient for an Irish acre, sown in beds or ridges 8 feet wide, and the furrows well shovelled up; to insure good crops the land should be liberally manured.

Rye is also an excellent early soiling crop, if sown in ridges at the rate of 16 to 18 stones to the Irish acre, it is also an excellent feeding crop for ewes and lambs, to which it affords an early bite, when sown on stubble land and lightly ploughed in.

Bere should be sown some time during the month, after potatoes; it comes in early, generally about the middle or end of July, in time to afford new bread to the harvesters.

Peas, if the land be sufficiently dry and warm, may be sown in limited quantity; if they escape through the winter they will come in early; but the best time to sow the general crop will be by the end of February, or early in March.

Parsnips, when sown by the middle of this month, come in early, and yield the best roots and heaviest crop. The land should be well and deeply tilled, and well manured. If the land is sound and dry sow in drills, 28 inches apart; if inclined to damp, it will be safest to sow in ridges, in which they may also be drilled at the same distance; 6 lbs. of seed will be ample for an Irish acre.

Cabbages, to come in early, should be finally planted out this month; they require well-tilled and well-manured soil; plant in rows two feet apart, and one foot plant from plant in the rows; it is a good and economical plan after planting the cabbages, to sow parsnips midway between the rows; the cabbages will be off the land before they can be injurious to the parsnips.

Potatoes, of the early sorts, may be planted this month, either in drills, if the land be dry—or in ridges, if inclined to damp; they require a liberal manuring, and six inches of cover, at least, to ward off the injurious effects of frost.

Pigs.—Sows should now be put to the brawn, to have litters early next spring, and store pigs should be put up to fatten.

Important Work on Controversy.

Just ready.

THE "CONTROVERSIAL CORRESPONDENCE,"

This correspondence, conducted with great ability on both sides, has, terminated by the withdrawal of the Rev. Mr. Maclachlan from the contest, who has republished the whole of his letters, WITHOUT THOSE OF MR. KENNARD! As such a proceeding is evidently unfair, and calculated to be productive of mischievous results, if not counteracted, the entire correspondence, consisting of about 70 letters, is in course of publication, so that the nature of the Controversy may now be thoroughly understood by all parties.

Dr. Irving writes—"This is a remarkable publication. Mr. Maclachlan is sufficiently skilled in the Romish arts of controversy; but in logical dexterity, and even in theological learning, the priest is no match for the Protestant layman."

The Rev. John Evans writes—"This correspondence furnishes decidedly the best Handbook of the Romish Controversy yet extant."

The Venerable Dr. Croly says of Mr. Kennard's letters—"I sincerely admire their learning, reasoning, and spirit of Christianity; and I know of no production fitter to produce a more ample assurance in the mind of any man open to rational conviction." It has also been characterized as the "most important controversy that has taken place since the days of Stillingfleet."

The Controversy embraces the modern arguments of Romanists, having reference more particularly to History than Doctrine; and the Book will form an excellent companion to Dr. Cumming's Controversy with Mr. French, known as the Hammersmith Discussion, which is exclusively Doctrinal.

The Work is now publishing in one Volume, Demy 8vo, and will contain above 700 pages, with a copious and useful Index. Price 5s. to SUBSCRIBERS ONLY.

PILGRIMAGE FROM THE ALPS TO THE TIBER;

OR, THE INFLUENCE OF ROMANISM ON TRADE, JUSTICE, AND KNOWLEDGE.

By the Rev. J. A. WYLIE, LL.D., Author of "Modern Judea;" "Scenes from the Bible," &c.

"This is a remarkable book. Its descriptions are literally fascinating. The great scenery of Italy has been painted by tourists since the days of antiquity, but the sketches of Dr. Wylie possess a freshness and an interest peculiar to the author; and it is no exaggeration to say that many of these sketches, in relation even to familiar objects, are surpassed by no similar descriptions in the English language. . . . Dr. Wylie's book administers to the Roman Papacy a deadlier blow by far than any merely theological disquisition could have inflicted, and for this paramount reason, that its social workings are here exhibited in the shape of undeniable, terrible facts."

"After an interval of many years, Dr. Wylie has brought the old town (Rome) as vividly, and more truthfully, before our eyes than Robert's great picture in this year's exhibition."

"We do not think that from any book of travels we ever read, we gathered more exquisite and vivid pictures of the scenes through which he passed than from Dr. Wylie's."

"The production of a man who, with one shrewd Presbyterian eye upon the moral and religious features of the country in which he travelled, has kept the other fully open to the charms of nature and of art, the records of departed glory, and the imperishable beauties of the living world."

THE BLESSED CORNELIUS.

Archbishops write books only on great occasions.

We have now before us a book, just published, called "THE BLESSED CORNELIUS;" or Some Tidings of an Archbishop of Armagh who went to Rome in the 12th century and did not return; the title page of which tells us (in bold defiance of the statute in that case made and provided), that it was written by the most Rev. Joseph Dixon, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland.* It is a learned work on the thigh-bone of one of his predecessors.

In the Catholic Layman for October, 1854 (p. 117), we called on Dr. Dixon, or any one else who believes him the successor of the ancient Archbishops of Ireland, to give the list of his succession, which we undertook to publish. In October, 1855 (p. 112), we pointed to the fact that, during a whole year, no one had attempted to produce such a list. We now find that Dr. Dixon has been looking for his predecessors during that year; and here is the result. Instead of a succession, which he has not to show, he makes a flourish with a thigh-bone, which he has certainly got, but which, we think, is not the thigh-bone of the man whom he supposes to have been the owner.

We take the account of this important discovery from Dr. Dixon's book. In chapter xi., p. 68, he tells us "how I came to hear of the blessed Cornelius." All he had ever heard of him before is comprised in this sentence from the "Annals of the Four Masters," one of the highest authorities in Irish history. Under the date 1175, they say—"Connor (Cornelius) Mac Concoilleadh, Abbot of St. Peter and St. Paul's, and afterwards Coarb of St. Patrick (Archbishop of Armagh), died at Rome, whither he had gone to confer with the successor of St. Peter."† All the best Irish authorities agree in this account—viz.: Lanigan, Ecclesiastical History, vol. iv. p. 220 and 229;‡ Colgan, Trias Thaumaturga, who calls him Conchovar; Ware on Irish Bishops, who calls him Concobar. All these authorities give the same account as the Four Masters; and, beyond this, nothing was known of Cornelius by Dr. Dixon or any one else.§ However, when Dr. Dixon was at Rome, in December, 1854, where he had gone to help in making the new article of faith, he happened to see, in a newspaper, a statement that "St. Concord," whose bones are kept in a glass case, on the altar of the Church of Lemenc, at Chambery, in Savoy, was the identical Cornelius of Armagh, who had been so long missing.

In December, 1854, Dr. Dixon received from the bishop of St. Maurienne, in Savoy, an account of this Cornelius, or Concord, asking for more information about his life in Ireland, and offering to give a piece of his remains to Dr. Dixon. In consequence of this document, Dr. Dixon resolved to go home by Chambery, and get his prize to bring to Armagh.

Dr. Dixon thus describes (p. 68) the state in which he found the saint:—"For a long time his holy relics had reposed in a poor walnut shrine, and were covered with still poorer ornaments, when, on the occasion of repairing the church, the happy idea was adopted of replacing this precious treasure in a more suitable state. The wretched panel which formed the front of the shrine was replaced with a handsome plate glass; and, thanks to the zeal of several pious persons, the holy bishop is richly adorned. On Saturday, July 1st, 1854, he was replaced upon his altar."

A pamphlet written by Count Firnex on that occasion, and inserted in Dr. Dixon's book (p. 78), gives this account of what was done:—"Some months had elapsed since the relics were brought from Rome, where they have been recognized and authenticated by the venerable prelate who is charged to perform this duty. For this purpose documents had been forwarded to the Eternal City, relative to the life of this Saint and the veneration in which he is held by all in this country, in virtue of the authorization of the Holy See; and they were found so interesting that, to enter on a closer examination, they have gone so far as to open the head of this revered body. God has, doubtless, permitted this minute investigation in order to manifest more clearly the glory of his servant, for, in the interior portion of this sacred part of the relics, which have been for nearly seven centuries entombed (on the altar?) the brain was found hard and still coloured with blood, though it is well known that this organ is of a soft nature, and is consumed in ordinary bodies in a very short space of time. Struck by this discovery, the Roman Examiner before whom the operation had been made, availing himself of his right to some portion of the holy relics, wished to retain this part, but the Rev. Father Alphonse, Capuchio, charged with the commission, having insisted on his making choice of some other portion, the interesting part was returned to increase the treasure of Lemenc, where it is enshrined apart in a silver reliquary." (p. 78).*

Count Firnex proceeds (p. 80) to describe the dress:—"The saint's body is apparelled in mitre and chasuble, the latter cut in an antique form, and its texture is like that of the other accessories, of white silk, embroidered with gold. The alb appears to be beautifully worked; and the cushion that supports the head is of red damask, trimmed with gold fringe. The pallium is spread out near the mitre. In a word, all connected with the apparel shows a perfect coincidence with the most approved taste."

We feel satisfied that no Paris milliner could have done it better. Dr. Dixon evidently found the saint "in full fig." certainly he had been grossly neglected before, but it was well-arranged that the saint should be "new done up" for the important part he is henceforward to act, and that just in the nick of time to receive Dr. Dixon.

Dr. Dixon then relates his arrival and his reception at Chambery, and how "the devout throng had assembled to see the successor of the Blessed Concord, at a distance of 700 years from his time, saying mass at his altar." (p. 74). Dr. Dixon then went to the monastery where S. Concord died. "From this house we went to visit the convent of the Carmelite nuns: this community, too, had a special interest for us. To these good nuns had been committed the office of dressing (and of undressing, as it seems) the blessed Concord in the new Pontifical ornaments which he now wore. They had also been good enough to prepare, in a beautiful case, a SMALL relic of the holy man, intended as a present for the church of Armagh. But now they were about to establish the strongest claim of all on our gratitude, by taking the trouble—and it was no slight trouble—to undress the saint, and procure for us the bone of the thigh, that we might thus have a CONSIDERABLE relic to bring to Armagh. All this was to be done privately, that the people of the parish might not be generally aware of what had happened; for, great as was their respect for the successor of the blessed Concord (that's himself), they would hardly have endured to see so much of the bones of their revered patron and protector carried away from them. May God reward those good daughters of St. Teresa for their trouble. One good nun rose from her sick bed, where she had been confined for a month, to take a share in it" (p. 74, 75).

This narrative calls for some observations from us. 1. We think Dr. Dixon plumes himself too much on so petty a larceny. If Dr. Dixon were worth anything—and if the "blessed Cornelius" were worth anything, too—the doctor should have had him body and bones. 2. We think Dr. Dixon exaggerates the risk of the larceny. We cannot suppose that Dr. Dixon, having got his own bones safe in a distant country, would expose these poor nuns to the fury of a deceived and injured populace, it would be a base return for kindness—but since Dr. Dixon has not scrupled to expose them in a book, which will, of course, be popular at Chambery, we trust that the danger is imaginary.

What Dr. Dixon did carry off is safely lodged—"the portion of the rib at the presentation convent in Drogheda, and the bone of the thigh at the convent of the SACRED HEART, Armagh" (p. 104). It might have been more suitable to have placed the rib at the heart, but this, of course, is only temporary. Before long there will be a grand religious display, on occasion of placing the bones on the altar of God.

The object of bringing home these bones is thus pointed at: "I have applied to the Sacred Congregation of Rites in Rome for permission to have his office celebrated in the diocese of Armagh, under the same rite as at Chambery" (p. 104). That permission will, of course, be granted: the bones of Cornelius are to be an object of "veneration," and Cornelius himself is to be "worshipped."

Roman Catholics sometimes try to justify the worship of Saints by saying, "we do not pray to them; we only ask them to pray for us." This idle distinction is not to be observed in the worship of Cornelius. Dr. Dixon gives in his book a "PRAYER TO ST. CONCORD," which runs thus, "Oh, glorious St. Concord, ... I come profoundly humbled, to prostrate myself at thy feet, to obtain, through thy powerful protection (not intercession) a grace very necessary for the salvation of my soul [here the particular favour which one seeks is specified]. Draw me from this urgent peril, and give me the courage and strength necessary to overcome the attack of the enemy who seeks my destruction and eternal damnation, &c" (p. 104). Here St. Concord is asked himself to give and to do the things prayed for. There is not a word in the prayer, asking him to pray to God for the things required. So the Irish Roman Catholics are to be taught to pray to St. Concord, that He will save them from the devil and damnation.

At the end of the Introduction (p. xiii), Dr. Dixon acknowledges that Cornelius has not been canonized by the Pope. Yet, in page 104, Dr. Dixon teaches men to offer actual prayer to Cornelius. We have hitherto thought that Roman Catholics were allowed to pray only to Saints who have been canonized by the Pope. Such a precaution would seem only reasonable; for, surely, if men want infallible direction in anything, they should have it concerning the object of prayer. But, it seems we were wrong: Roman Catholics are taught by Dr. Dixon to pray not only to canonized Saints, but to dead men who have not been canonized. It, therefore, becomes a question of the highest interest—what degree of proof or certainty Roman Catholics have that the objects of their worship, and the beings they pray to, are really right ones. We have, therefore, to examine the documents on which Dr. Dixon relies for his facts about Cornelius, which facts, be it observed, are these:—1. That Concord of Chambery and Cornelius of Armagh are the same person. 2. That miracles have been worked by his bones since the time of his death.

THE DOCUMENTS.

Dr. Dixon produces—

1. An extract from a newspaper (p. 68).
2. A communication from the Bishop of St. Maurienne in Savoy, written in December, 1854 (p. 69).
3. A pamphlet called, "A Tribute to the blessed Cornelius, written in July, 1854, by Count Firnex, of which Dr. Dixon publishes part, but not the whole" (p. 77).
4. A life of St. Concord, printed in Chambery, in [illegible]. Dr. Dixon professes to give some facts from this life, but he does not publish the life itself (p. 99).

* Published by James Duffy, 7, Wellington-quay, Dublin, 1855.
† Ed. Connellan, Dublin, 1846, p. 10. ‡ Ed. Dublin, 1822.
§ Dr. Dixon himself says—"Here we have an Archbishop of Armagh, of whose life his country has preserved no details, and with the place of whose death it has been hitherto unacquainted."—Introduction, p. 10. Yet at p. 104, Dr. Dixon tells us that, 300 years ago, the people of Chambery wrote to Hugh O'Reilly, then Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh, telling him all about it.

* This passage throws light on the practice at Rome about relics. Dr. Dixon, by producing it, gives it authority. There is a Bishop at Rome whose business it is to judge of the genuineness of relics. A post-mortem examination is made. It will appear that very little documentary proof is required; the surgical evidence appears to be chiefly relied on; though we think it would puzzle the College of Surgeons to ascertain the former state of a man's soul by an anatomical examination of his bones. The operator is probably a surgeon, and he seems to be paid by choice bits, which we suppose sell well.

5. An extract from a letter of Ferrandus to Bollandus, in 1653, with a note by Papebroch (p. 116); with a hymn to St. Concord (p. 106); all taken from the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists.

Dr. Dixon tells us of other documents, which, he says, do exist, but which he does not publish in his book. I. Dr. Dixon tells us (p. 101, 102, and note to 103) that a bull was issued by Pope Clement X. in the year 1671, establishing a confraternity of St. Concord, at Chambery. Dr. Dixon does not insert this bull in his book; for which we imagine he had an excellent reason.* 2. The pamphlet of Count Firnex, which Dr. Dixon publishes (p. 78), tells us, "Some months have elapsed since the relics were brought from Rome, where they have been recognised and authenticated by the venerable prelate who is charged to perform this duty. For this purpose, documents had been forwarded to the eternal city, relative to the life of this Saint." It would have been most interesting to have seen the documents on which the relics of St. Concord were officially pronounced authentic. But Dr. Dixon does not produce these documents. 3. Some document must have been issued by the venerable prelate, charged with the duty of authenticating the relics. But Dr. Dixon does not produce that document. 4. Dr. Dixon might have published the life of St. Concord, which he says was printed in 1809, and which he says he has got. But he does not publish it, but only tells us something out of it.

In the introduction, p. viii., Dr. Dixon says: "And whereas the details of the history of this Archbishop are but scanty, as far as I could discover, I was obliged to introduce some other subject in order to give anything like the dimensions of a book to this publication." That, under such circumstances, Dr. Dixon should not insert the bull of Pope Clement X. and the "documents relating to the life of this saint," and even the life itself at length, gives rise to grave suspicion. The omission can only be accounted for thus:—Either these documents do not really exist; or Dr. Dixon is conscious that they would not bear examination: in other words, the case is a fraudulent case, to be established only by the suppression of truth. We can well imagine the reason of the suppression of those documents. At p. 116 Dr. Dixon produces the conjecture of Ferrandus and Papebroch in 1653, that Concord of Chambery was an Irish archbishop or bishop. In p. 103 he states that the people of Chambery, before the year 1656, wrote to Hugh O'Reilly, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh, inquiring about the history of Concord as archbishop of Armagh. How very awkward, then, to produce a bull, dated 1671, showing that the Pope at that date did not treat Concord as an Irishman at all! If the Bull had called him an Irishman, it would certainly have been produced 2. To produce the documents on which he says it was officially determined that the bones at Chambery belong to Cornelius of Armagh would have been still more awkward, since no such documents exist. 3. To produce the decree of authentication itself would have been most natural, if such a decree really exists, which we greatly doubt. 4. Dr. Dixon lets out the reason why he does not publish the life of St. Concord, printed at Chambery in 1809. It contains "some things regarding the state of the Irish Church in the days of Cornelius which have been drawn from sources not the most reliable" (p. 95). It was evidently from this pamphlet that the Bishop of St. Maurienne took his statement, and it would never have done to have exposed its blunders. So Dr. Dixon was forced to leave out all these important documents, and fill up his book about "blessed Cornelius" with sad accounts of his own sea-sickness; and of his, Dr. Dixon's, "Introduction to the Scriptures," splendidly bound by Mr. James Duffy, which the Pope very naturally observed, "as it was written in English, could be but of little service to him" (p. 6). These evident suppressions make us examine more carefully the documents which Dr. Dixon produces. The only important ones are the communication from the Bishop of St. Maurienne, and the extracts from the Bollandists. That sent by the Bishop of St. Maurienne is demonstrably inaccurate, for it makes Cornelius "one of the lights of the Councils of Cashel and Armagh, presided over by Cardinal Paparo;" whereas, Dr. Dixon himself has to confess (note, p. 96) that no trace of such council as this at Armagh can be found; and Cardinal Paparo, as every tyro in Irish history knows, had actually left Ireland twenty years before the synod of Cashel was held. Hence it appears that this document is not founded on authentic evidence, but is the production of some one grossly ignorant of Irish history.

This document betrays equal ignorance of the history of the popes—ignorance so palpable as to make it evident that forgery had been at work in the matter. We do not bring the charge of forgery against Dr. Dixon or the Bishop of St. Maurienne. Their statements are evidently taken from the "Life of St. Concord," printed at Chambery in 1809. But Dr. Dixon himself admits that this life contains things which have been drawn from sources not the most reliable (p. 95). And although labouring under a lack of material, he does not venture to publish that life. Yet he adopts statements from it which his knowledge of the history of the Papacy should have at once pointed out to him as forged. We refer to the following passage:—"Immediately afterwards, he (Cornelius) went to Rome on important business. The Pope ALEXANDER III. being made acquainted with the merit and high sanctity of this prelate, loaded him with favours and distinctions" (p. 70).

Dr. Dixon gives the following account, as from the printed life, though, not in the words of the life:—"Concord, seeing that after all his solicitude and labours in the cause of religion, there were still reforms to be made in the discipline of his Church, would not undertake these reforms without visiting Rome, and taking counsel with the Pope. He, therefore, set out for the Eternal City, where he arrived on the 16th January, 1176. We shall give the rest in the words of his biographer:—'ALEXANDER III., fully instructed regarding the piety of this bishop, immediately granted his request,'" &c., (p. 98).

Now, we are able to prove that Cornelius did not see Pope Alexander III. at Rome; neither was it to see Pope Alexander III. that he went to Rome. For this good reason—that Pope Alexander III. was not there, and Cornelius must have known that he was not there. Pope Alexander III. had fled from Rome some years before; he was certainly not at Rome in the years 1175 or 1176; and did not get back to Rome until at least two years after Cornelius was dead. And this was notorious to all the world; and, least of all, could the Irish prelates be ignorant of it, who had heard but too much of Pope Alexander III. for the last three years, as we shall see.

That Cornelius should have gone to Rome in 1175 or 1176, to see Pope Alexander III., would have been about as absurd as if Dr. Dixon had gone to Rome in 1848 to see Pope Pius IX., when all the world knew that he had fled from it.

But do not "the Four Masters," and all the best Irish historians, say that Cornelius "went to Rome, to confer with the successor of St. Peter, in 1175?" They do say so; but they do not say that it was Pope ALEXANDER III. that he went to confer with. We must explain this puzzle for our readers. If they will look back to our number for September, p. 102, they will see that there were such things as "opposition Popes," and a good many of them, too.

Now, it happens that, while Cornelius was at Rome, there were two Popes at once, as there very often were—namely, Callistus III. and Alexander III.—and CALLISTUS III. was then in possession of ROME, where Alexander III. dared not show his face. We take the facts of this schism from the learned Roman Catholic historian, Du Pin, Doctor of the Sorbonne.

Pope Adrian IV. died at Rome in 1159. Cardinal Roland was then chosen Pope at Rome, under the title of Pope Alexander III. At the same time, Octavian was also chosen Pope at Rome by others of the Cardinals, under the title of Victor III. The Emperor interfered to settle the dispute, and Alexander withdrew to Anagnia. A council of fifty archbishops and bishops met, and gave judgment in favour of Victor, as lawful Pope. In the meantime, Alexander took refuge in Sicily, till he could get away to France. He arrived in France at Easter, 1162, and at Paris 1163. Octavian died in 1164, and Guy of Crema was elected in his place, under the title of Paschal III. Alexander was recalled to Rome in 1165. Great contests and wars then followed; sometimes Alexander had possession of Rome, and sometimes Paschal; but in 1170 Alexander retired to Anagnia, and then to Benevento. About 1170, Paschal III. died in possession of Rome, and his party chose for Pope, John, Abbot of Struma, under the title of Callistus III., and the Emperor acknowledged him as Pope. "Although Alexander's affairs prospered every day more and more, the Romans could not be induced to receive him into their city, and he usually resided either at Frescati or in Campania." The Emperor, being unsuccessful in war, was obliged to come to terms with Alexander III. They met at Venice in 1177, and the Emperor agreed to abandon Pope Callistus III., and to acknowledge Alexander as Pope, and to restore him to "the Regalia of St. Peter." In the following year, 1178, he was recalled to Rome by the clergy, senate, and people of that city (Eccl. Writers, vol. ii., p. 332. ed., Dublin, 1724).

Every fact or document that we can collect confirms the proof that Pope Alexander III. was not in Rome in 1175 or 1176 (the only years in which Cornelius could have been there), but that he was residing and performing all his official acts elsewhere. In December, 1174, at Ferentinum, he granted a charter to the monastery of Palermo (Baronius, annals xii. 654). In February, 1175, at Anagnia, another charter to the same. (Idem). In March, 1175, to another monastery, at Ferentinum (Bullarium Rom. II., 435, A.D. 1746). In July, 1175, at Ferentinum, he confirmed the order of St. James in Spain (Labbe & Coss. x 1383). In October, 1175, at Anagnia, the order of St. Basil, at Messina, (Idem 1385). To two other monasteries at Anagnia, in May, 1176, (Bull. Rom. II., 440, 441). In June 1176, Baronius states that he was "residing at Anagnia," where his "consistory" was then held (Annals xii, 660). Four other charters to monasteries in June and July, 1176, at Anagnia (Bull. Rom. II., 441, 444, 445.) In September, 1176, at Anagnia, he confirmed the order of Carthusians (Labbe & Coss, x 1386). In February, 1177, he set out from Anagnia to Venice, and got back to Anagnia in December, 1177, the whole year being fully accounted for. In all those years no trace is to be found in any Italian historian of Alexander III. having been at Rome. Nor does the Bullarium give a single document issued by Alexander III., from Rome, from the year 1169 to 1178. In 1178, he was recalled to Rome, and the account of his recall given by Baronius, from the acts of Alexander III. in the Vatican library, demonstrate that he was not, and could not have been, at Rome during the preceding years. The cardinal says, "Year 1178; in which year Pope Alexander being recalled by the Romans, betook himself to Rome. But how he was received, the acts of his life thus deliver. In the meantime the whole clergy of the Roman Church, and the people, seeing that the Emperor Frederick was prostrate at the feet of Pope Alexander, but that the evil of schism was extinct through the Divine protection, considering also that they had incurred most heavy loss, as well in spirituals as temporals, during long times, by the absence of that Pontiff; by common counsel, they bound themselves by oath concerning the restoration of that pontiff to the see of St. Peter. They therefore sent to him to Anagnia seven men of the best citizens of Rome, with letters from the clergy, senate, and people, suppliantly entreating that he would now think fit to return to his own city, and to the people specially entrusted to him, and have the charge of them. But the Pontiff, although their humble and devout change was very pleasing to him and all the fathers, yet recalling to his memory his *former recall by the same clergy and people, from the countries beyond the Alps, how, after a short time, they had heaped injuries and reproaches on him and his brethren, he, with reason, hesitated to trust in their bland promises, and refused to return to that city, which he knew contained many disturbers of peace, without certain and firm security." This answer being brought back to Rome, they resolved "That they would perform fidelity and homage to the lord Pope; that they would freely restore into the hands and power of the pontiff, the Church of St. Peter, and his royalties, which had been seized by them; that they would, moreover, inviolably observe peace and security to the Pope himself, and to his brethren, and to their goods, and to all those coming to him." And then follows the account of his public entry, "all, indeed, grieving at this, that, by their own fault, they had been deprived of so great a good for so long a time."—Baronii. Annal. 1178.

From this account of his restoration, it evidently appears that Pope Alexander III. had not been in Rome for a long time; and from the security which he extracted, it appears that it would not previously have been safe for him, or any one coming to him, to have shown their faces in Rome. It further appears that "the Church of St. Peter" had been seized on by his enemies, and, of course, served by the priests of Callistus III., who were under sentence of excommunication by Alexander III. The importance of this fact will appear further on.

If, then, Cornelius, as we are informed by the most authentic historians, did go TO ROME, in 1175 or 1176, to confer with the Pope, it was Pope Callistus III. that he went to confer with, and not Pope Alexander III. And, if he conferred with him, he joined in communion with him too.

It is curious that all the accounts which Dr. Dixon gives agree in attributing these words to Cornelius, when he entered the monastery of Lemenc—"I have officiated in St. Peter's, of Armagh; I visited St. Peter's, at Rome; and I come to die in St. Peter's of Lemenc, (p. 70, 80, 99, 108). And the Bishop of St. Maurienne makes it, "I have offered my devotions in the Church of St. Peter of Rome" (p. 70).

Either these accounts are all forged, or "the blessed Cornelius" was a schismatic and a rebel against Pope Alexander III., by joining in schismatical worship. And, in that case, the fact that Cornelius should have worked miracles, and should immediately be worshipped all through Savoy, and that his worship should continue to this day, may be rather perplexing to Dr. Dixon, and all the rest who now believe that Alexander III. was the true Pope.

It was on this written communication from the Bishop of St. Maurienne that Dr. Dixon acted. He appears to have relied on it implicitly, without even looking to see how many popes there were at that time.

The only ancient or genuine document which Dr. Dixon gives respecting this Concord of Chambery is the letter of Ferrandus to Bollandus, written in 1653, and the hymn to Concord, both of which are in the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists (die quarta Junii). "Among these (the monks of Lemenc), the whole body of St. Concordius, an Irish Archbishop, is religiously preserved and worshipped, of whose life I have not been able to gather or learn anything, except a hymn inscribed in very ancient characters, before the altar, sacred to the holy man, which I insert verbatim, disfigured with foul misspellings, as was the barbarous practice of those times, "which hymn speaks only of Concors, bishop of "Illand."†

On this, Father Papebroch, observes—"We have never known any such place as 'Yllandia' or 'Illandia. Ferrarius understanding Ireland, (Irlandia), has announced him to us as an Irish Archbishop. The Fullienses (monks of Lemenc), understanding it Iceland,

* This Bull is not given in the Bullarium, though we find there one of same date, January 28th, 1671, confirming the worship of the blessed Ludovico. Bull. Rom. Cocq. Romæ, 1746, vii. 86.

* This recall took place in 1165. Du Pin. II. 332.

† Salve Præ ul pretiose, Quondam Pater Illandiæ. (p. 103.)
Dr. Dixon translates "Pater," "Primate," in order to help out his case.

(Islandia), &c." Papebroch thinks the monks must give up their opinion when they find there is no bishop named Concord in the catalogue of the bishops of Iceland, and that they had no Archbishop in Iceland. "We must therefore," he says, "return to the opinion of Ferrandus interpreting Illandia, Ireland". But here Papebroch honestly confesses that just the same difficulty arises about making Concord an Irishman, as we find no bishop of that name in the Irish catalogue. But, at least it might seem that there is a difficulty less about Ireland, as there were Archbishops there. But to this Papebroch gives a very candid answer, which answer Dr. Dixon leaves out, viz.:—"The dignity of Archbishop is not free from suspicion, being no where expressed in the hymn itself, but only affixed to the title of the hymn." In fact, the hymn only calls Concord bishop, Præsul; and the word Archbishop at the end of the title bears evident marks of having been added by an ignorant person; for the title runs thus—"Prayer of the Confessor Illustor B. Concord, Archbishop of Illandia," which is about as absurd as if any one were to call Dr. Dixon "Bishop Dixon, Archbishop of Ireland!" There is, therefore, reason to suppose that the "Archbishop" was added by some ignorant person, especially as an Archbishop is called by the name of his see, not of his country.

Papebroch goes on to give a remarkable instance how the dignity of Archbishop is applied in the Acta Sanctorum to another Irishman, who certainly was not an Archbishop, in the instance of Silanus (Acta Sanctorum. 21. Maii) who died in 1094, and is represented as wearing the Archiepiscopal Pallium, which as Papebroch justly observes, was never worn in Ireland until 1152. Papebroch therefore concludes, "I have thought it sufficient, therefore, to write Concord a bishop in the heading, leaving the further investigation of his age and see to the learned Irish.

It is here clear that the learned Papebroch never dreamed that the Latin names Cornelius and Concord could be the same; but thought, perhaps, that some Bishop Concord might yet be found in Ireland, which discovery has never been made.

It remains to inquire, whether the hymn inscribed at Chambery, can possibly apply to Cornelius, Archbishop of Armagh. The hymn has no date; it does not mention Cornelius, nor Alexander III.; but it contains this unlucky verse:—

Io Illandia servivi	I have served St. Peter in Illand,
Petro Apostolo Sancto,	I have visited St. Peter at Rome,
Romæ Petrum Visitavi,	I shall be buried in Lemenc.
Tumulabor in Lemenso.

If this hymn be fixed to the date of 1175 or 1176, (in which years only it could apply to Cornelius,) then Concord, whoever he was, worshipped in the church of St. Peter at Rome, when that church was served by priests who acknowledged Pope Callistus III., and were actually under sentence of excommunication by Alexander III., and this is all the hymn can prove about Cornelius. In which case, Dr. Dixon's thigh bone can really be fit for nothing now, but to break the head of the Editor of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, if he can be got at.

Now, we ask, where is the proof that Concord of Chambery, and Cornelius of Armagh are the same person? We find that only in the statement of the Bishop of St. Maurienne, and the pamphlet of Count Firnex, both written in the year 1851; and also in the life of St. Concord, printed in 1809 (which Dr. Dixon was ashamed to publish), and IN NO OLDER OR MORE CREDIBLE DOCUMENT. Such evidence is really contemptible. Miracles which happened 700 years ago (if they happened at all) cannot be proved by documents written yesterday.

The hymn does not speak of Cornelius, but it does speak of miracles.

In transitu hujus sancti	At the death of this saint,
Miracula fiunt multa;	Many miracles are wrought—
Ægri eunt sani effecti	The sick are healed through his
Per sua magna merita.	great merits.

But the hymn only specifies one miracle; and that is one which it will puzzle Dr. Dixon to apply to Cornelius:—

Depositio præsulis	The death of the priests
Fuit a Deo relata,	Was published by God; for,
Nam in libris ab angelis	Angels described it in books
Per orbem fuit descripta.	All over the world.

The prayer, which is also given by the Bollandists, and which Dr. Dixon has given in his book (p. 118), makes this miracle still more plain. "O God.... who that thou mightst make the day of his death venerable throughout the whole world, didst cause his name to be inscribed, marvellously, on the same day, by thy holy angels in martyrologies, &c."

Now, if this miracle be true, how came it never to be found in a book in Ireland until now, as Dr. Dixon himself confesses in his introduction, p. x. We have seen too much of miraculous stories of the middle ages to believe in such nonsense as this.

To us, Irishmen as we are, nothing seems more natural than that Cornelius, Archbishop of Armagh, should have gone to Rome in 1175 or 1176 to see Pope Callistus III. Nothing more unnatural or more base than that he should have gone to see Pope Alexander III. Cornelius was an Irishman, and an Irish churchman. Pope Alexander III, was at that time the deadly enemy of Irish independence. Only three years before, he had sold Ireland to Henry II. and the English, and had foully calumniated the Irish church, to cloak his own wickedness. What more natural, than that an Irish Archbishop, zealous for the liberty of his country and the honour of his church, should go to Rome, (as all Irish historians say Cornelius did in 1175,) to Pope CALLISTUS III., who was then in actual possession of the see of Rome, to try if he could find in him any decency or virtue, or honour, becoming his station? Yet, Dr. Dixon is not ashamed to say that it was to Pope ALEXANDER III., the great betrayer of Irish nationality, the great calumniator of the Irish church, that Cornelius went. And, it is simply on the very ground that Cornelius went to this arch enemy of Ireland, that Dr. Dixon calls on Irish Roman Catholics to fall down and worship Cornelius. But, we have shown that the wretched life of Concord, published only forty-four years ago, and which Dr. Dixon was himself ashamed to reprint, is the only document that ever said that Cornelius went to Pope ALEXANDER III. And the story is proved by the plainest facts of the history of that age to be a contemptible forgery. But, on this contemptible forgery Irish Roman Catholics are now to be called on to sacrifice every feeling sacred to the history of their country, before the shrine of Roman ambition.

Our readers may remember what we said in our number for Dec. 1853, p. 137, on the wholesale manufacturing of forged epistles of Popes of the early ages, to support the supremacy of Rome. We then showed to what an extent Roman doctrines are actually founded on such forgeries. We may yet have space, as we have abundant material, to make this exposure more full.

Rome boasts of being unchanged and unchangeable. What wonder, then, that the manufacturing of forgeries is still in operation to sustain the impostures of Rome. All this may be not without an aim. Rome has ever been hostile to nationality. Not that Rome avows this. It would defeat the object. She usually professes to cherish, and she flatters nationality, that she may get it into her embrace; but the secret managers of the policy of Rome have always looked steadily to the extinction of national feeling. For Rome demands for herself what patriotism gives to one's country. In the twelfth century she destroyed the nationality of Ireland, to bring Peter's Pence to Rome. True to the same principles, she seeks now to humble Irish nationality before the dead bones of its betrayers. What greater triumph could Roman policy now have in Ireland, than to see Irishmen bow down before the bones of Cornelius, on the ground of his alleged submission to the Bull of Pope Alexander III.?

It is not without a deep design that the era of 1170 was fixed upon for the selection of a thigh-bone to be worshipped. That era determined Cornelius as the man. And though this involved a contradiction between the document which had to be framed, and the awkward fact of two Popes at the one time (the wrong one being in the right place) yet this seemed not insurmountable—perhaps even desirable. For what if homage to Alexander III. must be based on a transparent forgery? Yet it might succeed, as so many similar attempts have succeeded. And if successful, the greater is the exaltation of Rome, in triumphing at once over the nationality, the intellect, and the moral sense of her victims. Choose this solution, or one less flattering to the wisdom of the forgers—that they are profoundly ignorant of the most notorious facts in the history of the Papacy itself. A clearer case of forgery never was convicted. Yet, on this convicted forgery, a grand religious display will, no doubt, be celebrated, notwithstanding. We would have healed our countrymen, and they are not healed. We must look longer yet on the spectacle of forgery and fraud in the deceivers, and credulity and degradation in the deceived. This is the spectacle afforded by a church that prohibits free discussion. Yet it will not be lost on those that have the courage to think. In the depth of the degradation into which men are driven, lies the last hope of their deliverance.

RELIGIOUS PROCESSIONS.

READER, did you ever hear of angels on horseback? Perhaps you have seen one. If not, read the following description, transcribed verbatim from page 25 of the "Legends of the Blessed Virgin," published in London in 1852, by Charles Dolman, and you will be able to judge how much edification or amusement we lose by the law which, in these countries, prohibits the enactment of religious processions:—

"Malines, or Mechlin, is perhaps the only city in the world which has preserved in all their original perfection the religious fêtes or shows of the middle ages. In 1825, at the Jubilee of St. Rombould, to whom it is indebted for the knowledge of the Gospel, and in 1838, at the Jubilee of our Lady of Hanswyck (the name of a venerated image held in great esteem), this old Christian city exhibited the magnificent and popular spectacle of those gigantic processions, rich in allegory, and studded with those attractive costumes which delight the crowd, whose appearance reminds one of the times of Philip the Good, when the same fêtes took place exactly in the same manner, the spectators alone differing.

"We will here faithfully describe in all its details the grand procession of 1838, in the persuasion that they will be appreciated by our readers, few of whom, perhaps, have ever assisted at any fête of so remarkable a nature.

"First marched a band of music on foot, in the costume of the present day, after which rode a squadron of cavalry. This formed as it were a modern preface to an ancient work. The following was the order of the procession:—

"A group of sixteen angels on horseback, with large extended wings and azure bodies, sounding golden trumpets around the herald who carried the standard of the Jubilee. They announced the coming of the representation of the Litany of the Blessed Virgin of Loretto.

"This sweet and favourite devotion of the people was represented by emblematical figures. First came thirty-six maidens, mounted on horses, elegantly dressed in white, in the modest and becoming fashion of Christian art, wearing crowns on their heads, from which fell rich lace veils. Each one carried in her left hand the attribute she represented—the Tower of David, the House of Gold, the Tower of Ivory, the Mystical Rose, the Mirror of Justice, &c.; and from their right hands waved banners of white silk. On every banner was worked, in letters of gold, some title given to our blessed Lady—as, Amiable Mother, Admirable Mother, Powerful Virgin, Clement Virgin, Cause of our Joy, Health of the Sick, Refuge of Sinners, Consolatrix of the Afflicted, and Help of Christians &c. Thus the show was for the people a continual prayer.

"The concluding portion of the Litany, in which the dignity of Queen is so justly attributed to Mary, called forth still more majestic representation. Eight triumphal chariots bore the groups emblematic of these glorious titles of our heavenly queen.

"Before the cars rode choirs of angels, with snow-white wings and starry foreheads, playing on harps and psaltering, mounted on palfreys magnificently caparisoned. The Queen of Angels was in the first car, drawn by six cream-coloured horses. She was raised on a golden throne, around which knelt many heavenly spirits. Seraphim, cherubim, archangels, and angels, surrounded their Queen; the powers, principalities, and dominations carried crowns and sceptres. All these characters were borne by young girls, taken from the noblest families of Malines.

"The Queen of Patriarchs was in the second car, attended by the venerable personages of the old law—Adam, Noah, Abraham, Jacob, &c.

"Next came the Queen of Prophets, round whose throne might be seen the inspired men, whose voices recorded the future as plainly as the past from Abraham to St. John the Baptist.

"The fourth car bore the Queen of Apostles, who sat on a high throne, covered by a canopy, over which was raised the arms of the See of Peter, the eternal emblem of the Church. Among the twelve Apostles, the chosen ones of Christ, who were directly commissioned by him to propagate his holy gospel, might be seen their successors, who had been chiefly instrumental in spreading the Christian religion in the north of Gaul—St. Rombauld, St. Servais, St. Amand, St. Lambert, St. Lievin, St. Gomer, and St. Willibrod.

"The Queen of Martyrs sat in the fifth chariot, which represented the whole of the earth; for where has not the blood of Christians been shed for the faith? Princesses and recluses, bishops and soldiers, children and old men, young girls and mothers—all were there bearing their palms of triumph.

"The sixth car was formed like a pulpit, and carried the Queen of Confessors and her militant court; the young girl who held the reins bore also a naked sword, to show that they who laboured in the propagation of the faith must always be ready to shed their blood, if necessary, in its defence.

"Next came the Queen of Virgins. The fair charioteer of this car trod the pleasures of the world under her feet; behind her was a wheel and a palm, and on her right a lamb, emblem of innocence.

"The eighth chariot was made to represent the heavens, in which reigned the Queen of all Saints, surrounded by her heavenly court, round whom shone a brilliant glory. The Grand Harmonic Society of Malines followed the Litany; but it sadly marred the effect of the whole to see the members dressed in the modern costume. Better had it been to give them the characters of the court of David, or some others corresponding with the allegorical nature of the festival. But see, here is Malines herself, represented by a beautiful child crowned with towers, and surrounded by nine maidens, bearing emblems of the virtues of the city—faith, prudence, charity, union, constancy, fidelity, valour, modesty, and justice.

"The cavalry officers, the king's aides-de-camp, and the grand officers of the court, followed on horseback. Behind them is a royal car drawn by eight horses, in which are faithfully represented, by children of twelve years of age, the king and queen of the Belgians upon their throne. The attributes of the arts, commerce, justice, and war, group at their feet. The car is led by fidelity, religion, justice, goodness; Belgium, wisdom, and generosity are the attendants of their majesties.

Four winged angels, at each corner of the car, bear aloft the national standard, surmounted by the lion.

"A party of naval officers forms the transition to another spectacle. It is a ship, representing the country's welfare, an ingenious emblem—navigation is to all countries the source of wealth.

"The country's welfare is a three-masted ship, with her sails, cordage, flags, and cannon. An emblematic figure of Belgium commands her; she has her officers and sailors. She sails along the streets by mechanical contrivances, and is followed by fantastic personages, serving as fore-runners to the horse Bayard, an enormous animal, on whose back ride four mediæval knights: they are the sons of Aymon.

"In the tradition of the country, Aymon was a count of Termonde. His four valiant sons defended Malines and Brabant, and Bayard, their trusty steed, often came to feed in the forest of Soigne, where he left the mark of his foot upon a rock; he browsed formerly in the fertile plains watered by the Dyle.

"After Bayard followed the giants, for which the northern cities are so famous. Here come three children, fifteen feet high, whose father and mother look over the houses; the lady being a colossal princess, holding a fan as large as those with which domestics in the Indies cool their employers. The grandfather is even taller than his son, to show that each generation degenerated in size. He is seated in a monster tilbury of antique form, escorted by two monster camels mounted by cupids. This is, it is said, a relic of the crusaders, who were the first to import these animals into Europe.

"After these great figures comes, as a kind of moral to the show, a good old man smoking his pipe on a wretched nag, who draws Dame Fortune's wheel. The goddess herself is borne on high, around whom are grouped figures, who, as she makes a movement, rise or fall, showing what freaks the dame plays with mankind. These personages are well-dressed representations of harlequin and a beguine; a hunter and a milk-woman; a courtier and a coquette; a hermit and an old woman. Bursts of laughter greet the vicissitudes which these various persons undergo as they pass along. The cavalcade closed as it opened, with a large body of cavalry.

"Such is a rapid glance at the curious procession which passed four times through the city of Malines during the fifteen days of the jubilee, from the 15th of August to the 1st of September, in the year 1838."

Such, too, were the religious fêtes of the middle ages in all "their original perfection," which a certain party would gladly revive in "heretical" England, in the nineteenth century. Whether the bursts of laughter which greeted the mingled throng of angels on horseback, giants, cupids, harlequins, and nuns were calculated to promote the cause of devotion, or to encourage secret infidelity among the population of this "old Christian city," we leave our readers to judge; but we confess we are better pleased that the Litany of Loretto should have been the subject of this profane parody than that the more solemn events of sacred history should be made the subject of these tableaux vivants, as they too often were in the "magnificent and popular" theatrical spectacles of the middle ages, and still are in countries like Spain and Italy, where the Church of Rome has absolute sway, and it is thought politic to amuse the populace, to divert them from the more intellectual but dangerous (!) occupation of thinking.

FABER ON THE BLESSED SACRAMENT.*

MR. FREDERICK WM. FABER is one of the little knot of English clergymen who, a few years ago, abandoned their Church for the Romish communion; and he has proved himself since, with one or two exceptions, the most active and energetic of their number. In addition to performing with zeal the ordinary duties of a clergyman of the church to which he has joined himself, he has done his best to forward her interests with his pen, both in works published with his name, and in periodical publications. And yet, we must confess that there is nothing about what Mr. Faber has written that gives us the idea of reality. We are wholly unacquainted with his private character, and take our opinion of him solely from his works; but nothing which we have seen from his pen impresses us with the belief that when the writer makes a statement he does so because he is convinced that it is true, but rather because he feels it to be suitable to his position to profess a belief in it. It strikes us as if, when Mr. Faber joined the Church of Rome, he felt that it became his duty to maintain the character of a good Romanist, and as if he forthwith set himself to make up and dress for the part to the utmost of his skill. He takes pains to weed his phraseology of every trace of Anglicanism, and to learn the vocabulary of his new communion. If a doctrine or opinion comes before him for consideration, he never dreams of asking what evidence there is for its truth; all he inquires is, what side of the question is most unlike the view which Protestants would take. We do not speak of doctrines promulgated as articles of faith by the authority of the Church of Rome: with regard to these we can understand that he would consider it his duty to believe without evidence and without examination. But we speak of those debatable questions on which Roman Catholic divines have held different opinions; stories of asserted revelations, from which sober-minded Roman Catholics have always felt themselves at liberty to withhold their assent, or extreme views of doctrine which they have considered they might, without disloyalty to their Church, refuse to receive. In every case of this kind Mr. Faber takes his line decidedly. When the miraculous story is one which a Protestant would consider peculiarly unfounded and absurd, and which cooler Roman Catholics turn away from as likely to do their cause more harm than good, Mr. Faber, without producing any evidence for it, quietly assumes it as a certain fact, which no one had ever questioned or doubted. If a doctrinal view is embarrassed with difficulties to which more timid Romanists have tried to shut their eyes, Mr. Faber delights in stating these difficulties in their most startling form, as if there was the more merit in believing the doctrine in spite of them. With some readers, we doubt not, this style of writing may have an effect. Bold and confident assertion, and quietly taking things for granted, will often give the most absurd statements an air of reality. Gulliver's Travels, for instance, have more of an air of truth than the histories of many more veracious travellers. But, for ourselves, we cannot get over the feeling of hollowness which we find in all Mr. Faber's works. His belief is so manifestly destitute of evidence, so plainly governed by the exigencies of his theological position, that we constantly feel that, after all, it is not believing, but make-believing.

When, however, we want information as to the actual state of feeling and opinion in the Church of Rome, we learn more from ten pages of Mr. Faber than from a hundred of Dr. Murray of Maynooth. Foreigners sometimes have learned to speak a language so perfectly that they can only be distinguished from natives by their greater anxiety for purity of diction, and their greater fear of committing a solecism. We believe that more Latin idioms and Ciceronian turns of expression can be found in a page of Dr. Parr, or some other modern scholar, than in half a dozen of Cicero himself. And so, we find that Mr. Faber, in his ever-vigilant care to speak as he thinks a Romanist ought to speak, gives us more information, in a small compass, about prevalent Roman Catholic opinion than we should easily find in the works of an original Roman Catholic.

Accordingly, we have on a previous occasion brought largely before our readers Mr. Faber's former work "All for Jesus," and have given from it plentiful samples of the extraordinary mass of doctrine which has been added to the Roman Catholic creed since the time of the Council of Trent. We now proceed to notice Mr. Faber's last published work, "The Blessed Sacrament," from which, however, we cannot premise to give any extracts so interesting as those we gave from the book just referred to. We must say that this new book has, on the whole, a degree of dryness and heaviness about it, not usual with Mr. Faber, and that we have had some little difficulty in making our way through it.

The principal reason, probably, why this work is more dry than other productions of Mr. Faber is, that it is more full of the scholastic theology. Mr. Faber tells us in his preface that "his treatise is an attempt to popularize certain portions of the science of theology, in the same way as hand-books and manuals have popularized astronomy, geology, and other physical sciences." This being his object, private revelations, which are so largely quoted in "All for Jesus," are much more sparingly employed in the present work. He tells us (p. 510), "There are two sources from which we learn [the relations of Mary to the blessed sacrament] theology and private revelations. We should be out of harmony with the Church if we lightly esteemed these revelations to the saints, especially those that enjoy the countenance of ecclesiastical approval in any of its various degrees. But my object in this treatise has been to follow theology rather than these revelations; and where I have referred to them at all, I have left them in their own uncertainty."

With all Mr. Faber's attempts to make the scholastic theology popular, a book which contains much of it will always be somewhat repulsive to the generality of readers. His book, however, gains in solid value what it loses in interest. We look with great satisfaction on any attempt on the part of the religious guides of Roman Catholics to make them know what they are really required to believe. There are many Roman Catholics who have but a vague idea of the doctrines of their own religion: who (for example) think they believe the doctrine of the Transubstantiation; when, in reality, perhaps they believe no more than what is taught by the Church of England—that "the body and blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper." Such persons would turn away with suspicion if we Protestants were to attempt to draw out in detail from the school divines all the absurdities which are involved in the doctrine of transubstantiation. They would think that we were purposely falsifying the teaching of their schools, in order to make it seem incredible or ridiculous.

It is, then, convenient to us when there is a book of their own, easy of access to them, by the help of which they can readily verify whether we are reporting their doctrines fairly or not. The use, then, which we shall make of Mr. Faber's work in this article is to give from it a detail of all that must be believed by any one who gives the Romish interpretation to those words of our Lord, "This is my body;" and we shall give our references to Mr. Faber as we go along. First, then, we give Mr. Faber's general remarks on the wonderful mystery of transubstantiation:—

"Transubstantiation may be described as the true change and substantial conversion of the whole substance of the bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, produced under the species by a real productive act, proximately subject to the accidents of bread and wine, but without any adhesion to them, the substances of bread and wine perishing altogether in the act.

"St. Thomas says that the blessed sacrament is the compendium of all miracles; for in it we behold one body at one time in all hosts, and in all parts of all hosts, and that without extension. We see matter putting on the properties of spirit, and accidents without a substance, producing all the same effects as substances. Thus, another author calls it the abridgment of the miracles of grace. It is miraculous in the substance, he says, for it destroys the substance of bread and wine, and substitutes the body of God in their room. It is miraculous in quantity, for a body ought to have extension, and the body of Jesus under the species has none. It is miraculous in quality, for a body ought to be sensible and palpable, yet the body of Jesus is here invisible, neither is it subject to the action of any one of the senses. It is miraculous in the action, for, on the one hand, the word of a man gives even to God a manner of being altogether new, in order that he may nourish himself on Him, while, on the other, instead of changing that food into the man's own substance, the food transforms him into itself, and communicates to him its qualities. It is miraculous in a sort of passion endured therein, for we behold here a free prisoner, a living one dead, an impassible one suffering, a body separated from the blood and yet united with it, risen and still buried, eaten and not consumed, consumed and not destroyed. It is miraculous in local movements, for at one and the same time He is placed in different positions, He is lifted up and taken down, He is borne to the right and to the left as well, to the east and to the west both at once. It is miraculous in the situation, for our Lord has His eyes in the same place as His heart, and the heart in the same place as the head; and the head in the same place as the feet; all parts of His adorable body are all together, and yet, nevertheless, they undergo no confusion. It is miraculous in all the accidents of bread and wine, for they are detached from their subject, and have no other support than the almighty hand of the Son of God, who holds them up."—pp. 74, 75.

Let us, however, examine the subject in more detail. Every time that a consecration of the Eucharist takes place, a believer in transubstantiation must believe that no fewer than twelve miracles, or miraculous actions, take place: of these twelve miracles (says Mr. Faber, p. 77), two concern the substance of the bread and wine, two more the species, six the body of our Lord and its concomitants, and two the consecrator in the Mass, &c.:—

"The first miracle is the destruction, the annihilation, the perishing, the vanishing, whichever word we will choose, of the substance of the bread and wine. It is not the customary language of theology to speak of them as annihilated, because, according to the divine intention, their ceasing to be does not end in nothingness, but in the position of the body of Christ in their room. Nevertheless, nothing whatever of the substance, of bread, for instance, remains, neither form nor matter nor existence nor any degree of it, but the whole perishes utterly, and is as if it were reduced to nothing, without anything to succeed it. —p. 78.

"The second miracle, which also concerns the substances of the bread and wine, consists in the reproduction and restitution of the perished substances, when the species are corrupted or changed, and our blessed Lord has withdrawn. It is not that the species themselves act the part of the matter, or minister the material for corruption, or that they only appear to do so. But though separated from the substance which sustained them, they follow its laws, and suffer change in due season. Thus, when the change of the species has reached that point when it would not be natural for the proper substances of bread and wine any longer to consist with the accidents, at the moment by His wisdom and omnipotence our Lord restores and reproduces the substances, withdraws His sacramental presence, and the usual laws of creation resume their uninterrupted sway. All this is done in so occult a manner that there are no external signs by which we can detect either the original disappearance, or the fresh substitution of the substance, so that there is nothing to break the meritorious exercise of supernatural faith.—p. 79.

"Both these miracles concerning the substances of the bread and wine are, to use the emphatic word of one holy doctor, so 'exotic' and so remote from the natural order of causes, we know of nothing at all parallel to them outside this mystery of transubstantiation."—p. 80.

In other words, besides the miracle of destroying the substance of the bread and wine, and the substitution of that of our Lord's body and blood in their room, a new miracle takes place, if the Host is kept so long as to become spoiled or corrupted.* In this case, by a new miracle, the Lord's body is withdrawn, and another is re-created to supply the void thus occasioned.

We proceed now to the miracles which concern the species.

"The first of the two miracles, which concern the species, is that they exist and hold together without leaning upon any subject. This prodigy may be conceived to happen in one of three ways."

* The Blessed Sacrament; or, the Works and Ways of God. By Frederick William Faber, D.D., Priest of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri. London: Richardson and Son. 1855.

* We use, for shortness, Protestant language. Instead of the periphrases necessary to describe this change in the Roman Catholic hypothesis.

We leave out these three attempts at explaining the mystery, and content ourselves with the conclusion of the writer. "Anyhow" (to use Mr. Faber's favourite expression)—

"Whatever comes of these endeavours to explain it, the miracle itself is absolutely certain; the sacramental species remain, when their substances are withdrawn from them.

"The second miracle which concerns the species is, that they suffer the same contingencies and receive the same impressions, and are accompanied by the same qualities, as if their substances had not perished. Thus they grow warm, or cold, or dry, and undergo similar mutations, just as they would do if their subjects existed; and this not in appearance, for the purpose of deceiving the senses, but in reality. In other words, those qualities—such as heat, cold, dryness, and the like, are produced there by the power of God in a miraculous way, without any subject to receive, suffer, and sustain them; and they mingle with and run into each other just as if they were tied together in a common subject."—p. 82.

In short, the believer in transubstantiation must suppose that there is heat, and yet nothing which is hot; dryness, and yet nothing which is dry, and so forth. We heartily assent to Mr. Faber's concluding remark:—

"Nowhere out of the mystery of transubstantiation does it seem that God has vouchsafed to give His concurrence to qualities without a subject; and this shows us the singularity and eminence of the transcendent mystery which we are thus venturing to analyze.

"We have now to consider six miracles which regard the body of our Lord and its concomitants; and the first is the production of the body and blood of Christ, existing and permanent in heaven, under the species of bread and wine, so that He is not less truly, less really, or less substantially in the host than He is in heaven; and this most magnificent dogma is of divine faith. You must not quarrel with me just now for using hard words. A clear idea of this mystery in your mind will soon result in increased love in your heart, and deeper adoration in your spirit. Bear with me patiently, at least for a few more pages. The question is, how this great mystery, this production of the body of Christ, is effected? By what manner of divine operation is it under the species as it is in heaven? How are we to qualify and describe the action which accomplishes this stupendous wonder?"—p. 83.

We need not give the explanations of the mystery which Mr. Faber rejects; it is sufficient to give that which he pronounces most satisfactory:—

"They maintain that the body of Christ is placed under the species by a productive action, which may be called a reproduction of the same substantial being, whereby the same being which it has in heaven is conferred on it, and somehow reproduced under the species, although with another method of existence. If God can restore what has perished, and reproduce it altogether the same, as He does when He restores the perished substance of bread, He can also produce for a second time that which continues to exist. We surely cannot deny this to be within the compass of omnipotence. And not for a second time only. The actual existence of the thing does not hinder but that God could produce it elsewhere a thousand times. He is, of course, not dependent on the circumstances which render this impossible in the natural order of things. From one man, says Lessius, he could produce an army. As in the stores of His wisdom and power there lie countless individuals of the same species, so also in the same stores each individual may lie countlessly, and He could give forth infinite reproductions of the same individual. And although a thing thus reproduced in itself is in act one and the same, yet virtually it is manifold; for it is equal to many in localities, in operations, in beginnings and endings. Thus, it fills distant places, and in a certain sense is distant from itself. It can accomplish different and even contrary effects in different places, and thus really avail to do of itself the work of many. When it begins or ends in one place, it does not necessarily begin or end in another. In one place it may be hot, in another cold; here it may ascend, there it may descend; here it may cease and die, there it may begin and be born."—pp. 87, 88.

We allow readily enough that from one man God could make an army. But, then, if we understand the meaning of language, none of the individuals so produced could be the same as he from whom they sprung. It is quite beyond our power to conceive the possibility of the same man existing in different places, and there accomplishing different or even contrary effects; being hot in one place, cold in another; being born in one place, and at the same time dying in another. All this, however, must be believed by those who receive the doctrine of transubstantiation.

We add, without farther comment, Mr. Faber's enumeration of the other miracles which concern our Lord's body:—

"The second miracle which concerns the body of our Lord is the presence with it of His blessed soul, with all its sanctity, beatific love and vision, and all its ornaments and gifts natural and supernatural, under the same species. In the language of the Council of Trent, we say that our Lord's soul is present under the species, not by the force of the words of consecration, but by what the Council calls concomitance—that is, it was befitting and honourable for our Lord's body that it should be accompanied by His soul into all its surpassing beauty, and that in a manner as real as is its own presence in the sacrament. It was not, therefore, necessary that the soul should come, neither did it directly, by virtue of the consecration. And though it comes by force of natural connection with the body of Christ, as the Council speaks, yet as the body was produced under the species of an intimate, peculiar divine influx, which did not reach the soul, the presence of the soul requires a new distinct productive influx touching its substance, as the former one touched the substance of the body. So that here is a fresh act of beauty and of power in order to produce the soul of Christ under the species, and it is there as true, really, and substantially as the body itself."—p. 90.

"The third miracle which has reference to the body of Christ is the presence under the species of the hypostatic union, by which the flesh and soul are united to the Divine Word. From this union the flesh of Christ receives its dignity and all its power of sanctification; and it is present under the species by a productive action of its own. For although the Divine Word is everywhere, yet the union of the body and soul of Christ with the word is not everywhere; because the body and soul of Christ are not everywhere, but are circumscribed in a particular place. Nevertheless, the hypostatic union is so intrinsic to them that they cannot exist without it. Therefore, as the body and soul of Christ are present in the blessed sacrament by a peculiar action, so also is there union with the word. Thus the Divine Word is present in the blessed sacrament by concomitance—that is, not merely by reason of His immensity as God, by which He is in all things, but also by reason of the hypostatic union. Hence, furthermore, though let it be carefully observed not by any productive action, which cannot extend thus far, the Father and the Holy Ghost are also present under the species by reason of connection and identity with the word."—p. 91.

"The fourth miracle is the spiritual manner in which the body of Christ exists with all its corporeal qualities under the species. The body, with all its bulk and its qualities, is by a divine virtue raised above the condition of a body, and receives a spiritual mode of existence, by which it is contracted as it were into a point, and is simultaneously and continuously so diffused through the species, that, like a spiritual substance, it is whole under the whole species of bread, and whole under every one of its parts; just as a man's rational soul is whole in his whole body and whole in each of its parts. This is perhaps the most stupendous prodigy of all this resplendent collection of wonders, and has no just parallel out of this mystery of transubstantiation. That a thing extended by parts should be empowered to exist spiritually and without extent; and that when the substance and existence are both corporeal, the mode of being should nevertheless be spiritual!—p. 91.

"The fifth miracle is the multiplication, so to call it after the example of theologians, of the body of Christ; its manifold presence, or method of existing multiplicdly. See how the case stands with a man's soul. The soul is whole in each part of the body, yet not fully or completely, but imperfectly; for it depends in one part on its existence in other parts; so that if a limb is cut off, it cannot preserve the soul in it unless by a miracle, in which case even it would be in a certain sense incomplete. Now, the body of Christ is totally and completely in every particle of the species, however small, and to the sense indivisible, as perfectly as under the whole species; neither does His existence in one particle in any way depend on His existence in the neighbouring ones, but under each one He exists perfectly and independently, so that when the species is divided, He remains complete in each part without any additional miracle. This prodigy differs from the preceding one, and is additional to it; for it does not follow from His body having the gift of a spiritual existence that it should have also what theology calls the gift of 'multiplicity of complete existence.' He might, for instance, have given Himself once under one species. Thus, the former miracle gives to His body the prerogatives of a spiritual substance, and this one adds to that a multiplicity which not even a spiritual substance possesses. And this multiplicity of Himself, His flesh, His blood, His soul, the hypostatic union, what is it all but love, the same abundant, prodigal, spendthrift love which moves our tears in His blood-sheddings and in all the mysteries of His dear passion, and the actions of His three and thirty years?—p. 92.

"The sixth miracle is the retiring of the body of Christ from the species when they corrupt. When by any external agent or by the internal conflict of qualities, the species so far suffer change as that the substance of bread, if it were there, would naturally be corrupted, in the very moment in which the substance of bread would suffer alteration, the body of Christ withdraws. It is not that the body of Christ has any natural dependence on the species, as the substance of bread would have; but that the body of Christ being there by a special productive influx of God, that influx is withdrawn, and it ceases to be, so that if it were not in heaven, or in the blessed sacrament elsewhere, it would cease to be altogether, and be annihilated. Nevertheless, our Lord suffers in no way by this; for it is all one to Him whether He exist once or a thousand times, for existing once He has the plenitude of all goods and all power, and a million times ten million existences could add nothing to Him. And this beautiful, worshipful marvel closes the series of those which concern His body."—p. 93.

Mr. Faber's remaining two miracles are so in a less strict sense of the word than those that precede:—

"But our survey of this great work of God, the mystery of transubstantiation, would not be complete, if we did not add to it two more miracles, which devout writers, using the word in a loose and poetical sense, are wont to notice, and which concern the consecrators of the body of God. They are miracles rather of love than of power. One of them consists in the prodigal abundance with which our Lord has bestowed this immense gift of consecrating His body. If one man had the power once in a century, how would the world fling itself in pilgrimage upon the one spot where the chosen pontiff was to accomplish this stupendous work. Yet God has given it to a huge motley multitude of priests. He does not require holiness of life to make the consecration valid, nor yet the profession of the true faith, nor even freedom from dreadful crimes. Even blasphemers, schismatics, heretics, and apostates, so long as they were validly ordained, retain this power, and use it to the ignominy and shame of our dearest Lord, and to the profaning of His most holy presence. They make our Lord common and vile and wearisome to the people. They make merchandize of Him, and dishonour Him by simony and sacrilege. Yet He seems to care nothing for it. He looks only at us, consults only our interests, legislates only for our convenience. He must be at our doors. The adorable sacrifice must be easy and ready for all of us. Opportunities of communion must be cheap and common as the air we breathe. This is the best for us, sweetest for us; and as our good is the rule of God's goodness, so it is! Who will quarrel with us for calling this a miracle?—p. 94.

"Once more our last and twelfth miracle is in the [illegible] of consecration. When a priest works miracles, first of all he is a priest, and that is to be remembered, for it tells of long years of prayer and conflict, and modest courses of ecclesiastical austerity. But if long fasting and great heart-searching and much toil, and a cycle of preliminary ceremony, were necessary before consecration, it would seem an easy exercise of power when we consider the stupendous majesty of the work performed. But no! Five little words, and it is done!"—p. 94.

Such, then, are the wonders which attend every celebration of the Lord's Supper. But there is one celebration of the Eucharist which demands special notice—the first occasion on which it was celebrated. Every one will admit that the true sense of the words "This is my body" is the sense in which they were spoken by our Lord on the night before his passion, and in which they were then understood by his disciples. Are we, then, to suppose that our Lord meant that he was then holding his body in his own hands? Are we to believe that the apostles understood the Saviour to mean that he was then taking up his own body, that he put his whole body into his mouth, and eat it before them? If by the word body is understood what is commonly meant by the phrase, this is certainly a contradiction in terms; and yet this is what must be maintained by every believer in transubstantiation. Let us hear Mr. Faber's account of the institution of the Eucharist:—

"The awful words have been spoken. This is My body. It is the first time earth has heard them. If it were not inanimate, it would have reeled to its very foundations, even as the gates of hell are vehemently shaken by the assertion of the mass. Our Lord stands, cognizable as Mary's son and in the dimensions of mature mortal age. On His face is a light of love, more bright than a saint's ecstacy. He stands there, body, soul, and divinity, holding in His hand with unconceivable thrills of joy His own very body, with the soul and the divinity. He holds it forth for a moment for the adoration of His apostles, and then enters Himself into the richest inheritance which He has left to His church, by communicating Himself with Himself. By virtue of the incarnation the incarnate Lord received Himself incarnate, was held in His own hands, lay upon His own tongue, descended into His own heart, by the most real reality on earth, His own real presence in the blessed eucharist."—p. 476.

We have only space for one more of the wonders connected with the Sacrament of the Eucharist—one which, to our mind, is the most astonishing of them all, and this is, that there is not a syllable about all these wonders in the New Testament. We quote again from Mr. Faber:—

"In what way should we expect that our blessed Lord would give us this sublime institution? We might have thought He would have founded it with all the solemnities of a Divine Legislator, that it would have been given to us as a boon for which we could never sufficiently thank Him, as a trust the responsibility of which ought to weigh gravely upon our whole lives, as the reward of our faith in Him, over which we might triumph and rejoice perpetually. It would seem as if the Holy Eucharist rather than the Resurrection would be put forward as the reason for completing the number of the apostles, as the prime evidence of the mission and love of the Son of God, and as the glorious end of His merciful coming. We might suppose that the epistles of the New Testament would contain little more than the enforcing of the doctrine of the Eucharist, or the rubrics for its consecration, or the varieties of loving devotion with which it would be our duty to surround it. Yet if we fancied this, we should have shown how little we knew our Lord's way, or had caught the true spirit of the Incarnation."—p. 561.

Here we close, for the present, our citations from Mr. Faber. We own that these things which he has described are wonderful in the highest degree; but we must first ask ourselves are they true. Those who have not Mr. Faber's wonderful gift of taking the imaginations of their own minds for realities, will ask what evidence there is for them? We do not dispute the omnipotence of God. When he tells us that he has done a thing, we bow with humble reverence; nor do we count anything impossible with Him. The only question in this case is, whether God ever has said that He performs these twelve wonderful miracles enumerated by Mr. Faber. The silence of Scripture with regard to any religious doctrine is a wonderful circumstance, which we may, with Mr. Faber, speak on and philosophise about, and try to account for, provided we have some other means of making sure that the doctrine is true. But in this instance, what are these means? The foundation of the whole fabric is the right understanding of the words, "This is my body." If Mr. Faber is mistaken on this point, all his system tumbles to the ground. We have to choose whether we will understand these words in a sense conformed to our Lord's habit of speaking in several other instances; the sense in which, as far as we can perceive, they were understood by the apostles at the time; the sense in which they were understood by the fathers of the early Church, who had certainly acuteness to know all the consequences of their opinions, and yet who never discovered in their doctrine of the Sacrament those twelve miraculous actions reckoned up by Mr. Faber. We have to choose, we say, whether we will understand the words in this plain sense, or in one which is embarrassed with innumerable difficulties and counter-fictions, which requires to explain it a language and a philosophy of its own, not invented for hundreds of years after our Saviour's words were spoken. We conclude by asking our readers to consider well the following, which are only a few of the instances in which our Lord's hearers were misled by putting a gross and carnal, but, as they thought, a literal interpretation, on the words he made use of:—

Matthew xvi., 5–12—"And when his disciples were come over the water, they had forgotten to take bread. Who said to them: Take heed and beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees. But they thought within themselves, saying: Because we have taken no bread. And JESUS knowing it, said: Why do you think within yourselves, O ye of little faith, for that you have no bread? Do you not yet understand, neither do you remember the five loaves among five thousand men, and how many baskets you took up? Nor the seven loaves among four thousand men, and how many baskets you took up? Why do you not understand that it was not concerning bread I said to you: Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees! Then they understood that he said not that they should beware of the leaven of bread, but of the doctrine of the Pharisees and Sadducees."

John ii., 19–22—"JESUS answered, and said to them: Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up. The Jews then said: Six and forty years was this temple in building, and wilt thou raise it up in three days? But he spoke of the temple of his body. When, therefore, he was risen again from the dead, his disciples remembered that he had said this, and they believed the Scripture, and the word that JESUS had said."

John iii., 3, 4—"JESUS answered and said to him: Amen, amen, I say to thee, unless a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God. Nicodemus saith to him: How can a man be born when he is old? Can he enter a second time into his mother's womb, and be born again?"

John iv., 9–14—"Then that Samaritan woman saith to him: How dost thou, being a Jew, ask of me to drink, who am a Samaritan woman? For the Jews do not communicate with the Samaritans. JESUS answered, and said unto her: If thou didst know the gift of God, and who he is that saith to thee, Give me to drink, thou, perhaps, wouldst have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water. The woman saith to him: Sir, thou hast nothing wherein to draw, and the well is deep; from whence, then, hast thou living water? Art thou greater than our father, Jacob, who gave us the well, and drank thereof himself, and his children, and his cattle? JESUS answered, and said to her: Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again, but he that shall drink of the water that I will give him shall not thirst for ever; but the water that I will give him shall become in him a fountain of water springing up into life everlasting."

31–34—"In the meantime the disciples prayed him, saying: Rabbi, eat. But he said to them: I have meat to eat which you know not. The disciples, therefore, said one to another: Hath any man brought him to eat? JESUS saith to them: My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, that I may perfect his work."

XI. 11–13—"These things he said; and after that he said to them: Lazarus, our friend, sleepeth; but I go that I may awake him out of sleep. His disciples, therefore, said: Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well. But JESUS spoke of his death; and they thought that he spoke of the repose of sleep."

THE ANCIENT MANSION.

A great many years ago, a certain owner of a very large estate built a house upon it, and by his will left it to his children, with a strict command never to alter it, but always to keep it up in the very same state as he had left it. In order that this direction should be the more exactly carried out, he caused a full description of it to be written in his last testament. His descendants continued long to occupy it; and, from an anxious desire to fulfil the intentions of the builder, some of the early occupants caused surveys to be taken of the house, three of which, together with the will, have come down to us in the present day. These three early documents all agree in describing the house to consist chiefly of twelve commodious rooms; and in this respect they fully agree in every respect with the account in the will; and though they are not of equal authority with it, they wonderfully corroborate all the particulars mentioned in it. Through succeeding generations, however, many changes took place; not that any part of the old house was altogether removed, but from time to time great additions were gradually made. The directions of the will that no part of the house should ever be taken down were well known and strictly observed; but as the will itself was not much read, the same care was extended to the several additions which successively were made to the original building. These additions, in process of time, became so great, and had been built in such a way as well nigh to render useless the original edifice. They darkened the windows, which had been at first large and open; they rendered the old rooms cold and comfortless, and well nigh superseded them altogether, and they became at last so numerous, that on a subsequent survey the house was found to consist not merely of the twelve original rooms, but actually of twelve others in addition, each of which it was thought needful to keep up in perfect order, according as the commands in the will were understood. The trouble of keeping up the house in this enlarged form became very great. The old mansion being well built, and on a rock, was easily preserved in repair; but the additions which had sprung up around it being badly built, and on a loose sandy foundation, required continual propping up, and entailed a most burdensome expense on the inhabitants. The occasion of the last survey was remarkable. One of the inmates being of an inquiring disposition, and fond of antiquarian researches, happened to find the old will describing the original house; and on taking it in his hand, and going with it from room to room, he discovered that the new buildings were not mentioned at all in it, but that the old part of the house was most accurately described. He had, however, some trouble in exactly drawing the line between the old and the new parts; the new had been in many places so artfully fitted to the old that, without much care, he found it would be difficult to remove the additions without doing injury to the first original building. At last, however, he succeeded, by very diligently studying the testament, aided, also, very much by the three early surveys. Having satisfied himself, he became anxious to communicate his discovery to others, many of the most sensible of whom were soon convinced that these additions were contrary to the will of the founder; and a resolution was come to that the house should be again restored to its original fair proportions, its severe grandeur, and massive strength; and they set about to pull down all the gaudy additions which encumbered the old building, and gave it no additional support, and at the same time supplied very unsafe accommodation. Upon this a violent contest arose. The more enlightened part of the tenantry on the estate, who were able to read and comprehend the will, at once saw that the object was restoration, and not destruction. They clearly understood that the strictest compliance with the original will never required that all the after additions of many centuries were to be regarded as embraced in the first builder's directions. And, moreover, they saw that as these injured the building, and rendered the original rooms almost uninhabitable, the removal of the novel additions was, in fact, the only way to observe the directions of the will, so as to keep the house in perfect order. But, though the more enlightened thus viewed the matter, and rejoiced at the thought of being able to carry out the intentions of the founder, the more ignorant, who are always the greater number, raised a violent outcry, saying that the provisions of the will were about to be set aside. The builder, they said, had ordered that no stick or stone should ever be removed from the house; and now, they said, these modern reformers had come to violate all that was sacred, and to go in direct opposition to the will. It was in vain that they were asked to read the will; they said they did not want to see it; that they knew very well what it ordered; that they had themselves seen the house as it had been from their earliest recollections; and that their old grandfathers could tell them that, in the memory of the oldest inhabitant, it had always stood as it then was. They accused the reformers, as they called them, of all manner of evil doings, and of every wicked motive; and, in order more fully to protect the house from the slightest alteration, they caused a new survey to be made of the premises as they then stood. In doing so they could not gainsay the three original surveys which were in their hands, and in which there was not a word said about the additions; but, having held a general meeting, they decreed that the house now consisted of twenty-four rooms; namely, the twelve mentioned in the old surveys, and twelve others which now, for the first time, were written down in the new survey. And they further resolved, that any one who did not maintain that the original house consisted of these twenty-four rooms should be shut out of the house altogether. The contest has been carried on to this day; and, even now, the dispute is as hot as ever—those who have the will, and study it, declaring that it does not contain anything to support the comparatively new additions; and that, though some of them may lay claim to considerable antiquity, none of them are as old as the house itself, by many centuries. Those, however, who have not the will, or, if they have it, do not care to read it, say, they do not mind what may be said in the old will; they know the whole building has been standing for many years; they accuse the reformers, as they still call them, of novelty, and insist that they want to pull down the old house altogether, and to build up a house entirely new, of which the original founder knew nothing. These people will listen to nothing; they will neither study the will nor be satisfied with the old surveys. Nay, so strongly are they prejudiced that, though they have themselves actually added a new room to the building within the last year, yet they still obstinately contend that, though it now contains twenty-five rooms, albeit it had but twelve months ago only twenty-four, that it is even still the same house as it came from the hands of the original founder, and that his directions never to alter the house extends to this last addition as much as to the building he had erected himself hundreds of years ago.

Reader, do you not think the best way to settle this dispute is, for both sides to read and study the will; that the one party may take nothing away from the house which is in the will; and that the other may require nothing to be retained as needful according to the founder's intention, but what the will directs; for, surely, it seems to be a reproach on the architect either to add or diminish ought from his work, which all admit was perfect?

This is a parable. Who will interpret it?

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XXXIII.

"Well, Pat," said Jem, when they met again, "are you going to be quiet, or what are you going to do at all?"

"About what we were speaking of, Jem?" said Pat.

"Aye, sure that's what we have to think of," said Jem.

"Well," said Pat, "as for thinking, sure I can think of nothing else; but for what to do, sure that's the thing to think of."

"Aye," said Jem, "to think how a man will live; but sure, that's nothing: but to think how will a man give a bit to the childer if he can't get work, sure that's the thing to think of."

"Aye, and the sore thing in earnest," said Pat; "for a man to take his two choices, to be ashamed of Christ and His Word, or else to have the childer screeching to him for their bit; and him to see his own childer hungry, and give them no more than a stone—that is the hard thing, Jem; and isn't it the hard church that puts a man to that? Is it the church of Jesus Christ at all?"

"Oh, if they would only give us the Word of God; and let us give the childer their bit ourselves," said Jem.

"They can't do it at all," said Pat; "sure they're too far gone for that: sure their church couldn't stand if they did it."

"And what's to be done with the childer," said Jem. "Sure it's not in man to see them want their bit."

"Is the Bible true at all, Jem?" said Pat.

"Oh, God save us! don't say the like of that," said Jem.

"Is there a word of truth in it at all?" said Pat.

"Oh, sure it's not in earnest you are now, Pat," said Jem.

"It's in earnest I am now, for the soul that's in me, and for the childer that God gave me," said Pat; and then Pat turned round on Jem—"and is it you that's in earnest," said he, "about the Word of God? Is it His Word at all, or is there any truth in it?"

"It's the Word of the living God, that will stand for ever and ever," said Jem.

"And would you take His word, if He spoke to you?" said Pat.

"Oh, God help me! and isn't that what I would like to do," said Jem: "but isn't it hard when the church stands between Him and me, and between the childer and their bit?"

"Jem, have you sense in you," said Pat, "and do you think that it is the church that stands between us and the hearing of what He says? sure that be to be something else besides the church that He made Himself."

"It be to be something else, that stands between a man feeding his own childer and hearing the Word of God," said Jem; "but what will a man do, Pat, when the childer is crying in the house, and him walking the road and doing nothing? Sure flesh and blood can't stand it. But what does the Word of God say about it at all?"

"Jem," said Pat, "did you ever see a bird lying dead on the ground, because it was starved?"

"I never did," said Jem; "and isn't that the quare thing to think of, now, in the hard winter, and the long snow we had last spring? and I didn't see one of them dead in the snow; and I didn't think of that before. And how did the creatures live at all, I wonder? sure there's as many as ever this summer; and, now, isn't it a wonder, and we not to think of it: sure that's another wonder, too."

"I'll tell you why, Jem," said Pat; "sure here it is in the Word of God;" and Pat pulled out his Bible, and read it out (Matthew, ch. vi., v. 26) 'Behold, the fowls of the air; for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your Heavenly Father feedeth them: are not ye much better than they?' Now, Jem," said Pat, "do you see why you didn't see the birds lying dead in the snow?"

"Well, it's ever more the little things that's biggest in the Word of God," said Jem. "Sure the birds gather up nothing for the winter, and still they get through: sure it's God done that; and it's little we think of it, till the Word of God shows it to us."

"Well, sure it isn't for the birds it's written, Jem," said Pat; "sure it's God that feeds them; but they can't read it."

"Well, now, I see it," said Jem, "what Jesus Christ said it for: he wasn't talking to the birds, when he said, 'Your heavenly Father feedeth them; are ye not much better than they?' Now, wouldn't that mean that He will care better still for us?"

"Stop, now, Jem," said Pat; "there's more." So Pat read verse 33, "But seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

"Well, that isn't the way people takes," said Jem. "Sure everybody thinks they has to look for their bit first; and if they can serve God after, and make their souls, well and good."

"And isn't that why I axed you, if there is any truth at all in the word of God, or if you will take His word when He says it?" said Pat.

"Well, that's new entirely," said Jem; "but it's not new in the word of God; for sure it was always written there, only it's new to see it. I wonder how would it be with us now, if we were just to take the word of God as if He said it to us? If we were to take Him at his word now, would He do it?"

"Isn't that just what I axed you, Jem," said Pat. "Would you take the word of God if He spoke to you, or would you leave it?"

"Aye, then, I never thought of it that way before," said Jem; "and it's frightened I was when you asked me would I take the word of God; who wouldn't, thinks I; and is the man mad that asks me, or what is he after; is it going to deny it he is? And now sure it's the very thing to ask myself, is it the word of God to ourselves, or is it not? and will I take it, or will I leave it?"

"Aye," said Pat, "isn't that what it comes to? Sure its reading the word of God we are, and don't we call it the word of God? but is it the word that God says to us, and will we take Him at His word? If He was to say it to us, would we tell Him we wouldn't take it? and did Jesus Christ say that for us, that if we seek His kingdom FIRST, that food and clothing will be added to us?"

"And how will it be, Pat, if we just take that same as if Christ said it to ourselves?" said Jem. "Was it meant now, just for you and me? for sure if it was, what would stop me to take the promise of Jesus Christ himself for the childer and me?"

"Jem," said Pat, "does Jesus Christ tell you to seek the kingdom of God?"

"What else would I seek in heaven or earth?" said Jem; "or what else in heaven or earth would Jesus Christ bid me seek?"

"Well, then, Jem," said Pat, "isn't it for me, and for you, and for every one that has to seek the kingdom of God, that Jesus Christ said this, 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you?' Didn't He mean just to clear us of them things that stops us, with His own blessed promise, that if we seek that, he'll mind the rest?"

"And will He do for us and the childer, too?" said Jem; "sure that's what goes against us."

We cannot show men in our pages: we cannot show the power of faith, and the energy in man that springs from a principle divine. But those who have felt it may imagine the earnestness of Pat, as he exclaimed—

"Will it be worse with us nor with the birds? Will He let us die in the snow no more nor them?"

We think that Pat has come near to the kingdom of God. We think he is reading God's Word as if it were in truth the Word of God, that cannot fail to them that lay hold upon it. We think his faith is becoming that victory which overcometh the world (1 John, v. 4); the faith of prophets, apostles, and martyrs; the faith of the children of God, that makes them His children, and lifts up their hearts and hopes to their Father in Heaven. And we shall look to hear what that faith leads him to do; and what it brings upon him from that Church which stands between his little children's bread and the word of God.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER 17, 1855.

MANY of our readers will, we dare say, remember the case of the monk who was convicted at the Mayo Assizes in Spring, 1852, for having, shortly before, publicly burnt a Protestant Bible in the parish of Ballyowny, near Ballinrobe, in that county; and they may possibly, also, recollect that "Brother John" was defended at the trial by an eminent counsel, Mr. Keogh—the same, we believe, who at present fills the high office of Attorney-general for Ireland.

They may possibly, also, remember that in calling their attention to the circumstance, we gave them, in our number for April, 1852, some extracts from a leading article in the Tablet, highly approving of the act, in the course of which the writer stated (we use his own words) that—

"If Brother John was guilty of an offence, he, the writer, was equally an offender. He has burned a Protestant Bible, and is prepared to burn a thousand more if he can gratify his taste economically; and we heartily wish that the whole seed, breed, and generation of them was extinguished. We beg leave perfectly to associate ourselves with 'Brother John' in this particular—to scoff at the book which he scoffed at, and to pronounce it a book put together by some of the most active friends and servants of the Fire King—in other words, 'the book of the devil.'"

The defence, of course, was, to use "Brother John's" language, that it was "not the Word of God, but the devil's book, that he was burning." A sentiment which another zealous Roman Catholic advocate of the day, the Rev. Dr. Cahill, followed up not long afterwards by making the somewhat astounding assertion that "he would rather a Catholic should read the worst books of immorality than the Protestant Bible!"*

That these were not solitary instances of the deadly hostility which Roman Catholic priests in Ireland have always evinced towards the authorized version of the Scriptures may be seen by consulting the First Report of the Commissioners of Irish Education Enquiry (Appendix, p. 510), where it is recorded in the evidence that certain priests in Connaught told their flocks that "if they read the Bible, or took it into their houses, they should be damned, and that the devil was in the Bible;" meaning, we presume, the Protestant version of it.

We thought at the time these things had enough (though it did not very greatly concern the discussions carried on in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, as the writers in it generally quote Scripture from the Douay Bible), but had hoped that we should hear no more of such outrages, especially after the just rebuke which a witness (who objected to be sworn on the Protestant Testament) not long ago received, we believe, at Kilkenny, from the learned assistant-barrister, himself a Roman Catholic, when he stated that "he had carefully compared the two Bibles, and that he saw no reason at all why Roman Catholics should object to be sworn on the Protestant Bible, and that, in point of fact, two Roman Catholic bishops had lately taken their oaths on the very book refused by the witness, and that those bishops made no objection at all to it." We are sorry to find, however, that our anticipations have been falsified, and that all previous outrages against the Holy Scriptures have been wholly cast into the shade by a scene enacted within the last few days, almost, we may say, in the metropolis of Ireland, in which not merely one obscure monk or noisy controversialist was concerned, but in which several much-lauded Roman Catholic priests seem to have been actively engaged—an occurrence we could scarcely have credited but that the substantial truth of the account has been testified by eye-witnesses beyond all impeachment.

We take the following brief account from our respected contemporary the Daily Express of Friday last:—

"THE REDEMPTORIST FATHERS CELEBRATING THE FIFTH OF NOVEMBER.

"Unauthenticated rumours and correspondence reached us on Tuesday, referring to an alleged case of wholesale Bible-burning by the Redemptorist Fathers at Kingstown. The accounts conveyed to us were almost too dreadful for belief, and we consequently abstained from giving them currency in our columns. We have since received indisputable evidence of the scandalous business; for we have not only conversed with a person that was an eye-witness of what took place, but we have seen with our own eyes a fragment saved from the 'burned sacrifice.' It appears that for some time past these fathers have been holding a series of services in Kingstown, the object of which was to spread dismay and terror among those who possibly might have come under the influence of clerical zeal or Scripture-readers connected with the Protestant Church. On Monday morning the effect of their ministrations was made visible. A fire was kindled in front of the Roman Catholic Chapel, at mid-day, in the open air, and in the presence of a large number of persons who looked on, some exulting like fiends, some excited by strong indignation, and others more in 'sorrow than in anger.' A whole load of Bibles and other sacred works was committed to the flames. The police, who saw it all, did not interfere. Is this, we ask, a Protestant country, and can it be that we are governed by Protestant laws? The Protestant Bible publicly burned by a fanatic and bigoted throng, and yet no interposition, no penalty, no punishment! The thing is monstrous!"

The following account is taken from the Dublin Evening Packet of Tuesday, Nov. 6:—

"To the Editor of the Evening Packet.

"SIR—I have this day witnessed an awful scene. You are, perhaps, aware that the Redemptorist Fathers have been holding a variety of services in the Roman Catholic chapels, at Kingstown, during the last fortnight. Large crowds have attended, and there has been great excitement among the people. A few days ago they erected, in this chapel-yard, a great red cross for the adoration of the multitude; but this morning they reached the climax, by procuring a large number of copies of the authorized version of the Holy Bible, and burning them, in open day, before the public gaze, some of the metropolitan police passing up and down till they were consumed. Comment here would be out of place.

"AN ERE WITNESS."

The Editor of the Evening Packet adds—

"Had we not the fullest confidence in the veracity of our correspondent, who sends us his name in attestation of the above, we could not believe it possible that this occurrence took place, as we may say, in the metropolis of Ireland."

What her Majesty's Attorney-General may think of such matters we know not; or whether the offence was committed in the hope that the defender of the Partree monk will not prosecute the Redemptorist Fathers, we know not; we leave such matters to the public authorities, whose duty it is to vindicate the laws: we are much more concerned in the question, what view the heads of the Roman Catholic Church will take of the affair; but we collect, from the tone of approbation with which Dr. Dixon, in his new book on the thigh-bone of the blessed Cornelius (which our readers will find some notice of in another columns), speaks of the seizure of Protestant Bibles at Nice, that the ecclesiastical authorities in Ireland are not likely to disapprove very highly of destroying any more than of seizing them. The passage we allude to is an extract from a newspaper published at Nice, in Piedmont, called La Verité, which alludes to a fact of very recent date, as follows:—

"We have spoken, in our last number, of a seizure of Protestant Bibles and heretical works effected at Nice, at the house of MM. Gay and Leon Pelatte, Protestant ministers, as also in an English family, Wilson, and at Menton, in the house of M. Trenca, Adjutant-Major of the National Guard. We are assured that in the house of one only of these gentlemen twenty-eight chests of these books were found; but that which, beyond all question, is the most striking feature of this affair is the protest addressed to the English Consul at Nice, by M. Wilson, and inserted in the journal l'Avenir. It confirms victoriously the efforts which England has made to Protestantize Piedmont, and the aid and assistance in this attempt which she is known to have given the ministry that directs the cabinet of Turin. Here is the protest—

"'I protest, in the name of the Earl of Shaftesbury, the noble President of the British and Foreign Bible Society, who, when he was at Nice, confided to my care the Bibles and New Testaments belonging to the society. He made me then promise to apprise him as soon as possible of every effort that would be made to seize these books, or to put an obstacle to their legitimate use, in order that he might, without delay, refer the matter to the government of Turin, through the medium of his friend, the Count de Cavour.

"'W. CARUS WILSON.'

"La Verité concludes by calling on the independent and Catholic press to give all the publicity in their power to these facts, which throw so much light on the misfortunes of Piedmont."—(See Dr. Dixon's book, p. 62.)

If Dr. Dixon considers the misfortunes of Piedmont to be (as we may infer he does from quoting this article) referable to the circulation of the Protestant Bible, one would naturally suppose that the remedy he proposes to avoid similar misfortunes in Ireland would be the establishment of what we have more than once ourselves suggested—a ROMAN CATHOLIC BIBLE SOCIETY, for the circulation of the Douay Bible and Rhemish Testament. The most cursory perusal of his book, however, will easily satisfy any one that his remedy for the misfortunes of Ireland is one of a very different character. He has, in fact, made the important discovery that it is bones, not Bibles, which Ireland wants for her welfare and protection at the present period. The principal object which Dr. Dixon seems to have in view is, to promote the worship or veneration of relics in general in this country by importing "a thigh bone and one of the ribs"

* See the Tablet, Dec. 17, 1853, p. 804, for which, however (as a violation of all common sense and decency), he was shortly after soundly castigated by the Rambler of February, 1854.

of a supposed predecessor, who lived 700 years ago, and introducing "his office and mass into the ancient city of Armagh, according to the rite of the greater double which they hold at Chambery, in Savoy." In p. 56 he thus describes his grief at the want of such relics in Ireland:—

"We arrived at the Cathedral of Fiesole (a small city near Florence) just as the people were coming out after last mass. The clergy, who were in the church, paid us every attention, and immediately gave orders to have the shrine of St. Donatus, which is kept on a side altar, opened, that we might see the relics of our sainted countryman, and venerate them. The interior of the shrine is beautifully ornamented, and the bones of the holy bishop are all there. On looking at that precious treasure, we could not help reflecting, with grief, on the absence from our own dear Ireland of the relics of her saints. They went to enlighten the continent by their preaching and to edify it by their holy lives, and they have left their bones to it as a precious inheritance, which has been most jealously guarded by the depositaries of that sacred treasure."*

Dr. Dixon's taste for such treasures seems to have been largely gratified during his journey. He thus describes some of his visits:—

"Commencing our journey for Sienna, we left the city (Rome) by the Porta del Popolo. It gave me great pleasure to think that I was to visit Sienna, the city of St. Catherine (whose head, it appears from another passage, p. 53, is kept at one of the altars of the church of the Dominicans in that place), and remained there for a night. I had, whilst in Rome, been delighted to see the improvements that are going on in the great Dominican Church of the Minerva, where the body of St. Catherine rests, in a marble sarcophagus, under one of the side altars. As soon as the improvements shall be finished, the body will be removed to the high altar. I had the gratification of contributing my mite towards the fitting up of this new shrine of that holy virgin. We had travelled for a great part of the day before I was aware of another happiness which I was to enjoy, even before reaching Sienna, and that was to visit Viterbo, the city of St. Rose. It was in Viterbo that we rested for dinner. Immediately after dinner, before the diligence resumed its journey, Mr. Farrelly and I were so fortunate as to find time to visit the body of St. Rose.†

"We were received with great kindness by the good nuns of the convent in which the body is kept. The saint rests on a couch placed in a gorgeous shrine. We were admitted to kiss her hand. That body, the great treasure of the convent and of Viterbo, so miraculously preserved for near six hundred years, is whole and entire. Glory be for ever to the great God!

"I was reminded by this visit of the body of another saint, which I had the happiness of visiting, and of which I was permitted to kiss the hand, in 1846, in Bologna, who died in that city on the 9th March, 1463, being then forty-nine years of age. This body is not only whole and entire, but has retained its natural flexibility like a living body; and, dressed in the nun's habit, it sits, with an air of great dignity, in an arm-chair, in a graceful and natural position, without being fastened in any way."

The secret of these apparent miracles is, however, somewhat naively let out in other passages, when explaining how the remains of the blessed Cornelius, or rather St. Concord, have assumed their present imposing appearance:—

"His relics, which had reposed for a long time in a poor walnut shrine, covered with still poorer ornaments, were, on the occasion of repairing the church, replaced by a happy idea, as a precious treasure, in a more suitable state. The wretched panel which formed the front of the shrine was replaced with a handsome plate glass, and, thanks to the zeal of several pious persons, the holy bishop is richly adorned—p. 68. This year (1854) the entire head of this holy body has been sent to Rome to have the face filled up with wax."—p. 70.

The work of the Count de Firnex, which Dr. Dixon reprints for our edification, goes into something more of detail in this matter:—

"These preliminaries (i.e., the examination of the brain of the blessed Concord by the ecclesiastical authorities at Rome) terminated, the relics were enclosed in a waxen bust, representing the saint with that natural and true expression they know so well how to give in the city of the saints. The head is a fine one, and the beholder is pleased to see imprinted on the stranger's brow the noble dignity, the serious and meditative air of the inhabitant of the North of Europe, joined to a sweetness and serenity of expression which at once recalls the distant birth-place of St. Cornelius, his exemplary life, and early death."—p. 79.

Who can say whether, without informing Dr. Dixon, the remains of St. Catherine of Bologna and St. Rose of Viterbo, "whose graceful and natural postures" in the couch and the arm-chair he, in his simplicity, referred to miraculous agency, were not really indebted for their attractions to the same miraculous power by which ecclesiastical artists in the city of saints "knew so well" how to impart to a waxen bust, in the year 1854, the natural and true expression of the fine head of St. Cornelius, who died 700 years before! We suppose, when the visit of St. Concord's head to Rome is forgotten, pilgrims in ages to come will (not knowing that all the bones of the good bishop are not still there) give glory to God for the miraculous preservation of his body, "whole and entire," and kiss his hand of wax, believing devoutly that it has been miraculously preserved from decay for seven or eight centuries!

One observation more we must make about these holy relics before we have done. It appears that it has been "a great source of joy and special exultation to the good people of Chambery to have succeeded in preserving those relics of the holy archbishop from indignity during the period of the French Revolution; and they have found by long experience that many favours have been placed by God at the disposal of the blessed Cornelius; one of which is, the procuring of rain for their parched crops, from whence arises such a special devotion to the blessed archbishop among the farmers of the whole country around" (p. 102), which Count de Firnex (p. 81) thus describes a little amusingly:—

"Since his decease he has often proved to our city that he has adopted* it for his country, by obtaining signal favours for it, through his powerful influence. A great number of cures have been operated at various epochs by his intercession, and the inhabitants remember with gratitude the beneficial rains which, after a long drought,† suddenly refreshed our harvests, because St. Cornelius was publicly invoked, or when some extensive demonstration of homage had been paid him. At one time, this celestial benefactor was so earnestly and unceasingly invoked, that he seemed to forget the honour due to his mortal remains (!) and during a procession in which his holy relics were borne, the clouds gathered quickly, and then poured their refreshing showers upon the parched earth so bountifully that, to save the Saint's body (we suppose to prevent the dry bones from being washed away), the bearers were obliged to enter a house in the suburb Reclus."

"Thus, this sacred treasure is considered as the most powerful resource of the country in unusually dry seasons; and, not only immense crowds of the people of this city, sometimes headed by their magistrates, but even the population of the surrounding parishes crowded to Lemenc, to invoke this powerful protector."

We cannot help wondering at the hardness of heart which could rob the poor farmers of Lemenc of half their "most powerful resource in dry seasons," and bring it over to Ireland, where our climate is generally deemed rather too moist already, and where, therefore, "the favours at the Saint's disposal" will be rather prejudicial than otherwise; and we cannot help sympathising with the just horror of the magistrates and population when, upon finding, at some future time, that they only procure half rain enough to refresh their parched harvests, that the real cause is that their patron saint can only now stand on one leg, the most Rev. Dr. Dixon having privately, but rather treacherously, carried off the other. "All this," Dr. Dixon admits, in page 74, "was done privately, that the people of the parish might not be generally aware of what had happened; for great as was their respect for the successor of the blessed Concord, they would hardly have endured to see so much of the bones of their revered patron and protector carried away from them." And who could say they would have been wrong, if the success of their harvests depended on their possession?

Dr. Dixon, it is evident from his whole book, is one of those pious believers who look not very pryingly into the truth or falsehood of statements, or the propriety or impropriety of conduct, as long as the cause of Rome is likely to be promoted by either the one or the other. He tells us that he saw the miraculous crucifix that bowed the head to St. Francis of Sales, in the presence of the people to whom he was preaching! (p. 63); and that he visited, in Paris, the chapel in which the Sister of Charity was favoured with the vision of the miraculous medal! (p. 65). He narrates the story of the painting of the Saviour, in the church of St. Maria, in Monticelli, at Rome, which was observed to open and move its eyes, for several months, in the year 1854! (p. 40); and he rejoices to state that Monseigneur Ginoulhac, the present bishop of Grenoble, has not the most remote doubt of the truth of the apparition of La Salette! (p. 46.) Nothing is too hard, in fact, for Dr. Dixon to swallow, except the Protestant Bible—which he looks upon as "the cause of all the misfortunes of Piedmont," and we presume heartily thanks the Redemptorist Fathers for burning them en masse at Kingstown, on the 5th November, as a substitute for the somewhat obsolete effigies of Guy Fawkes.

The struggle has fairly begun, and though, perhaps, it may be a century hence before Ireland will have finally settled the difficult question in modern theology, whether it is safer for her to put her trust in bones or Bibles, we entertain not the slightest doubt as to the ultimate result, in spite of the Redemptorist Fathers, or even the thigh-bone of the blessed Cornelius, alias Conchovar, alias St. Concord, alias Conor Mac-Concoille, alias Mac-Concalede, alias Mac-Conchailleadh, whether he were a Bishop of Iceland or an Archbishop of Armagh, a canonized saint, a schismatic, or a traitor.

REASONS FOR NOT READING THE BIBLE.

TO THE ROMAN CATHOLICS OF IRELAND.

BELOVED COUNTRYMEN—Various attempts have been made to prove that it is "the right and the duty of all men to read the Holy Scriptures."

The arguments advanced in support of this opinion have usually been drawn from three sources: from reason, from the Scriptures themselves, and from the writings of the fathers.

It has, for instance, been argued, that God in giving to mankind a revelation of his will, must have intended it for all men alike, all men alike requiring it, and must have designed that it should be as free to every man as the light which shines around us and the air which we breathe.

It has further been insisted, that the Bible itself declares this to be the design of its Author; and great stress has been laid upon those words of our blessed Redeemer, addressed to the common people, "SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES:" which they allege contain not merely a command to all to read the Scriptures, but even a solemn injunction to study them with diligence, exploring their hidden meaning, as men digging in a mine for gold or precious stones.

To the objection drawn from the obscurity of the Scriptures, and the difficulty, especially to poor and unlearned persons, of understanding them, it has been replied, that most parts of the Scripture are plain and easy to be understood, though some are obscure and difficult; that there are "shallow places," as a great Bishop of Rome once said, "in which a lamb may walk, as well as deep places in which an elephant may swim." That enough is intelligible even to a child to "instruct him to salvation," as Scripture itself testifies. That the Gospel was preached to the poor, and, therefore, may be read by them; and that it is not human learning which is required to enable any man to understand the Scriptures, but divine teaching, an express promise of which is given to all who by prayer seek it.

Then, with regard to the danger of exercising the right, as it is called, of private judgment, seeing that men may put a wrong meaning upon what they read, and thus "wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction,"

* The italics above are our own.

† Dr. Dixon here anticipates, not unnaturally, "But some one may ask, who was St. Rose of Viterbo?" The answer he gives is, no doubt, remarkable. "She was born in that city, in the year 1249, of poor parents; and God inspired her with such wisdom, that she—a poor uneducated child—was authorised by the Holy See to preach publicly and explain the Scriptures to the people, in the streets of Viterbo, at the early age of ten years! and such was the fervour of her preaching, and so great the miracles which accompanied it, that she was able effectually to counteract the evil influence of the Emperor, Frederick II., in the city of Viterbo, and to overturn there the heresy and schism which followed in the train of that impious opponent of the Holy See."

* If so, pray, what right had Dr. Dixon to interfere with him?

† As far as our experience goes, rain generally does follow a long drought! At least, in Ireland, such miracles are not uncommon!

and among other evils, endless sects and divisions arise; it is commonly answered, that God, in publishing a revelation, and commanding mankind to read it, must have foreseen all these consequences; and that everything is liable to abuse as well as the Scriptures, even the best and most necessary things; so that if the argument from the abuse of anything against its use were to stand, then it would be reasonable and right for men in general to abstain from food itself, as multitudes abuse it by sinful excess, to the destruction of their bodily health.

It is moreover asserted, that the divisions and differences referred to as consequent upon the free use of the Scriptures are more apparent than real, all who thus use them agreeing in the belief of one and the same Saviour, one and the same way of salvation, however they may differ in lesser things; so that there is a real and essential unity, though not an outward and visible uniformity.

There is, it must be confessed, considerable force in these reasonings, so that one cannot be surprised to learn that many have been convinced by them; nay, it is commonly reported, that many, impressed by the arguments thus put forward, have gone so far as to possess themselves of copies of the Scriptures, and are secretly, if not openly, engaged in the study of them, expecting that God himself will become their teacher, by sending his Holy Spirit to "guide them into all truth," in answer to their prayers to Him to this effect, offered in the name of his Son, Jesus Christ.

However this may be, in justice and faithfulness as your friend, I am bound to inform you, that however cogent may be the reasons which some have advanced for reading the Scriptures, there are, also, on the other hand, many weighty and powerful ones for not reading them.

The object of this letter, therefore, shall be to point out to you, with all plainness and honesty, what those reasons are.

In general, then, let me observe, that great disquietude and disturbance of mind are oftentimes produced by reading the Bible. A man living in the practice of any sin, or leading a worldly and ungodly life, the moment he opens the Bible, a light from heaven, as it were, flashes forth from that wonderful book, and all at once he begins to see himself and his character in their true colours. The sight is a painful one—the discovery is alarming. Either he must give up sin or close the Bible. What worldly-wise man would not choose the latter, and prefer a false peace, founded on ignorance, to parting with his sins and earnestly seeking the favour of God? Our blessed Saviour describes the very case (John, iii. 19, 20, 21):—"This is the judgment: because the light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, for their works were evil. For every one that doth evil hateth the light, and cometh not to the light, that his works may not be reproved. But he that doth truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest, because they are done in God."—(Douay Bible.)

Thus, you see there are strong and powerful reasons, operating in general to hinder or deter men from reading the Scriptures.

To come now to your own particular case as Roman Catholics, the following results would most probably follow were you to become Bible-readers—results attended with serious disturbance of mind and manifold inconveniences, as you yourselves must plainly perceive, and as I shall afterwards more fully explain. You would almost necessarily be led to make the following discoveries, among others:—

1. That Jesus Christ, the Son of God, by His ONE oblation of Himself, ONCE offered upon the Cross, made a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world.—Is. liii. 6; John, i. 29; Heb. ix. 25-28; x. 10; 1 John, ii. 2. (Douay Bible).

2. That, having risen and ascended into Heaven, He is there "always living to make intercession for us;" for which reason he is "able also to save for ever them that come to God by Him."—Heb. vii. 25.

3. That, as there is "one God," so there "is ONE Mediator of God and men—the man Christ Jesus."—1 Tim. ii. 5; John xiv. 6.

4. That confession of sin is to be made to God, who alone can forgive sin, and who will forgive it for His dear Son's sake.—Psalm xxxi. 5; Pa. l. 6; Is. xliii. 25; Dan. ix. 9: Mark ii. 7; 1 John i. 9.

5. That God promises to bestow pardon of sin and eternal life, as a free gift, upon every sinner who believes in Jesus, trusting in His merits and blood.—John, iii. 14-16, 36; v. 24; vi. 40, 47; Acts, xvi. 30, 31; x. 43; xiii. 38, 39; Rom. iii. 20-28, vi. 23; x. 1-10.

6. That "the blood of Jesus Christ," the Son of God, cleanseth us from ALL sin."—1 John i. 7; and that "by ONE oblation He hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified;" so that "there is NO MORE an oblation for sin."—Heb. x. 10, 14, 18.

7. That, consequently, there is no necessity at all, nor can be any, for either penances in this world, or Purgatory in the world to come; no need of absolutions or indulgences, or of masses either for the living or the dead, however lucrative such things may be to those who deal in them; no need of other Mediators than Jesus Christ, full of compassion and power as He is—"yesterday and to-day, and the same for ever."—Heb. xiii. 8.

Light would by this time break in on your minds as to the true motives which some may have for withholding the Bible from you.

Further you would discover:—

8. That there was not a shadow of foundation in the Scripture for the invocation of angels and departed Saints, or for prayers to the Blessed Virgin, or for bowing down to the images or pictures of any of these, or to the crucifix; but the very contrary of any warrant or authority for so doing.

9. You would, I am persuaded, be astonished and shocked to find, as you would very soon find, that there was an express commandment of God contained in your Bible (Exod. xx. Deut. v.) forbidding all that idolatrous veneration and worship last mentioned, which commandment was deliberately and dishonestly (query, prudently) left out of your Catechisms.

10. You would, very soon also discover that, by a similar fraud, or even worse, certain passages of Scripture (Apocalypse, xix. 10, and xxii. 8, 9,) directly prohibiting religious honour to be paid to angels and departed saints, were so garbled in that well-known book, Dr. Doyle's "Abridgment of Christian Doctrine," as to justify and encourage the very practices which they were intended by God to condemn.

11. You would, in common with all Protestants, soon be enabled to interpret according to the analogy of Scripture, that is, figuratively, our blessed Saviour's words at the institution of the Eucharist, "This is my body;" and would learn to shrink back with horror from the terrible guilt of offering adoration to that which was not God. You would plainly perceive that Transubstantiation was false, as well as absurd and ridiculous; that the worship of the Host was, therefore, nothing short of idolatry; and that there being no Transubstantiation, there could consequently be no such thing as a propitiatory sacrifice (as of Christ's body and blood) for sin in the mass.

12. To your astonishment, you would discover that what you have been taught to regard as a venerable and most precious sacrament, viz., Extreme Unction, without which you would be unwilling to die, was no sacrament at all; and that no passage of Scripture can even be pretended for it but one in which mention is made of anointing with oil sick persons in order to their recovery. (James, v. 14, 15.)

13. I have no doubt that your wonder would also be moved to find that so far from Celibacy being enjoined by Christ upon the ministers of His Church, as especially conducing to sanctity and fitness for their holy office, the very contrary is the fact—(see Epistles to Timothy and Titus), and that celibacy is the exception and marriage the rule for such, according to Christ's institution and God's word; the very "forbidding to marry," together with commanding "to abstain from meats," being in Scripture among the marks of the apostasy or departure from the faith which was to arise in the latter times. You would probably ask yourselves to what Church that you know of these marks belong, and to what Church ONLY?

14. Your notions respecting "The Church" itself you would speedily find to be grossly erroneous, supposing it, as you do, to be limited to one particular denomination or communion, as that of Rome, and not to consist of all true believers in Christ, of every name and in every place; or, again, that it consists of the clergy alone, who, at the best, can compose but a very small part of it.—John, x. 9; 1 Cor. i. 2; xii. 13; Eph. i. 22; ii. 20-22; vi. 22; Col. ii. 19; 1 Peter, ii. 4, &c.; Acts, xv. 4; xx, 28.

15. But the most astounding discovery of all would be that to which, in due time, probably, you would be conducted—namely, that so far from your Church being, as you now fondly suppose, THE Church of Christ, to the exclusion of the claims of every other Church in the world, she is, emphatically, the false and corrupt Church doomed to destruction, of which the Lord says, "Go OUT FROM HER, MY PEOPLE; THAT YOU BE NOT PARTAKERS OF HER SINS, AND THAT YOU RECEIVE NOT OF HER PLAGUES." (Apoc. xviii. 4.)

Beloved friends, that your minds would be seriously disturbed by these discoveries, cannot for a moment be doubted. You would feel like men suddenly awakened out of sleep and false security to the sight and consciousness of the most imminent danger. You would resemble mariners in a foundered bark, the waves and the billows every moment threatening to overwhelm you; the foundation which you deemed to be a "rock" would tremble and totter under your feet. What would you then do? The course prescribed by a regard to your eternal interest would be plain and inevitable—forsake the sinking ship, flee out of the doomed city. But other present considerations would render this course difficult. Your companions, unless they, too, saw their danger, would refuse to accompany you; nay, they would probably ridicule you as madmen, or fools, or hypocrites; perhaps violently and bitterly oppose you as enemies.

Do you not see, then, to what Bible-reading would lead you? Are there not weighty and powerful reasons against it? You would have to choose between God and men, between your soul's eternal welfare and present ease, comfort, and, perhaps, worldly interest.

The spiritual power you have so long been accustomed to dread, if you take but one step in the direction of your safety, would break forth against you in wrathful fury; thunders would roar and lightnings would flash. It is true they would not be the thunders and lightnings of heaven; they would be impotent of themselves to harm you. The anathemas, mine-denunciations, however noisy, would be innocuous, just like the petty crackle that mimic heaven's sublime terrors in the theatre. There should not "an hair of your head perish" by mere spiritual power alone. Look at the Pope of Rome—poor man! How little did his spiritual power avail, when some time since he fled from his own subjects in disguise; and never would have dared be return to this day, except under the cover and protection of foreign bayonets. Unguarded by these, he would not be safe one hour in his own capital.

All the power of your clergy to oppress is derived from the people. They never can be your tyrants without your permission. One, or two, or three, or twenty in a place may, if they fall away from them, and forsake them, be persecuted by the majority who remain blindly devoted to their interest; but let members arise, and nobly assert, in the face of heaven, their rights as men and as Christians; their right to possess and to read God's Holy Word, and to think for themselves, refusing any longer to be led blindfold in matters of eternal moment, and the iron despotism, which has so long unrighteously lorded it over men's consciences and God's heritage, will crumble into dust, and its deluded victims marvel at their own former fatuity.—I am, beloved countrymen, your faithful servant in Christ, and ardent well-wisher,

ST. PATRICK.

RELICS AT OVIEDO.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—I shall feel much obliged if you will inform me whether there is any method by which the genuineness of relics can be ascertained, or whether there is any authority in the Roman Catholic Church empowered by the Pope to distinguish true relics from spurious ones. My reason for making the question is as follows:—I lately obtained possession of the following list of relics, which are exhibited in the church of St. Salvador, at Oviedo, in Spain. This catalogue is of very modern date, being published with the sanction of the dean and chapter of Oviedo, in the year 1845. Now, although I am no very great admirer of antiquity, yet some of the relics specified in the list are so curious that I would gladly pay a visit to Oviedo, were it in my power, in order to see with my own eyes these interesting memorials of past ages, as well as the wooden chest which contains them. But here lies the difficulty. I would not like to have my journey for nothing, and to find, perhaps, at the end of it, that I had been imposed upon by an impudent fabrication. A reasonable amount of fair evidence would satisfy me—evidence, for example, which, if any of the relics were stolen, would suffice to establish their identity, and prove the right of the dean and chapter of Oviedo to the possession of them before a jury of honest men: but I must candidly confess, that I can scarcely believe that some of the bread of the last supper, of the manna that was rained down on the Jews in the wilderness, of Moses' rod, or of the roasted fish and honeycomb that our Lord ate along with his disciples, besides countless other relics, are all actually at this present moment in the Church of Oviedo, merely because the dean and chapter say they are genuine. These relics, doubtless, bring in a great deal of money to the Church; and it is an old maxim, that no man is an unprejudiced witness in his own cause.

There is one other question that I would wish to ask before I conclude. What religious benefit does to the people of Oviedo from the possession of all these objects, supposing them to be genuine? For example, the list specifies the pouch of St. Peter, part of the skin of St. Bartholomew, one of the water pots of Cana of Galilee, and various other miscellaneous articles. Now, it is plain, from the short history prefixed to the catalogue, that the presence of "the chest of imperishable wood," with its sacred contents, never saved the country which it visited from temporal evils;—for all these various places, Jerusalem, Persia, Africa, and Spain, have from time to time been overrun by infidels, and devastated by other terrible calamities. It is plain, therefore, that the chest brought no temporal blessings along with it. And what proof have we that any spiritual blessings have accompanied it in the course of its pilgrimage, or now actually belong to it? If a man disbelieves St. John's account of the miracle of Cana of Galilee, will the sight of the water-pot in the chest at Oviedo convince him? Do the people pray to the pouch of St. Peter? or do they offer up their devotions to the piece of the rock of Mount Sinai on which Moses fasted? We read in Holy Scripture that the good king Hezekiah broke in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses made, because it was the cause of the Israelites falling into idolatry. Can it be that the Church of Rome teaches her people to commit a similar offence now?

I enclose a copy of the list referred to, and beg to remain,

Your obedient servant,

INVESTIGATOR.

LIST OF RELICS AT OVIEDO.

"Brief summary of the holy relics that are venerated in the sacred depository of Oviedo, exhibited out of cases, after, through the divine mercy in the year 1075, at the instigation of our Lord the King Don Alfonso the Sixth, they were opened in the presence of many of the prelates of Spain, who, through its general overrunning (by the Moors), found themselves refugees in the said city; and likewise of the indulgences granted to this sanctuary which these persons gain who visit them, and meet as members, in virtue of this Bull.

"To all and to each of the faithful Christians to whom the present writings may come—We give to know that God, our Lord, by his wonderful power, transferred a certain chest, formed of imperishable wood by the disciples of the holy apostles, and full of their great remains, after that the holy city of Jerusalem had been subjugated by the King Chosroes—from Persia to Africa, from Africa to Carthagena in Spain, from Carthagena to Seville, from Seville to Toledo, from Toledo to the Asturias to the mountain called the Sacred Mount, and thence to this holy Church of San Salvador DE OVIEDO, where the said chest was opened, and the faithful found in it many golden caskets, and others of silver, of marble, and of coral, who unfolding with supreme veneration, certain labels that withinside were tied to each relic declared clearly what every one was: they found a large portion of the holy linen cloth with which our Saviour was wrapped in the sepulchre, and his precious cloth from the face (sudario), tinged with his most holy blood in which his most beautiful face and his sacred head had been enveloped, which with all possible veneration and reverence is to be taught every year three times; and it is well to know the periods—on Friday in the Easter week, on the 14th of September at the feast of the Exaltation of the Cross, and on St. Matthew's day, both morning and evening: a great part of the real cross of our Redeemer; eight thorns of his sacred crown; a piece of the reed that the Jews used in ridicule upon Christ; [a piece] of his tunic, of his sepulchre, of the swaddling clothes that wrapped him in the manger, of the bread of the last supper, of the manna which God rained down for the children of Israel; an image of Christ crucified, one of the three that Nicodemus made of his portrait; a large piece of the apostle Saint Bartholomew's skin; the alb which the Sovereign Queen of Heaven gave to San Ildefenso, Archbishop of Toledo; some of the milk of herself, the Mother of God, and of her precious locks and robes; one of the thirty pieces of silver for which the Jews sold Jesus Christ. They found also a phial of blood shed from the side of an image that Christians had made in the likeness of Christ, that the Jews, obstinate in their ancient unbelief, set up as a mark, and wounded the right side with a spear, from which issued forth blood and water. Some of the earth on which the feet of our Redeemer stood, when he ascended up to heaven; and [of that] when he raised Lazarus from his own tomb; of the mantle of the prophet Elijah; of the forehead and locks of St. John the Baptist; of the hair with which the blessed Mary Magdalen cleansed the feet of Christ; of the bones of the holy innocents, and of the three youths, Ananias, Azarias, and Mishael; part of the rock that closed the Lord's sepulchre; of the olive branch that he carried in his hand, when he entered Jerusalem on the ass; of the rock of Mount Sinai, on which Moses fasted; a part of the rod with which Moses divided the Red Sea; a piece of the roasted fish and of the honeycomb that our Lord eat along with his disciples, when he appeared to them after his resurrection; the vestment of San Tyrso, the martyr; a hand of the proto-martyr, Stephen; the sandal or sole of St. Peter, the apostle, and part of his chain; a pin, or spoke (navaja), from the wheel that martyrized Santa Catalina (Catharine), the martyr; relics of the twelve apostles, of the prophets, and of their bones; the pouches of St. Peter and St. Andrew, apostles; four bones from the head of St. Librada, virgin and martyr; relics of St Lawrence and St. Stephen; and of Saints Cerveo and Daminn; and Stephen, the pope and martyr; Bishop Martin, Facundus, Primitivus, Justus, Pastor, Adrian, Natalia, Mames, Verisimo, Maximius, Vedulus, Pantaleon, Cyprian, Christopher, Cucufatus, Suplicio, Aguedn, Emeterius, Celedonius, Fructuosus, Augurius, Eulogius, Victor, Justa, Rufina, Seroanda, Germamio, Sergius, Bachius, Julian, Felix, Peter, the exorcist; Eugenius, the deacon; Vincent, St. Anna, Felix, Faustus, Beatrice, Petronilla, Eulalia, the Barcelonese; Emilia, Jeremias, the martyr; Pomposa, Colegius, and Exportalius. And besides these, many bodies, bones, and relics of saints, prophets, martyrs, confessors, and virgins, are treasured amongst the others, whose number God alone knows. Outside of the said chest, there was also a cross of the purest of gold, wrought in the same church by the hands of angels, like that celebrated cross with which the King Don Pelago conquered the army and arrogant Saracens, during their general overrunning of Spain, which gave a happy beginning to its restoration to the Catholics. One of the six water jars in which Christ our Lord changed the water into wine; and the bodies of the holy martyrs, Eulogius and Lucretia; that of St. Eulalia, of Merida, our patroness; those of St. Pelago and St. Vincent, abbots and martyrs; those of St Julian, Archbishop of Toledo, and of St. Serranus, bishop. There are, also, in this church, the bodies of King Don Alonso, the chaste, who founded it, and of many other ancient kings of Spain.

"Whomsoever God calls to visit such precious and glorious gifts, know ye, that by apostolical authority, granted for the purpose by the bishop of this holy church, the third part of the penalty of their merited sins is forgiven, besides which, they obtain one thousand four years and six lents (cuarentenas) of indulgence. You are made members and participants of all the sacrifices in this church, and likewise the Pope Eugenius IV., and other pontiffs, by these Bulls and apostolic deeds, will concede plenary indulgence, even in the article of death, to all believers who visit this said church, truly repentant of your faults and holding firm intention to make confession at the periods that the canonical law appoints—the day of exaltation of the cross in September, and when it may fall on Friday during thirty other days before and following; and also every year in whatever day the said fiers happens, for a week before and a week after, which apostolic concession and favour will last for ever.

These are the gifts with which divine mercy has enriched this sacred church, fortified the Christian religion, and liberated [it] from captivity by the Moors, in testimony of which, we, the Dean and Chapter of the Sacred Church of Oviedo, cause these notifications (presentes) to be given forth. Printed by Don. Benito Gonzales and Co. 1845."

We thank our correspondent, INVESTIGATOR, for his letter, and the interesting document which he has kindly enclosed in it. The list of relics, we believe, is not of modern invention. It has been long in existence; and a translated copy, very similar to what has been just given, appears in the Miscellaneous Tracts of Dr. Michael Geddes, London, 1705, vol. ii., pp. 227-230.

With regard to our correspondent's questions, we fear we can scarcely hope to give such replies as will entirely satisfy him. There is, we believe, an officer at Rome whose proper duty it is to certify the truth and genuineness of such relics as are brought to him for inspection. If INVESTIGATOR will take the trouble of referring to a book lately published, containing the account of the Most Rev. Dr. Dixon's journey to Rome, he will find mention made of the functionary to whom we allude. And we may remark, in passing, that the supposed case put by our correspondent, of some of the relics at Oviedo being stolen, happens just to apply to Dr. Dixon's case; for, as all the world knows that that reverend prelate has lately been engaged in stealing, or at least appropriating (if a polite word must be used) and carrying off the thigh-bone of the blessed St. Concord, he ought to be a fit judge of the question of identity himself. But the best judges will sometimes be mistaken. It is a provoking thing, when a thief picks a pocket of a purse, to find the purse empty; and we think that, in another part of the present number, we have given pretty clear proof that Dr. Dixon has fallen into a similar predicament with regard to what he took for the thigh-bone of Archbishop Cornelius.

We have not space to enter upon the consideration of the second question fully; but we reply that we know of no benefit which can possibly accrue to any church or people from the possession of any relics whatsoever. Some people, no doubt, allow their veneration for Christ and his apostles to vent itself on tangible objects supposed to be connected with them, or on supposed holy places, to which they make pilgrimages. Our divine Master "left us an example that we should follow his steps;" instead of which, they go to Jerusalem, to tread literally on the ground he trod. Instead of "putting on Christ" as the apostle exhorts us, they venerate a tunic He is supposed to have worn, or bits of wood of the supposed "true cross;" or procure a bottle of water from the river Jordan for baptizing their children. Instead of being "followers of the apostles, even as they were of Christ Jesus," they bow down before the fragments of their bones, or locks of their hair, &c. All this, in our opinion, is as if some one, when shown a tree bearing delicious and wholesome and nourishing fruit, should neglect the fruit and try to feed on the leaves or bark; or as if, when he had received a package of the most valuable goods, he should lay them by, and make no use of them, but wear with much pride the canvas wropper in which they are packed up. There is not a single text of the New Testament which either mentions relics or sanctions their use, or attaches any spiritual benefit to the possession of them. If there be, we shall feel much obliged to any of our Roman Catholic correspondents who will call our attention to it. Suppose that we could be put in possession not only of "a piece of the skin of St. Bartholomew," and of "the sandal of St. Peter," but of the bones of all the apostles, what good would they do to us, if we wanted the faith and obedience of those holy men? "Blessed are they," said our blessed Lord, "who have not seen, and yet have believed" (St. John xx. 29). The people of Oviedo may pride themselves, if they will, upon the possession of the "precious locks and robes of the Virgin Mary." We agree with our correspondent in thinking that the mere assertion of the dean and chapter of the Church of St. Salvador is rather scant evidence on which to rest the genuineness of such relics. But to us the question of identity is immaterial. The relic which, for our parts, we should desire to be possessed of, is to be made partakers of the blessing which our blessed Lord bequeathed to His church, when He said, "Whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother" (Mark iii. 31.) This is a treasure which every sincere Christian, whether in Ireland or elsewhere, can labour to obtain. It is one which does not depend for its reality upon the word of any man or set of men; and if a Christian, according to our Lord's promise, can, even in this life, be brought into the same relationship to Him in which his mother stood, he will need to care very little for the locks of St. John, the hair of Mary Magdalen, or the bodies, bones, and relics of saints without number, which are said to be enshrined in the marvellous chest at Oviedo.

ON BIBLE BURNING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—You have, from time to time, inserted in your paper inquiries from me concerning doubts that had arisen in my mind relative to some doctrines that are taught in the Catholic Church, and some articles of faith proposed to those who are educated in her creed.

Will you now permit me to address to you a few observations on a subject on which I never had, and never could have, the slightest doubt. I allude to the manner in which the word of God is spoken of and treated by some members of the Catholic Church. I think of it with heart-felt sorrow, and confess it with the keenest shame; and I feel confident that my feelings are shared by many Catholics who have never, as yet, felt other reason to doubt the doctrines or to blush for the deeds of their Church.

I trust the circumstance related in yesterday's Saunders is either utterly untrue or a gross and aggravated misrepresentation; perhaps, even if any books were burned, the Bible was not amongst them. It is so long since I heard of such an atrocity that I had persuaded myself it could never occur again.

I have compared many parts of the Douay and the authorized versions, and, so far as I have seen, there is but one word on which any rational complaint of a difference of translation could be founded. The similarity is so nearly complete, that if I were to burn an authorized, that is, a Protestant Bible, I should feel I had burned all that is revealed as necessary to salvation in the Douay or Catholic version. In recalling such portions of both versions (bearing on this subject) that I can remember without immediate reference to both, the impression on my mind is, that the first crime proposed by Satan to man was a disregard of God's word. He first insinuates, by a contemptuous exclamation, his disbelief that what Eve had heard could be really the word of God, and then boldly declares that word to be untrue. We all know that this led to a practical defiance of God's word on the part of Eve; but who amongst us can really estimate the results of that defiance—a defiance or disregard of the spoken word of God. The curse that followed on the destruction of God's written word by the impious Joakim is not less terrible than that announced to Adam. What woe, what suffering, what destruction, was not intimated in "all the evil" that God had pronounced on Joakim, on his children, his servants, and his subjects, "after that the king had burnt the roll."—Jeremias xxxvi., 29.

At first sight, these threats appear to contain all the evil that could be inflicted on those who attempt to bring discredit upon, or to destroy the Word of God; but our Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, discloses in His own words, in the New Testament, the further attempt of Satan to take the word of God out of the hearts of men, and reveals his reason for doing so—"Lest they should believe and be saved." Where he succeeds, there is no further curse for man. What reward will he give to those who aid him? Should he even bestow on them the bishop's mitre, the cardinal's hat, or the Pope's tiara, would it not be "better for them that a millstone were hanged about their necks and that they were drowned in the depths of the sea?"—I am, sir, yours, &c.,

IN EARNEST.

We fully appreciate our correspondent's sentiments, and are quite sure that the whole of the respectable Roman Catholic laity of Ireland feel nothing but shame and horror at the atrocious outrage alluded to. We entertain no doubt whatever that a number of Protestant Bibles were publicly burned in the chapel-yard at Kingstown, on the 5th of this month, though we have just learned that one of the six or seven Redemptorist Fathers who were there at the time, the Rev. L. De Buggenoms, has publicly disclaimed that he ordered or sanctioned it, and says that if it was done it was "contrary to his wishes." How far it can be proved to have been done by the directions of any particular Roman Catholic priest, parochial or otherwise, will, we presume, be, ere long, tried in a court of criminal law; and, therefore, we forbear any remarks upon that subject, further than to say that we find it rather difficult to believe that a bonfire of any kind could take place in the open day, in the immediate precincts of a large parochial chapel, without the knowledge and approbation, at least, of some of the ecclesiastics connected with it.

ON RELIGIOUS CONTROVERSY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—The part of your paper which I often read with most interest, and which I have reason to believe that others read with equal satisfaction, is the correspondence. Although a Protestant myself, yet I always like to see what able and well informed Roman Catholics can say in defence of the faith of their church; and I am sure it will be generally admitted, that many of the letters which, from time to time, have appeared in your journal, from Roman Catholics, have done great credit to their ability and learning.

There is one point, however, in which I must confess I feel disappointed. All these letters have been from laymen, and no Roman Catholic priest has ever come forward to accept the challenge you have so often given, to enter upon an amicable and temperate discussion of the leading points of controversy between the two churches. And why should this be so? St. Peter has left the Christian church an express command on this point, which I think no one claiming the character and office of a Christian minister can safely afford to disregard. "Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you" (1 Peter iii., 15). If all the ministers of a religion will always keep obstinately silent, they have only themselves to blame if the public at last conclude that they have not much to say for themselves.

The chief reason for my writing to you is to call your attention to the reasons which Mr. Faber, in a work lately published, gives for the silence of his brother priests, but which, I must confess, appears to me far from satisfactory. It is plain, from his remarks, that he was galled and nettled at hearing the charge put forward in some quarter or other, when he must have been conscious that there was so much reason and truth in it; and his efforts at defence seem to leave the matter pretty much where it stood before. He says (vide the "Blessed Sacrament", page 371):—

"From the Council of Trent downwards, the church has had a succession of theologians of the most profound thought and the most brilliant genius, yet we hardly ever see in modern Anglican controversy the slightest vestige of the writers having read Vasquez, Suarez, De Lugo, Viva, and the like, but, on the contrary, plain evidence that they have not."

Surely, if Roman Catholic priests have all the arguments ready made to their hand, by "theologians of the most profound thought and the most brilliant genius," it would be, to say the least, but common charity to their erring Protestant brethren to bring forth a few crumbs of spiritual food from their abundant stores, especially when the editor of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN promises to be at the cost of paper and print.

But, sir, I think Mr. Faber does plain injustice when he speaks of modern Anglican writers not affording the slightest vestige of having read the works of Vasquez, Suarez, and the like. Sure I am that I have, more than once, seen their names in the foot-notes of your pages; and, I will make bold to say, that you have given more copious citations and references to their great champion, Cardinal Bellarmine, than are to be found in many Romish works of theology. Mr. Faber's excuse, therefore, will not apply to you. And, indeed, when I turned over to the next page of his book, I saw pretty plainly that he felt his own argument insufficient. When men cannot give a good defence for themselves, they generally lose their temper; and so Mr. Faber, for want of satisfactory reasons, begins to scold and call names. Here is what follows:—

"And yet, these very men (the Anglican divines before mentioned) are writing books which professedly treat of theological subjects, and when we ignore them, or leave their precious lucubrations unanswered, they think it passing strange and peevish in us that we can find anything more important or more interesting in life than to answer their objections, which have been answered completely a hundred years ago."

The italics, I may remark, are mine, not Mr. Faber's; but the whole tone of the passage indicates an uneasy consciousness that, after all, these "precious lucubrations," as he terms them, ought to be answered, and that priests are apt to grow fretful and "peevish" when they are asked to reply to them, and are obliged, from some cause or other, to maintain an obstinate silence.

I hope, sir, that out of the two thousand priests in Ireland, some one will at length be found willing to commence a discussion in your pages, of one or more of the chief points of controversy. I am confident that his arguments would be read with deep interest by all your numerous readers, both Roman Catholic and Protestant; and the character for impartiality which you have so justly earned would, I am sure, induce you to take every care that both sides should have fair play.—I am, sir, yours, &c., A MUNSTER MAN.

We feel obliged to our correspondent for directing our attention to Mr. Faber's remarks. We agree with him in thinking that there must be some other reasons for the silence of the Roman Catholic priests than those which Mr. Faber puts forward. For ourselves, we can only repeat, what we have a dozen times said already, that our pages are freely open to any Roman Catholic correspondent, whether priest or layman, who, in a candid and temperate spirit, desires to lay his views before the public. Our only object is the promotion of truth.

THE EFFECT OF PRAYER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

YOUR HONOUR,—On the last Sunday in October, I was passing a church after dusk in the evening, and thinks I, I'll just turn in, and sure nobody will know it. Well, your honour, I was well pleased; for sure I heard the Protestants singing the hymn of the Blessed Virgin herself, where she said that all generations should call her blessed; and thinks I, the Protestants can't be so bad at all—sure it can't be their religion to hate the Blessed Virgin when they sing that. But it isn't about that I am writing at all, your honour; it's about the beautifullest prayer that ever I heard with my mortal ears; and there was a man kneeling down beside me that had a prayer-book, and he let me read it, and I just took and got it by heart; and it's night and morning I'll pray that prayer, for sure it's just the very prayer I want; and I'll tell it to your honour, for sure I have it by heart, and maybe there is other poor men would be as glad of it as me. Well, your honour, here it is—

"Grant, we beseech thee, merciful Lord, to thy faithful people pardon and peace, that they may be cleansed from all their sins, and serve thee with a quiet mind, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen."

Well, now, if God would just give me pardon and peace, and just cleanse me from all my sins, instead of sending me running after stations, and penances, and indulgences, and still hunting for pardon and peace and never finding it, and trying to leave a little money behind me, to pay for masses to get me peace when I was dead; if he would just get me quit of all that, and give me pardon and peace now, and cleanse me of my sins at once, isn't it I that would love to serve Him with a quiet mind, after what He done for me. So, your honour, I never quit praying the beautiful prayer I got. Well, your honour, as I was walking away, who would I fall in with only the clergyman himself, and he bid me good evening kindly, and asked me was I in church; and I told him I heard the beautifullest prayer at all; and many's the time, says I, I wished for a prayer like that. And did you never hear it before? says he. Never heard it before, your reverence, says I. And were you never at mass, on this Sunday of the year? says he. Always regular, your reverence, says I. Then you always heard that same prayer, says he. Please your reverence, says I, as I'm a living man, I never heard that prayer afore, since pussy was a cat. Well, your honour, up comes a man and calls him away, in a hurry to see a man that was dying, so I couldn't learn any more out of him, and I didn't know what to think at all. Well, the next day, I meets a neighbour that was just come out of Dublin, and he has with him a beautiful blue book, that was just written by Dr. Dixon; that's our primate, your honour. Well, I hadn't much time for the book, only I just read the first chapter, that told how he was at Rome itself, and how he saw the Pope, and give him a copy of a book he wrote about the Scripture, and how his Holiness said the book couldn't be any good to him at all, 'cause why, it was written in English. Well, your honour, with that it just come across me all at once, may be the Church of Rome has the beautiful prayer in the Latin, and may be that's just the reason why I never knew one word about it, good nor bad, when I don't know one word of the Latin, no more nor the Pope does of English; and then how would the prayer do any good to me, no more nor the book would to him? Well, I just thought I would ask your honour; for sure isn't it the quare thing, if the churches is so different, that they would both have the one prayer, and no difference at all only the Latin and English. But sure, your honour, isn't that all the differ in the world to a poor man like me?

Your honour's servant to command,
PAT MURRAY, of Westmeath.

Pat Murray is quite right; both churches have the beautiful prayer, and a great many other prayers too. These prayers have come down from a very early time of the church, before there were any differences among Christians. The only difference about these prayers is this—the Church of England and Ireland wishes people to understand the prayers of the early church, and the Church of Rome does not; and we agree with Pat Murray, that in the matter of prayer, this makes all the difference in the world.

HOLY WELLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

MR. EDITOR,—In your number of the LAYMAN for July last, you had the goodness to publish a letter of mine relative to the sending of the blessed stones of Barigowen well to Sebastopol, in order to save the life of one of our brave soldiers engaged in that protracted siege; and as you said that you would wish to hear more about those "holy wells," I now take the liberty of furnishing you with an account of what's done at a few of them, and which I have visited often since my boyhood, in company with a great many others, who went from curiosity to see so many people praying at them.

Within three miles of the flourishing town of Tralee, and two of the ancient borough of Ardfert, is to be found "Tobar na mult," i.e. Weather's Well, to which thousands of both sexes resort, of all ages, from every corner of Ireland. The blind and lame, halt and maim, the deaf and the dumb, flock there to be cured of their diseases; and such as cannot go themselves are sure to have their "rounds" given by proxy. At the north-east end of the field stands "the holy well," or "great well," as some call it; it is surrounded with a high wall, and is kept carefully locked, open only for the pilgrims, who pay a-pence for washing in its sanctified waters, and is entered by a descent of stone steps. Those who cannot pay for the "great well" wash in the stream which flows from it, gratis; but they are informed that no benefit is to be derived without paying for it, and bathing in the large well, where there is a trout, the Saint of the well, which is seen once in every seven years by some favoured ware-shipper. You cannot imagine the eagerness with which the water is drank; although, while it is being handed round, more than one diseased person is washing in it in a state of nudity. Whilst this strife is going on at the well for the water, a number of other pilgrims are going round an old tree and a little cabin at the western end of the well, repeating their paters and aves, which they tell over by the decades on their beads: each as had no beads counted their ave marias, beginning at the little finger of the left hand, and ending at the little finger on the right: thus they hasten on to a mound of earth, on which is built a low altar of stone, before which they prostrate themselves, and walk round on their bare knees three times, stopping before the western side of the altar each time, and kissing three pictures of stone, which are fastened with mortar into the altar, nine times, and rubbing them nine times more with the right hand, which is to be rubbed as many more times to the part diseased. Those pictures are said to be "constantly sweating." When the devotions of the day are over, the jaded pilgrims hasten to partake of the stimulating beverage, freely offered for sale in several tents, where the lively strains of the bagpipe and fiddle drive away the remembrance of this troublesome penance, and soon afterwards they join in the merry dance.

Barigowen well, which is within a few miles of Askeaton, is also a very great resort, and is accounted famous for working miracles. I saw a priest's sister and nephew at this well, who travelled to it a distance of forty-six miles; and as I wish to have no secrets from you, the priest's name is Mr. ———, curate of ———.* The field surrounding this, on St. John's eve, was literally crowded with people, some of them very well dressed; and as you approach the well, from the road, the low monotonous chant of the paters and aves which fall on the ear is more easily conceived than described.

Three years ago I had a conversation with a man near Belmullet, in Mayo, on the dishonour paid to God by visiting such unhallowed places. "Arrah, hold your tongue, man," said Monaghan, "and leave off wid your talk; in troth, I wish you seen the trout that's in the blessed well near Castlebar, and one side of him fryed; for a heretic (a Protestant) saw him one evening swimming about in the well. He ran into the blessed well, and caught the trout, and got him fryed by the cook of the Castlebar hotel for his dinner; but when the cook went to turn him, he gave one jump up the chimley, and never stopped till he came back to the well again; for the trout was the blessed Saint of the well." "Did you see the trout in the well after being fryed, Mr. Monaghan?" said I. "In troth, then, I did, and seen the side that was fryed as brown as a berry from the pan, and, more by token, the other side was as bright as a [illegible]. Och, but where's the use in talking; you won't believe what a man seen with his eyes!"

Hoping, sir, that you will excuse the length of this letter, I remain, your humble servant till death,
HUMPHREY LEARY.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

Wheat sowing should be proceeded with as fast as the root crops are removed. Split the drills with the double mould board plough, to raise the manure, and harrow well to spread it equally over the surface, the seed may then be sown broadcast, and ploughed in; or, if the soil be sufficiently loose and friable, it may be put in by the drilling machine; if the latter is not in use on the farm, the land may be ribbed up with the common plough, at any distance from twelve to eighteen inches apart, the seed sown broadcast, and covered with short tined harrows, first in the direction of the ribs or drills, and then across them.

Winter Vetches may be sown in the early part of the month. If the land be dry, sow in beds six to eight feet wide, covered from the furrows. A liberal dressing of manure should be applied. Four stones of vetches will seed the Irish acre; and if three or four stone of rye, or winter dun oats be mixed with them, they will protect and support the vetches.

Potatoes.—In dry, favourable weather, plant some early potatoes. Apply a liberal quantity of stable manure. Plant in lazy beds, three and a half to four feet wide, and give at least six inches of cover, which will effectually protect them from frost and [illegible] wet.

* The names are given, but to avoid giving offence to individuals we omit them.

Apostolical Succession Overthrown, and Evangelical Succession Established,

By a Comparison of the Qualifications, Functions, and Endowments respectively assigned by Jesus Christ to the Apostles, and to their successors in the Ministry of the New Covenant.

BY A CLERGYMAN OF THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

"The author proves that the Apostles, as such, had no successors; that the commission given to them, as ministers of the Gospel, was totally distinct from the commission under which they exercised apostolic authority; and that the radical error of Rome and Romanizers consists in claiming not only the untransferable prerogatives of the Apostles, but even greater powers than the apostles ever attempted to exercise. The argument is elaborised with much care, and the book deserves an attentive perusal."—Achill Missionary Herald.

Preparing for Publication, in 12mo.,

The World in which I Live, and my Place in it,

BY E. S. A.

Edited by the Rev. JOHN H. BROOME.

The object of this book is to present a succinct history, from the creation to the present time, in connection with Scripture, and with the progress of the Church of Christ.

It is hoped that this slight sketch of the History of the World and of the Church may help the young reader to discern God's moral government and man's duty.

The study of History invariably inculcates principles.

The Romish Church, alive to this fact, is most careful that the Histories put into the hands of her children shall be those of her own writers. But the Protestant Church has hitherto possessed no Epitome of History sufficiently simple to meet the requirements of her youthful students.

The plan of the book embraces a general view of the History of all known nations, having regard to their chronological connection with each other, with copious and comprehensive indexes; and by thus commencing the study of history from the beginning, a good foundation will be laid for the fuller study of any particular History.

The Book will be Published by Subscription, price 5s. 6d., and the Names of intending Subscribers are requested to be sent to WILLIAM CURRY and Co., Dublin, or to Wertheim and Macintosh, London, as early as possible.

By the Rev. J. A. WYLIE, LL.D., Author of "Modern Judea;" "Scenes from the Bible," &c.

"This is a remarkable book. Its descriptions are literally fascinating. The great scenery of Italy has been painted by tourists since the days of antiquity, but the sketches of Dr. Wylie possess a freshness and an interest peculiar to the author; and it is no exaggeration to say that many of these sketches, in relation even to familiar objects, are surpassed by no similar descriptions in the English language. . . . Dr. Wylie's book administers to the Roman Papacy a deadlier blow by far than any merely theological disquisition could have inflicted, and for this paramount reason, that its social workings are here exhibited in the shape of undeniable, terrible facts."

SAVONAROLA.

We are informed by travellers in Persia, that the following strange and remarkable phenomenon is occasionally beheld in those regions. Some time before day-break, the eastern horizon presents all the usual symptoms of the near approach of dawn. Faint streaks of light are seen in that part of the sky, which gradually increase in brilliancy, and the inexperienced traveller imagines that night is at an end, and that the day, whose arrival he has, perhaps, long wished for, is at length about to break. Soon, however, the light fades away, and is succeeded by a darkness like that of midnight, which seems the more intense from its contrast with the momentary splendour which preceded it. To this phenomenon is given the name of the false dawn.

It has often seemed to us that the foregoing circumstance furnishes no unsuitable emblem of the fate of those isolated reformers, of whom we occasionally read in history, who have lived before their time. When the world has long groaned under some system of tyranny and corruption, men of loftier spirits, full of warning and zeal, from time to time make their appearance, and raise their voice against the evils of the age. Such men, after diffusing a momentary light among their own contemporaries, have sometimes been suddenly removed by death at an early age, leaving behind them but little trace of their existence; and the minds of those who read the chequered narrative of their lives are impressed with a feeling of despondency and regret, that, owing to untoward circumstances, such great talents and energies have been lost to the world, which, under happier auspices, might have raised their possessors to a high place among the illustrious benefactors of mankind.

The remarkable individual whose name we have placed at the head of this article—Girolamo Savonarola—appears, from all that we know of his history, to have been a man such as we have just described. Had he lived about twenty years later than he did, we see much reason to believe that his ardent zeal for the cause of truth and holiness would have led him to co-operate with the great German reformer, Martin Luther, in the important work of the Reformation. But in the days of Savonarola, the minds of men, at least in Italy, were not yet ripe for such a change; and all the efforts which he made to produce an impression upon his countrymen, and to stir them up for a vigorous effort for Church reform, ended in disappointment, and brought Savonarola himself to a cruel and untimely end. Such men, however, do not live in vain. We feel convinced that no person whose own heart is animated by a sincere love of truth, can fail to leave some impression behind him. If he labours earnestly and diligently for the spiritual good of others, his exertions, sooner or later, will lead to salutary results, although not always, perhaps, in the way which we should expect. The motives of Savonarola have, indeed, been called in question, and his sincerity impugned, by various writers, both in ancient and modern times. We are far from asserting that he was a faultless character, or that his conduct was in all respects worthy of imitation, but we fully believe him to have been sincere in his labours for the good of his countrymen; and, as the events of his chequered career were so strange and tragical, we trust the following brief account of them will not prove unacceptable to our readers.

Girolamo Savonarola was born at Ferrara, in the year 1452, and was admitted a friar of the Dominican order, at Bologna, when he was of the age of twenty-two. His Superiors at first employed him to teach metaphysics and natural philosophy; but at length he grew weary of this avocation, and applied himself entirely to the reading of pious books, and especially the Holy Scriptures. In the year 1489, he removed to Florence, where he soon acquired great fame as a powerful and convincing preacher. Florence at that time was governed by Lorenzo de' Medici, the father of Pope Leo X.; and the dissolute morals of both court and people, and their utter disregard for religion, must have awakened no ordinary feelings in the breast of a zealous and ardent man like Savonarola.

It would be impossible, consistently with our usual limits, to give our readers any idea of the lamentable state of morals and religion in Italy during the latter half of the fifteenth century. We will content ourselves with citing the unimpeachable testimony of Cardinal Bellarmine. "Some years before the rise of the Lutheran and Calvinistic heresy, according to the testimony of those who were then alive, there was an almost entire abandonment of equity in the ecclesiastical judgments; in morals, no discipline; in sacred literature, no erudition; in divine things, no reverence; religion was almost extinct."* However the advocates of the Papal cause may endeavour to excuse and palliate this fearful state of things, the fact itself remains on record, that vice and irreligion rose to an unprecedented height at a time when the Pope and clergy of the Church of Rome had uncontrolled sway; and that, so far from checking those things, they themselves set an example of every kind of enormity. In a recent number of the able Roman Catholic periodical, the "Dublin Review," the writer of an eloquent article on the life of Savonarola makes the following remarkable statement on this subject:—

"The time in which he (Savonarola) lived, was such as to task the strongest intellect and the firmest will; well might he strive to look forward to the future for light, when the present closed so dark around. Well might he turn to read and expound with ardent longing the prophecies which told of the Church's never-failing life and perpetual renovation, when he saw so many of her ministers around him, sunk in vice, and simony enthroned on the chair of Peter."†

The two Pontiffs who occupied the Papal chair in the time of Savonarola, and one of whom is alluded to in the last paragraph of the foregoing extract, were Sixtus IV. and Alexander VI. In former numbers of this journal, we have made some remarks on the characters of these two men;‡ and the facts of their history must have been indeed notorious, to have wrung such a sentence of condemnation from the pen of a Roman Catholic writer as that which we have just quoted. Sixtus IV., has been charged with unnatural crimes; and it is recorded that he devised a new mode of replenishing the sacred treasury—namely, the establishment of brothels in Rome! It would be superfluous to say a word about Pope Alexander VI. A Romish historian was obliged to combine three of the most atrocious monsters to be found in the annals of pagan Rome, in order to obtain any thing like a parallel to the enormities of this man. Nero, Caligula, and Heliogabalus must be united, in order to shadow forth the character of—if it may be said without impiety—this vicar of Christ. His next successor but one, Julius II., scarcely, if at all, fell short of his wickedness. Perjury, poisoning, assassination, drunkenness, unnatural crime, were laid to his charge. He was, moreover, a ferocious and merciless soldier. It was a saying of those times, that the earth drank in more blood in a single day, shed through his means, than he himself and his fellow-revellers had drunk wine during his whole pontificate. Such were the characters of the men who occupied the papal chair, and were the infallible depositories of the Roman Catholic faith, at the close of the fifteenth century!

It is with much reluctance that we have cited some of the foregoing particulars; but when Roman Catholic controversialists attack the conduct of the Reformers, and impugn the sincerity of their motives, we are compelled to open the pages of their own historians, and to point out to them there the scenes of iniquity perpetrated at the very time of the Reformation, by the supreme rulers of their Church, which claims to be exclusively holy and infallible. Without some knowledge of the facts to which we have alluded, it would be impossible for the ordinary reader to form any notion of the fearful torrent of vice and immorality, which Savonarola, alone and almost unaided, undertook to stem. Nothing, as it appears to us, but the greatest singleness of purpose, and the most undaunted courage, could have induced him to commence so arduous and almost hopeless a task.

The success of Savonarola's efforts at reform in Florence however, soon became visible to all men. The mass of the people were aroused from their sloth and sensuality, and flocked in crowds to the Church of St. Mark, which soon became unable to contain the multitudes that were drawn together by the fame of the preacher. The writers of that time have left on record statements with regard to the wonderful results of his eloquence, which might almost seem exaggerated, if their testimony was not so clear and unanimous. "He thundered," says one writer, "against the dissolute morals of the age with such marvellous eloquence and such great success that he beat the minds of his auditors whithersoever he desired, and infused a zeal for piety and religion even into the most abandoned breasts. All Italy seemed to hang upon the mouth of the speaker."* The times of the ancient prophets, according to another writer, seemed to have returned, and Jonah's preaching to the people of Nineveh, recorded in holy Scripture, was the only fitting counterpart of that of the Dominican monk. "The stories that are told of the Christian eloquence of Savonarola," saith he, "might seem strange and incredible if they were not borne out by his writings. . . . He not only recalled the people of Florence to a more sober and modest course of life, but even stirred up among them a spirit of mourning like that of the Ninevites, from which circumstance the name of "mourners" was given to them."† The name Piagnoni, or "Weepers," which is here alluded to, and which was commonly given to the followers of Savonarola, is the best proof of the influence wielded by this remarkable man over the susceptible minds of his countrymen, and of the success of his efforts for their improvement. So high was his character for piety and zeal, that Lorenzo de' Medici, although personally hostile to Savonarola, received him when he was on his death-bed, in 1492, and asked for his benediction.

It soon became manifest to the earnest mind of Savonarola that the greatest enemies and obstacles to a reform in morals and religion were the bishops and clergy of the Church of Rome. He saw plainly, that if any permanent improvement among the people was to be effected, the whole system of that Church must be thoroughly reformed. John Picus Mirandola, the friend and biographer of Savonarola, and who was intimately acquainted with his opinions, draws the following melancholy picture of the state of the Romish Church at that time, and assigns this as the chief cause which stirred up the Florentine reformer to take the course which he subsequently pursued. "The Popes were openly accused of having obtained the Papedom by craft and stratagem, perfidy and simony, so that scarcely any one could be found who doubted the truth of the assertion. It was likewise alleged that when they had obtained the Papal chair, their time was occupied with harlots and impure men, and the heaping up of gold; and, moreover, that the Cardinals and Bishops who were under them followed their example. Among them there was not even the most moderate regard paid to the worship of God or religion; nay, it was even alleged that some of them did not worship God at all, and uttered contemptuous and reproachful sayings regarding our holy faith. Many of those priests, moreover, who had adopted a religious life, and professed the usual rules, by degrees glided into hypocrisy."* What an awful account of the state of a Church calling itself Christian, and claiming to be the sole and exclusive depository of faith and morals! Popes, bishops, cardinals, priests, monks, stained with simony, avarice, sensuality, hypocrisy, infidelity! Well may we ask, where were the people to look for religious truth, when such was the fearful condition of those who claimed to be their divinely appointed guides to heaven!

The Romish advocates assert, however, that all these evils did not invalidate or destroy the infallibility to which their Church lays claim, and that this was admitted even by the Florentine reformer himself. "It is here well to observe (writes the Dublin reviewer) that Savonarola never disputed the authority of the Church in morals as well as in faith, and of the Pope as its head." We will not now stop to inquire what authority a man like Pope Alexander VI., whose life was stained by every enormity, might be supposed to have either in morals or faith. We will simply ask one question. How, or by whom, was the authority of the Church to be exercised, or its voice made known, in the days of Savonarola? If Pope, bishops, cardinals, and all were alike corrupt, as the foregoing extracts would lead us to believe, it is repugnant alike to common sense and to Scripture to suppose that any wholesome precept or sound doctrine could proceed from the lips of such teachers. Was faith to be learned from prelates who sneered and scoffed at Christianity? Were sound morals to be taught by bishops and cardinals whose chosen companions were harlots and abandoned men?

We fully admit that Savonarola himself may have been loth to abandon the idea of the infallibility of the Church, which he had imbibed from his earliest years. It is a hard task for any man to uproot from his mind those inward convictions which have grown with his growth, and which form the basis of his belief. We know how slowly and gradually the truth dawned on Luther's mind; and it is no wonder that the case should have been the same with Savonarola. We will make some remarks on his religious opinions before we conclude. At present we will content ourselves with observing, that the man who could write, as he did, to the princes of Christendom in 1496, urging them "to save the Church which was tottering to its fall; for that from the sole of her foot to the crown of her head there was no soundness in her, and that the very abomination of desolation stood in the Holy place"†—the man who could write thus, could not, we think, have formed a very exalted notion of the authority of the Church either in faith or morals.

But the career of Savonarola was now drawing to a close. The monks and clergy, irritated by his frequent denunciations of their vices and hypocrisy, brought their complaints to Pope Alexander VI. We quote again from the friend and biographer of the Reformer:—"The most bitter persecutors of Savonarola were the men of depraved morals, and chiefly the prelates of the Church, the vileness of whose lives had filled the world with the stench of their vices. He inveighed against their lust and avarice, their luxury and simoniacal guilt, preaching both publicly and privately that men should fly from Babylon (that is to say, Rome), because some malignant demon had made it the cess-pool of every kind of wickedness."‡

The Pope, by no means displeased, perhaps, at the opportunity of silencing a man whose zeal and virtues put his own scandalous conduct to the blush, first summoned Savonarola before him, who, not unnaturally, refused to put himself in the power of a man so notoriously unscrupulous as Alexander VI. After some delay, the Pontiff issued a letter to the Superior of the Dominican Order, directing him to enquire into the guilt of Savonarola, and meanwhile suspending him from preaching. Savonarola obeyed for a time; but at length, on Feb. 11, 1498, he resumed his accustomed place in the pulpit of the Church of Sta Maria del Fiore. The grounds which he alleged for this decisive step were these:—In the first place, that the Pope having been elected by simony, his authority was invalid; secondly, that the Pope's sentence being manifestly founded on misrepresentation might be considered as null; thirdly (in a sermon on the text, "We must obey God rather than man,"—Acts iv. 29), he urged that "on all occasions where it can be obviously seen that the commands of superiors are contrary to the commandments of God, and especially the precepts of charity, none should obey in such a case." A man who could urge such reasons as these was plainly an advocate for the liberty of private judgment; and those of our readers who are familiar with Luther's early history will be able to trace many points of resemblance between his conduct, shortly before his final rupture with the Papal See, and that of Savonarola.

The result of such open rebellion against the authority of the Pope was obvious. A bull of excommunication was thundered forth from the Vatican. Florence became divided into two great parties—the Piagnoni, or "weepers," who were the friends of Savonarola, and the Arrabiati, who were his enemies. The Franciscan monks, who were jealous of the fame and popularity of the Dominican orator, sided with the latter, and in them Alexander VI. found his most able and active auxiliaries. Strange, indeed, it is, that when such facts are recorded in the page of history, the advocates of Rome can yet pride themselves upon the unity of their Church, and claim this attribute as one of her distinctive marks!

The Dominican party published seven theses, or propositions, the principal of which were—1. That the Church of God wants a reformation. 3: That it will be reformed. 7. The excommunication of Savonarola is null, and that those who pay no regard to it do not sin.* A Minorite friar of the Franciscan order, Francis of Apulia, declaimed against these theses in his sermons, and offered to maintain that they were heretical. He was seconded by his brethren, as Savonarola was by his; so that there arose a great dissension between the two orders. The Dominicans declared that they would prove the truth of their theses before an unsuspected judge, and they chose fire as such a judge. And then there ensued a contest which is, perhaps, unparalleled in the history of the world.

The Franciscans having accepted the ordeal of fire, Dominico de Pescia, one of the most ardent followers of Savonarola, signed a writing, by which he engaged to enter the fire with the Minorite friar who had preached against the theses, and declared that he hoped to come out from the midst of the flames safe and sound. The Minorite friar declared that he was ready to dispute with Savonarola, and that another Minorite friar would enter the fire with Dominico de Pescia! "I am certain of perishing," said he; "but Christian charity teaches me not to withhold my life, if, on sacrificing it, I might precipitate into hell an heresiarch, who has already drawn into it so many souls."† It was thought strange that Savonarola did not accept the challenge of the Franciscan; but he justified himself by saying, that it was not worth his while to enter the fire with a single Franciscan; but that if his enemies, especially those who resided at Rome, would expose themselves to the fire, he would accompany them into it.

Enthusiasm spread beyond the two convents; many priests and seculars, and even women and children, more especially on the side of Savonarola, earnestly requested to be allowed to enter the fire. On the morning of the first Sunday in April, almost all the hearers of Savonarola, in the Church of St. Mark, shouted aloud with great fervour, "Here I am, sir; I will enter into the fire for your glory."‡ The magistrates of Florence consented that two monks only, Dominico de Pescia, and Francis of Apulia, should devote themselves for their respective orders, and directed the pile to be prepared.

On the 7th of April, 1498, a scaffold, dreadful to look at, was erected in the public square of Florence; two piles of large pieces of wood, mixed with faggots and brooms, which would quickly take fire, extended each eighty feet long. Every window was full; every roof covered with spectators; almost the whole population of the republic was collected around the place. The Dominicans arrived at their station in the portico called the Loggia de Lanzi, chanting canticles. Some persons suspected that one or the other of the friars, or perhaps both, had concealed some charm under their gowns, and they were therefore ordered to pull off their clothes and take others. The Minorite friar agreed to this, and even offered to enter into the fire quite naked. The Dominican protested that he would not enter the fire without a crucifix. This was granted him likewise, at the desire of the Minorite friar, who observed that the crucifix was of wood, and so, instead of being a preservative against the fire, it would be burnt with the Dominican. The latter then demanded a new favour, that he might be allowed to enter the fire with the holy sacrament. The Franciscans immediately declared that they would not permit the host to be carried amid flames. The dispute upon this point grew warm. Several hours passed away. The multitude, which had waited long, and began to feel hunger and thirst, lost patience; a deluge of rain suddenly fell upon the city; the piles were so wet that they could no longer be lighted; and the crowd separated with a feeling of disappointment that they had lost the miracle they had so impatiently looked for.

The enemies of Savonarola took courage. On the day but one after (April 9) his convent was besieged by the Arrabiati, eager to profit by the inconstancy of the multitude; he was arrested, with his two friends Dominico de Pescia and Silvestro Marruffi, and sent to prison. A criminal prosecution was commenced against them; Alexander VI. despatched judges from Rome, with orders to condemn the accused to death. We cannot afford space to dwell on the mock trial that ensued—the tortures inflicted on Savonarola seven different times—the falsification of the answers of the accused by the notary Ceccone, and all the other steps of this unjust process. Savonarola was too weak to support the torture; he appears to have avowed in his agony all that his enemies imputed to him; and, with his two disciples, was condemned to death. The three monks were burnt on the 23rd of May, 1498, in the same square where, six weeks before, a pile had been raised to prepare them a triumph.

Such was the tragical end of this remarkable man, at the comparatively early age of 46. In the above account of the circumstances which led to his death, we have intentionally abstained from embarrassing our narrative with allusions to the political and other charges which were brought against him. The impartial Roman Catholic historian, Natalis Alexander, has briefly, but emphatically summed up the whole case in the following words:—"Savonarola was persecuted by Alexander VI., and condemned by an unjust anathema."* We see but little reason to discredit the confession which Savonarola himself made on this subject during his imprisonment. After denying the calumnies which were alleged against him, he averred "that the predictions which he had delivered were not founded upon any divine inspiration, but were the results of his own observation, and the study of Holy Scripture; that his object was not to obtain any ecclesiastical dignity or promotion for himself, but that he earnestly desired that a council of the whole Christian world should be called, by whose authority and decrees the clergy might be reformed, and the state of the Church might be restored, as far as possible, to the purity of Apostolic times."† Such were the objects which he professed, and, we believe, sincerely professed, to have in view. No one, after reading the foregoing account of the state of the Church at that time, can question the necessity of the reform which he advocated. Had his efforts been crowned with success, —had the rulers of the Romish Church been gifted with the most ordinary prudence, the Reformation might have been averted, or, at least, delayed. But the Pope and his advisers were blind to the signs of the times. The very men who professed to be infallible could not or would not see that the whole Papal system was held in detestation by all who had any regard for religion. The cup of Rome's abuses was full. The profligate sale of indulgences by Leo X. was the last drop which made it overflow.

It remains to add a few words upon the peculiar religious views held by Savonarola. In many points his opinions seem to have been in accordance with what are considered the orthodox tenets of the Roman Catholic Church—for example, with regard to the Sacrifice of the Mass, the doctrine of seven sacraments, prayers for the dead, and some others. On the other hand, it appears certain that the study of Scripture, to which, as we have seen, he was devoted from an early age, induced him to reject many of the doctrines of Romanism, fully as important as those just enumerated; nay, perhaps more important, as bearing more directly on the Gospel message of salvation for perishing sinners. He decried human traditions; he owned no salvation but by free, gratuitous justification through faith in Christ, on which alone he relied, without admitting any other merit; he maintained the communion in both kinds; he denounced indulgences; and, as well with respect to life as doctrine, he owned that Antichrist was in the Court of Rome.‡ The evening before his execution, in the gloom of his prison-house, and in the full prospect of a cruel and ignominious death, he composed Meditations on the 31st and 50th Psalms, in the most glowing language, and full of the deepest spirituality of mind; and in these Meditations he dwells especially on the doctrine of gratuitous justification.§ It was of course to be expected that books containing such doctrines as these should be condemned by the Court of Rome, and put in the index of prohibited books. On the whole, we are much more inclined to wonder that Savonarola, alone and unsupported, with all the influence of education and early prejudice to struggle against, should have arrived at sound Scriptural views on the important points we have just indicated, than to feel any surprise that he should still have clung to the Romish doctrines which we have noticed above. And it will ever remain a disgrace to the Church of Rome, that a man so highly and deservedly admired for his exalted learning, severe morals, probity, and incredible eloquence, should have been brought to a cruel and untimely end, in order to gratify the malice of a rival monkish order, and the hostility of a wicked and unscrupulous Pope.

HISTORY OF PURGATORY.

The existence of a purgatorial state in which departed souls were long and fearfully tormented, was urged upon the people's belief more earnestly and perseveringly than almost any other dogma of the church during the middle ages. The reason of this is obvious: not only did this doctrine increase the reverence with which the priests were regarded, on account of the vast influence which they were supposed to possess in that region, but still more on account of the great pecuniary emolument which it afforded them. From the time of Gregory I., at least, it was constantly believed that the torments of purgatory could be eased and abridged by the suffrages of the living; and chiefly by prayers, alms, and masses. The prayers were always performed by the clergy; the alms denoted money contributed to the church, and none but priests could perform mass. Thus, to inculcate the belief and dread of the flames of purgatory was the most direct way to fill the coffers of the Church, and most vigorously was the work effected. Century after century sermons were preached, books were written, visions were related, miracles invented, and every effort made by interested men to inspire mankind with the most alarming terrors respecting this fictitious place of woe. Nor can we wonder, that in a dark and superstitious age, the picture drawn of the torments of purgatory should inspire the people with overwhelming apprehensions. "To be nailed to the ground foot and hand; to be led by their torments to eat the ground; to be cast into cauldrons of burning metal, some up to the loins, others up to the breast," was surely enough to alarm the stoutest heart. All fear of hell was supplanted by the dread of purgatory, and the great concern of a sinner, under the influence of Roman teaching, was not to flee from the wrath to come, but to escape from the purgatorial fire.

The natural effect of all this was to drive men to those means which, as they were taught, were infallibly connected with the more speedy release or entire freedom from the tormenting flames. In the words of an old writer—

"The new doctrine and invention of purgatory, bred by superstition and nursed by covetousness, as it was managed, became a most forcible engine continually to drain the people's money: For, when men were made to believe that after death their souls should enter into a region of fire, there to suffer long and bitter torments, to be purged and fitted for the region of bliss, but yet to be eased there, and the sooner released, according to the measure and number of the masses, offices, and prayers, which should be made on their behalf here, while they lay broiling in that fearful state; people were put upon it to make the best provision they could in their lifetime, or at least at their deaths, that such helps and means should be used on their behalf as they might reasonably reckon upon a short and tolerable continuance there. . . To this purpose, the founding and endowing of monasteries, abbeys, and nunneries, by the best and richer sort; and the colleges, free chapels, and chantries, by the middle sort of people, according to their respective abilities, and the apprehensions they had of this future state, all pointed at the good of the founder's soul after death, and the souls of such others as he appointed.

"But yet, not trusting to the uncertain charity of others, most persons strained to the utmost, and many most excessively, their fortunes considered, to leave some provision behind for that purpose, and most commonly by their last wills and testaments, which were accounted sacred; and thereby, or by acts executed in their lifetime, it was not rare for many men, though they had many children to provide for, or many debts to pay, to postpone all relations and considerations to this concern of the soul; and to appoint, and to take order for masses satisfactory, anniversaries, obits, requiems, dirges, placebos, trentals, lamps, lights, and other offices, to be performed daily, weekly, monthly, or yearly, as far as the sums destined would afford, for the ease and comfort of the testator's soul."†

These were not the only means of deliverance from the purgatorial flame. Indulgences were rendered available to souls in purgatory. It is only since the year 1300—the commencement of the Romish jubilees—that these Papal impostures extended their influence even to the dead. Ecclesiastical historians attest the rapid progress of this superstition. In less than a century it spread everywhere, and at length the monks did not hesitate to say that they saw the souls leave purgatory the moment that the people purchased from them the indulgences for the dead.‡

Alexander VI., in the Constitution for the Jubilee of 1500, it is well known, offered to all the penitent faithful who were willing to give alms for the repair of St. Peter's, a plenary indulgence, by virtue of which they could deliver from the fire of purgatory the souls of their parents, their friends, or other faithful Christians, on whose behalf they had contributed money. The words of the bull itself are given in Raynald.§ Since the time of Alexander VI., the following Popes have extended indulgences to souls in purgatory in their jubilee bulls—Clement VII., Julius III., and Gregory XIII.

Without speaking of plenary indulgences and those for the article of death, which have the necessary effect of conducting the soul immediately to paradise, which gains them; it is well known that there are an innumerable number of indulgences for the dead, both in the city of Rome, and the rest of the Roman Catholic world. Besides, the popes have granted them to many confraternities of regulars and seculars. They participate in all the prerogatives of the indulgences attached to the stations of Rome, where souls are delivered from purgatory. The Bull of Crusado places the Spaniards and Portuguese in a position to deliver an infinite number. It is even proved from a calculation made, that as, according to the bull, there are nine days in the year in which every one of the faithful, from the age of seven years and upwards, is able to draw a soul out of purgatory; the Spaniards alone might have sufficed, and more than that, to have delivered from Purgatory the souls of all the Roman Catholics who have died in the faith and in charity, from the very establishment of Christianity.† The Bull of Adrian VI. in favour of the Portuguese obtained the same advantage for them.

To these kinds of indulgences for the dead, must be added also those which are attached to privileged altars.‡ There are few churches which have not privileged altars attached to them, either in perpetuity, or, what is more common, for seven years, and to which the popes grant that the priest, who on certain days shall celebrate there a mass for the dead, shall deliver a soul from purgatorial § flames; so that as the Jesuit Santarel has agreed, it would be easy in one day to deliver all the souls in purgatory.‖

The frivolous conditions attached to certain indulgences of the dead deserve one notice. According to Thiers, the Carmelites pretend to have received from John XXII. a bull which they call the Sabbatine Bull, which promises to whosoever shall belong to this order, and wear the habit called the scapular, a plenary indulgence, with the promise of being at once delivered from purgatory. The Blessed Virgin is then introduced, saying—"I, the mother of grace, will descend the first Saturday after the death of all those who shall wear my habit, and who for the love of me have entered into my order, or my confraternity, or my society, and who have lived worthily in this life; I will deliver them from the pains of purgatory, and I will gloriously conduct them to the holy mountain of eternal life."¶ Other privileges, referring to souls in purgatory, belonging to the girdle of St. Augustine and of St. Monica, are mentioned by the same writer.

A still more extraordinary means of delivering souls from purgatorial fires belongs, or did belong, to another order of monks in the Church of Rome. According to a distinguished Romish writer—"The friars minors had once, they have it still in the present day, a very easy means of delivering souls from purgatory; for they declare that this may be accomplished as many times as a person enters and passes out of the church of our Lady of Portiuncula, from the first vespers of the first day of August until the second vespers of the following day; so that for another entry and departure out of the church one does not deliver more than one." This is stated by Cardinal Bonaventure de Vitalinis in his "Commentary on the Clementine Constitutions." It was confirmed by Honorius III., and by various bulls and briefs of the successors of Honorius. The actual words of the writers of this order are given by Thiers."

The popes have never dared to say that they had any knowledge of the particular state of every soul after this life; they never ventured to decide positively, "these go to heaven, these depart to hell, these others remain in purgatory." How could they know? and in this ignorance what certainty can their indulgences for the dead possess? Granting the case that God has condemned a soul to one hundred years of purification in this middle state, is it not natural to believe that it will remain there one hundred years? Who can deliver it? The Pope! Is he able then to exalt himself above God?†† To absolve those whom God has condemned? To mitigate or remove the punishment denounced on sinners by the decree of his justice??

It now remains to give some particulars respecting the modern history of purgatory, and the superstitions connected with that unscriptural dogma. It is unnecessary to say that the Council of Trent—the modern standard of Romanism—openly declared its truth, and anathematized any one who entertained any doubt on the subject. The following is the decree of the council, passed at its twenty-fifth session:—"Since the Catholic Church, instructed by scripture and the ancient tradition of the fathers, hath taught in sacred councils, and most recently in this general council, that there is a purgatory, and that the souls detained there are helped by the suffrages of the faithful, especially by the sacrifice of the altar, the holy council enjoins the bishops to take diligent care that the sound doctrine on the subject of purgatory, taught by the holy fathers and sacred councils, be believed by the faithful, be held, taught, and everywhere preached." After prohibiting difficult and subtle questions, and also such as are of doubtful character, the decree proceeds as follows:—"Let those things which tend to mere curiosity or superstition, or savour of filthy lucre, be prohibited as scandalous and offensive to Christians. Let the bishops take care that the suffrages of the living faithful—viz., masses, prayers, alms, and other works of piety, which the faithful have been accustomed to perform for departed believers, be piously and religiously rendered according to the institutions of the church, and whatever services are due to the dead, let them not be performed slightly, but diligently and carefully."

The advice here given, with reference to the manifold evils arising from the doctrine, might just as well have been spared. It is utterly irrational and absurd to suppose that an order of men entrusted with an engine of such tremendous power, could abstain from using it for selfish purposes. And such, indeed, has proved the case. The monstrous abuses springing out of this dogma, and the practices connected therewith, have increased rather than diminished since the Council of Trent.

The fathers of that Synod have exercised a very discreet prudence in the amount of information which they have thought proper to give respecting purgatory. They simply state the fact that there is a purgatory; and that the souls detained there are helped by the suffrages of the faithful. We are compelled, therefore, to go to the doctors of the church in order to ascertain, more particularly, the notions prevalent among Romanists in modern times on this important subject.

One of the most able and learned champions of the Romish Church was Cardinal Bellarmine. His writings have been repeatedly quoted by English Roman Catholics, as authority for explaining what the doctrines of that Church are; and from them we give the following extracts, as illustrating the sentiments entertained respecting purgatory, subsequently to the sitting of the Tridentine Synod. At the commencement of his "Treatise on Purgatory," the Cardinal defines it to be "a certain place where, as in a prison, those souls are purified after this life, which were not purified here, in order that they may be able to enter into heaven." "It is appointed," he says, "for those who die with venial sins, and again, for those with the temporary punishment of sin undischarged, though the sins themselves have been remitted." He describes the pains of purgatory as most horrible (atrocissimæ), exceeding, beyond all comparison, any sufferings upon earth, according to the uniform doctrine of the fathers. He says, also, that "the belief of purgatory is an article of faith, so that they who do not believe it shall never arrive there, but must be tormented in the eternal fire of hell."§

"Since many persons," says Bellarmine, "will not believe what they have never seen, it has pleased God sometimes to raise his servants from the dead, and to send them to announce to the living what they have really beheld."

‡ PRIVILEGIO ALTARIS. Inscription on a marble slab in the Chapel of St. Mary and St. Francis, in the Church of St. Lorenzo, in Lucina.
Gregory the XIII., Pope. As a perpetual memorial of the thing. Bearing the stead, though unworthy, and following the example of our Saviour, our Lord Jesus Christ, consubstantial and co-eternal with the Father; who for the redemption of the human race, deigned to descend from the highest throne of heaven to the abyss of this world, and to assume our flesh from the Virgin's womb; we study to afford to the souls of Christ's faithful dead existing in purgatory—who, in charity united to God, have departed this life, and have deserved to be assisted by the suffrages of the pious—opportune assistance from the treasures of the church; so that, as far as it shall please divine goodness, they may be more able to reach their heavenly country. Confiding, therefore, in the divine mercy, and led to it by prayers on the part of our beloved son, Luigi Franco de Formanis, Master of the ceremonies of our chapel, humbly offered to us for this purpose by the tenor of these presents, we grant in perpetuity that as often as at the altar under the protection of the blessed Mary of grace, and of St. Francis, situated in the Church of St. Lawrence, in Lucina of the city, any priest, secular or regular, shall, of his own or of another's will, celebrate a mass for the liberation of one soul existing in purgatory, the same soul shall, from the treasure of the church, the merits of the same our Lord Jesus Christ, and all his saints, obtain the same indulgences, and remission of sins by the acceptance of divine clemency, and the said mass shall operate for the liberation of the same for which it shall be celebrated, as it would have obtained, and as it would have operated, if the aforesaid priests should for this cause celebrate a mass for the dead, at the altar situated in the church of St. Gregory of the city, deputed for that purpose. Ours concerning the not conceding indulgences, for the like purpose (ad instar) and other apostolic constitutions, and ordinances, and whatsoever other things to the contrary notwithstanding. Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, under the ring of the Fisherman, the 8th day of April, 1578. In the sixth year of our Pontificate.—Cæ Glorierius.
On one side of the altar of the church of St. Maria della Pace, we find the following—"Every mass celebrated at this altar liberates a soul from purgatory."
Over the entrance to the catacombs in the church of St. Lorenzo fuori le mura—"This is that tomb most celebrated in the whole world of the cemetery of St. Cyriac Martyr, where if any one shall perform the sacred rite for the dead, he will evoke their souls from the pains of purgatory through the merits of the divine Lawrence." ‡ John IV., of Portugal, died loaded with relics and plenary indulgences, and yet in spite of these indulgences, he had scarcely breathed his last, when prayers were at once commenced for the repose of his soul before privileged altars. And there, 30,000 masses were celebrated by his orders in the poorest convents of the kingdom, to which 100,000 masses (neither more nor less) to be said, with an equal, for the same object; and, as though these 100,000 masses were not sufficient, they hastened to establish, in the monastery where the king was buried, four masses to be said each day, for ever, for the peace of his soul, and its deliverance from purgatory § De Pury., cxv.

The Cardinal here refers to certain revelations, exhibited by him in another work, two or three of which we shall here give as strikingly illustrative of the actual belief of the Church of Rome:—

"A pious father of a family, in Northumberland, died after a long illness, in the early part of one night, but to the great terror of those who watched by his body, came to life again at the dawn of the following day. All but his faithful and affectionate wife fled at the sight of him; and to her he communicated, in the most soothing terms, the peculiar circumstances of his case; that he had indeed been dead, but was permitted to live again upon earth, though by no means in the same manner as before. In short, he sold all his property, divided the produce equally between his wife, his children, and the poor, and then retired to the monastery of Melrose. He there lived in such a state of unexampled mortification, as made it quite evident, even if he had not said a word on the subject, that he had seen things, whatever was the nature of them, which no one else had been permitted to behold."

But he disclosed it all.

"'One,' said he, 'whose aspect was as light, and his garment glistening, conducted me to a valley of great depth and width, but of immeasurable length; one side of which was dreadful beyond expression, for its burning heat, and the other for its no less intolerable cold. Both were filled with the souls of men, which seemed to be tossed, as by the fury of a tempest, from one side to the other; for being quite unable to endure the heat on the right hand, the miserable wretches kept throwing themselves to the opposite side, into the equal torment of cold, and thence back into the raging flames. This, thought I, must be hell, but my guide answered to my thought, that it was not so —"This valley," said he, "is the place of torment for the souls of those who, after delaying to confess and expiate their sins, have at length, in the article of death, had recourse to penance, and so have died. These at the day of judgment will all be admitted into the kingdom of heaven, by reason of their confession and penance, late as it was. But, meanwhile, many of them may be arrested, and liberated before that day, by the prayers, alms, and fastings of the living, particularly by the sacrifice of the mass.'"

In the seventeenth century, St. Patrick's purgatory was made the subject of a religious drama by the Spanish poet Calderon. The piece begins with the entrance of Egenias, King of Ireland, clothed with skin, and very furious, attended by his two daughters. St. Patrick, and a recent convert to Christianity, by name Ludovicus Ennius, are wrecked upon the Irish coast, and appear before the impious monarch. St. Patrick relates to the king his life, and preaches the truths of the Gospel, but with no success. Subsequently the saint, horrified at the blasphemies of the king, prays for a divine manifestation to convert his countrymen, when two angels make their appearance, and reveal to him the celebrated cavern. The mouth of this fearful opening is exhibited on the stage, and, according to the stage directions, is to be the most horrible that can be contrived, and within it an aperture on the stage. The impious king is induced to enter the cave; but instead of passing into purgatory, he falls through the apertnre into the pit of hell. He sinks in with much noise—flames rise from below, and great cries are heard. The awful death of their sovereign leads to the conversion of his people. In the course of the drama, Ludovicus Ennius enters the cave, but with better fortune. He passes through purgatory, and on his return relates to his auditors the wonders of that fearful region. His account is nothing more than an abridgement of the old legend, which we have already given, of the descent of Sir Owaine. Ludovicus finishes his relation by giving a long list of authorities—many of them of modern date—in proof of the truth of the legend of the purgatory of St. Patrick.*

At the commencement of the eighteenth century, appeared in France a work intended for popular use, entitled "A History of the Life and of the Purgatory of St. Patrick, Archbishop and Primate of Ireland, with numerous prayers; translated into French by R. P. François Bouillon, of the Order of St. Francis, and Bachelor in Theology." This book was widely circulated in France, it appears, for more than half a century, for the first censorial approbation bears the date of 1701, whilst the other is dated 1742. It contains a life of St. Patrick, composed from all the most absurd legends in existence respecting him. The writer then proceeds to give a description of the state of souls after death. Afterwards we have the history and description of the purgatory of St. Patrick, and the various ceremonies connected with it, and the various visions which have been seen there, in the truth of all of which he expresses his fullest belief. Finally, the latter part of the book is occupied with "The veritable relation of the History of Louis Ennius, chiefly taken from the drama of Calderon;" to which reference has already been made.

About the middle of the eighteenth century we find Pope Benedict XIV. preaching and publishing a sermon at Rome, expressly in favour of this ridiculous legend of St. Patrick.

It is well observed by the author, to whom we are indebted for our knowledge of this work, that it serves—

"To show the kind of religious information which was spread among the middle and lower classes of society in France by the (Roman) Catholics, so late as the last century. Two doctors in theology, of the faculty of Paris, sign their names to an approbation dated 1742, in which they declare that they 'have read through this mass of absurdity and falsehood, and that they have found nothing in it contrary to faith or morals!' It was, indeed, not more than two or three years after the date first mentioned, that Pope Benedict XIV. preached and published at Rome a sermon in favour of St. Patrick's purgatory. By such doctrines and representations, the Popish system kept its hold on the minds of the simple and ignorant people, and the same policy which led the (Roman) Catholic priesthood to continue them in this condition, and to perpetuate their influence, made them oppose and persecute men of science, such as Galileo, who were labouring to enlighten the world, and whose experiments and discoveries naturally tended to dispel the cloud of superstitious legends."*

It is not our intention here to refer to the effect of this doctrine in dishonouring the Saviour, and rendering his salvation an incomplete work. We have already dwelt upon this. Our object now is simply to point out the demoralizing influence which purgatory and its practices have exercised upon members of the Romish Church, for upwards of a thousand years. The pernicious consequences of the doctrine arise chiefly from the two following causes:—In the first place, it removes all fear of hell from the mind of Roman Catholics, and substitutes for it the dread of a temporary state of suffering. Secondly, it associates the performance of prayers, the celebration of masses, &c., with deliverance from this place of temporary woe. The believer in this unscriptural dogma constantly lives under the influence of a spiritual opiate.

It is the acknowledged doctrine of the Romish Church, that no Roman Catholic can go to hell, except he dies in mortal sin—unconfessed and unabsolved. But if he applies to the priest, he is bound to grant him absolution on the mere profession of regret for such a sin, and thus the eternal punishment is instantly converted into the temporary suffering of purgatory. The consequence is, that the fear of hell is virtually banished in the Church of Rome: we do not mean merely from the exemplary and moral, but also from the abandoned and the profligate. The only possible case under which any Romanist would be doomed to "the outer darkness," the place of eternal woe, according to the Church, is, by failing through some accident to obtain a confessor in his last hours. The probabilities of this chance are so exceedingly small, that it is rarely thought of. There is, too, a saint worshipped in the Church of Rome—St. Barbara—whose special office it is to deliver her votaries from this possible calamity. Hence, as a general—we may perhaps say universal—thing, the people consider themselves as free from any danger of incurring the sentence of eternal death, as if the doctrine were entirely blotted out of the Word of God.

In the place of this eternal punishment, the Roman Catholic looks forward to the sufferings of purgatory, which, although considered by some doctors to be equal in intensity to those of hell, possess this essential difference—that they are limited in their duration. And here the fearful evils of this doctrine at once appear. It is the eternity of future punishment which gives it all its weight with those who are under the dominion of worldly or sensual passions. Take away the endless duration of "the wrath to come," and men will brave even the frowns of an angry judge. By substituting purgatory, then, for the punishment of hell, papal doctors removed the only effectual check to wickedness which worldly men experience. The passions of the heart are violent and ungovernable—the temptations of the present life are strong and overpowering—the pleasure which is offered to us by our lusts is a present, a sensible, and a certain good. On the other hand, the punishment which men are taught by the Bible to dread, as the consequences of gratifying their sinful desires, is a future, a vague, and to them an uncertain evil; yet it contains, amidst all this, one element, which compensates for all these disadvantages. IT IS ETERNAL. It is justly remarked by a modern writer—"A profligate will face unshrinkingly the prospect of distant suffering, and bear, even in the thought of hell, everything but its eternity and its despair; and Popery, to meet his weakness, converts hell into purgatory." What, then, should we say to a system of religion which deliberately and advisedly withdraws this element from the future woe, and leaves man thus exposed to the temptations arising from the world, the flesh, and the devil? Surely the exercise of the largest charity cannot justify us in acquitting Romanism of thus removing from society one of its chief barriers against human depravity, increasing, to an extent which we can hardly estimate too greatly, the amount of human wickedness and crime!

But this is not all. As we have observed, there is a second consideration which must not be omitted. Not satisfied with practically substituting for hell, purgatory, and thus converting the eternal punishment of the second death into a mere temporary state of suffering, Rome provides her votaries with such an endless variety of deliverances from this temporary state, that, even that is reduced oftentimes to a nonentity, especially in the case of the rich. There are masses, and obits, and requiems, and dirges. There are confraternities, and indulgences, and privileged altars, and blessed beads, and such a countless host of other Papal impostures, all having for their object the important task of fetching out souls from the terrible fire, that it would weary the reader's patience only to recite their names.

We are able to confirm the conclusions to which we have thus been led by the testimony of one of the most intelligent and able witnesses at the bar of the House of Lords, during the agitation of the Roman Catholic Relief Bill. The Rev. John Burnet, then a dissenting minister at Cork, declared as follows:—

"No Roman Catholic of the lower orders has any dread of a final perdition. I have spoken with them frequently on this subject, and never found one of them that supposed he could go to hell. If they die in mortal sin, their doctrine is, that they must go to perdition; if, however, they apply to the priest for absolution, he must give it; and in the case of absolution, which is administered on their professing a regret for their sins, they go only to purgatory, and they depend on these books of orders for their release from it, and hence the punishments of futurity in their estimation are only temporary punishments, and this conviction has a very injurious effect upon the views and conduct of the people." *

Here the conclusions of reason and the experience of actual life perfectly harmonize. We know not, then, how it is possible to escape the lamentable fact, that one of the most essential and important doctrines of the Romish faith is fraught with such evil results, that wherever it prevails, it must necessarily produce immorality and crime. The effect of the doctrine of a state of purgatory, from which the suffrages of the faithful could deliver them, upon men of the world, was to take away that which constitutes the great check to depravity—the dread of everlasting woe, and thus the sinful passions were left to riot in unrestricted freedom.

DOCTOR CULLEN'S PASTORAL.

TWELVE months have just elapsed since Pope Pius IX. announced to the world that a new glory had been added to the crown of the Virgin Mary, and "her honour increased" by a dogmatic decree, in which he declared that from the first instant of her conception she was by a special grace and singular privilege, preserved from all stain of original sin, and that it had been so revealed by God himself.†

Our readers will, no doubt, also remember that in the same letter apostolic Pope Pius asserted that the Church had always held the same doctrine, and that all the illustrious monuments of a venerable antiquity, and the clear, unanimous opinions of the most eminent Fathers and Doctors of the Church, testified that it had done so.

We have now before us a pastoral letter addressed to the (Roman) Catholic clergy and laity of the diocese of Dublin, by the Most Rev. Dr. Cullen, on the Feast of the Immaculate Conception, in which after exulting in this great achievement, by which "the last wreath of glory has been added to the crown that adorns the Virgin's brow," he reminds his readers of "the raptures of joy with which the decision of the Sovereign Pontiff was received," when, "in the centre of Christendom, it was greeted with the peals of a thousand joyful bells and the thunders of artillery, and an illumination of the whole city." "The immortal Pontiff," says Dr. Cullen, "having examined the teaching and tradition of our forefathers in the faith, and considered the wishes and pious desires of all faithful Christians, issued, after mature deliberation, on the ever-memorable day of the 8th of December, 1854, his solemn and infallible definition declaring that "the doctrine has been revealed by God, and is, therefore, to be firmly and constantly believed by all the faithful, which teaches that the Blessed Virgin Mary, in the first moment of her conception, was, by a special grace of the Almighty, and by a singular privilege, through the merits of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the human race, preserved from all stain of original sin." "Rome," he adds, "has spoken, and all controversy has ceased." Dr. Cullen has, however, not thought it wise to add the next paragraph in this decree of the Pope:—"Wherefore, if any shall dare to think otherwise, let them know and understand that they are condemned by their own judgment—that they have suffered shipwreck of the faith, and subjected themselves to the penalties justly established, if what they think they should dare to signify by word, writing, or any other outward means."

Dr. Cullen probably knew that high-sounding threats in this country would scarcely intimidate men from saying or even printing what they think, or induce them to believe that they must make "shipwreck of the faith once delivered to the saints," or feel condemned by their own judgment, if they did not at once rejoice at the new wreath of glory so tardily conferred by Pope Pius on the Blessed Virgin in the middle of the 19th century, or fail to feel "all ground for difficulties and doubts removed" by what "is now proposed to the Church under the seal and sanction of infallibility." He, therefore, resorts to other methods; and in condescension to "the doubts and difficulties," which he expects to remove by means somewhat more suited to the atmosphere of Great Britain than anathemas and excommunications, after promising to all the faithful who shall attend the devotions of the present Novena a plenary indulgence, he goes on, with an unusual condescension in one who fills so high an office as that of "Delegate Apostolic," to quote some of the "ancient Fathers" to show, he says, with what "decisiveness antiquity professed the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception." Nay, by what we must certainly consider an additional favour, Dr. Cullen actually condescends to add the very editions, volumes, and pages where his extracts are to be found, as if he really felt that the practice which the CATHOLIC LAYMAN has adopted from the very first was (as we are sure it really is) the only one likely to satisfy those who dare to think or inquire for themselves upon such subt jects, notwithstanding the penalties threatened against them by the Holy See.

Now, this kind condescension of Dr. Cullen gives us exactly what we wanted, and regretted that we could never get at before—the proofs relied on in support of this dogma.

Our readers may remember that we reviewed, in several of our earlier numbers,* all that we could find in the ancient Fathers of the first and second centuries respecting the Blessed Virgin, and showed that not one of those primitive writers contain a single passage to justify the present pretensions or practices of the Roman Catholic Church in respect to her.

We called our readers' attention successively to the epistle ascribed (whether correctly or not) to the Apostle Barnabas, and to the works of Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, the Shepherd of Hermas, Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, none of which give any support to those pretensions, and though nearly three years have since elapsed, no one has attempted to refer us to any writer of the first three centuries who affords countenance to any of the peculiar doctrines of Rome in respect to the Blessed Virgin.

Dr. Cullen, however, at last comes forward to enlighten the unlearned and convince the sceptical; and having the power to choose from what he calls "the invariable testimony of Christian antiquity," (an extensive field, no doubt,) we may fairly presume that he has selected, of course, the most convincing and decisive testimony in favour of the new decree.

His very words are as follow:—

"To show how unfounded are the assertions of heresy, we quote some few passages of ancient Fathers, which will serve as an illustration of the fervent devotion they bore to the Mother of God, and the decisiveness with which antiquity professed the doctrine of her Immaculate Conception."

When we had read thus far we confess we rejoiced to think that we had at last found a fair and learned opponent, who, seeing the importance of the work, had taken the trouble of examining and sifting all the illustrious and venerable remains of primitive antiquity, and was about to give the world the valuable fruits of his learned industry, and conclusively to confute all gainsayers.

We anticipated, of course, that the authorities Dr. Cullen was about to select would be taken, if not from the Fathers of the first three centuries, at least from the undisputed works of the most celebrated Fathers whose writings had gone through the ordeal of learned Roman Catholic criticism, such as St. Athanasius, St. Hilary, St. Basil, St. Gregory, St. Ambrose, St. Chrysostom, St. Augustine, all of whose works have undergone the scrutiny and learned labours of the Benedictine editors, who, from time to time have done so much for the works of these great fathers, by separating their genuine productions from the forgeries or works of inferior and later writers, which were too long palmed off on the world under the sanction of their names.†

We confess, therefore, we were not a little disappointed when we found not only that Dr. Cullen passed over, unnoticed, all the primitive fathers of the first, second and third centuries, but that even when commencing so late as the 4th century, he did not cite a single writing, even of that century, which has the stamp of the Benedictine editors, as genuine. This is, perhaps, the more remarkable, because we find that Dr. Cullen had not forgotten or overlooked the works which those learned Roman Catholics thought worthy of their erudition and vast industry, but actually had them under his mind's eye at the very moment that he preferred citing others, whose works have never undergone the same searching and enlightened, though still, we think, imperfect, examination. Perhaps we may presently be able to see why Dr. Cullen has made so remarkable a selection. But let us hear his own words:—"In the fourth century," says Dr. Cullen, "in page 11, shortly after liberty had been granted for the first time to our holy religion" (as if all the fathers of the first three centuries had written under compulsion!) and when the Church was adorned by the genius and eloquence of her Basils, her Gregorys, her Athanasiuses, and her Hilarys—when the teaching of the first general council still resounded in the ears of the faithful; St. Ephrem—one of the most distinguished luminaries of the East, and the friend of St. Basil—thus expressed his feelings in a prayer to the Holy Virgin:"—

We must ask leave to pause here for a while, and ask why Dr. Cullen has passed by St. Basil, St. Gregory, St. Athanasius, and St. Hilary, "whose genius and eloquence adorned the 4th century, in which they lived," and preferred St. Ephrem, the friend of St. Basil, in preference to St. Basil himself? We don't deny that St. Ephrem was a distinguished man, and that he lived in the same century; but we think it does seem singular to go to a simple priest, or, perhaps, deacon, of Edessa, in Syria, for proofs of the teaching of the Church of the fourth century, when she had, at the same period, such eminent saints and bishops as St. Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria the great champion of the Catholic faith, St. Basil the Great Archbishop of Cesarea, St. Gregory Bishop of Nyssa, St. Gregory Theologus, Bishop of Nazianzum, and St. Hilary, Bishop of Poictiers, all copious and eminent writers, whose genuine works have been not only safely preserved and handed down to us, but more or less carefully distinguished from the spurious ones formerly attributed to them by the ignorance or design of after ages.*

We can perhaps account for this, as far as St. Athanasius and St. Basil are concerned, because it so happens that the only passages which, we believe, could be cited with any effect from their alleged writings (though falling far short of the new dogma) have clearly been established to be spurious, though such eminent controversialists as Cardinal Wiseman and Dr. Milner did not scruple to rely on them, until Protestant writers called public attention to the proofs of their spuriousness.†

We can account also for Dr. Cullen passing over St. Hilary in a still more simple way; for, we believe, it would have been absolutely impossible for Dr. Cullen to have referred to any passage from St. Hilary's works, genuine or suppositious, which would have given any colour to his assertion. St. Hilary, we are almost certain, never refers to any especial honour as paid to the Blessed Virgin, either by himself or his fellow-Christians, or considered by him to be her due. He never alludes to her as exercising any patronage or having any power or influence in heaven or on earth, or as having already been received into glory, much less to her "immaculate conception;" but, on the contrary, speaks of the necessity of her undergoing the final general judgment of God, like the rest of mankind, though she was the mother of our Lord. We put out of the case such passages as merely contrast the evils brought into the world by Eve with the blessings of which Mary was the channel, because they appear to us to prove no more than is admitted by every Protestant—viz., that the Blessed Virgin was the means of bringing our Blessed Lord into the world, and therefore the human instrument of the great mystery of his incarnation. Of the two Gregorys of Nazianzum and Nyssa we think it would be equally difficult for Dr. Cullen to have cited any passage affording any support for his present object. That the tragedy entitled "Christus Patiens," written after the manner of Euripides, which has sometimes been cited in defence of the worship of the Virgin, was not written by Gregory of Nazianzum, nor in his age, is agreed with one voice by the greatest Roman Catholic authors and historians, Tillemont, Dupin, Baillet, Baronius, Rivet, Vossius, Bellarmine, Labbe, and Ceillier.‡

As to the writings of Gregory of Nyssa (brother of Basil the Great), we believe it would be needless upon the present question to enter upon any discussion as to which of them are received as genuine and which not; for in none of the works, whether rightly or incorrectly referred to Gregory of Nyssa as the author, is any countenance given to the invocation of the Virgin Mary, much less any hint as to her possessing a peculiar privilege, which would place her high above any other saint in the calendar. With Gregory of Nyssa God in Christ is all in all. Such, we think, are some of the reasons which induced Dr. Cullen to talk of, but not quote any of these eminent writers, whose "genius and eloquence adorned the fourth century." It is, however, time to return to the fathers whom Dr. Cullen does quote as authorities to prove his assertion, that the Church from the most ancient times held the doctrine so lately promulgated by the Church of Rome.

The first writer quoted is, as we have stated, Ephrem the Syrian, of Edessa, who died somewhere about A.D. 380. His works in Syriac have been published in 3 vols. folio, and Theodoret§ and Sozomen‖ both say that he was unacquainted with Greek; but a number of works in Greek (among which are Dr. Cullen's extracts) are given as his by his Roman editor, Asseman, from whose work Dr. Cullen quotes, but which other learned and eminent writers reject altogether, or attribute to another Ephrem, called the younger, who lived about the middle of the 6th century, if not of some still later writer. Cardinal Bellarmine declares himself to be unable to pronounce whether they were genuine or not. We can scarcely conceive any authority, therefore, less satisfactory than that of the Greek writings attributed to St. Ephrem, which have been so much disputed among learned critics; and for ourselves, at least, we freely confess we should require somewhat stronger evidence of their genuineness than the mere assertion of Asseman, (who, in the true spirit of a partisan, seems to have adopted as genuine works of Ephrem everything which had ever at any time been attributed under his name,) unless, indeed, we were prepared to swallow the fable or miraculous legend which records that he spoke only his own language (the Syriac) till he was ordained by St. Basil, when he suddenly spoke Greek as fluently and as accurately as his native tongue.¶ We are happily, however, relieved in the present instance from all difficulty in deciding whether the Greek prayers cited by Dr. Cullen from Asseman's edition, and which do not exist in the Syriac at all, and were never published till Asseman produced them, for the first time, in his edition of St. Ephrem's works, published at Rome in 1732—1746, are genuine or spurious, because even Asseman himself does not positively represent them as prayers of St. Ephrem, but confines us, in fact, to pronounce that they were not his.

As this is a matter of grave moment from the prominence given to these prayers by Dr. Cullen in his pastoral, we must entreat our readers' patience while we, as briefly as possible, bring before them the grounds on which we base this assertion.

The facts are these:—The three prayers given by Dr. Cullen are taken from the third vol. of Asseman, pp. [illegible], 534, and 545, all of which purport to be taken from a Greek codex in the Vatican Library, No. 1190, p. 1137, 1147. Asseman in his prolegomena (vol. I, clxvi., No. 101) represents these prayers as being found not only in the Vatican MSS., but also in that of the Coislinian Library in Paris, though he omits to tell us (what Montfaucon† states expressly) that the first penitential prayer, with the opening of the second, is all that is contained in the Coislinian MSS., the rest being entirely lost. The Coislinian MS., however, is of great importance, because it gives the heading of the penitential prayers in full, which that in the Vatican, No. 1190, does not. It is as follows—"Penitential prayers of the most holy mock Thecaras, collected from Divine Scripture, but for the most part from holy Ephrem, for those who desire to contend against their own inclination towards the passions and pleasures." In the Vatican MS. the heading omits the word "penitential," and suppresses the name of Thecaras. The prayers are, however, the same which Asseman publishes in his edition of Ephrem's Greek works, vol. iii., p. 492 to 523. But when the prayers of this series are brought to a close, a short prayer is introduced (bottom of p. 523) from the "Hierologium Græcorum in mesonyctico," from another MS. in the Vatican, wholly different from that which contains the prayers of Thecaras. Then come the prayers to some of which Dr. Cullen appeals, p. 524 to p. 545, headed severally Ἐυχὴ τῆς Θεοτόκου (a prayer of the mother of God) without any reference to Ephrem or Thecaras, or any other author. Asseman, indeed, of his own mere will, has introduced in Latin (top of p. 541) the word "ejusdem"—"of the same"—in his general heading to the prayers which follow; but for this he has no more reason than a Latin editor and translator of the New Testament would have for ascribing the Acts of the Apostles to St. John, because that book followed next in the Greek manuscript. The Vatican MS. does not pretend to be a MS. of Ephrem's works, or even of his prayers; for example, between the third prayer to the Virgin, p. 1135, and the fourth prayer, p. 1137, in page 1136, intervenes a prayer to the Virgin, called a prayer of Barsanuphius (vol. i., p. cxxxvi., col. 2), and instead of any general heading or any allusion to Ephrem, or even to Thecaras as the author, the MS. calls each separately "a Prayer of the Mother of God," or, "a Prayer of the Most Holy Mother of God," &c.; and what is worthy of remark, Asseman himself, in his preface, vol. iii., p. iv., confesses that though he cannot bring himself, with some late writers, to think the prayers unworthy of Ephrem, yet in prayers of this kind some epithets were added by amanuenses, either from their own piety towards the Virgin, or drawn from the writings of holy men.

We believe we may safely add that these prayers have never appeared in any earlier edition of Ephrem's works than that of 1746, nor are they to be found in any other MSS. than the Cod. Vat. 1190. Even Venetus, who in his dedicatory epistle to the Pope, is [illegible], says he has brought to light all the writings of Ephrem, some of which had never before been published, especially from the Italian, and more particularly the [illegible] MSS. makes no allusion to any of these prayers. And Possevinus, though he speaks of the Vatican MSS., does not allude to these. One or two somewhat similar prayers contained in the former editions of St. Ephrem, also containing similar exaggerated [illegible] in honour of the blessed Virgin, are rejected as wholly unworthy of this holy man, and inconsistent with the spirit of the age in which he lived, by Tillemont, Cave, Dupin, and Cave;‖ and we certainly cannot help being astonished at the coolness with which Dr. Cullen cites these prayers as undoubted works of Ephrem Syrus, as no better evidence than what we have above referred to.

We may, perhaps, however, put the matter in a still clearer light, by citing some short passages from the in-

* See CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. i., p. 116–135. Vol. ii., p. 41.

* All the works of Athanasius were splendidly published in three volumes folio by the Benedictines, Paris, 1698; those of St. Basil in three volumes, folio, Benedictines, Paris, 1721–1730, and those of St. Hilary by the Benedictines, Paris, 1693, and John Salles, Rome 1731. The first volume of the long-expected Benedictine edition of Gregory Nazianzum appeared at Paris in 1778.

† For conclusive proofs that the homily "On the Annunciation of the Mother of God," attributed to St. Athanasius, and the Epistle to Julian the Apostate, attributed to St. Basil are spurious, see CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. iii., p. 81.

‡ The only other passage we have seen quoted in favor of prayer to the Virgin is contained in an oration said to have been made by Gregory in laudation of Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, which is pervaded with such a tissue of inconsistencies and contradictions, biographical and historical, from beginning to end, that it is impossible to believe it to have been the composition of a bishop deeply imbued with literature in all its branches—sacred and secular. We shall probably make these spurious works of Gregory the subject of a future notice, as for the present it would too much interrupt the course of our observations on the subject in hand, none of them having been relied on by Dr. Cullen in this pastoral.

disputably genuine works of St. Ephrem, taken from the original Syriac, from which the true nature of his devotional language may be safely learned, subjoining the Latin translation from Asseman himself, lest it might be suspected that we had mistranslated the original Syriac:—

Let us now, however, proceed with Dr. Cullen's quotations. His second selection is from a discourse in honour of the holy Virgin, cited from the second volume of the works of St. Epiphanius, edition of Petavius, Paris, 1622, page 293 et seq. Now, this discourse, or panegyric, is not only utterly inconsistent with other undoubted passages from the works of St. Epiphanius, of the 4th century, who was Bishop of Salamis, about A.D. 370, but it has been pronounced by all the learned, even Petavius the Jesuit himself (whose work Dr. Cullen cites), of much later date—though whether of the 7th or 9th century does not appear. Our space prevents us from citing the passages at length, from Ceillier, Tillemont, Cave and Oudinus, but we subjoin the exact references† and the very words of Petavius, which establish its spuriousness beyond all reasonable doubt, though we have not the additional advantage of the judgment of the Benedictines, they never having published an edition of the works of Epiphanius. Any of our readers who may wish to contrast what Epiphanius really wrote with this spurious panegyric referred to by Dr. Cullen, may easily do so by consulting THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. iii., pages 71 and 83.

With respect to Dr. Cullen's third authority, St. Proclus, who, he forgets to inform us, was of the 5th, not the 4th century, but whom he names as a Patriarch of Constantinople, and the successor of the holy doctor, St. John Chrysostom, we might, we think content ourselves by merely transcribing the passages, to show how little they are worth in such a controversy; but if any one should deem such extracts evidence that the Church of Rome, in the 5th century, believed that the Blessed Virgin was free from every stain of sin, original or actual, we only refer him to what St. John Chrysostom himself, the glory of the Greek Church (as St. Augustine was of the Latin), has recorded of his sentiments, which were not only that the Blessed Virgin was not free from original sin, but that she was not free from actual sin, which we have shown at large from copious extracts from the 7th vol. of St. Chrysostom's works, Benedictine ed., p. 407.—In our 2nd vol., p. 41.

Dr. Cullen's extracts, however, from St. Proclus, are verbatim as follows:—

"In his first discourse on the Blessed Virgin (Bibl. Galland, vol. ix.) he styles Mary "the spiritual paradise of the second Adam: one formed by God himself: a house which He himself had constructed: a vase made by his own hands: His dwelling place created by himself:" thus, adds Dr. Cullen, declaring the especial solicitude with which God, in creating Mary, watched over her integrity and sanctity.

"Again, in his sixth discourse:—" Mary is the heavenly globe of the new creation, in which the Sun of Justice never sets, repelling from her soul every darkness of sin." What words, says Dr. Cullen, could more simply and yet more emphatically convey to us the Catholic teaching, that the holy Virgin was ever illumined by the heavenly rays, and that no shadow of sin had for an instant darkened her pure soul?

"Again, in the same discourse, alluding to the intended separation of Joseph from the Virgin, he says—"He did not bear in mind that she could well become the temple of God, who was herself formed of pure clay; it was concealed from him how, by the pure hands of God, a second Adam had been formed from another virginal paradise."

Two out of the three of these extracts, it will be observed, are taken from the 6th discourse, which is, to say the best of it, of very doubtful authenticity. The learned Ceillier, 13th vol., p. 487, calls it "une mauvaise piece," and that it bears the name of Proclus only in one MS, adding the following description. "It is a long and tedious dialogue between Joseph and the Virgin Mary, on the subject of her pregnancy, founded solely on imagination, or some old apocryphal stories."

Let the remaining quotation from St. Proclus go for what it is worth, but any one who takes the trouble to refer to the learned Dupin's character of these discourses, in the Life of Proclus, vol. iv., p. 49, will agree with us that fifty such extracts would not weigh a feather in the scale when judging of the opinions even of the fathers of the 5th century.

Dr. Cullen cites but one other of the fathers, and that one also of the 5th century, being a passage from an oratorical eulogy on the Virgin, of St. Cyril of Alexandria, when presiding at the Council of Ephesus, which condemned Nestorius for denying her maternity, A.D. 431; but which, from beginning to end, does not contain a single phrase which proves that he considered her to have been "conceived without sin," neither the word "immaculate," nor anything equivalent to it, being to be found in the whole passage, the whole of which, however Dr. Cullen does not give, omitting, in fact, a great deal of it, including a part which clearly shows what the speaker meant by all his rhetorical laudation, which is briefly summed up in the description given of it by the learned Ceillier, tom. xiii., p. 285, when he says—"This oration" (for it was not a prayer, as insinuated by Dr. Cullen), "is, properly speaking, a mere eulogy on the Blessed Virgin, whom he represents as the source of all blessings, because she brought into the world Him by whom the human race was rescued from destruction;" which St. Cyril distinctly expresses in some of the words omitted by Dr. Cullen, viz.:—"per quam unigenitus Dei Filius iis qui in tenebris et in umbra mortis sedebant lux resplendit"—"thou by whom the only begotten Son of God shines forth as a light to those who sat in darkness and in the shadow of death."

Dr. Cullen's quotation is as follows:—

"Hail, Mary, Mother of God, venerable treasure of the universe, inextinguishable lamp, crown of virginity, sceptre of orthodoxy, temple which cannot be destroyed, ... through whom the Holy Trinity is glorified; through whom the precious cross is celebrated and adored all over the world . . . through whom churches are founded throughout the universe; through whom nations are brought to repentance, ... What mortal can adequately celebrate the glories of Mary?" He then points out, by a beautiful comparison, the exemption of the Holy Virgin from every sin:—"Who has ever heard," he says, "of an architect, after constructing an edifice for himself, to invite his enemy to be its first occupant and possessor?" "Quis unquam audivit architectum qui domum sibi ædificavit, ejus occupationem et possessionem primo suo inimico cessisse?" Which words, whilst showing forth Mary, formed by the All-wise Architect as a peculiar edifice in which He alone should dwell, clearly asserts says Dr. Cullen, that her pure soul was unsullied by the presence of sin, and never subject to the slavery of Satan."

In the same spirit this doctor of the church elsewhere exclaims (Opp. tom. 5, part 2, page 389 seq. edit. Paris, 1638):—"Hail, O Mother of God! through thee the ineffable and jordanic baptism of sanctification has shone forth. Hail (Deipara), Mother of God, by whom John and the Jordan are sanctified, and Satan is overcome. Hail thou, by whom the demons are put to flight, tempting Satan falls from Heaven, and the fallen creature is lifted up thither!"

We trust our readers will not consider us reviling the Blessed Virgin when we say, that we cannot help thinking that it would be nearly as just to assert that the Countess of Mornington won the battle of Waterloo, because she was the mother of the Duke of Wellington!

The remainder of Dr. Cullen's proofs are connected with our own country, and the way he deals with them does seem to us something remarkable. His first witness is St. Patrick. Those who are familiar with the writings of this great man must know it to be a fact, (and a significant one we think it is,) that neither in his Confession, nor anywhere else in his writings, is there even a single mention of the Virgin Mary's name; and we have shewn that in the ancient hymn of Secundinus, written in praise of St. Patrick, and which we printed in full in our 2nd volume, p. 134, while the writer speaks fully of the chief objects of the Christian faith, the three persons of the Trinity, the Angels, the Apostles, the Church, the Scriptures, Earth, Heaven, and Hell, it contains not one word of devotion to the Virgin Mary. Yet, what says Doctor Cullen: "Arriving in Ireland, and sent by St. Celestine,* a Pontiff who was a strenuous defender of the divinity of the Mother of God, and who had hurled his anathemas against the impugners of her divine maternity, we are not to be surprised that St Patrick bore with him a glowing love for Mary, and that he transmitted to his spiritual children a tender devotion to the Mother of God as all powerful in Heaven, as a virgin all immaculate, and free from every stain of original sin"! We are too old in Roman Catholic controversy to be ourselves much surprised at mere bold assertions, however devoid of any foundation in fact, but it is certainly somewhat surprising that Dr. Cullen should think his fellow-countrymen so simple as to believe his assertions, merely because he says we ought not to be surprised at them! Let Dr. Cullen cite a single line from St. Patrick's writings, (which have all been collected and published by the learned J. L. Villanceuva, Graisberry, Dublin, 1835,) that even colourably makes out his position, and we will apologise most heartily for our ignorance of the writings of the Patron Saint of Ireland, and admit that we have done grievous injustice both to St. Patrick and to Doctor Cullen's Pastoral Letter.

We pass over some poetical passages from the Paschal Poems of St. Sedulius, about "rosebuds and thorny briars" in which he contrasts Eve and Mary, after the fashion we have before mentioned when speaking of St. Hilary, and go on to Dr. Cullen's remaining Irish authorities, which, fortunately for our readers' patience, will not detain us long—St. Columbanus, and the Leabhar Breac. We must, however, to do justice to them, cite Dr. Cullen's exact words.

"We might here also quote another Irish writer, born about the middle of the sixth century, the great founder of monasteries, St. Columbanus, who, in his Commentaries on the Psalms, speaks in the same glowing terms of the privileges of the Virgin. But, we pass over his words to make room for another decisive document of the tradition of our Church, which is found in an ancient manuscript collection entitled Leabhar Breac."

As to the glowing terms of St. Columbanus, we think there is a very good reason why Dr. Cullen did not cite them; for we are nearly sure that it was as much out of his power to give such words as to give similar words from St. Patrick—the work in which they are said to be contained being, we believe, long since totally lost. We have never, at least, seen it, or been able to discover its existence; and the learned Ceillier,* in his Life of St. Columbanus, speaks of his "Commentary on the Psalms" as one of his works which are lost.

As to the Leabhar Breac, so far from its being a decisive document of the tradition of the Church from the remotest antiquity, it is sufficient to tell our readers what it really is—to show that it is of no value at all in a matter of this kind. We need scarcely say that, before the era of printing, it was the custom of scholars to transcribe and collect together in a volume or volumes all the manuscript works they could collect, and the Leabhar Breac Mac-Eodhagain, Anglice the "Speckled Book of MacEgan," which is preserved among the manuscripts of the Royal Irish Academy, is nothing more than a manuscript transcript of a variety of writers in the Irish language, of various ages and dates, transcribed for or by one MacEgan, in the 14th century; so that, without informing us what was the name and date of the author who composed the prayer taken from it, there is no ground whatever for knowing whether it belonged to the 6th, or the 10th, or the 14th century. If we were ready to admit, with Dr. Cullen, that the (Roman) Catholic Church never changes her doctrines, of course it would signify little whether the documents he cites were of the 19th or the 4th century; but we respectfully think that when he is purporting to prove that the NEW dogma is an ANCIENT doctrine, it would be somewhat more satisfactory to prove it by documents of the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, or even 4th century, than by those which may not be more ancient than the 14th.

There are some other topics treated of by Dr. Cullen in this pastoral letter which we should like to notice, but we must refrain from doing so for the present month at least, from want of room.

HAS A ROMAN CATHOLIC A RIGHT TO READ THE BIBLE WITHOUT ASKING THE PRIEST'S LEAVE.

A DISCUSSION BETWEEN FATHER HUGH AND BARNEY BRANNIGAN.

Hallo! Barney (says Father Hugh), is it true what I hear, that you've taken to reading the Bible, and never asked my leave?

Barney—If it's any crime to read the Bible, sure enough, your reverence has heard no lie of me; and indeed the more I read it, the better I like it; it's a fine book entirely, and a good warrant it has to be that same, for sure it's God's Book.

Priest—Well Barney, I always thought 'till now that you were a good Catholic, and an example for the parish, but I see you've been talking with the jumpers, and it's afraid I am that you'll be after losing your soul through their means.

Barney—God forbid, your reverence. Sure it's for the good of my soul I'm striving, for I know well that "'twouldn't profit a man if he gained the whole world, and suffered the loss of his soul,"† and indeed if it wasn't for the good of my soul I read the Bible, I wouldn't read it at all; for your reverence knows, as well as I do, that 'tis very bad for one's body to have anything to do with it, for it's sticks, and stones, and abuse we get for reading it, and if 'twas only the good of our bodies we were looking to, we'd have nothing to say to it.

Priest—It's not for reading the Bible that I'm angry with you, but for not asking leave. A good Catholic should never open a Bible without leave from his clergy.

Barney—Will your reverence show me where it's written in the Bible that I should ask any one's leave to read God's Word?

Priest—It's easy to show you that 'tis written in the book itself that "the lips of the priest shall keep knowledge, and they shall seek the law at his mouth,"‡ that is, you're to come to us when you want information about religion; we're God's trustees, and it's to us you should come for instruction.

Barney—Well, your reverence, I never thought that verse meant that the priests should lock up the Bibles and Testaments, and keep them from the people. I thought it meant that the priests should be so well acquainted with the Bible, that when a poor ignorant man like myself found anything hard in it, all he had to do was, go to his priest, and bring his Bible with him, and that the priest, being knowledgeable in such things, and being well acquainted with God's Word, would be able to help him out of the difficulty, and explain what he found hard.

"Iam orationes illæ, quæ Epiphanii nomine fucum jamdudum faciunt, satis cum stylo ipso, tum aliis quibusdam indiciis, alterius vel Epiphanii, vel authoris se esse declarant"—Epiphanios enim fuisse complures Cypri etiam episcopos, observabat R. These orations are eight in number, and extend from p. 251 to p. 303, of which the one cited by Dr. Cullen is the seventh, p. 291, &c.

We may add that Cardinal Bellarmine (de Script. Ecclesiasticis, Lugd. 1613, p. 74), in enumerating the works of Epiphanius, makes no mention at all of these orations.

* We have already proved in our life of St. Patrick, that there is not the least reason for believing that St. Patrick had anything to do with St. Celestine, or that he derived any commission whatever from the Bishop of Rome.—See CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. I, p. 25.

Priest—I wouldn't demean myself by arguing about the meaning of Scripture with the likes of you, but just look at the Protestants and see the fruits of allowing every man to read the Bible. Look at all the sects and religions they have among them. There's what the Bible has done; no wonder then that Pope Leo XII. called the Protestant Bible "the Gospel of the Devil," and no wonder that he exhorted all bishops and pastors "to turn away their flocks from those poisonous pastures;"* sure 'tis it that causes all the sects and divisions among heretics, while on the contrary, the Catholics are one and the same everywhere.

Barney—I'm thinking, your reverence, there's other reasons for Catholics being united, besides their not having the Bible; sure we can't differ from your reverence, and your reverence can't differ from the bishop, and the bishop can't differ from the cardinals, and the cardinals can't differ from the pope, and that's the reason there's a kind of unity amongst us. The thruth is, we'd be afraid to differ from your reverence, for if we did, 'tis abuse, and beating, and stoning we'd get. Sure we wouldn't get a day's work through the country, and we couldn't show our nose at a fair or a market, without a cry being raised after us, as if we we're robbers or murderers, and that's the reason there's a kind of unity among us; but in troth, your reverence, I'd rather have a little difference between us, like there is among the Protestants, than a kind of unity that depends upon the horsewhip and the curse. If the priests put them aside, and if every man could do as he pleased, I'm thinking there wouldn't be much unity amongst us, any more than there is in America, where I hear the Catholics are beginning to think for themselves, and read the Bible too, without leave or license from priest or Pope.

Priest—I see, Barney, that it's all over with you: a Protestant couldn't argue better; I see that you're fairly corrupted.

Barney—Your reverence, I deny that the Bible ever corrupted any man, and I couldn't stand by and hear it said that God's holy Word was the curse of mankind, and the cause of all heresy, without saying a word in its defence; and indeed I'm sorry to hear a priest crying down the holy Scriptures.

Priest—I'm not crying them down. I'm only saying that no man has a right to read them without leave from the Church.

Barney—And please your reverence if some tyrant was to say that you had no right to see the light of the sun, or drink the water of the well, or breathe the air of heaven, would you give in to him?

Priest—Of course I wouldn't, because those things are necessary to my life and health, and God only, who created them for my use, has a right to deprive me of them.

Barney—Just so, your reverence; and the Scriptures are as necessary to the life and health of the soul; they are light, as David tells us, and I'm sure that I've a right to see them. They are the streams of living water, and I have a right to drink them; they are the breath of the Holy Spirit, and who has a right to forbid my breathing them?

Priest—No one said that you shouldn't, only you should come to the Church for leave.

Barney—Why then, your reverence, shouldn't it be quite the other way? Sure it's the Church that should come to me with them; it's the Church that should urge us to read God's holy Word, instead of hindering us; and your reverence might as well say that you are appointed to see all the light, and drink all the water, and breathe all the air, and eat all the bread for me and every man in the parish, as to say that you can be religious for us, and that you have a right to keep the Bible from us as you please.

Priest—Hold your tongue man, I'm fairly vexed listening to you. Sure I knew well that it's with the jumpers you've been.

Barney—I hope, your reverence, that I've said nothing but the truth, and by my word the time is coming when the people won't allow themselves to be kept in darkness here, any more than in Dublin or the North, where Mr. O'Hagan, the great Catholic counsellor, says that 400,000 Douay Bibles has been sold within the last seven years—100,000 in Dublin, and 300,000 in Belfast—and it's me that's glad to hear that same any way; I tell your reverence plainly, that I deny the right of Pope or bishop, or priest, or church, to lock up the Scripture and keep it away from any of us, that is able to read it, and there's many more of my way of thinking. Sure you might as well say that the priest has the right of keeping under lock and key all the money in the parish, and giving it out as they please, by pence and half-pence, as to say that you have a right to keep from the people that which is worth more than thousands of gold and silver*—God's own word!—my mind is that your reverence might just as well undertake to save us the trouble of swallowing by eating for us yourself, as to say that you'd keep us from reading the Bible by reading it for us yourself. Take my word for it, the people will have their rights; and if your reverence and the other priests of Ireland won't give them the Scriptures they'll just take them from Protestants, or jumpers, or wherever they can get them. Sure I wouldn't care from whose hand I got a loaf of bread if I was starving; and in like manner I tell you the time is coming when the people will take the Word of God from whoever is kind enough to give it to them. They won't allow their precious souls to be starved to death for want of the bread of life while they can get their own Bible from the Protestant minister. More by token, when Christ himself tells us that "man liveth not by bread alone, but every word of God.†

Priest—But ignorant people like you would pick a wrong meaning out of it, and then 'twould do you harm instead of good. That's the reason why it's better for us priests to read it, and take the right meaning out of it, and then explain it to you.

Barney—Troth then, your reverence, though, I mean no offence, 'tisn't much of the Bible we'll get if we're trusting to what we get of it from the priests. And as to what your reverence says about poor ignorant men not understanding the word of God, I find it in the Bible that 'twas mostly the learned people that didn't understand it. St. Paul tells us that "the world by wisdom knew not God"‡ that is, they thought themselves so knowledgeable, and were so proud of their learning, they wouldn't submit to the simple plan of salvation that God had set forth for learned and unlearned. Again St. Paul says, "if any man among you seem to be wise in this world, let him become a fool that he may be wise,"§ that is, I'm thinking, that the learned man wasn't to trust to his learning but to come with an humble spirit, like a little child, ready and willing to be taught by God. And your reverence knows that the poor fishermen of Galilee understood Christ's words better than the learned scribes and doctors of the law, for the one saw the truth of his words and believed on him, while the others rejected and crucified him. So I don't think it's always the most learned that are best at understanding God's word. And moreover, if your reverence will let me tell you my real mind, I think many of the priests don't understand a great dale about it themselves.

Priest—Don't be slandering your clergy, Barney. It's they that know it, and a good right they have to know it, for it's taught them in Maynooth.

Barney—They ought to know it your reverence, but sure all the world knows that nothing frightens priests in general equal to the Bible. If a scripture-reader, or even a poor jumper pulls out the bible, it's enough to put a priest to flight. And besides I'm thinking if it's such a bad book for us, how can it be a good book for the priests. More by token, how seldom they read it, or speak about it. When a priest is going along the road he always has a book in his hand, but 'tisn't the Bible. It's his offices, and I'd like to see the man that ever seen a priest walking about with a Bible in his hand. I'm thinking that would be a sight good for sore eyes. And as for what they learn at Maynooth, I wouldn't give much for it, for I seen on a paper that in the year 1846, there were only 10 Bibles or Testaments found among 400 scholars, that were to be the makings of priests. But that's more than 7 years ago, and before Bibles was sold so cheap as Mr. O'Hagan says they now are at Belfast. But if we looked to the rights of the case, the priests would want to be even better instructed in the Bible than the Protestant ministers.

Priest—What do you mean by that?

Barney—I mean, your reverence, that our priests should know the Bible on their fingers' ends, for we're trusting entirely to them for everything about our religion. The Protestants hear service in English that they can understand, and every Protestant has a Bible that he can read for himself, so that even if his minister didn't know much about it, he could read the Word of God for himself; but we're trusting entirely to our priests, and I'm afraid it's the blind leading the blind, for some of them know as little about it as we do ourselves.

Priest—Barney, I only thought you an omadhaun before, but now I see that you're an out and out heretic; you're abusing your clergy, and standing up for the Protestant Bible, that all the world knows is a corrupt version.

Barney—I'm sorry to offend your reverence, but I must speak the truth whether it's pleasing or not; and after all I'm not so sure that the Protestant Bible is corrupt, for if it is, ours is corrupt too; for I've compared both, and there's but little differ between them; and I read in Mr. O'Hagan's great speech, that the great Bishop Doyle said that the Protestant Bible was one of the noblest books, and one of the ablest translations that ever was made, though he admitted it to have many inaccuracies; and besides it's out of the Douay Bible the Protestant ministers argue with us, and it's the Douay Bible they're giving out to us, and even your reverence won't say that it is corrupt.

Priest—I won't argue any more with the likes of you; I see that you're gone to the bad; you're a Protestant already, and you've left the old religion that your father and grandfather lived and died in.

Barney—Well, your reverence, to tell you the honest truth, I tried hard to remain in the Church of Rome, but I heard the voice of God calling to me out of his holy Word, and saying, "Go out from her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that you receive not of her plagues." But what made up my mind was seeing your reverence and the other priests so much against letting the people read the Bible; for, says I to myself, how can that be God's Church which is so much against God's Word? and how can they be God's ministers who are always keeping his Word from the people? And remember what I'm telling your reverence; the time is coming when, if the priests don't preach the Word of God in the chapels, the people will go to the church to hear it; and the day is coming when if the priests don't give out Bibles, the people will take them from the Protestants, or wherever they can get them; for God gave that Word to be "a lamp to our feet, and a light to our paths;"† and why should poor Irishmen be kept in darkness because the priests choose to lock up the candle? and God gave that Word to be food for the soul,‡ and why should poor Irishmen starve because the priests think it better to lock up the loaf? God gave that Word to be like living water, refreshing our souls, and making them bring forth fruit unto eternal life;§ and why should poor Irishmen be left to die of thirst because the priests choose to lock up the water of life? No, your reverence, 'twon't last, for with God's help, "there's a good time coming," when poor Irishmen will get their rights; and the first right they'll ask for is the Word of God. And now may God bless your reverence, and may he open the eyes of the priests of Ireland, and show them that in shutting up the Bible from the people, they are shutting out both themselves and others from the kingdom of heaven.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, DECEMBER 15, 1855.

SINCE our last publication, as most of our readers have no doubt already learned, the Reverend Vladimir Petcherine has been tried and acquitted of the charge of participating in the scandalous outrage on public decency committed on the 5th November last, in the chapel-yard at Kingstown, by publicly burning the Holy Scriptures among a number of immoral and irreligious works. We have no disposition whatever to impeach the fairness of either the trial or the verdict—whether that verdict was based upon a conviction that the rev. gentleman was not aware that there were Bibles in the heap burned in his presence and by his directions, or upon a deficiency of evidence to satisfy the jury (of whom the foreman was a Protestant, and the remainder Roman Catholics) that he was aware of it. In either case the rev. gentleman was properly acquitted; and we are far from asserting that the jury came to an unsound conclusion in the matter. According to the humane and enlightened laws of Great Britain, every man—be he native or foreigner, clergyman or layman—must in law be considered innocent until he has been found guilty on legal evidence; and though we may regret that the real culprit, be he who he may, has, for the time at least, escaped, we are not disposed to regret that the jury should have found that the crime was perpetrated without the concurrence or authority of the clergyman, who, prima facie at least, was responsible for what was done on the occasion. Two things of importance have, at any rate, resulted from the trial: first, the law has been published and put beyond dispute; and secondly, the determination of the Government and the law officers of the crown to enforce the law, no matter by whom violated, has been publicly demonstrated in a way which we have no disposition to criticise, even though the prosecution has failed to convict the particular individual suspected of its violation.

Such a prosecution we think was rendered the more imperatively necessary by the fanatical and turbulent language used and countenanced by some other Roman Catholic clergymen, even pending the proceedings against the Redemptorist Father.

On Sunday, the 25th Nov., the Very Rev. Dr. M'Evoy, P.P. of Kells, when takingthe chair at a numerous meeting of the electors of the county of Meath, at which we are told a large number of Roman Catholic clergymen were present, among other things is reported to have used the following words, when speaking of the pending prosecution :—

"Would you know what is the nature of that charge? It was that of committing to the flames a thing which pretends to be the Bible, but which is a vile and blasphemous perversion and corruption of the Word of God (loud cheers). It was for committing to the flames a volume, which, if I myself, in the absence of Attorneys-General and Solicitors-General, were going to commit to the flames, I should take it up with a pair of tongs, for fear of soiling my fingers; and so with the tongs would I hurl it into the consuming fire (tremendous cheering)."

Surely, when such language could be used at a public meeting by a Very Rev. Roman Catholic clergyman, in the presence of a number of others, and such a sentiment be received with tremendous cheering, it was high time for the law officers of her Majesty to take some steps to vindicate the law, and show such men as Father M'Evoy that they cannot violate it without running the risk at least of incurring a serious punishment. We rejoice to think that there can no longer be any dispute either about the law or the disposition of the Government to enforce it by all legal means within their power; and we sincerely trust that this trial will be the means of deterring some persons from committing similar outrages, who, but for it, might have been led into crime in the expectation of impunity.

Having said thus much to atone for the doubts expressed in our last as to the course likely to be pursued by the Attorney-General in the matter, and recorded our ready acquiescence in the acquittal of Father Petcherine, we should not further notice what took place at the trial but that we think the speeches delivered both by her Majesty's Attorney-General, and the eminent Queen's Counsel, Mr. Thomas O'Hagan, who conducted the defence (both, be it recollected, themselves Roman Catholics) contain matters of great importance, which deserve to be universally known and remembered in this country. We would gladly, if our space permitted it, insert both these speeches at large in our pages, as specimens of forensic eloquence, of which any true Irishman might well be proud. But even limited as our columns are, we cannot deny ourselves the gratification of recording at least a few extracts from these speeches, which we think will be as acceptable to our readers as they have been agreeable to ourselves. We trust the passages quoted by the Attorney-General from Archbishop Kenrick, and by Mr. O'Hagan from the celebrated Dr. Doyle, as to the excellence of the Authorised Version of the Scriptures, will not be lost on our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen; while the facts stated by Mr. O'Hagan as to the large circulation which the Douay version has obtained during the last few years, will afford all true lovers of the Holy Scriptures the sincerest pleasure. It will not be forgotten that we have never omitted an opportunity of encouraging the circulation of the Douay Bible (while steadfastly maintaining our conviction of the superior accuracy of the authorised translation), nor that, in order to facilitate that fair and free discussion which we have now laboured for four years to promote among our fellow-countrymen, we have always quoted the Douay version in preference to any other, though sincerely believing it to be inferior to our own.

The following are the extracts from the speeches of the Right Hon. the Attorney-General and Mr. Thomas O'Hagan, Q.C., on the trial, above referred to :—

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

Gentlemen, from the humblest individual in this country to the Sovereign who sits upon the throne, there is no security—none—for anything, be it life, or be it property, except what is based upon the Authorized Version of the Word of God. And, gentlemen, what is the law which governs this case? Upon that subject you will have information on the high authority of their lordships; but, speaking under their correction, I will state to you what is the law on the subject, as laid down by the greatest authorities, and recognised and established in these countries. Gentlemen, the law is thus stated:—Offences against God are, by the common law, indictable, as are all blasphemies against God, denying His being or His providence, or profane scoffing at the Holy Scriptures, or exposing any part thereof to contempt and ridicule. That is laid down in "Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown," p. 359, and Blackstone, in his fourth volume, p. 59, cites Chief Justice Prisot, in the reign of Henry VI., who says that "the Scriptures are the foundation of our common law;" and when was this said? It was not since the Reformation—it was not since the Authorized Version was given to the people of England—it was not since that translation was made. And remember, gentlemen, that these are the words, in all human likelihood, of a Roman Catholic Chief Justice, words spoken before the Reformation in England; and what says he? "The Scriptures are the foundation of our common law," on which all other laws are founded. These, gentlemen, are ancient and venerable authorities; but I regret, deeply regret, that I can refer to later cases—cases occurring in this country. Gentlemen, I consider it a great disgrace to this country that I am enabled to refer to other cases of this description. But, gentlemen, the people of this country—the Roman Catholic people of this county—are not to be held accountable for the acts of over-heated fanatics; and accordingly when I refer to these acts I do believe that the Roman Catholic population of this country do not agree in the acts complained of. Gentlemen, in the year 1852, so late as that, at the Spring Assizes of the county Mayo, a man was tried before the present Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench. It was my duty, as counsel for the prisoner, to suggest such topics in his defence as occurred to me, and I trust, and I know that every member of the bar will, with his utmost zeal and ability, press upon the court to lay before the jury such matter as may prove favourable to his client. That man was found guilty of the offence, which was the burning of a single copy of the New Testament. I was present, and I will not forget the words used by the eminent judge to whom I have referred in sentencing the prisoner. I will state it, for I know it to be the fact, that he was tried by a mixed jury of Protestants and Roman Catholics, and he had such assistance as my humble abilities were able to afford him. He was found guilty of the offence, and the eminent judge used these words:—"In this case the prisoner is indicted for burning a copy of the Authorized Version or Translation of the New Testament; and the offence is equally applicable to any other version or translation of the Scriptures, whether it be the Douay translation of the Old Testament, or the Rhemish translation of the New Testament, or the Authorized Version of the Bible." Gentlemen, you are aware—such of you as are Roman Catholics—that the Douay is the Roman Catholic translation of the Old Testament, and the Rhemish is the Roman Catholic translation of the New Testament. And what said that learned and eminent judge? "The offence is the same no matter what translation the book may be." In that case there were contemptuous words used at the burning, and it was laid down that the words used, and the want of reverence for the Scriptures, were blasphemous, for it is not because fallible men cannot agree upon a translation that any one version of it is to be treated with contempt; it is not because it may not be a perfect translation it is to be treated with vilification. Gentlemen, that man was found guilty, and he listened to these words, and heard an exhortation which I thought would have had such weight and influence throughout the entire of this country, that whatever might be our sectarian differences, however closely we might each hug the persuasions in which we were educated and brought up, still that we might join, and find a common ground whereon to join, in respecting and reverencing the Holy Scriptures. Still more recently—and it is with regret that I have to say it should be so—another transaction of the same character occurred. In the case of the Queen v. M'Quaid, tried at the summer assizes of last year, an humble man, not with the advantages of education, an humble peasant, was accused of having burned contemptuously a copy, a single copy, of the Sacred Scriptures. He was tried before an eminent and as merciful a judge as ever sat upon the bench—Baron Pennefather. Gentlemen, what was his language; what were the words of this eminent judge? "The offence," he says, "is complete, no matter whether it is an Authorized Protestant or Roman Catholic version of the Scriptures. It is an act of gross impiety, and I would say the same of any Protestant who would destroy, in so contemptuous a manner, the Douay copy of the Holy Scriptures. Whatever differences exist between these volumes—and they are slight indeed, it must be acknowledged by all that they both contain truths of deepest worth—truths that have been revealed to us for our eternal salvation; and the destruction of either is an offence against the law of the land, and an indignity offered to the oaths taken upon the Sacred Volume." That is the law, as laid down in the highest authorities. That is the law, as recognised by eminent judges who still live to adorn the Bench. That is the law acted upon in those two cases I have mentioned, when Roman Catholic jurors—and I say it to their honour—thought it right to convict the prisoners. This was the principle recognised by the best teachers of the Roman Catholic Church; and, if I am rightly informed, instead of wishing to cast contempt and ignominy on any version, they have spoken of the Authorized Version with honour, as a work deserving of the highest admiration and respect. Perhaps you will excuse my reading, gentlemen, from a public copy of a Roman Catholic, and a recent Roman Catholic version of the Sacred Volume. I have here in my hand a translation recently made by one of the most eminent divines, at this moment an Archbishop,* and when he made this translation a bishop of the Roman Catholic Church. For, gentlemen, you ought not to think for a moment the Roman Catholics have one fixed copy of the Sacred Scriptures, and that no one is to presume to make any other translation. The learning and the piety of man, from the earliest ages down to the present time, have thought it right in searching for truth to turn back again and again to the great originals; and accordingly, I find this rev. divine searching the most minute points of etymology, in order to make clearer and more plain the solemn truths of the Holy Scriptures. He says:—"In adopting occasionally the words and phrases of the Protestant version, I have followed the example of others, who have from time to time revised the Rhemish translation. It is not to be regretted that whilst we point to errors which need correction, we acknowledge excellencies which we are free to imitate, thus diminishing the asperity of censure by the tribute which we willingly render to literary merit." There is that volume—there is that translation published in the year 1851—emanating from a Roman Catholic bishop, now a Roman Catholic archbishop. There is that splendid tribute paid by him, in the face of the whole Roman Catholic world to the Authorized Version of the Sacred Scriptures. But, gentlemen, is it necessary in this day that we should refer to the authorities so late as that? Let us take up the Roman Catholic version of the Scriptures, and quote from that Roman Catholic version. What says the apostle himself, speaking upon the value of sacred writings?—"All Scripture [says St. Paul] inspired of God is profitable to teach, to reprove, to instruct in justice, that the man of God may be perfect, furnished to any good work." Has that been ever disrespectfully commented upon by any minister of the Roman Catholic Church? Where are we to search for the true lights of the Roman Catholic Church if not amongst those greatest bishops and teachers who are acknowledged as amongst its greatest ornaments? Let us turn to the almost inspired page of Masillon. Let us hear him tell us that the Deity, who scarcely ever appears in the profane page of ancient history, appears distinctly and openly almost always in the Divine writings, and that it is by their light only, that profane history can be advantageously studied. Let us look to the confession of St. Augustine, where he says, "that the Scriptures may be ever his chaste delight—that no day may pass without his finding a time to meditate on the sacred things of the law." Let us hang upon the eloquent lips of Bossuet, as he indignantly exclaims—"The greatest calumny of all which has ever been used against the Roman Catholic Church is that which attributes to us that we consider the Holy Scriptures dangerous. I ask who amongst us has ever dared to advance this blasphemy?" Well then, gentlemen, if these be the views and opinions of Roman Catholic clergymen, and of those most celebrated teachers and divines,—if these are the words and instructions of the Roman Catholic version of the Scriptures,—I ask, if those facts be proved before you which I have shortly endeavoured to detail, what will be said on behalf of the traverser? I well know that everything which talent, genius, and legal ability can suggest on his behalf will be suggested to you by my learned friend on the other side, but, gentlemen, I am much deceived—I have much deceived myself—if a word should fall from his Roman Catholic lips—even one single word—disrespectful of the Authorized Version of the Sacred Writings. He may, and he will, if he can, challenge the fact, and say the Word of God has not been treated with disrespect by the traverser, and that is a complete and sound defence. He may, and he will, if he can, say that it was not wilfully and knowingly committed by the traverser at the bar; but, as I have said, I shall be astonished, indeed, if my learned friend says a single word of a disrespectful kind of the Holy Scriptures. What, in fact, the defence will be, it is not for me to speculate upon. I have adopted the views of all Roman Catholic writers in telling you what I have told you, that it is the duty of every Roman Catholic to reverence and respect the Sacred Writings; and if he should ask you, without any evidence, to arrive at the conclusion that, because these doctrines have been laid down by the heads of our church, it is impossible that any man, any minister of the church, could show disrespect to this sacred Volume, —then, gentlemen, I will warn you against arriving, without sufficient grounds, at that conclusion; because the history of the world tells us that there are men influenced by fanatical zeal who can see nothing right save in that instrument which they have themselves used. If the facts I have stated are proved in evidence I would rather you would arrive at that conclusion, and consider that the traverser has been so influenced, rather than that, without evidence, you should come to the determination that whilst the Sacred Volumes were burned, whilst they were knowingly burned, still there was no contemptuous or criminal intention. Now, gentlemen, do not understand me as telling you that I believe or that I think that all versions of the Sacred Scriptures are the same. I do not mean for a moment to ask you to come to that conclusion. There are differences between different versions of the Scriptures. There are undoubtedly differences between the version of the Catholic Church and the Authorized Version. These differences are such as will continue to the end of time. Do I say that all versions of the Scriptures are alike? By no means. Differences there will exist between every sect, and each will cling to the version in which he has been taught to search for and find the truth. But Christianity is still the same. Great is the difference between the rising and setting sun, but the morning and evening are but one day. Errors will creep into every translation, for they are the work of erring men, and no temple is perfect but one, and that not made by human hands. Still, despite of differences and errors, the great original remains—that venerable record of the economy of the Supreme Being, the prophecy and the proof, the oracle and the miracle, the Royal Psalmist and the Divine Teacher—above all, the belief, the cherished belief in the atoning blood of Him, of whom it is written in all versions of the Scriptures alike, that "there is no other name under heaven given to men by whom we must be saved!" In that great name, in the name of our common Christianity, I ask you to approach this case. Act upon its precepts, and the law will be vindicated. This prosecution is not instituted for vindictive purposes, but for example. Whatever may be your verdict, I earnestly trust that there will go forth from this court a lesson of mutual forbearance: may Peace and her twin sister Charity preside over the land!

* F. P. Kenrick, Archbishop of Baltimore, U.S.

MR. THOMAS O'HAGAN, Q.C.

From the time of the invention of printing the press has teemed with copies of the Holy Scriptures; and can any one doubt the position on which I stand, when I tell you that between the period of the invention of printing and the publication of the Bible by Luther, there were 200 editions of the Bible published by the press of Europe; and not only that, but before the completion of that Bible, fifty editions in the vernacular tongues of Europe —those of France, Belgium, Spain, and England,—issued from the press? What is said by Maule in his remarkable work with respect to England. He says:— "The Holy Bible was long before Wickliff's day, by laborious and well-learned men, translated into the English tongue, and by good and godly people held in reverence and diligently read." And so, gentlemen, it has been down to the present moment. But before I go to this, need I ask for evidence to sustain my position beyond the very case now trying in this court? Here are the law officers of our Sovereign Lady the Queen coming to prosecute this humble minister of God. How and why? Not by reason of any statute, nor by reason of any law passed by any modern legislature. This case is founded on the old common law of England; and if there be a conviction here, it will be on that common law. That law, established by wise judges, by pious kings, and sanctioned by holy bishops, proclaimed that Christianity belonging to the Constitution of the country, and that the Scriptures and Christianity were identified, and that assault upon the Scriptures was an assault upon the Constitution and the law. But, gentlemen, it might be urged upon you, the impression might be upon your minds that this old system was not in existence at the present time, and that, although in the beginning of Christianity and in the mediæval times, under the influence of popes and bishops, the Scriptures were reverenced and spread throughout the world for the enlightenment and the salvation of the human race, still that in this unhappy land of Ireland there is a difference. It may be said (and my apprehension is that some of you may be under the impression) that in Ireland there is a disposition on the part of the Roman Catholic Church to prevent the circulation of the Scriptures and the cause of the Word of God. I have investigated that; I have, with a view to this trial, made a few inquiries; and I have to tell you this (and this fact ought to leave no doubt on the mind of any honest man whom I address), that in this city of Dublin there is a single publisher who, within the last seven years, has issued three editions of the Catholic Bible from his shop and press, under the sanction of the Rev. Dr. Mac Hale, Archbishop of Tuam, and the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, the late venerated prelate of the archdiocese; and that publisher has told me, that of these three editions he sold 42,500 copies, and that if all the copies which have issued from other hands in Dublin were enumerated, they would amount to 100,000 copies. I know this, too, that friends of mine—dear and venerated friends—in the county and town where I was born, informed me that there had been a large issue of the Holy Scriptures in the Douay Translation. In Belfast alone copies of the Bible to the extent of 300,000 have been disposed of, and at such prices as to bring them within the reach of the poorest person, varying from 6*d.* and 9*d.* upwards, and that although the publishers of that town have not the assistance or facility which the publishers of the Authorized Version possess; for whereas the latter have an allowance of twenty-five per cent on the paper on which it is printed, the former have not an allowance of one farthing. I think on that point I have a right to make an impression upon such of you as have any doubt upon the matter as to the circulation of the Scriptures, and as to the enmity of the heads of the Catholic Church to that book. And now I have to tell you, and it is right you should fully understand, that the doctrine of that church, while it is consistent with the full and free circulation of the Word of God, proclaims this: that that church, holding of authority—holding itself the teacher of the nations, does not approve of the unadvised and undirected perusal of the Scriptures. But I have to tell you further, that that church does not approve in all its parts of the Authorized Version of the Scriptures. It believes in it there are errors and corruptions, and having these, and leaving them unexplained, might be the means, instead of guiding men to truth, of leading them into error. But while it does that, it holds this as its true doctrine and real faith, that the Scriptures are a most precious possession, and that rightly read, and under right direction, the Scriptures should be circulated afar, even to the bounds of the earth. The Attorney-General was right in saying that you would hear from me no word of condemnation of the Sacred Scriptures here. Understand me as saying nothing whatever on that subject, but that if it be necessary to prove to you that Catholics have not the narrow views which some attribute to them, if it were necessary I could demonstrate to you that Catholics regard with reverence the Word of God. I have to state to you the opinion of one of the ablest and wisest men, and one of the most devoted Catholics that ever existed in this land. I refer to the Right Rev. Dr. Doyle. He was examined before a committee of the House of Lords in the year 1825, and he was asked—"Did he consider the Authorized Version of the Scriptures used in the Church of England as of a sufficiently perverse quality to warrant the description that it is the Gospel of the Devil?" and his answer was—"I have said before, God forbid that I should so consider it, for, though it has many errors, I consider it as one of the noblest works, and one of the ablest translations that ever has been produced. This I say, while I consider that it abounds in inaccuracies." In the same year, before a commission of inquiry which sat in Dublin, the opinion of four Catholic Archbishops was required. They were Drs. Curtis, Kelly, Suffern, and Murray. Dr Curtis said:—"We agree that the Authorized Version of the Established Church is a very noble and a very fine work. It uses fine language. It surpasses ours by far in point of language, for it is in the nature of a paraphrase; but we cannot take it, and have not done so, but we have all of us in our controversial works praised the translation. It is a very fine one—very good language—and harmonized more than ours." Why do I state all this? It is for the purpose of showing that there is not among the prelates of the Catholic Church the opinions attributed to them, and because I have a right to say that no such opinions are propounded by the heads of that church. And I have a right further to ask you not to assume that my reverend client acted in the spirit and with the purpose imputed in this indictment. Gentlemen the Attorney-General spoke, and truly, of the fanaticism which sometimes disfigures the Christianity we all profess. There is, unfortunately, no doubt of it. There is no doubt that men of all religions are sometimes over zelous, and that their zeal may degenerate into fanaticism, though I shall demonstrate to you that that observation has no bearing on my client.

I felt when I read those passages to you that the Church of Ireland was not obnoxious to the charge of zealotry, and I have others to read from some who rank even higher than the prelates whose words I gave you. Dr. Kelly the Metropolitan of the Roman Catholic Church in the west, was examined at the committee before which Dr. Doyle was examined in 1825, and he was asked—"Is it your experience of the Protestant Bible, or have you heard it in such a manner as to believe it, that there have been any number of cases of desecration of the Testament in the West, either executed or enjoined by the clergy?" He answers:—"The directions given to the clergy are, that if the versions of the Scriptures are not approved of by the Catholic Church, the faithful are to refuse to take them. If they take them, they are to be given up into the hands of the clergy, and I have not known of any instance of any clergyman destroying, by fire, or otherwise, any of them." He then, in answer to another question, says he knows nothing of a destruction of Bibles in the river at Ballinasloe, and says he would think it improper to sanction such an act, and improper to destroy such a book. Dr. Doyle says he would think it improper to treat the Word of God in that way; he might overlook the act in a person committing it from a mistaken view, but would think it very wrong. I have read this to disabuse your minds of the impression that my client, because of his religion and profession, is to be assumed guilty of that which, in fact and truth, he never did. If I have taken with me each of you as had that impression or prejudice on your minds, my work is done."

We take the present opportunity, when closing our fourth volume, to repeat the offer which we made at the end of the year 1854, viz:—That with a view to facilitating fair discussion, we will undertake to forward the CATHOLIC LAYMAN during the ensuing year, without charge, to any Roman Catholic clergyman who will be good enough to intimate either to the Editor or Publisher, 9, Upper Sackville-street, his desire to receive it, direct through the post. We also, again, invite our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen, whether clergymen or laymen, to avail themselves of our pages to publish replies to our arguments, or otherwise defend the doctrines of their Church as they may think most likely to promote Christian charity, and the cause of truth. Anything written in a spirit of candour and good feeling will be inserted freely, and with a sincere anxiety to give the most perfect fair play to our opponents.

We hope our regular subscribers will be good enough to forward their subscriptions for the ensuing year (together with any arrears due) on or before the 1st of January next. We need scarcely remind them, though 3*s.* 6*d.* is a small sum, that when a large number of such sums is in arrear, it imposes a serious difficulty in the way of the conductors.

BIBLE BURNING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

DEAR SIR—I should be sorry to think that there are not many Roman Catholics who are offended and grieved at the profaneness of those persons, wherever they were, who were so destitute of all feelings of reverence for the holy Scriptures as to burn them publicly at Kingstown on the 5th of November last—an outrage which has filled all right-minded persons with shame and indignation. Unfortunately this is nothing new. It is quite certain, whatever be the truth of the matter as to the Redemptorist father, that Roman Catholic priests have been known to burn Protestant Bibles, and encourage others to do so, and that such zealots as the late editor of the Tablet have made no secret of their approval of their impiety. For this reason I should wish to propose, for the consideration of your Roman Catholic readers, two or three questions, which, I hope, they will not think improper or undeserving of an answer.

1. Why is it that Roman Catholics burn the Protestant Bibles, while Protestants never think of burning Roman Catholic Bibles?

The Roman Catholic version was made and published with a controversial intention. It was not put forth in order to encourage or facilitate the reading of the word of God in the vulgar tongue; but to guard people against the alleged corruptions in the Protestant Bible. This is distinctly avowed in the preface of the Rhemish Testament, where the misdoings of the Protestant translators are declared to be so wicked and shameful, that the word of God has been, through their "sacrilegious treachery, made the devil's word." Well, if the Protestant Bible is so utterly contrary to the Roman Catholic faith, we may fairly suppose that the Roman Catholic Bible is quite as contrary to the Protestant faith. It was got up expressly for the purpose of opposing the Protestant doctrines in the Protestant Bible. It is not what it professes to be. The learned Romanists by whom it was prepared and published, and all their other learned divines who have been revising and correcting it from time to time during two centuries and a-half, have laboured to little purpose. It is an antidote against Protestantism, as far as they could make it serve such a purpose. Why, then, do not Protestants collect the Douay and Rhemish translations and burn them? Some Protestants have not shown themselves very moderate or temperate in their mode of carrying on the controversy—I regret to be obliged to confess it; and I trust the CATHOLIC LAYMAN is doing something effectual towards bringing all parties to treat such serious matters with more of the meekness of wisdom. But did ever any one hear of the wildest Protestant—gathering Roman Catholic Bibles together and making a bonfire of them? I confess, for my own part, with more than five and twenty years' experience of the controversy, I have never heard of a Protestant burning a single copy. Why is this?

2. Every one has heard of Protestants taking trouble and going to expense in order to supply their Roman Catholic fellow Christians gratuitously with copies of the version sanctioned by their priests. It is notorious that Protestants would infinitely rather see them read the Roman Catholic Bible than none at all, well knowing, all the time, that this translation was made with an avowedly hostile intention towards the Protestant faith. My second question, therefore, is this—Why do Protestants encourage Roman Catholics to read the Roman Catholic Bible, and help to supply them with it? Is it that they know that even this hostile version is, on the whole, so favourable to the spread of what they believe to be the truth, and so likely to open men's eyes to what they believe to be the errors of Rome, that they are only too thankful to induce Roman Catholics to read it? If this be not their reason I should like to know what is. If it be, I hope your Roman Catholic readers will consider the consequence.

3. When St. Paul was in prison in Rome, he wrote to the Christians at Philippi an epistle, in the first chapter of which he mentions that some persons in Rome were preaching the Gospel, not from any proper motive, but from "envy and contention—not sincerely," he says, "supposing that they raise afflictions to my bonds." In what spirit did the great Apostle bear this trial? "But what," he says, "so that by all means, whether by occasion or by truth, Christ be preached: in this also I rejoice, yea, and will rejoice." I would appeal to all calm judging men, which party among us seems to bear most resemblance to the spirit of the Apostle and his unselfish love for truth—'the Protestant, who rejoices to assist and encourage his Roman Catholic brethren to read their own Bible,' or the Roman Catholics who denounce the Protestant Bible as "the devil's word," and burn it?

These candid Roman Catholics who have taken the trouble to compare the two versions, know perfectly well that the differences between them are too trifling and unimportant for the questions at issue between the Churches to be much affected by them, one way or other. But even if this were not so—even if the Roman Catholic version were much more serviceable to their side of the controversy than it really is—my questions could lose nothing of their importance. I shall be thankful if some readers of that communion will not think them unworthy of serious consideration.—Faithfully yours,

X. A.

PIOUS BIRDS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As you do not seem to believe the story of the pious sparrow, who was always chaunting Ave Maria in the ears of Victor De Planecy,* I can scarcely hope that you will give full credit to what I am about to narrate; but I can assure you I take it from no less an authority than Bonaventure† (a canonized saint of the Church), in his life of St. Francis, and the Annales Fratrum Minorum by Lucas Waddingus, published at Rome (cum privilegio summi Pontificis) in 1731. St. Francis having been once in dispute with himself whether it were fitter for him to spend his time in praying or preaching, sent to St. Clara and St. Sylvester to consult them thereupon; and they having both answered that he should preach, St. Francis immediately replied, "Let us go forth in the name of the Lord." And, accordingly, the next morning early, having taken two companions with him, he started off without delay, and ran so fast, and with such fervour to fulfil his divine calling, that he appeared endowed with new virtue from heaven, as if touched by the hand of God himself. He soon approached Bevagna, and, seeing a place where multitudes of various kinds of birds were gathered together, he makes haste thither, and salutes the birds as if they were reasonable creatures. The birds being all big with expectation turned towards him, and those who were in the bushes bowed their heads, that they might listen to him, in a manner quite unusual; he then approached them, and earnestly admonished them all that they should hear the Word of God, and said to them—"My brethren birds, ye ought to praise your Creator, who has given you feathers and wings, and good air, and provides for you without your care." At these excellent instructions, the birds, in a wonderful manner, began to stretch out their necks, spread their wings, open their beaks, and look earnestly at him. Then he, passing through the midst of them in an admirable fervour of spirit, even touched some of them with his tunic, but none of them stirred, till, having made the sign of the cross over them, and given them leave and his blessing, they all flew away together. All these things his companions, who were waiting for him on the road, were witnesses of.*

The same learned and pious writers go on to say that St. Francis proceeded on his travels, and came to a place called Castrum Alvianun, in Umbria, near the river Tiber, where, having collected a number of people and commanded silence, he was scarcely able to make himself heard, from the great noise made by the swallows who were building their nests in the place; whereupon, the man of God, in the hearing of all the people, thus addressed the troublesome birds, "Sisters swallows, it is now time that I should speak, you have said enough already. Hear the word of God, and hold your peace till that be done." Whereupon, as if they were rational animals, they suddenly were silent, nor did one of them move from the place until the whole sermon was finished; whereupon, all who saw it were filled with astonishment (as well they might) and glorified God. The fame of this miracle being spread around influenced many with reverence to the Saint, and true devotion of faith.†

But wonders did not cease there; for St. Bonaventure goes on to inform us that "a scholar of Paris having heard of the fame of the above-mentioned miracle, being much troubled with the continued chattering of a swallow while he was intent on study, said to his companions, 'This swallow is one of those who interrupted St. Francis when preaching, until he imposed silence on them;' and turning to the swallow he addressed him in faith thus, 'In the name of God's servant, Francis, I command you, that when you are near me you always hold your peace.' The swallow, therefore, on hearing the name of Francis, as if taught by the discipline of the man of God, immediately became silent, and placed itself in his hands, as if in safe custody. The stupified scholar immediately restored it to liberty, and heard its chattering no more."‡

Whether, Mr. Editor, you will believe these stories of docility and obedience on the part of birds, I cannot say; but think their example would be very edifying, if one only had credulity enough to believe such saintly legends with an implicit faith.

Yours, truly,

A CONSTANT READER.

[If we had not the high authority of St. Bonaventure that these things were real miracles and not myths, we should have been disposed to think they were a mere pious pleasantry, invented designedly to diffuse a spirit of attention and obedience among the people. We confess, however, we feel much difficulty in treating as myths things so solemnly related as actual facts, though men like Dr. Newman may consider such stories the kind of facts proper for ecclesiastical history, and say that if swallows did not obey St. Francis and the Parisian student, as narrated, they might and ought to have done so; which is all the same thing.

Our correspondent might have gone farther, and shown how St. Francis instructed a sheep to attend prayers, and kneel and bleat before the altar of the Blessed Virgin; and how he, at the market-place at Trevi, gently admonished an ass's foal who was running up and down and disturbing him while preaching there; and how he, with a pleasing countenance, said to him, "Brother Ass, I desire thee to stand still, and not interrupt the word of God, which I am preaching to this thirsty people." Upon which the ass (moved, perhaps, by the humility of the good man in acknowledging his poor kindred) fell on his knees and heard the sermon out.*

We shall not add a word of comment, but merely ask our intelligent Roman Catholic readers whether they believe these stories to be true? or whether they consider them silly falsehoods which must have been well known to be such by those who successfully foisted them for ages on the credulous and ignorant, and still continue to do so, wherever the light of a generally diffused knowledge and intellectual cultivation have not rendered such a deception impossible.]

A FEW MORE WORDS ABOUT PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

MR. EDITOR—As Jerry and I were coming home from work the other night, I seen that he was very down in himself, and never a word out of him, nor a bit of a song, nor any diversion in life, and says I to him, "What's come over you at all; is it the rent that's troubling you?" "No," says he, "the pig will pay the half-year that's due, and I'm clear up to last March." "Are any of the childer sick?" says I. "No," says he; "thanks be to God they're all hearty." "Well," says I, "what is it ails you? for I see plain that something is troubling you." "Well," says he, "I won't deny it to a friend like you; I'm greatly troubled in mind since I got the Bible, for," says he, "I can't get that verse out of my head, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and suffer the loss of his soul?"† "Well," says I, "if it's the Bible is troubling you, can't you give it back to the Reader, and have done with it?" "'Twould be no use," says he, "for I could'nt get it out of my mind, and besides," says he, "though it's troubling me, still I know that it's for my good 'tis doing it, and," says he, "it reminds me of what happened the year of the great fever. I was standing at the door one day as Doctor Hennessy was passing, 'and,' says he, 'Jerry, get that dung away from your door or you'll bring the fever into your house,' but I only laughed at him, so the next day he told me the same thing, but I kept never minding, but he kept on warning me until I got fairly vexed about it, and at last I answered him quite short, and told him to mind his own business, so after that he said no more, but signs on, the fever came into the house, and stretched myself on the bed for three weeks, and carried off two of the childer, and then I saw, when 'twas too late, that though the Doctor vexed and troubled me, 'twas for my good; and," says he, "Dan, I'm thinking it's just the same with the Bible; it's vexing and troubling me, but I know that 'tis for my good, so I can't put it away from me." "And," says I, "what part of it is troubling you?" "Well," says he, "every part, for I can't open it but I find something to trouble me. I find in it that all the holy water in Ireland can't blot out my sins, for there's nothing but the blood of Christ that can do it; and it troubles me to find in it, that all the prayers I've been offering for years to the holy saints won't do me a bit of good, because there's but 'one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus';‡ and it's troubling me to find in it that the Virgin, though a holy and blessed woman, can't put in a good word for me, for it speaks of no advocate but one, 'Jesus Christ the just."§ These are the things that's troubling me, for I see that the Bible is against us, but how could I ever give up the religion that I have been taught since I was the size of a sod of turf?" "Take my advice," says I, "and put away the book entirely." "I can't," says he, "for I know that it means well by me; but I won't deny that it troubles me greatly, not being able to find a bit of our religion in it, high or low." "There it is," says I, "isn't that the very thing Father John told us?" "Sure," says I, "how could an ignorant man like you find it?" "'Tis'nt the ignorance," says he, "that keeps me from finding it, for," says he, "I can find the Protestant religion in it, and sure I wouldn't find that any more than the other if 'twas the ignorance that ailed me; and," says he, "if our religion was in it, I'd be sure to find it." "But," says I, "have you searched well?" "I have," says he, "and since the argument the Reader had with Andy Kelly about Purgatory, I've been looking all through the Bible to find it, but the more I look for texts for it, the more I find texts against it. But," says he, "I'm thinking that I can't find Purgatory in the Bible for the very reason that Billy Jones couldn't find about the war in the newspaper." "How was that?" says I. "Why," says he, "I was going along the road with the master, and who did we meet but Billy, with a big newspaper in his hand. 'What are you reading?' says the master. 'Troth then, your honour, says Billy, 'it's looking for the war I am.' 'And haven't you found it?' says the master. 'Never a word about it, says he. 'It ought to be there,' says the master, 'but have you read it all?' 'Every word,' says Billy, 'for I'm this two hours at it.' So with that the master looks at it, and says he, 'no wonder for you not to find it.' 'Why so?' says Billy. 'Because tisn't in it, says he,' 'for that's an old paper of five years ago, and when that was written there was no war at all, and,' says Jerry, 'I'm thinking that's the very reason I can't find Purgatory in the Bible, because it isn't in it, and I'm thinking there wasn't any Purgatory at all when the Bible was written." "But," says I, "Andy is a very knowledgable man, being a schoolmaster, and he says that 'tis in the Bible." "Yes," says Jerry, "and yourself seen what a party hand he made of it when he argued with the Reader." "But," says I, "he said that he'd look for more texts, and may be he'd do better next time." Well, sir, just as we turned the corner, who should we see but Andy, and the Reader, and a lot of the boys, hard at work at the discussion, "and," says the Reader, "I'm not surprised at the priests standing up for Purgatory, for it's meat and drink, and board and lodging to them; but I'm surprised at poor men like you being so fond of it; for," says he, "if it's true, you're all in a bad way." "How so?" says Andy. "Why," says he, "How does the priest say that the souls are to be got out?" "By masses," says Andy. "And how are the masses to be got?" says the Reader. "By paying for them," says Andy. "And where is the money to come from?" says he. "Troth, then, that's easier asked than answered," says Andy. "Now," says the Reader, "don't you see that it's a bad doctrine for a poor man? and," says he, "most of you are poor men, and between the taxes and the bad times you find it hard enough to feed the childer, and when you die it's little you'll be able to leave behind for masses." "True for you," says Mick; "sure if I died to-night I couldn't leave as much as would pay turnpike for a walking stick." "And," says he, "if Purgatory is true, it's mighty hard entirely on the poor." Well, Sir, Jerry jumped up, "and," says he, out quite bold, "I'll never believe that God would be harder on the poor than on the rich, and," says he, "the Bible is against it; for," says he, "I'm not ashamed or afraid to confess that I've been reading it; and that book says that God 'regardeth not the rich more than the poor, for they are all the work of His hands;'* and," says he, "if Purgatory was true, the rich man would be well off, for he could leave plenty of money for masses, but we'd be ruined entirely; so," says he, "it can't be true; and, besides, doesn't St. James say that 'God hath chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom;'† and the word of God tells us everywhere that Christ died for one man as well as for another, and that salvation is as free to the poor man as to the rich—to the beggar as to the Queen—because Christ gives it freely without money and without price. That's the kind of salvation that would match us," says Mick, "that would be given freely, without money or price; for I'm thinking if it depends on the money we've but a poor chance." "But," says one of the boys, "I hear that the priest is coming down greatly in the price of the masses in regard of the badness of the times." "Well," says the reader, "that reminds me of what I once seen in Waterford, and I never laughed so hearty before nor since." "What was it at all?" says the boys. "Why," says he, "I seen a great crowd standing round a placard that was on the market-house door, and sure enough a queer placard it was. Here's the way it read"—

GREAT REDUCTION IN PRICES!

Cheap Fares to

PURGATORY!!!

"Well, the Romanists were very angry, for they thought 'twas the Protestants done it; but one of the boys saw at last how it happened. The Steam Packet Company had posted notices of cheap fares to Liverpool, and 'twas a tall man that put them up, and the next day a little short man posted notices of a lecture on purgatory, and put his over the others, but wasn't tall enough to cover them entirely; so you couldn't go through a street in the town without meeting a crowd of boys reading the cheap fares to purgatory." "But," says Andy, "the Bible says that 'nothing defiled' can enter into heaven,‡ and," says he, "there's none of us so good but we're defiled with sin; and therefore there must be some sort of purgatory to take away the defilement, or no one could get to heaven." "You never spoke a truer word," says the reader; "but the same book that told you that, tells you how the defilement is to be got rid of. God says, 'I am he that blotteth out thy iniquities for my own sake, and I will not remember thy sins.'§ There's who does it—'tis God himself; and then St. John tells us what the sins are blotted out with. He says, 'the blood of Jesus Christ, God's son, cleanseth us from all sin.'‖ Now," says he, "there's what takes away the defilement—there's what we trust to for cleansing our souls—there's the 'Protestant's purgatory,' and," says he, "show me a better if you can." "Well," says Andy, "I'll give you a proof out of Dr. Milner, and there never yet was a Protestant that was able for him; he says that 'Abraham's bosom,' where the soul of Lazarus was carried by the angels,¶ was Purgatory; and he proves it clearly, for he says that it wasn't heaven, 'otherwise Dives would have addressed himself to God instead of Abraham;'* and it wasn't hell, for 'twas there Dives was; and, therefore, it must have been Purgatory." "Well," says the Reader, "that beats all I ever heard. Tell me," says he, "what kind of place is Purgatory at all?" "'Tis 'a place or state of punishment,'† says Andy. "Well," says the Reader, "the Catechism of the Council of Trent says that the souls of the saints enjoyed a 'tranquil abode in the bosom of Abraham, without any sense of pain;'‡ and now, boys," says he, "you may settle among yourselves which, Dr. Milner or the Catechism, is wrong, for one or other must be wrong." "Why, then," says Jerry, "it's Dr. Milner that's wrong, for the note to that verse in our own Bible says that 'Abraham's bosom' was a 'place of rest;' and," says he, "we all know that Purgatory isn't a place of rest." Well, sir, Andy turned on Jerry, and says he, "You ignorant spalpeen, how dare you set up your opinion against mine and Dr. Milner's? and," says he, "isn't it enough to have the Reader against me, without having an omadhawn like you aggravating me." Well, the boys began to laugh, and Andy got vexed; and, says he, "By this and by that, I'll never speak another word in defence of our religion before a set of Ignoramuses, that don't know a parallelogram from a triangle." But the boys only laughed the more. "So," says he, "the curse of Cromwell on every mother's son of you; I won't be wasting my time any longer with the likes of you." And with that he left the place. So the Reader turned to us, and, says he, "Boys, take my advice, and stick to the plain words of the holy Apostles, and don't trust to the meanings that Dr. Milner, or Dr. Butler, or Dr. Doyle does be putting on them, for you see plainly that hardly two of them agree—one is against the other, and that one against a third; but," says he, "did you ever find St. Matthew against St. Mark, or St. Luke against St. John? or does St. Paul tell us that it's Christ's blood that cleanses sin, while St. Peter says that it's Purgatory does it? No," says he, "there's no contradiction between them; it's the one word with them all, the same story with each. They all tell us that there's nothing else can blot out our sins but the precious blood of Christ, and that nothing else is required, for that blood can cleanse us from all sin." So with that he left us.

Your humble servant to command,

DAN CARTHY.

CLURICAUNES AND FAIRIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

MR. EDITOR—You may smile if I ask, do you believe in such things as cluricaunes and Fairies? Perhaps, however, your mind may be changed, when I tell you what happened here last spring.

Just after the potatoes were set, I went out one morning to look after the men, and met my friend John Connors. "Jerry," said he, "did you hear what happened yesterday?"

"No," said I.

"May I never, sin," said he, "but a labouring boy of Johnny Corkery's caught a cluricaune, making a little saddle by the side of a ditch, in one of Johnny's fields."

"Do you tell me so," said I. "How did he manage to catch him?"

Oh!" said he, "the way he did it was this. He spied something red at some distance from him, as he was coming down the field, just like a red poppy in the distance, and as he came towards it, he heard a little tap, tap, tap, like a shoemaker putting on a sole. He threw himself down on the grass, and crept on without making a noise until he came quite close to where he had seen the red thing; and, sure enough, there he saw a real live little cluricaune, with a red cap and knee breeches, as hard at work as he could be, making the most beautiful little saddle that could be seen. The cluricaune was so intent on his work, and making such a noise with his little hammer, that he did not perceive the boy coming nigh him, and before he could turn round, or make an attempt to escape, he had him caught safe in his hand. "I have you, my boy," said he, "and before I let you go, you must tell me a thing or two; and, first of all, Will the potatoes grow this year?"

"They will," said the cluricaune, but you will not be there to eat them."

"Tell me this instant," said the boy, "where is that crock of gold that you know about?"

"I know no more than that man behind you," said the cluricaune.

The boy, not recollecting that if he took his eyes off of him, he would be sure to disappear, turned round his head to see who was behind him, and when he turned it back again, the cluricaune was gone! In his hurry, however, he forgot to take the saddle with him, and the boy has it now; any one that likes to go up to Johnny Corkery's can see it."§

Now, if all this be true—and who can doubt it when the saddle is there to be seen—may there not be ten thousand cluricaunes in the country, for anything that we know to the contrary; and if there are such things as cluricaunes, why not believe that there are such things as Fairies?

The Protestant parish clerk says I am an old woman if I believe any such nonsense. Well, maybe so. "Be-thershin," as we say in these parts; but, for all that, he cannot account for the saddle.

Now what I want to know, Mr. Editor, is this do you, with your experience, think that there is sufficient evidence in this case of there being such things as cluricaunes? I have related the matter as it was told to me. I am sometimes on juries at the sessions, and I have a general idea of what evidence ought to be, in common cases, but I have a high opinion of your skill and learning in solving difficulties, and I have a lurking suspicion that the evidence for the genuineness of many relics that our Clergymen tell us of, and for some extraordinary and miraculous things that are said to have been done by saints, may not be everything that a plain and reasonable man might expect. For this reason I take the liberty of asking your opinion on these matters, and hope you will give some account of what you think ought to be sufficient evidence in doubtful things.

I am, Mr. Editor, your humble servant,

J. J. O'C.

‖ For an account of the Cluricaune, see Croker's Account of the Elves in Ireland; Fairy Legends, part iii., p. 7. Murray, 1826.

[We have been highly amused with the above little story, which is so well told that it is almost a pity to throw a doubt on it. We cannot pretend to so much skill in the laws of evidence as our correspondent gives us credit for; but as far as we understand those laws we believe that the proof of the genuineness of many so-called relics and modern and mediæval miracles is much on a par with the argument by which he so satisfactorily proves the sorority of Johnny Corkery's boy. "There must be cluricaunes, for we cannot account for the saddle!" If the jury on the late occasion had understood the laws of evidence so, who knows but they might have come to the conclusion that the Rev. Mr. Petcherine burned the Bibles; for there were the burned fragments, and who could otherwise account for them?]

FARM OPERATIONS FOR DECEMBER.

(From the Farmers' Gazette.)

FROM the very favourable seed time we have had now for some time, we were in hope that the principal breadth of wheat has been got in ere this. On a recent drive through the country, however, we find that not only the wheat has not been got in, but that much of the potatoes are yet to be lifted. We have only now to recommend exertion in lifting the one and sowing the other with as much despatch as possible, which should be completed, if possible, before Christmas.

Russian beans, peas, and vetches may still be sown. For the details of culture, see operations for previous months.

Lifting and storing roots.—Take advantage of the present favourable weather in lifting and storing such of the Swedes, mangles, carrots, &c., as still remain in the ground. No time should be lost in doing so, as weather may set in rather abruptly to prevent these operations being carried into effect, to the great loss and deterioration of those roots. For details see former calendar of operations. When straw is scarce, and therefore too valuable to use for thatching the roots, sedges and reeds from bog and other rough land, as well as sedge, flaggers, and other aquatic weeds, answer equally well for the purpose, when to be had.

Early potatoes should now be planted, taking advantage of dry weather, but avoid doing so while the weather or land is wet. At this season the lazy bed system is to be preferred to the drill; the sets are more securely and evenly covered, and a perfectly dry bed for them is secured. A liberal supply of fresh stable dung, and six inches of cover, is requisite at this time of year to insure the earliest crop.

Stall fed Cattle should now be so accustomed to their new quarters as to be on full keep. Their houses should be kept moderately warm, and well ventilated, but no cold currents allowed to chill them. Food at regulated hours. Keep them thoroughly clean, and curry and wisp them down twice a day. Dispose of ill-doers; as nothing is to be gained by keeping them over.

Milch Cows should be kept closely to the house, with the exception of an hour each day for exercise, if the weather be fine and temperate. Feed liberally on cooked and raw food alternately. Keep them moderately warm, clean, and well curried and wisped down twice a-day, which will supply the want of exercise in promoting the insensible perspiration so necessary to their health.

Young Cattle should be carefully housed and well fed; they require an abundant supply of nutritious food as much, or more so, than those full grown, to supply the requirements of their increasing size, and the full development of bone, muscle, and flesh.

Farm-horses should now be on full and liberal keep, and kept at constant employment—there is no profit in keeping them idle.

Digging on small farms.—This is the proper time to dig all land not under crop; dig deeply and roughly, so as to expose as great a surface as possible to the fertilizing influence of the atmosphere.

Scott's Commentary on the Bible.

NEW SUBSCRIPTION ISSUE OF SCOTT'S COMMENTARY ON THE HOLY BIBLE.

Notwithstanding the large circulation to which this Commentary has already attained, the demand for it is still so great, that the Publishers have determined to issue another Edition at such a price as will enable many persons to procure it who could not do so at the price at which it was recently published—viz., SIX GUINEAS.

This is the only complete Edition that is, or can be, offered to the public, having the final additions and emendations of the author, extending to upwards of Four Hundred pages, which consist chiefly of Critical Remarks, most important to the Biblical Student.

The Work contains an elaborate and compendious view of the Scripture Evidences—an introduction to each Book in the Old and New Testament, with a statement of its purport and intent—copious Marginal References, various Tables, and a Chronological Index. There is also an extensive Topical Index, which places the whole contents of the Work before the Student, and which will be found of great use in the selection of subjects, or for the elucidation of doctrines.

There are also Fifteen Maps and Sixty-Nine Steel Engravings, Illustrative of Scripture Incidents and Scenery.

COMMENDATORY NOTICES:—"It is the Comment of our Age."—Bishop of Calcutta.

"The writer has never consulted Mr. Scott's Commentary, on difficult passages, in vain. In every instance he found brief but solid refutations of alleged contradictions, which he could find in no other work in the English Language."—Rev. T. Hartwell Horne.

"I believe it exhibits more of the mind of the Spirit in the Scriptures than any other work of the kind extant."—Rev. Andrew Fuller.

"I never like to preach a Sermon without having seen what Scott says about it. If he takes the same view, I consider then that I am tolerably safe."—Rev. J. Harrington Evans.

The Work was originally published at EIGHT GUINEAS, and subsequently reduced to SIX GUINEAS. It is now offered for a limited period, viz., till the 31st December, at the low price of THREE GUINEAS, to parties who may be desirous of subscribing for a copy of the Work, and who are requested to forward their names, with a Post-office order for TEN SHILLINGS, as part payment, to

WILLIAM CURRY AND COMPANY,
9, UPPER SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.

It is expected the Work will be completed soon after the date above named, handsomely bound in purple cloth; and on the closing of the subscription list the price will be again raised.

NEW TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.
Just Published, Royal 4to, Price 5s.,

The Second Epistle of Peter; the Epistles of John and Judas, and the Revelation.

(Translated from the Greek.)

On the basis of the common English Version, with Notes.

This Volume will be followed by other portions of the Scriptures from time to time, as they pass through the hands of the Translators. This revision is not final, but is circulated in the expectation that it will be subjected to a thorough criticism, in order that its imperfections, whatever they may be, may be disclosed and corrected.

"I am obliged to you for giving me an opportunity of examining a specimen of the new great Biblical enterprise in America, of which I had heard much previously. The impression made on my mind is that the undertaking is a valuable one, and that it seems to be in the hands of men of sound views, as far as can be estimated from a short specimen. As to the translation of Job, there seems to be evidence of an extensive acquaintance with what the Germans have done in this department. On the whole, my cursory examination has been as satisfactory as such an examination can be."—Extract of Letter from the Rev. G. Sidney Smith, D.D., Professor of Biblical Greek, Trinity College, Dublin.

Preparing for Publication, in 12mo.,

The World in which I Live, and my Place in it,

BY E. S. A.

Edited by the Rev. JOHN H. BROOME.

The object of this book is to present a succinct history, from the creation to the present time, in connection with Scripture, and with the progress of the Church of Christ.

It is hoped that this slight sketch of the History of the World and of the Church may help the young reader to discern God's moral government and man's duty.

The study of History invariably inculcates principles.

The Romish Church, alive to this fact, is most careful that the Histories put into the hands of her children shall be those of her own writers. But the Protestant Church has hitherto possessed no Epitome of History sufficiently simple to meet the requirements of her youthful students.

The plan of the book embraces a general view of the History of all known nations, having regard to their chronological connection with each other, with copious and comprehensive indexes; and by thus commencing the study of history from the beginning, a good foundation will be laid for the fuller study of any particular History.

The Book will be Published by Subscription, price 5s. 6d., and the Names of intending Subscribers are requested to be sent as early as possible to Wertheim and Macintosh, Paternoster-row, London, or to their Agents for Ireland, WILLIAM CURRY and Co., 9, Upper Sackville-street.
